Although the Japanese are fond of much blood in story and drama, mingled with sacrifice for an ideal or for duty, the Nogi tragedy has never been used as a "plot" for a drama or as the theme for a song. It is too sacred and too recent for trifling with on the stage.

The Forty-Seven Ronin.

There are certain graves in Tokyo which are never clear of the smoke of incense burned by the reverent. These are the tombs of the forty-seven "ronin." Loyalty to those who Providence has placed over them, loyalty even to the point of death, is a characteristic of Japanese literature. It has been a characteristic of the race too, but it is doubtful if this loyalty is as intense to-day as it was in the past.

The sacrifice of themselves by these 47 "ronin" (knight errants) is typical of this characteristic and illustrates the national trait of readiness for sacrifice.

The story is true in every particular. In the feudal era, at the beginning of the 18th century, two feudal lords were appointed to entertain an envoy of the Mikado. Their lack of knowledge of court etiquette was made a pretext to treat them with scorn and one of them, drawing a dirk, wounded his tormenter. To draw a weapon within the precincts of the palace was punishable by death, and the offending lord was sentenced to die by his own hand — by dis-embowlling. This he did.

His retainers, determined to avenge their master, worked till they managed to the secure positions in the household of the chieftain who had caused the death of their feudal lord; one, by marrying a daughter of the man who built the house, secured a perfect plan of the building.

The tormenter was killed by these retainers, his head cut off and the grisly proof of their revenge placed on their dead master's tomb. The authorities were then notified and the 47 waited for sentence of death which they knew inevitable. The sentence was passed, and, in groups of three and four, they chose to commit "hara kiri."

"Hara kiri" differs from a suicide of frenzy in that death is carried out with calm deliberation, ceremoniously, and in a manner that precludes any suggestion that the victim died deliberately and with full possession of his faculties. In the olden days, as soon as the victim thrust his sword into his abdomen, an executioner, frequently the best friend of the man sentenced to commit "hara kiri" and chosen by him, immediately cut off the suicide's head, thereby ending the agony more quickly.

Now Obsolete.

This form of suicide is now almost obsolete. The death of the young man who committed "hara kiri" near the old American Embassy, over the excusion bill, caused such a stir largely because a "hara kiri" for a national purpose had not been known since the deaths of General and Countess Nogi and also because suicide, especially a spectacular suicide, possesses a strange fascination for the Japanese. At first there was an immense wave of feeling, but to-day only passing reference is made to the sad affair, and that, too,rather lightly. A section of the papers tried to make much of the unfortunate incident and perhaps were responsible for inducing other young men to kill themselves too, for there were several suicides over the exclusion clause of the immigration bill, following this one. Public interest, however, gradually receeded. Public opinion has undergone great changes in Japan as elsewhere.

The other suicides over the exclusion act cannot be rightly regarded as "hara kiri." Those suicides took the form of throwing oneself under an onrushing express train, by taking poison, and by shooting. "Hara kiri" must be death by disembowelling, after certain rites and observances have been meticulously followed.

THE PASSING OF THE DIPLOMATIC CORPS

(Contributed.)

Perhaps no diplomatic body in the world has had so unique a position or exercised such a tremendous influence on the country to which its members were accredited than the Diplomatic Body in Peking. Even before the Boxer Rebellion, efforts were made, particularly by the British and American ministers, to find a co-operative basis for their negotiations and relations with the Chinese Government. During the Boxer days, it was evident to all who were as interested in maintaining the integrity of a mistaken and misguided China as they were in upholding their own national dignity and rights, that only in union lay strength. Ever thereafter, until the Great War marred the friendships and the delightful social relations of Peking, did the various ministers function more or less harmoniously under the ægis of the Doyen of the Corps Diplomatique. Great was the sway of power of the diplomats. The Chinese Government, without revenues, without organization, without capable men, except for a very few, found itself more and more dependent upon the exceptional men who guided the international relations of China as well as, very often, her internal policies. The control of the surplus funds of the Maritime Customs and the Salt Gabelle gave this body an awesome influence over politicians and rulers in Peking.

The situation may now be viewed historically. Mistakes were made—everyone makes mistakes. Strong men were strengthened when in reality their strength lay largely in the support of the diplomats. Yuan Shih-kai, for instance, appeared a colossus, when he was really but a small figure in the face of the opposition of the politicians of China. Tuan Chih-jui confused the situation by his destruction of the legal government of Li Yuan-hung, which, no matter how weak, was better than the heritage of illegality and waste which has reached down to this day. Whatever errors the Diplomatic Body as a whole, made, however, it is difficult to find a single incident during the two decades of its power, when its acts were designed to destroy the integrity of China, to continue the chaos, to serve ulterior ends. The Governments at home were not always sympathetic with the exceedingly pro-Chinese attitudes of the diplomats in Peking, many of whom eventually became more Chinese than the mandarins to whose courts they were accredited.

The War's Changes.

The Great War wrought a significant change. Three of the most powerful of the Legation members disappeared from the scene. Germany and Austria became enemies of China, Russia lost her status as a Power because of the débâcle within her boundaries. Many of the smaller nations ceased altogether to be of any importance or even trustworthy, because of the international inter-relationships growing out of the war. It became necessary for the Great Powers to act together to avoid unfortunate entanglements. Great Britain, the United States, Japan, France and Italy became the factors in the Legation quarter during the war. But Japan went her own way for a while, wobbling somewhat between a naval and a military policy which frankly frightened her allies and caused them to wonder what the outcome might be. The Twenty-One Demands and later the Nishihara Loans were not exactly earnests of allied amity. Therefore the United States and Great Britain, under the leadership of Sir John Jordan and Dr. Paul S. Reinsch, developed in Peking a habit of working together on all questions. Perhaps more was accomplished beneficial to China under this rapprochement than at any other period, both Sir John Jordan and Dr. Reinsch being avowed friends of China. This policy culminated in the Washington Conference, which, had China any statesmen, men of the calibre of Li Hung-chang, Wu Ting-fang or Tong Shao-yi in Peking, would have resulted in the greatest benefit to the country.

Now the Diplomatic Corps no longer exists save as a social body. Dr. Jacob Gould Schurman, the American Minister, recently made the suggestion in Shanghai in the course of interviews with the Press that during his Doyenate, he seldom called together the entire diplomatic body but rather worked with groups of similar interests. For instance, there is the Protocol Group, which consists of the nations still having an interest in the Protocol of 1901, growing out of the Boxer Rebellion. There is the Consortium Group, consisting of ministers whose countries are represented in the International Consortium. There is the group of Ministers whose nationals still enjoy extraterritoriality in China. There is, what one might call, the Lincheng Group consisting of those Ministers whose nationals suffered in the Lincheng outrage. These groups may overlap. Some of the Ministers are in all of them, some in many of them. Some are in none of them.

A Shortsighted Trick.

It has been the habit of the heads of the Waichiaopu to take advantage of this apparent lack of unity of interest, among the members of the Diplomatic Corps in Peking. The negotiations with Mr. Karakhan, for instance, were based upon the assumption that now that the Great Bear is no longer part of the general European ménage, it is a wise policy to play him for a good thing against all the foreigners in China. But this policy is as short-sighted as it is mistaken. Russia and the other countries will sooner or later come together on issues of greater moment to them than anything in China and then they will mutually resent China's attitude toward one in making of it a catspaw, toward the other in using Russia as a weapon for undue and perhaps unpleasant pressure. Russia, when her commercial interests in China become sizable will worry over the effects of her noisy and unprofitable play for popularity and will perhaps cry louder than all others for a return to the good old days when the Russian Minister in Peking could and did protect his nationals against official rapacity and misconduct. One cannot forget that the Kaiping mine came into its present management largely because the Chinese were fearsome that Russia might get it. Russia was the menace in those days, Britain, the dear friend. In due course, Russia and China will quarrel, as they have quarrelled in the past over such questions as Manchuria, as the boundaries between the two countries, as the relationships between China and Japan, and at such a time China will have to turn to the nations against whom the Waichiaopu is now intriguing, for friendship and assistance, just as Russia will attempt to find a common cause for bringing China to terms with those members of the Diplomatic Body against whom Mr. Trotsky thundered the other day in praise of the soldier on the wall. Things move and usually move in a circle.

Another Adjustment.

The passing, then, of the Diplomatic Corps does not mean as much as would first appear. It does not mean that each of the Legations in Peking will go off on its own, ignoring altogether the common interests of its colleagues. It means simply that another adjustment has taken place as a result of the war and that instead of a note being written by the Doyen, the identical note will come from each individual legation interested in the particular subject.

AT SEA

In my back yard the flowers are white
Until the sky lets down the night,
And then they bloom in every shade
Of phosphorescent colours made.

By day the lilies are of foam,
That bloom at night with poppies' hue—
And flying fish like orchids roam
In my back yard.

The glint of sun is pansies true
And a hedge of cloud soars heavenward,
Till the star-buds peep
Where dolphins leap
Across the sea's pale flower of blue
In my back yard.

AMATEUR PHOTOGRAPHY

VI.—On Development

By R. V. Dent.

There is hardly a more interesting experiment in the whole range of physical science than watching the gradual development of a photographic film of silver bromide into metallic silver where light has acted upon it, and exactly what change took place when the light touched it remains a complete mystery.

The amateur photographer who wishes to have some slight understanding of what he is doing when he presses the button, and to make progress by knowing his errors in exposure, positively must do a certain amount of developing and printing even though he later gives this to others to do as a rule.

Herein we are going to give formulae, as every packet of films, plates, and papers gives suitable developers, and photographic handbooks are full of them. In any case, formulae are not the key to success and the worker is recommended to choose his developer and stick to it, thus mastering its peculiarities. Many amateurs keep on changing formulae in the vain hope of finding a magic key to perfect negatives, but this idea is quite wrong.

The user of roll-film can have his path made so easy by modern methods that he really knows nothing in spite of having developed numerous films. There is no question that for the type of work he usually does, these methods will give absolutely as good results in the hands of the veriest tyro who uses common care as are obtainable by the most experienced expert.

But. . . . and herein is the pitfall. . . when it comes to producing certain types of negatives for certain clases of work, not understanding his subject the average amateur is all at sea and fondly imagines that his mechanically correct negative will always work. . . which it won't. Explain to him that his tank development is capable of absolute control and he is surprised and sees there is much more to development than he thought.

There are two correct ways, and two ways only, of producing first-class negatives. . . by time, with a known developer at a known temperature, or by the method known as factorial which requires either the factor or the constituents of the developer to be known. Actually factorial development is nothing more nor less than time development, as on the temperature depends the speed with which the developer works.

Tank Development

Space forbids our doing more than deal with development as it interests the average amateur who wishes to develop his own roll-film. He is strongly recommended to employ a tank, for no darkroom is then required and results are certain if he pays attenion to the following points:—

1. Uses a developer about which he has full working information, by which is meant complete time and temperature tables. Such as the Kodak Tank Powders or Tabloid Tancol developer, both of which are certain to give satisfaction. They have the additional advantage of extreme portability. Avoid developers which do not give full working particulars as they waste time and are not certain in use thus being a mistake for amateurs. Never use tank developer twice.

2. Mixes his developer in boiled water, particularly in summer. Ordinary water contains considerable air and herein is the key to much air-bubble trouble (undeveloped spots which fix out to transparent circles) which are so annoying and more common in hot weather. Filtering the mixed developer into the tank through a wad of cotton-wool in a funnel is advisable if convenient.

3. Mixes his fixing bath an hour or so in advance of when it will be required for use, because the addition of hypo to water drops the temperature of the latter and it takes some time for it to recover to room temperature. Acid fixing baths must be used for films to prevent staining. Buy it ready-made in tins in powder form and do not overwork it; fixing-baths last longer in cool weather than in warm.

4. In warm weather especially it is important that the temperature of the developer, hardening, and fixing baths should be approximately the same; otherwise frilling of the film, or, what is much more serious and incurable, general reticulation over the entire negative, may occur.

5. In hot weather, cool the developing solution to at least 75 degrees, and after developing but before fixing place the film in a hardening solution which must also be cool. A reliable and cheap hardener is a saturated solution of alum.

6. After hardening, rinse thoroughly and fix for about 15 minutes. In warm weather add hardener to the fixing-both. More negative troubles are due to incorrect fixing than from insufficient washing. Use your hypo container only for hypo.

The Importance of Washing.

7. Wash for half an hour in running water which is completely changing continuously or in 12 changes of water in trays, five minutes to each change of water. Washing is undoubtedly the amateur's greatest bother and about the easiest way to accomplish it is to insert the stopper of a good-sized basin in such a way that the water steadily flows out, keeping the tap running so that about the same amount or a little more flows into the basin. Be careful it cannot run dry or the hot water tap be turned on by mistake! Suspend the films, cut apart and held in clips, on a rod over the basis. The reason why the water must drain from the bottom is that hypo is heavier than water and will remain in the bottom in the form of a solution thus never washing the film free of it. Soaking is useless. Before and after washing, swab over the negative, back and front, with cotton-wool to remove the scum which forms; this is very important if alum has been used as a hardener.

8. Hang up to dry well away from any wall, as films have gelatine back and front and are susceptible to scratches on either side. Touch off the drops that form at the lower corners and do not try to hurry up the drying when they are partly dry, or incurable drying-marks may result.

The above looks rather fearsome; actually, however, except in extremely hot weather when the precautions stated must be used, there is nothing whatever difficult about developing roll-film successfully with a tank. And in summer only the enthusiast does his own work. But the roll-film user has a bed of roses compared to the plate-worker, who is cooped up in a stifling dark room with no daylight-all-the-way advantages.

Our amateur now knows how to develop a roll-film, but he knows nothing of what goes on inside that tank and what effect longer or shorter times, different developers and temperatures make. Temperature we can dispose of at once. All developers work faster warm than cold. Too cold some will hardly work at all; too warm others become unmanageably quick; elon (metal) is of the first class, hydroquinone of the second. This is one reason why for tray development they are usually mixed. Pyro (most tank developers are pyro) follows the universal rule and is far faster when warm than cold.

In actual practice all the principal developers will give equally good results; therefore choice is a matter of convenience. Avoid pyro except for tank use as it stains the fingers badly and elon-hydroquinone does not, a great advantage. There is absolutely no need for the amateur photographer to have stained fingers.

What Is Happening

Development starts with the high-lights . . . the parts of the negative most affected by light; the period elapsing between covering the negative with developer and the first appearance of the high-lights is the speed at which the developer works and it has been found that this bears a constant ratio to a correctly developed negative of a certain desired contrast. The number of times longer required to achieve this result is known as the factor. This factorial system works very well except for serious errors in exposure, when time and temperature is preferable, and produces the better results.

Gradually the medium lights and lastly the shadow details are brought out. If development is now stopped the negative will be thin all over and have little contrast. If development is continued, the high-lights will build up faster than the shadows; therefore the contrast between high-lights and shadows increases with more development. Thus the rule . . . density is governed by exposure but contrast by development. The time and temperature system produces the best possible results from normal, under—and over-exposed negatives, whereas the factorial tends to over-develop the former and under-develop the latter.

If developed to excess, the high-lights will clog and if an under-exposed negative is overdeveloped in the vain hope of producing detail which isn't there, then the result is such extreme contrast that the negative is unprintable.

Many amateurs are puzzled to tell the difference between an under-developed fully exposed negative and an under-exposed one. Look for the shadow detail. If there are blanks in the negative it is under-exposed; if there is detail everywhere but is thin all over, it was correctly exposed but under-developed. The latter can be greatly improved by intensification . . . chromium is the best for the amateur . . . whereas nothing can improve under-exposures, intensification merely increasing contrasts thus making matters worse. Over-exposures within the latitude of the film, properly developed, give dense but otherwise good negatives. This merely increases the printing time.

Portrait negatives should be developed about half the time or factor required for landscapes. Indoor subjects, three-quarters the time, there being no great contrasts indoors.

The Factorial System

Those who want to use the factorial system are recommended to always use the same developer; Tabloid "Rytol" is first rate; the factors are 15 for landscapes, twelve for average subjects such as street scenes, and about eight for portraits. Take care not to fog the film by working too close to the red lamp, and have a lamp which is really "safe." Before commencing developing wet the film by passing through a tray of water; this ensures even development and avoids streaks. Use deep trays only.

Reduction is best left alone by the amateur, and there should hardly ever be need of either reduction or intensification if development is correctly done. Stock solutions are a mistake in summer as they have a painful knack of going bad just when wanted. This reminds one of a good little story . . . some time ago, requiring the use of a wide-angle lens, inquiry was made for one in a well-known local store; imagine the inquirer's surprise when he was told that they didn't stock them because they won't keep in summer!!

The negative is but a means to an end, that end being the production of the print. On the quality of the negative depends to a very great extent the quality of the subsequent print. It is clear, therefore, that if the best possible print is required the worker must know just what type of negative he requires and work so as to get it. That explains why the finest workers do it themselves; it is mechanical but so is hitting a ball at golf . . . it must be done right or the result is not satisfactory.

VII.—On Printing

By the print is your photographic ability judged. This banal statement is called forth by the frequency with which one is told that the negative is first-rate but the print doesn't do it justice, etc. "If only" . . . but the answer is, make prints that do justice to the negative.

Many amateurs seem to get into the bad habit of collecting negatives; but negatives are only the means to an end and it is the final print that matters. Here we may mention that the only test of a negative is the print it will give, and it is in obtaining the best possible print from it that skill is required.

Contact printing with printing-out-paper (P.O.P.) is so easy it could be done by a child. Every amateur is advised to master it, however, as the knowledge thus gained is most useful. The only requisites are a printing-frame, water, and a dish of hypo, if self-toning p.o.p. is used. The beginner should start his printing experience with a packet of self-toning paper and use a hinged-back printing-frame which enables him to judge how far printing has gone by visual inspection of the print.

Full instructions for use are enclosed with every packet. What the amateur frequently does not know, because he is not told, is that p.o.p. requires, a negative of moderate density and contrast, and is useless for very thin negatives as a few experiments soon show. Thinnish negatives (if not too thin for the process) are best printed in diffused sunlight. It is a curious fact that a sheet of green glass placed over the printing-frame will increase contrasts. Print deeper than is required in the finished print as toning lightens the image and changes its colour.

Some collodion papers give superb results, sepia coloured, and are not affected by warm temperatures or warm solutions, and also can be dried by heat. These are eminently suitable for the amateur. The secret of good tones lies in thorough washing between printing and fixing. The print should be washed until the washing-water shows no trace of milkiness; then fix. Do not let the prints lie still on top of one another in the fixing bath or uneven tones will result. An acid fixing-bath must not be used for p.o.p.; use the usual plain hypo-solution.

The disadvantages of p.o.p. are that daylight is essential, thus ruling it out for most amateurs for most days in the week, and also enlarging on it is a practical impossibility. But for making contact proofs easily and quickly it is far and away the most convenient medium. Of course self-toning paper is not required for rough proofs. . . which are usually never toned at all.

The next step in learning printing is the use of what is known as "gas-light" paper, a very slow developing-paper of the bromide type, specially made to cope with the general run of amateur's negatives. Any reliable make will give good results provided the grade of contrast is suitable to the negative. The importance of this to the amateur is so great we propose to go into the matter in detail so that he may have an understanding of this point; then half his printing-troubles will vanish.

The negatives made by the average amateur do not run evenly; some have good contrast and some next to none. . mere "ghosts." These latter can be printed only on vigorous gas-light paper, the process being chiefly remarkable for its ability to give a good print from a negative too thin for any other process whatsoever. Therefore for negatives with little contrast use "vigorous" (contrasty) paper, for all others use "soft" (normal) grade. This is of great importance as using the wrong grade of paper will give poor prints.

Wherein lies the difference between contrasty and normal paper? It is in the scale or range of contrasts. Taking 1 as representing white paper and 10 as the deepest black the paper can give, 1 to 10 in the scale of contrast. This is a wonderfully small range, and only the vigorous gas-light paper has it, and it means that if the densest portion of the negative is only 10 times as dense as the lightest it will give a perfect print. The scale of normal gas-light is 1 to 20; therefore it needs a better and more contrasty negative. Thus we arrive at our explanation of why choice of the correct grade of paper is so important; if we use a negative with a scale of contrast of about 1 to 10 on paper with a scale of 1 to 20, it is clear our whites will not be pure whites or our blacks cannot be deep blacks, because we have not exhausted the range of the paper: we have used an unsuitable grade. Vice-versa, using a longscale negative with a contrasty (short-scale, called "vigorous") paper will cause all the finer detail to come out black and all the denser portions plain white. Again, wrong paper was used. If the amateur once grasps this quite clearly half his printing troubles will end.

Details of development we need not discuss here as they are fully dealt with in photographic handbooks. Gaslight paper flashes up in the developing tray and should be fully developed in less than half a minute. Fix thoroughly, keeping the prints moving.

Exposure is somewhat long unless a powerful light is used. Remember that the power of light changes as the square of the distance from it. Thus at one foot four times as long is required as at six inches; at two feet four times what it is at one foot, etc. Never alter the intensity of your illuminant but alter its duration. The best way is to once for all measure off an exact six inches, one foot, and two feet, and use one distance as standard, the others when widely different times are required. The printing-frame is best kept moving slightly during printing unless the light is diffused by a piece of ground-glass.

Gaslight paper can be worked in a room which is weakly illuminated by artificial light but is better worked in a bright yellow light. Do not take unnecessary chances as any light which will print it will fog it if the paper is exposed to it sufficiently long.

Bromide printing is a long-scale process, about 1 to 40, thus requiring more contrasty negatives to utilize the full range of the paper. At once we see why so many bromide-prints done by amateurs are not satisfactory. . . their negatives were unsuitable for the process. Even contrasty bromide has a longer scale than soft gas-light. No professional uses contrasty paper unless compelled to, as the longer scale of normal paper gives a much softer and more pleasing effect.

Bromide paper is very fast and should be worked in a red light only. Exposures are brief and the amateur often wonders why three or four seconds at one foot from a 32 c.p. lamp will give him an over-exposed print whereas he may need fully that to get a properly exposed negative indoors with his camera. The answer of course is that the entire surface of the paper is exposed to the light whereas in his camera the light must all pass through a small aperature in the lens.

Test exposures save a lot of trouble in bromide printing. The latitude of the emulsion is far from that of a plate, it being much thinner, and therefore the variations cannot be so great without ruining the print. To make a test judge the correct exposure and give somewhat less; now cover one quarter of the printing frame with a piece of cardboard; expose half as long as the first time cover another quarter and give the same exposure again; repeat the process; the last quarter of the paper has thus received two and a half times the exposure of the whole negative. From the resulting developed and fixed print the correct exposure is seen. The economy of thus using one sheet to discover exactly what is the best exposure is only appreciated when sheets and sheets are wasted trying to arrive at it without some such system.

To print from a wet negative, soak the paper and bring it in close contact with the thoroughly wet negative; wipe off surplus water and print without a printing-frame. Fine results of course cannot be expected. To remove the print from the negative, soak both and take it off under water; otherwise the negative may be damaged.

Development of bromide paper must always be full. Trying to save an over-exposed print by hurriedly removing it from the developer will result in a poor tone, while forcing development degrades the whites through chemical fog and gives disagreeable greenish-blacks. Thus for good bromide printing, exposure is the key to fine work, not development, which should always be full. Wet the paper before developing, to ensure even action of the developer.

In summer a certain amount of bromide is necessary to keep the whites pure. The most convenient way is to add drops of 10 per cent. solution of potassium bromide. Up to about 15 drops per ounce of developer. Too much should not be used unless the worker knows just what he is doing. The amount of bromide used has a great effect on the colours obtained by subsequent toning; this is not known by the majority of photographers, and can only be learnt by laborious experiment. We shall deal

Drying prints is not difficult; placing them face upwards on cheese-cloth after blotting off surplus moisture soon dries them. Heat should not be applied to any gelatine emulsion or it may melt.

Masked prints (usually a narrow white border) are extremely simple to obtain; ready-cut masks are made to fit all standard sizes of printing-frames and if the frame is the same size as the negative the print is necessarily masked accordingly. The amateur who wants something more than the usual stereotyped prints had better either match his masks to suit his negatives, thus trimming his prints by masking the negative, or not bother about masking the print and rely on subsequent trimming and mounting to produce the desired effect. Almost every print requires trimming and it is a mistake to have them all the same size and shape, regardless of whether the picture demands it. No use having a picture of baby in the fields, 70 per cent. fields, 25 per cent. white paper representing sky, and 5 per cent. baby. Trim it down to proportions more befitting to baby's dignity!!

Border-printing is suitable only for sepia-toned prints, as otherwise they are apt to look somewhat funeral. It is quite simple; use a printnig frame larger than the negative; fit the negative once and mask it suitably right up to the edges of the printing frame. Now, on a sheet of glass exactly fitting the front of the printing frame, gum a paper mask just a shade smaller than the desired print; leave a border of plain glass and mask all the rest of the glass. Expose very briefly through this glass first, then remove and insert negative with its inside mask, and print as usual. The paper films are rolled in makes excellent masks.

We have not dealt with many important points in printing, of interest to the amateur, such as spotting, blocking, finishing, glazing, vignetting, reverse-vignetting, shading, softening, sunning-down, plate-marking, etc., nor have we given points on toning. All these, so far as they interest the amateur, we shall deal with in our articles on Projection Printing (commonly called Enlarging) and General Information.

GRAMOPHONE NOTES

The Modern Instrument

By Marcato.

In comparison with other wondrous achievements of this modern age, the gramophone has made deplorably little progress. It is, indeed, only within the last year or so that it has been heaved out of the rut of the commonplace, and an effort made to invest it with the rank of real musical worth. For the improvements at present being made, the music-lover's thanks are due, not so much to the foresight of those at the head of the industry, as to the public itself whose demand for music of the right kind has set up very keen competition among producers. Not only is the musical taste of the enthusiast being considered, but the vexed question of reproduction too, is receiving the benefit of scientific investigation. Both paths might easily have been travelled the same extent many years ago, and the only balm available now is afforded in the doubtful relief of certain old fashioned adages which the position calls to mind. In spite of the fact then, that there is still plenty of room for advancement, one cannot but admit to-day that the gramophone bids fair to become an instrument of high artistic value

Musician's Recognition.

The barriers of prejudice erected as a result of the noise-machines of old, are fast being overcome, and musicians everywhere are acclaiming the modern instrument an important factor in the educational life of the public. Sir Henry Wood, in particular, who for many years held very decided objections to the gramophone, has now entirely altered his views. This eminent musician, at a recent convention of the Federation of British Music Industries, spoke highly of the instrument and its uses. The Press too, including the most conservative of periodicals, is profuse in its recognition of the gramophone's popularity, and in addition there are several excellent papers entirely devoted to the interests of the gramophone enthusiast. One of these, edited by the author, Compton Mackenzie, deserves special mention as a thoroughly interesting and well conducted enterprise.

Symphonic Recordings.

Twelve months ago practically none of the many record catalogues could boast of a composition extending over more than two sides, while to-day the collector may own fully recorded sets of at least four of Beethoven's symphonies, two of Tschaikowsky's, one of Dvorak's, many overtures and symphonic poems, and several quartets and other chamber music works. The cult of the "cut" record is no longer; it will not, one fervently hopes, ever be revived. While on the subject of works of major proportions, it is interesting to note that an outstanding feature of forthcoming announcements is the recording of César Franck's great Symphony in D Minor. This work was, by the way, given the greatest number of votes in a poll recently taken amongst its readers by a Home paper.

Gramophone Societies.

The idea of the gramophone society at Home is actively being taken up all over the country. Many first class organizations have been formed with extremely successful results. Periodical concerts are held and carefully chosen programmes, often accompanied by lectures, are enthusiastically carried out. Gilbert and Sullivan evenings are one of the most popular attractions, although chamber music and symphonic concerts receive a full share of appreciation. The whole thing is very commendable, and apart from the cheerful spirit of camarderie which the gatherings engender, and the mutual benefit derived from the exchanges of ideas, much good work is being done.

American Issues.

Latest American lists are really very disappointing. The recording itself is first rate, but the type of musical offering more often than not reflects little discrimination on the part of those responsible. A month or two ago, for instance, Kreisler had wasted his genius on some popular little melody, while one of the greatest sopranos had given her lovely voice for the recording of a sentimental song of the variety-stage type. As a direct contrast, one found in the H.M.V. list much worthy material. First, Chaliapin in "Don Giovanni," Hislop in "Rigoletto," the Royal Albert Hall Orchestra in Bach and Handel, Florence Austral in "Cavalleria Rusticana," and last but not least, a complete recording of the Choral Symphony.

H. M. V. Features.

The latest (July) supplement to hand contains much that is interesting. A new singer is introduced in the attractive personality of Madame Dal Monte who has made a double sided record of great brilliance. Her selection is from Donitzetti's "Lucia." Battistini, the well known baritone has contributed two songs, one from Gluck's little-known opera "Paride ed Elena," and the other by Denza. There are two waltzes by Rachmaninoff, that of Chopin in B minor Op. 69, and of Tschaikowsky in A flat Op. 40. Bach figures on a double-sided record by that eminent exponent, Harold Samuel. The items chosen are the Prelude and Fugue in B flat, and a Fantasia in C minor. The former is taken from the celebrated "forty-eight." A number of unusual merit is Tschaikowsky's Quartet in D major recorded in complete form on four double sided records by the Virtuoso String Quartet, an organization composed of English players. The ensemble of their playing is reported to be excellent, although the chosen title, which refers to the Quartet as a whole and not to individual players, has brought about a certain amount of criticism. Peter Dawson, the ever-popular, is heard to advantage in two rollicking sea songs, one by Coleridge Taylor, and another by Gilbert. Sir Harry Lauder, too, contributes two humourous numbers in his own inimitable style.

Elgar's "Sea-Pictures" Cycle.

A recording worth mention is that of Elgar's "Sea Pictures" Song Cycle, sung by Leila Megane. The more one hears these records, the greater is their charm revealed. It will be remembered that the songs were given upon the occasion of a Subscription Concert in Shanghai last season, when Mrs. Lyle was the vocalist. The records, issued some few months ago, are obtainable on two double sided black label H.M.V.

Brunswick Latest.

A word of praise is due to the excellent tone obtained in the Brunswick dance records. The best of the latest batch to hand from Geola Ltd. include "That Lullaby Strain" and "Yes, There's Yes in Your Eyes," both by the Oriole Orchestra, two really irresistible foxtrots, and two more, entirely jazzy by Gene Rodemich's Orchestra, "Mobile Blues" and "Tenth Interval Rag." Other dances by Carl Fenton's Orchestra are also to be recommended. We are also regaled with some vocal selections of a semi-humourous nature in the American style, and a violin solo by Fradkin. His two numbers include Drigo's "Valse Bluette" and a small piece by Fibich-Kubelik. The tone is exceptionally round and mellow, although it must be admitted that piano and violin tone on the Brunswick is invariably first rate. The Capitol Grand Orchestra's contribution is three numbers from Tschaikowsky's "Casse Noisette" Suite—the "Danse des Mirlitons," "Danse Chinoise" and "Valse des Fleurs," quite well done.

WET-SEASON ACHES & PAINS

Rub Zam-Buk in to Banish Rheumatism, Sciatica, Pains in the Back and Chest

Whilst known universally for its successful treatment of skin diseases and injuries Zam-Buk is equally valuable for dispelling muscular rheumatism, sciatica, and pains in the back, chest and joints.

Rubbed well into the affected parts, Zam-Buk's powerful herbal essences penetrate right down to the seat of the trouble, moving pain, soreness, congestion and inflammation in a wonderful way. At the same time, Zam-Buk strengthens the skin and tissues, enabling them to resist damp and chill.

Ex-Lieut. Commander H. J. Morgan, R.N., of Porchester, Hants, England, says:—"As a result of getting wet through, I began to suffer from acute pains which started at the top of my leg and extended down to the knee, and at times, even to the ankle. At first I thought it was cramp, but the pains got so agonizing it was like a saw being run up and down the limb.

"On a friend's advice I got a box of Zam-Buk. When I rubbed this balm well into my crippled leg it gave almost immediate relief. I therefore preserved with Zam-Buk daily until the pians and stiffness all disappeared and I was able to lay aside my sticks, without which I had not been able to hobble about. To-day, thanks to Zam-Buk, I am able to walk and cycle long distances without discomfort."

Zam-Buk is also unequalled for the cure of eczema, impetigo, Dhobies' itch, heat sores, rashes and swellings, ulcers, piles, abscesses, sore feet, cuts, burns, scalds, bites, etc. Guaranteed to contain no animal fat or other impurity Zam-Buk keeps well in any climate. The record price of £1,400 was recently paid for a first edition of "The Pickwick Papers." The opening bid was one of £500.

Three recent novels recommended:—"The Sinister Man," by Edgar Wallace (Hodder and Stoughton, 7s. 6d.); "Quack," by Robert Elson (Hutchinson, 7s. 6d.); "The Brothers," by John Sillars (Blackwood, 7s. 6d.).

The Society of Authors appeals to publishers to date their books—that is, to give, in the first and every other edition or reprint, the date of the original publication. The idea of this is that books of all kinds, even novels, often serve as historical documents of great importance.

There will probably be some piquant revelations in a new book with which Lord Birkenhead is busy just now. This is to be a three-volume history of British politics during the last twenty years.

A librarian who was recently asked to recommend some novels suitable for hot-weather reading suggested the following: Porter's 'Freckles,' Bullen's 'Call of the Deep,' Stacpoole's 'Beach of Dreams,' Phelps's 'Shady Side,' Collins's 'Woman in White,' Rowlands's 'In the Shadow,' Hocking's 'In the Sweat of Thy Brow,' Hardy's 'Under the Greenwood Tree,' Vachell's 'Blinds Down,' France's 'The Gods are Athirst,' Canfield's 'The Brimming Cup,' and Burchell's 'My Lady of the Bass'!"

Mr. Ford Madox Ford collaborated with the late Mr. Joseph Conrad in a novel entitled "The Nature of a Crime," which will be published by Duckworth in the course of the next few weeks. It is a story of contemporary life, and presents the study of a man's mind at the crisis of a great emotional drama. The book will contain two prefaces by Mr. Conrad and Mr. Ford respectively, and an appendix in which the joint method of collaboration is explained.

It has always been understood that Mark Twain left an autobiography, though hitherto his family have said little about it. Now, however, the announcement is made that it will be published in the autumn, with an introduction by Mr. Albert Bigelowe Paine, who wrote his biography. The book, which will make two volumes, was dictated at intervals over a long period of years. Mark Twain chose his subjects without regard to chronology, but according to what most interested him at the moment. Knowing the record would not be published in his lifetime, he set it down very frankly.

No imaginative book of our time has been better regarded or more widely read than Mr. Ernest Bramah's "Wallet of Kai-Lung." It was liked and understood by high-brows and low-brows, and by all classes of folk between those two categories. Shortly we shall have another volume of stories by him, probably, although this is not settled, under the title of one of them, "Once In a Blue Moon." It is remarkable how often the word "blue" comes into pretty and inviting titles, as if it assured good romance. Mr. de Vere Stacpoole's "Blue Lagoon" is a classic in this colour of a title.

Interest was excited by a series of articles on Lord Morley which recently appeared in the "Quarterly Review." They were by Mr. J. H. Morgan, they were written as a result of personal contact with their subject, and sometimes they were almost interviews with him. Mr. Morgan, who was a Brigadier-General during the war, is gathering the papers into a book which John Murray will publish under the title. "John, Viscount Morley: An Appreciation and Some Reminiscences." Perhaps it will be as intimate a study of a man great in letters and in politics as we shall ever get, for John Morley banned any biography of himself.

POETRY

RETURN AND OTHER POEMS. By E. S. Barlow. London: Grant, Richards, Ld., 3/6 net.

Grant Richards have a list of books of poetry to their credit which entitles them to the gratitude of all poetry-lovers. It may be doubted whether any book on the list, with the exception of the two A. E. Housman volumes, has achieved a financial success commensurate with the trouble and cost of publication. The publishing of poetry is not a paying business. The discouragement of it, moreover, is not only in the counting house. If these books of poetry were advertised as to be had free upon application, would the circulation be larger? I doubt it. Faith in the advance of letters and a tireless, undaunted energy in its promotion, these the publishers of poetry oppose to the mountain of the reading public's indifference. Sometime it must move. Meantime a few scattered eccentrics are free to enjoy the results of the research and sound judgment of such houses as Grant Richards.

Seeing their name upon the cover of this little book by E. S. Barlow, it was with a thrill of anticipatory pleasure that I opened it. The anticipation has been justified. There are several beautiful poems in the small collection. They are not all upon the same high level, of course. There is a vagueness of thought in one or two and an untidiness of structure and versification. It is commonly believed and said in these days that modern thought and fancy cannot be confined in poetic expression to the old forms of even metre and rhyme without sacrificing the truth of the thought. Here again, as in much other modern poetry, that belief is disproved. For in the poems where the expression is ragged, the thought also is cloudy; and in those where the conception is clearest the expression falls easily and naturally into the conventional forms. In the title poem, for instance, which is the first in the book, there is a beautiful idea half-formed in the mind which pours itself out in verse reading like alexandrines out of step, out of control. It is a little irritating, for the beauty of the thought was worthy of a more polished expression. That it could have received it is amply proven by such poems as "The Choice" and "Derivation" and one other I shall come to. In "The Choice" a light fancy is given a quaint turn, delightfully expressed in symmetrical, perfectly balanced verse.

The little lark trilled out in glee
And ecstasy, and ecstasy.
"O look, the skies are blue," he said.
"Why don't you come up too," he said,
"And play with me?"

The little mole who burrows deep
Began to creep, began to creep.
"The earth is warm and dark," said he
"Why emulate the lark?" said he
"Come down and sleep."

Alas, dear lark, I cannot fly.
You soar too high, you soar too high.
My place is underground, I said
And earth shall wrap me round, I said,
There where I lie.

Again, the deeper idea of love's reliance is sung in smoothly finished cadences in

DERIVATION.

The sea that glitters in its sun-flecked pride
Shines with a borrowed glow,
And all its brilliance does but serve to hide
The sunless depths below.

So every light whereof my soul bears part
Is drawn from you alone:
Nor have the shadowy caverns of my heart
A glimmer of their own.

Yours is the shining image that I find
Reflected from afar;
Your love and thought lie mirrorred in my mind,
Whose only sun you are.

But the weightiest evidence in favour of the conventional forms of versification and rhyme is on page 30. Were there no other page in the book it would be a joy to have it for this one alone. It must be quoted in extenso:

AT THE END.

If love grows cold between us, let it die.
Bury it deep and pile the earth above.
Better the truth than any careful lie
Of lukewarm love.
I could not live with you and see your will
Fettered by memories, longing to be free,
Yet feigning to itself that bondage still
Was liberty.

To feel a sense of duty in your kiss,
To sound the depths and find no answer there
But ready shallow courtesies, all this
I could not bear.

Enough that I was by you in your need,
With you when trouble lingered at your door.
If ever I have helped by word or deed,
I ask no more.

Not vain those first deep feelings of your heart
Nor purposeless the hours that we spent.
If truth but stand beside us when we part,
I am content.

What if another reaps where I have sown
And lightly plucks the fruit my toil has won.
Mine are the dark days she can never own.
My work is done.

It is not fair to think of Browning. This poem cannot owe anything to the influence even of such a master. The light lament, "Tomorrow we meet the same, then dearest," with its mingled regret and suppressed relief, has nothing in common with it. It stands alone. In versification and happiness of rhyme it is flawless. Yet there is never the slightest strain. Every word is the only possible one, simple and direct. The slight slip in the second line of the fifth verse, where the scansion requires two syllables in the word "hours," is probably a printer's error; for one has only to read "have spent" instead of "spent" to correct it. No doubt the poet's draft had it so. "Have spent" carries the idea of finality.

There are several poems in this book which show that musical language is the natural expression of deep feeling, beauty of conception. Poetry is not a matter of moulding and cramping an idea to fit a form of words. An idea contemplated with a sustained high vision falls naturally, in expression, into a rhythmic order. In none of the poems here is this better exemplified than in "At The End." In the construction there is no betrayal of conscious craftsmanship in the details of the six rounded verses and their relation to the finished poem. It is not like a jewel of six cut gems set in an ordered shape. Rather is it like a six-petalled fadeless flower, perfect in form because the root lies deep in the poet's heart.

JOHN LOFTING.

SIDELIGHTS ON THE BOOK TRADE

Sir Frederick Macmillan Tells of a Famous Victory

"THE NET BOOK AGREEMENT, 1899, AND THE BOOK WAR, 1906-1903." By Sir Frederick Macmillan. Privately published.

Sir Frederick Macmillan, in this admirably printed volume, gives us two chapters in the history of the book trade. The first relates to the publishers' attack, led by the writer himself, upon the discount book system that was in vogue during the latter half of the last century. Books were published at one price and sold at another. Messrs. Macmillans led the attack by publishing an important book (it was Professor Marshall's "Principles of Economics"—a standard work) at a net price, and gradually other publishing houses followed their lead, until the net book agreement was reached in 1898.

The account of the subsequent "Book War" (what a delightful subject for a mock-epic) is the work of Mr. Edward Bell, who was President of the Publisher's Association during the time the conflict raged—1906—1908. The issue was, of course between the Association and the then newlyformed Times Book Club, which undertook to supply its members with "clean and uninjured copies" at discount rates. Mr. Bell describes the resulting campaigns in a very spirited manner, and Sir Frederick Macmillan rounds off the volume with an account of the negotiations for concluding the Book War. This volume is apparently intended for persons immediately interested—publishers, booksellers, and so forth, but actually it is good reading for anybody who has even the mildest interest in books.

A STORY OF HONGKONG

"CHUN YUT." by Cyril Weston. Hutchinson & Co.

This story is told with an intimate knowledge of the country and its customs and with rare insight into the psychology of the Chinese. The exploits of Chun Yut and his friend Morris, the English sailor, in their search for the hidden treasure secreted in a temple in the heart of the Kuangtung province, supply the reader with plenty of excitement. But, somehow, the book lacks vitality. A story of adventure, to be really thrilling, should have the racing touch that some writers of fiction happily possess. Then again, and end of the adventure is lacking in any dramatic element, and is somewhat unsatisfying. Where the author has succeeded, and succeeded admirably, is in his description of life in the interior. The chapters devoted to the journey on the "Saigonga" disclose an intimate knowlege of junk life, and the characterization of the loat people is extremely effective. One gives thanks to an author who knows his China and writes about it well without having recourse to the "opium den" and other stock sensations.

BETTER THAN SHERLOCK HOLMES

The Handwriting Wizard

"PSYCHO-GRAPHOLOGY: A STUDY OF RAFAEL SCHERMANN." By Eugene S. Bagger. Putnam. 3s. 6d.

When Sherlock Holmes glanced at a stranger and then remarked casually, for the benefit of Dr. Watson, that this stranger was a clerk with a wife and three children, a collector of foreign stamps, and apt to be bad-tempered on Wednesdays and Fridays, he was performing a feat that is merely childish when compared with those performed regularly by the subject of this new book, Rafael Schermann. Schermann is the great Viennese psycho-graphologist, who has been performing miracles for years. In the first place, of course, being a graphologist, he is a handwriting expert in the ordinary way, and can deduce character from handwriting. But he can do a great deal more—he can see visions by means of handwriting. His peculiar faculty has been described by Professor Fischer, of the University of Prague, as "second sight, induced or stimulated by handwriting."

And in this little book Mr. Bagger describes the activities of this unique personality. Some of Schermann's results seem to be due to an amazing acquaintance with what may be called the science of script-reading, and do not appear to have any visionary quality in them. Thus, he once traced an unpleasant person who for years had tormented a family by telephone hoaxes. He looked over the family correspondence, Mr. Bagger tells us, and found in one of the handwritings the shape of a telephone receiver wrought most ingeniously into the capital D. and S. The writer, he argued, was preoccupied with the telephone, and when he saw her privately, and accused her of being the author of these hoaxes, she broke down, confessed, and promised not to do it again. It appears that people are apt to introduce into their script anything with which they are preoccupied.

Mr. Bagger gives us specimens of handwriting submitted to Schermann, in which he found traces of a hand, a revolver, a steamship, and so on, and made his deductions accordingly. But even if persons do not give themselves away in this fashion, they are not safe from this wizard, because the very sight of script induces a certain faculty of vision or clairvoyance in him. This faculty has been tested time after time by showing him the handwriting of persons who, unknown to him, have already met their death in some unusual way, and he has declared very emphatically either what had or what would happen to them. He has, we gather, prevented murders and suicides, reunited lovers, detected criminals, and saved innocent persons, and even noticed diseases.

"He looks at a couple of script specimens," Mr. Bagger tells us, "and out of them he reconstructs the story of two human lives. His diagnosis is astonishingly correct, and his visitor is overwhelmed. Her excitement from the outset has helped in establishing a psychic contact with the seer; but now her will is like clay in his hands. He commands her to surrender the poison she carries. So he knows that, too! She opens her bag and hands over the poison." And all is well. The most astonishing detective in the wildest sensational narrative never dreamed of the feats described by Mr. Bagger. Fact is continually over-reaching fiction, and Schermann well deserves a volume all to himself.—"Daily News."

SIR OLIVER LODGE AND THE ATOM

"ATMOS AND RAYS." By Sir Oliver Lodge. Ernest Benn. 21s.

Sir Oliver Lodge is a writer on scientific subjects who has the great gift of making his readers feel that they are taking part in an exciting exploration. He has now written a book on the structure of the atom, which, though the average novel reader may find it difficult to follow, will afford a great deal of pleasure to ordinary men who are willing to do a little brain-work. The ordinary man has not yet realized that the atom is a sort of Solar System in miniature. There is a central nucleus round which electrons circulate "very much as the planets revolve round the sun."

It is a strange fact that science, which two or three generation ago was making war on the incredible, has in recent years introduced us to a world which would seem to many people to be infinitely more incredible than the Garden of Eden. The non-scientific man can scarcely help thinking of the atom as something perfectly solid. Sir Oliver Lodge tells him that, on the contrary, an atom, like the Solar System, consists mainly of empty space. An electrical particle discharged into an atom would be just as unlikely to hit one of the particles of which the atom is composed as a huge projectile hurled into the Solar System would be to hit one of the planets or the sun. So great in proportion is the amount of space compared with the amount of matter in an atom that Sir Oliver asserts that "if all the electrical particles which compose a human body could be violently compressed into absolute contact, the bulk would be reduced to a billionth part." In such circumstances, indeed, 16 stone would "occupy only a fraction of a cubic millimetre instead of 22 gallons."

A Prophecy.

Sir Oliver tells us a great deal about the new atomic astronomy, and leads up to a final chapter on the possibility of discovering a means of harnessing the hitherto inaccessible energy of matter and of the ether. "The idea is coming to the front," he declares, "that some of what we think of as the atomic energy of matter may be somehow made available. It is thought that this intrinsic energy is already being used to maintain the heat of the sun and other stars, though it is not yet tractable by any human device. It seems just possible that we may arrive at tapping the energy of the ether before we have learnt to use the intrinsic energy of matter." He ends with the expression of a hope, however, that we shall not discover too many secrets of this kind until our knowledge and wisdom have increased to such a degree that we shall not use them for deadly purposes.—"Daily News."

WHEN IT WAS DARK

"MAN BEFORE HISTORY." By Mary E. Boyle, Harrap. 3s. 6d.

Miss Boyle's "short account of prehistoric times," which is inscribed to her nephews and nieces, is enriched with a charming little preface by a principal authority, Abbé Henri Breuil. The Abbé has also supplied sundry reproductions of prehistoric beasts from the paintings in the French and Spanish caves. Miss Boyle only aims at a text-book, and her most delightful chapter, "a little girl's discovery," recalls the chance finding of the paintings of weird animals in a Spanish cave by the Marquis de Sautuola's little daughter in 1879. The author incidentally recalls the old story that the earth began to exist in B.C. 4004, but does not scruple to describe the characteristics of the Aurignacians of 25,000 years ago. She has brought both research and sense of humour to her investigation.

THE WOMAN'S PAGE

CHINESE GIRLS AND WESTERN MUSIC

Natural Affinity for Bach's Measures

By Elizabeth Pepys.

East has not only met West, but East and West have begun to study each other's art and literature, and general way of doing things. Mr. Henry Eichheim comes from the Boston Symphony Orchestra to study Chinese rhythms. Chinese artists go abroad to study Western art or are instructed in Shanghai in the Occidental perspectives and futuristic fancies. Mr. Rountree thinks their work so good that he comes to China to find out what produced their strength of line. Miss Frieda Frommel finds her Chinese piano students resilient to the impact of Bach, Chopin and Debussy.

Miss Frommel, who is known to many music lovers of Shanghai as a skillful interpreter of Chopin, has a studio "for music and languages" at 489B Avenue Joffre. Here she has collected a large following of music pupils and also has a number of classes and private pupils in French conversation, besides adding to her linguistic attainments by studying Russian and Chinese. A number of Chinese girls are studying with Miss Frommel and our illustration shows a group of them after tea has been served in a Chinese garden near the studio.

"Don't you find it difficult, teaching Chinese pupils?" is a question often asked Miss Frommel, to which she replies: "Not difficult, but different. At first, perhaps, it is a strain. We must remember that the Chinese have never played upon the piano, or even tapped the keys of a typewriter. Their slender, tapering fingers—and what nation has more graceful hands?—have never been trained by five-finger exercises. Their wrists, however, are unusually strong.

"But technique, important as it is as a foundation, is not what counts with a musician. I can develop their fingers easily. The essential thing is to teach them how to express what the music means to them. It is not that they do not understand what the composer has at heart to say. I find my girls very intuitive in that respect. But to express it, that is very different. Emotions were created, the Chinese girl feels, to be concealed. To pour out your soul through the medium of music seems appallingly self-revealing to the repressed and self-contained Oriental.

"But when she once is willing to yield herself to the sway of the musician, to give out his message truthfully, O then, what possibilities! The Chinese student is essentially teachable, she will work unstintedly, her memory is marvellous. Yes, I expect to be very proud of these pupils some day. Their favourite composers? Bach seems to touch some specially responsive chord, his scientific, methodical exposition of the highest laws of harmony appeals to them intellectually. But they play Chopin and Debussy well, and even Tchaikovsky."

BOOKS FOR CHILDREN

Starting a Library for the Youngsters

By Elizabeth Pepys.

I might bring you sweetmeats,
Or soldiers in a box,
A bounding, barking puppy or Paper dolls in flocks.

After these my gift looks tame,
Yet it shows the world,
A ship to bear you far away
With magic sails unfurled.

For here are days of wonder
And nights of strange delight,
Clash of spear in tourney,
Many a rare sight.

Here where you may find it
When you wish to look,
All the wealth of fairyland
Gathered in a book.

In our nursery days two of our aunts had sub-titles, being known respectively as the Book Aunty and the Clothes Aunty because of the gifts which they invariably brought us. We suspected at times that their gifts had certain propaganda tendencies, being intended in the one case to develop our lagging esthetic appreciations and on the other hand to stimulate our slowly unfolding intellects. The effect of that balanced line of action still remains, and since the Clothes Aunty has spoken of kiddies' wardrobes, the Book Aunty must counter with news of the latest styles in stories.

Mr. Henry M. Snyder, representing over a dozen of the American publishers, has come out from New York to bring the book-sellers of the Orient the advance copies of books which are being brought out this autumn. Among the piles of books displayed in his rooms at the Palace Hotel the children's volumes are by no means the least attractive and we hasten to pass along some suggestions for Christmas buying.

Looking Ahead to Christmas.

It is a sad but true state of affairs, that the booksellers will not stock up largely with the new books for children. "Don't blame us, blame the mothers," they say when reproached for their failure to have the fascinating books which you have just seen reviewed in the last Home magazines, "they won't buy expensive books for their children, or if they do they want to play safe with the classics." Therefore, if superior-calibered parents and relatives and friends, like ourselves, want to bestow high-grade juveniles at Chritmas time, the only way to be sure of securing them is to order them from our booksellers now.

One of the highly successful Christmas books for 1923, a book we could hardly bear to part with, was Mr. C. B. Falls A.B.C. Book, painted for his little daughter. Bedelia Jane is a year older now and wants more of a story, so this year's book is "Mother Goose," illustrated with an imaginative grace as well as in strong design and clean colouring. All the characters so closely woven into the texture of our every-day life riot gaily through these pages and in their happy atmosphere the child will immediately come in contact condescension.

The Dolittle books are fast becoming a fixture on the nursery bookshelves in America and Hugh Lofting's latest, which describes the adventures of "Dr. Dolittle's Circus," is as amusing and as delightfully illustrated as ever. The author-illustrator, who by the way is the brother of Mr. John Lofting of Shanghai, in 1922 won the Newbery Medal for the most distinguished contribution to American literature for children. Hugh Walpole says of the first book in this delicious nonsense series, "The Story of Doctor Dolittle," that it is the first real children's classic since "Alice in wonderland." A new Goop book has not been announced for nearly 10 years and in "Why Be a Goop" Gelett Burgess has made his goops "badder, funnier and more warning" than ever.

Children between three and eight will especially appreciate "The Raggedy Bears," as told by Ruth Irma Low, the author of "In Story Land" and "The Adventures of Bunny Bobtail." Mr. Leslie Stout's illustrations add to the book's charm. Two of the Houghton Mifflin books in their generous supply for children are "The Colonial Twins of Old Virginia," by Lucy Fitch Perkins, a great favourite in nursery circles. These twins live on a tobacco plantation on the James River in Virginia, around 1676, which allows for adventures with pirates. The other book is also southern, but with an entirely different flavour for the hero of "Jibby Jones and the Alligator" lives on the Mississippi and leads an irrepressible gang. One reader said of Jibby: "He's kin to Peck's Bad Boy, Aldrich's Tom Bailey, Huck Finn, Tom Sawyer, even Kim and all the Boy Immortals (except Little Lord Fauntleroy)."

IMMEDIATELY WANTED

Helpful Hints for Harrassed Homes

By Elizabeth Pepys

It is not our intention at this moment to stock up the conscientious housekeeper with a new crop of remedies for household pests, the latest wrinkle in making currant jelly, or a short cut to a perfect budgeting system. Rather is it our desire to broadcast an appeal for some advice in domestic emergencies constantly arising.

For instance, we should like to discover or even to listen to some infallable method of telling which is the front of a dress or hat. It doesn't make so much difference about hats, that is with shingled hair and no hat-pins; but since we no longer fasten up the back it is difficult to get inside properly. There is't much "fit" to clothes nowadays, it's true; but the dressmakers insist that they are distinctly created with a front and back. One indignant modiste even threatened to sue one of her patrons for wearing a creation hind-side before and thus spoiling the effect.

No suggestions such as stitching an X in the front of a dress, will be tolerated. We doubtless have such insignificant marks in all our frocks; but does it help us when we are madly leaping from gown to gown, with hardly a moment between ourselves and the next engagement? No, and No again. A small electric bulb which would automatically light up to show the frontside, might be useful, although we haven't much idea of how to manage its installation. Another idea which had occurred to us was that of a bell which should ring like a burglar alarm, if we started to draw on the dress the wrong way. There should be something by way of warning, for it is most disconcerting to a coiffure to be joggled about.

Social Divining Rods.

The above is a material problem, and hence can no doubt be solved by some mechanical genius. Another perplexity with psychic implications arises when persons wishing to add to the general geniality of an occasion and yet being ignorant of the pasts and presents of the company in which they find themselves are unable to steer the conversation into quiet waters.

Suppose a young man with a fund of humour grows facetious upon the subject of Vers Libre. Even his untutored sensibilities detect the chill in the atmosphere. He changes gears as rapidly as possible and begins on football thinking the subject of sports a safe one. But no, all unknown to him, there is an estrangement in the family circle, due to a son's unbridled passion for the game which lost him his University degree. Finally the unfortunate guest lapses into gloomy silence or burbles meaninglessly about the weather.

Would that some of these clever new psychologists would leave off their sex explorations for a season and set themselves to work to devise something akin to the old hazel rod, which in the hands of the diviner, pointed unerringly to water. A more delicate instrument, designed to catch the fluctuations in the social atmosphere, would dip when a promising vein in the conversation was opened, just as the hazel rod twisted in the hand when the proper place for a well was indicated.

There are many other needs in our social life which need to be filled, and suggestions for a simpler and more efficient method of conducting our mental and psychic life would be welcomed with even greater joy than recipes for cooling beverages.

THE TWO-TO-TENS

Wide Variety Possible in Comfy Children's Clothes

By Elizabeth Pepys.

Prudent mothers who patronized the remnant sales this summer are finding that with the present happy vogue for combining different materials that the Young Person's summer wardrobe may be extremely chic and at the same time surprisingly inexpensive. Moreover, if the house tailor has mastered the intricacies of one pattern which commends itself to mother and daughter alike on the grounds of beauty and comfort, there is no reason why a whole flock of clothes may not be made in that same style, for a change in materials, trimming and colour completely alters the general appearance. Shirring and cross stitch may adorn one diminutive frock, plating another, a third may be made from silk, for festive occasions, another braided with rickrack braid, which is once more popular, dotted Swiss makes a fifth appropriate medium and ginghams, preferably white collared and cuffed, are always in good taste.

Chintz and cretonne in the giddiest of hues have been effectively used for the wardrobes of the Younger Set, and one sweetly quaint costume gives the Empire touch with a short-waisted, sleeveless bodice of cretonne and a rather long, full skirt of unbleached cotton, or any other stout material. Durability in children's frocks is a highly desirable quality, and colours should be "fast" or at least carefully set that the distressed "Little Small may not compain: "my used-to-be prettiest dress has faded clear away."

The one-piece bloomer slip is a boon for these hot days when every unnecessary garment pays a toll of discomfort which, with children, too easily runs into fever. The dress trimmed with buttons is generally a favourite with children who never tire of the "Rich Man, Poor Man" game. Animals appliquéd or embroidered make any dress popular.

One economical mother has discovered that men's shirts are generally made of good enough material so that after they have served their first purpose there is still a good deal of wear left, and quite sufficient to justify making a boy's shirts from his father's or a romper suit for the wee ones. A discarded gingham dress usually has enough material in the skirt to make not only a dress but a slip or bloomer-suit for the young miss. Our illustrations will suggest further ways of fitting out the youngsters of the family.

LONG SLEEVES OR NONE AND THE SLIM SILHOUTLE PERSISTING

Shanghai Mother Goose

Why Was the Southern Cross?

Twinkle, twinkle little star,
How we wonder what you are.
Must it always be our loss
Not to see the Southern Cross?

When the blazing sun is gone
Do you kindly shine upon Us? Or, is it just the False
Cross that we see after valse?

If "Red Funnel" in the dark
Sights afar your upper spark,
Say in Lat. N. 25,
Why may we not, if we strive?—

Elizabeth Pepys.

Jack: So she won her divorce?

A young friend of our acquaintance said recently to his uncle: "Uncle Jack, I think you're an awfully nice man—and I'm going to count up to a hundred for you!"—New York Tribune.

OUTBREAK OF FIGHTING BETWEEN CHEKIANG AND KIANGSU

SERIES OF ENGAGEMENTS WITH LITTLE RESULT

Press Gang Kidnappers on Settlement Border

Fighting broke out on Wednesday on the Quinsan front at 10.15 a.m. and continued inconclusively till nightfall.

The skirmish was continued on Thursday, when the Kiangsu troops were said to have withdrawn slightly. It is stated that the best troops are in another sector and the fight on the railway is merely a feint.

SATURDAY.

NANKING'S TROOPS AND HOW THEY HAVE BEEN DISPOSED

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

The question as to whether the war will be short and uneventful or long drawn out and involving eventually the whole of China is being raised in all quarters. Both sides create the impression that all that need be done is to play chess with the men and the battles will win themselves by politics. It is, however, becoming clear that there can be no solution of the war unless Kiangsu comes into possession of Shanghai or is defeated by Chêkiang. This involves perhaps more of a war than the generals anticipated. In Nanking, it is believed that the combined Nanking and Foochow navies will succeed in quieting the guns at Woosung and in destroying the Arsenal at Lunghua. Should the navies succeed in doing this, the war would be won without the troops moving from their present positions.

The number of troops involved is not as great as in the Chihli-Fengtien War when the full strength of Chang Tso-lin and Wu Pei-fu met on the Chihli plain. Nanking generally claims an army of 60,000 while Hangchow claims that it can muster 40,000 men. Already Marshal Chi has moved 20,000 men out of Nanking to the front. This includes the famous Sixth Division, and the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th Mixed Brigades together with some miscellaneous regiments. Some 15,000 troops are stationed along the railway from Quinsan to Nanking, including the 2nd Division under General Chu Hsi at Soochow. The troops from Nantungchow, Tsingkiangpu, Hsuchowfu and Haichow are not being sent to the front at this time. This line-up of regiments in Kiangsu does not include the strength of the Chihli Party should it be necessary to call upon Marshals Wu Pei-fu, Feng Yu-hsiang and Wang Chen-ping for assistance, nor does it include activity in Fukien and Anhui.

The mustering of numbers such as this naturally has a psychological effect upon Chinese generals. Very often when the odds in numbers is against a Chinese general, he gracefully retires and saves the costs. The exact figures and movements of Hangchow troops has not yet been reported. It is therefore difficult to draw conclusions from the array of forces indicated from Nanking. But should the difference in strength between Hangchow and Nanking be as great as would appear from the above, it is still possible that the war may end in negotiation.

HANGCHOW RUMOURS

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Hangchow, Aug. 29.

Rumours are still running wild, but those who are deaf do not hear them. One is that near to where the line was cut the other day, implements of German make were found in the canal close by. A long and heated meeting was held on Wednesday night in the Educational Association Hall where the present crisis was discussed by representative Chinese and foreigners. Some thought that they had better fight it out, and thus settle the question; others again that the sick man should be carefully nursed and cured and the final conclusion was to send a strong deputation to Shanghai to meet with the leading gentry of Kiangsu there.

MONDAY.

CHEKIANG TROOPS AND THEIR POSITION

Waiting for Naval Demonstration

BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

The Chêkiang troops are said to be moving toward the front in three general directions, from Sungkiang, Washing and Huchow. The objective is concentration on two main fronts, one with its centre at Quinsan; the other, in the general direction of the Taihu Lake from Huchow. On the Quinsan front, it is expected that the Kiangsu troops are to take the offensive. On the Taihu front, the Chêkiang troops will probably take the offensive.

The Quinsan front leads directly to Shanghai, giving the Kiangsu troops a position from which they can co-operate with the combined Foochow and Nanking navies in the attack on Woosung and Lunghua. The purpose of the Taihu front is to divert troops from the direct attack on Shanghai to a defence of Soochow and Wusih and to finesse General Chi into invading Chêkiang, which would involve a longer and more difficult struggle. The position to-day is that General Chi is waiting for the navies to begin the bombardment of Woosung and Lunghua before he starts his troops on their drive to Shanghai.

The Fukien Forces.

Facing the Kiangsu troops will be the divisions which came up from Fukien and which General Lu Yung-hsiang has incorporated into his army. Chêkiang claims that these divisions consist of 12,000 troops, while Kiangsu gives them credit for only 6,000. All figures with regard to troops on either side are unreliable, the commanding officers themselves probably not knowing accurately how full their divisions and mixed brigades really are. These troops are veterans of Fukien wars. Originating mostly in Shantung and Fengtien, they have fought hard and suffered terribly in the disorders in Fukien. They fought their way into Chêkiang from Fukien through Kiangsi, taking two months of almost inconceivable hardship to make a friendly haven. They are grateful to General Lu Yung-hsiang for his willingness to permit them to enter his province and finally for his acceptance of them in his own army. They are brave fighters, and are said to have only one object, namely to get back to their own province. If there is to be any real fighting in this war, it will be between these Fukien Divisions and the famous 6th Division, which Chi Hsieh-yuan personally commanded when Li Hsun was Tuchun of Kiangsi and later Kiangsu.

When Will It Start?

All sorts of rumours are being repeated in responsible quarters with regard to the commencement of hostilities. Chinese wars are somewhat different from the wars in Europe. A war starts when the troops begin to move. A war might be won without a shot being fired. It might be won by the dexterous movement and placing of troops. From that standpoint, the war has started, both sides playing chess on the chessboard which reaches from Woosung to Quinsan to Sungkiang to Kashing to Huchowfu to Wusih.

It is held by many Chinese who are acquainted with the intention of either side that hostilities might start any day during the next four, depending upon the ability of Chêkiang to finesse Kiangsu into action. Kiangsu is avoiding firing the first shot on land, although its navy is expected to begin activities as soon as it arrives here. There were reports on Saturday that the Foochow navy might make its base at Chapoo, the ancient port of Hangchow, drawing Chêkiang troops back into Kashing and to Hangchow to defend the capital. It is more than likely, however, that the combined fleets will attack Lunghua, the success of which would mean the destruction of the Arsenal and the elimination of General Ho Feng-lin.

Whippet Tanks.

A reader tells us that, when bicycling round Lunghua an evening or two ago, he met three whippet tanks, apparently on the way to be shipped off to some unknown destination. He says they were making very good speed along the road.

PEKING AND THE CONFLICT

Capital Now Agog With Bright Ideas of Mediators Who Shall Stop a Fight

Peking, Aug. 30.

A certain reaction against the recent pessimism regarding the Chêkiang situation is noticeable in official and civilian circles in Peking to-day, for which it is difficult to see any reason beyond reports that mediators interviewed Marshal Chi Hsueh-yuan on Wednesday, August 27, and General Lu Yung-hsiang on Thursday, August 28, and received assurances from both leaders that they were anxious to avoid warfare.

The British, American, French and Japanese Ministers visited the Waichiaopu at noon to-day and asked questions regarding the actual situation and the measures which the Chinese Government were taking. It is understood that the replies coincided in general with the official expressions to the effect that the Government do not want civil strife and are endeavouring to avert warfare.—Reuter's

THE FLIGHT OF MULTITUDES FROM HANGCHOW TO SHANGHAI

The Lakeside City Utterly Peaceful: Yet Its Inhabitants Swarming in Thousands to Foreign Settlements: Indescribable Scenes on Trains

From Our Own Correspondent.

Hangchow-Shanghai, Aug. 30.

Peaceful and calm is Hangchow. No war clouds hover over the West Lake. The lotus blossoms are blooming, the hills and pagodas tone delightfully with the salubrious mood of the city of gardens and poetry. No clash of arms here. No hustling motor-cars carrying military officers from place to place. No marching of soldiers. Hangchow is as far from the war as Shanghai was from the Western front during a much more serious conflict.

But when one reaches the railway station, the war becomes evident, not so much because of troop trains, of which there were none, but because of the huge numbers of Chinese who were rushing to Shanghai. The station was so crowded that one could barely move on the platform. The trains were simply jammed. First, second, third class—it was all the same. Crowds of women, children and men, loads of baggage, everything and everybody all mixed together. There were not sufficient seats for half the passengers. The aisles were filled with baggage and servants and chattering amahs. Even the tea-boy could not go his profitable rounds beyond Kashing. He gave it up—after collecting his coppers.

Why the refugees refuse to remain in Hangchow is somewhat difficult to understand. There will be no fighting there; Shanghai is much closer to the front and is the final objective of the Chihli armies. Nevertheless, they come. One poor woman, a baby in arms, was standing on the rear platform, at any moment liable to fall off. Sons were pressing aged parents through the fighting, deafening throng. And each person carried loads of baggage, heirlooms or perhaps family treasures. Generals and their orderlies were there on their way to Lunghua and what was not at all surprising, the wives of many officials, well-dressed ladies, were making their way from the capital to the International Settlement and French Concession where they could be reached neither by one side or the other, should the soldiers decide upon a little private war on their own.

Going toward Hangchow on the Friday, one saw worse conditions on the Hangchow to Shanghai train than were evident on Saturday. The crowded conditions of the Shanghai trams were nothing compared with the trains. Reckless gentlemen were hanging on to the steps of the platforms, even as once was done in Shanghai. The news that there had been a derailment and that the Kiangsu agents had succeeded in cutting the railroad at Kashing convinced thousands that the time to rush to the Foreign Concessions was—now.

Very few soldiers were seen either in Hangchow or on the line to Shanghai. The divisions from Fukien, over which the war is apparently being fought, were encamped just outside of Hangchow. But it was understood that they were to leave Hangchow on Saturday night for Shanghai, whence they were to take up their position on the Quinsan front. At Kashing and Sungkiang, no soldiers were evident. It was explained by an apparently well-informed official of Chêkiang that the troops were "inside," and that they would be moving toward the Taihu front. On the train, it was even suggested that General Lu Yung-hsiang himself might make his headquarters at Huchowfu, from which point he would direct the armies. This information might be taken with a grain of salt, although it is not altogether impossible that General Lu will leave Hangchow for closer proximity to the two Kiangsu fronts.

Another Respite.

Hangchow, Aug. 30.

I have nothing very much to report to-day. The Chêkiang and Kiangsu gentry, I understand, have come to an agreement with Marshals Lu and Chi that the opposing troops on the borders of the provinces will keep at least 20 to 30 li from each other. This, I understand, Marshal Lu has agreed to.

A couple of days ago the pawnshops were closed, and a cetain amount of panic was feared. They have opened again, but no one is allowed to pawn more than up to $2. The factories are still working, and I am told that, if they are compelled to shut down, certain allowances will be made for food, at any rate while the people are unemployed.

The night train for Shanghai on Thursday was packed with about 1,000 people, we are told, and not a few foreigners from Mokanshan. When the time for starting had arrived, a telegram came from Shanghai saying the train was not to leave, and such a hubbub ensued when the people were ordered out of the train to shift for themselves till the next morning, when they were assured a train would leave. To get them and their belongings all out was not easy. Then another message came at 10 p.m., saying "Send the night express at once." The people by that time all had dispersed and gone home to friends and to hotels, or to any place where they could stay for the night and the train left without a passenger.

HANGCHOW TUPAN INTERVIEWED

Marshal Lu Not to Be Bribed by Peace Terms with Opposing Troops Concentrated Against Him: Unification by Force Never Durable

By George E. Sokolsky.

Hangchow, Aug. 29.

Unperturbed, a twinkle in his eye, smiling, joking, apparently enjoying the delightful atmosphere of the garden city of China, Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang discussed the war, the possibility of peace, politics and principles.

"If war is to be avoided, Nanking must make war impossible," Marshal Lu said. "Everybody knows that I have been attacked by four provinces. No one will say that I have attacked any province. Those who have marched forward must return if we are to have peace. Naturally, I want peace, but Nanking has made war. It is up to Nanking to make peace.

"Article Three of the Peace Pact seems to be the cause of much misunderstanding. According to that article, if an army from another province came into the territory of either Marshal Chi or myself, the army was to be disarmed and disbanded. Now, the Fukien divisions, to which the Chihli Party objects so strenuously, came into Chêkiang by way of Kiangsi. As you know, Marshal Chi is not only Tuchun of Kiangsu but also Inspector-General of Kiangsu, Kiangsi and Anhui. These troops should have been disarmed by him when they were in Kiangsi. Instead, they were permitted to come to the boundaries of Chêkiang. I was faced with the problem of handling a large number of soldiers who were roaming the country at will. I could have fought them and driven them back on Anhui and Fukien to become bandits and to ravage that country, as hungry men are bound to do in certain circumstances. I could have tried to disarm them, but they probably would have taken to the hills and made trouble for Chêkiang as well as for the provinces over which Marshal Chi is Inspector-General. To do that would have been impracticable and harmful to the country. I took what I believe to be a wiser step. I reorganized these divisions and incorporated them in the Chêkiang army. They are part of the Chêkiang army to-day. Originally, I had no idea of incorporating these troops in the Chêkiang army, but to take over some of the more experienced generals who would be useful in my own armies. The troops were to be sent home, if possible. But Marshal Chi's attitude made that impossible and I had to keep them here."

The Chihli Peace Terms

"Marshal Lu," I asked, "the 'North China Daily News' has this morning published the Chihli Party peace terms. Is there not some basis for negotiation in them?"

Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang laughed. The thought of negotiating on the basis of the terms outlined, which were that he should become Inspector-General of Chêkiang and Fukien, that General Ho Feng-lin become Tuchun of Chêkiang, that Shanghai and 11 hsien be returned to Kiangsu and that all independence be voided, amused him.

"Wu Pei-fu's terms as you state them are a bribe," Marshal Lu replied. "I am not to be bribed. Everybody has tried to do that since the days of Yuan Shih-kai. I have resisted bribery from others; I can resist it now. The whole question is one of principle, not of my own position. I am not holding out for a higher position for myself. I have certain ideals, of which the people of Chêkiang approve. Those ideals I adhere to. When Li Yuan-hung was President, there was a possibility of peace on the basis of those ideals. But now everything is changed. China is being ruled by a military dictatorship and it is difficult for a man like myself to compromise with that.

"These terms were made after armies had been moved against Chêkiang. They were made after mobilization had taken place. There is no room for negotiation when the armies are in the field. I am not a coward. I am not afraid to fight. If I discuss peace now, people will say that I am afraid of Wu Pei-fu and Chi Hsieh-yuan and that I am ready to accept any offers they might make. That is not true. Last summer I was willing to meet Chi Hsieh-yuan in Shanghai face to face to discuss our differences and to find a means of settlement. He would not come. Now, it is too late. I do not accept bribes and I do not run away from danger.

Chekiang Made the Tupan

"My position is different from that of other military officials. I am Tupan of Chêkiang by the will of the people of Chêkiang. Public opinion has selected me Tupan. Wu Pei-fu's offer would mean that I am to desert the province of Chêkiang, probably to live in Foochow. Public opinion in Chêkiang would be opposed to that. The people would say that I am not true to my ideals nor faithful to the trust they reposed in me.'

"No matter what happens," Marshal Lu laughingly emphasized, "I can always return to the West Lake and everybody will be pleased to see me. If I accepted Wu Pei-fu's offer it would be different. I have been in Chêkiang a long time. I know what the people think of me and want of me. I am not going to desert them for my own interests or my own peace.

"The principle which we have to assume is that a military dictatorship is against the best interests of the people of China. The Peking Government exists on a military dictatorship. Of course, anywhere a government can be unified by force, if you use enough force. But has it proved practicable, thus far? In my opinion, it has only proved a policy which ruins provinces and makes the people suffer. Take, for instance, the example of the province of Fukien. There has been fighting in that province for almost 11 years; yet there is no unification, there is no peace. Wu Pei-fu claims that he has unified Szechuan; but a careful investigation of that will prove that Szechuan is to-day not really unified nor at peace. Many different parties are prolonging the processes of disunion in China. It is not the function of the Chinese Government to encourage one party against the other, to foment strife and to antagonize different parts of the country.

Peking Government Illegal

"The Central Government is illegal. It pays no heed to the constitution or the will of the people. The officials are often like bandits, taking what they can get in any circumstances. They do their work in the most peculiar manner. A man will come to Peking from Kuangtung, Yunnan, Kueichow, or Kuangsi. He will say that he can unify the province. The government without investigation, without finding out whether the people of that province want that particular man, authorize and assist that general to ruin the province, to fill it with Chihli soldiers, to bring misery and desolation on the people That is not unification. That is supporting banditry. Therefore, I strongly oppose Wu Pei-fu's policy of unification by force.

"There is only one way to unify China and that is by recognizing the will of the people. Let each province speak for itself. Let each province select its own representative and then let the Central Government recognize that representative. That will be genuine unification. Instead of the people suffering, they will benefit. The will of each province will be expressed, freely expressed.

"Again I want to repeat. I want no war. I made no attack. I was attacked. But I cannot negotiate on the basis of deserting Chêkiang or opposing the will of the people."

CONSCRIPTION CAUSES RIOT AT YANGCHOW

House of President of Chamber of Commerce Sacked by Angry Mob

From Our Own Correspondent.

Yangchow, Ku., Aug. 28.

The following events are to be reported since my letter of two days ago:

As reported in the "North-China Daily News" under date of August 26, many civilians were conscripted before the soldiers left this city. Some had been given to understand that they were only needed to carry supplies to boats on the Canal. As the launches left Yangchow, the new recruits were terrified at the prospect of war and a number jumped into the canal and were drowned, the bodies of three men being recovered afterwards.

On the afternoon of the 26th, members of the Chamber of Commerce met at the Public Garden to discuss means of raising a large sum of money demanded by the military forces. A great crowd gathered, protesting against those who had ordered the police to aid in the drafting of recruits, and demanding that relatives who had been taken should be returned to them. A prominent official was surrounded and his clothes torn, but he escaped without serious bodily injury. The President of the Chamber of Commerce had endeavoured to quiet the people, assuring them that a method would be found whereby the drafted men would be returned to their homes.

Yesterday afternoon a crowd of several thousand people, including many women and country people, again assembled at the Public Garden, women crying out for husbands and sons and all awaiting the arrival of the officials. These gentlemen failing to appear, the mob started at four o'clock for the home of the President of the Chamber of Commerce near by. The iron door was broken down and enraged men and women entered, destroying everything of value they could lay their hands on. Nothing was carried away, but valuable scrolls, gowns and other garments were torn to shreds, redwood lantern shades pulled down and broken to pieces and costly vases shattered, the damage done amounting to some thousands of dollars. Some favoured setting fire to the house, but this was not done out of consideration for the neighbours. Members of the family and servants escaped through a break in a rear wall. Seven civil police, who were protecting the house, were beaten with bricks and boards and went to the hospital with minor injuries.

Soldiers passed through this district yesterday, going south toward the Yangtze River and using the auto road. This morning about 200 cavalry troops took the same route to Chinkiang, coming from somewhere north of this city.

All the stores were closed yesterday, but business was resumed to day and comparative peace and quiet prevailed on the streets.

CONSCRIPTION STOPPED AT CHINKIANG

Remarkable Evidence of Power of Local Merchants; Why Not Oftener Used?

From Our Own Correspondent.

Chinkiang, Aug. 30.

The signs of war are eminent here. Each day several special troop trains pass through en route to Quinsan and other places.

The authorities for the last few days have been conscripting the coolies and the poorer classes of the people, in fact the measure was pressed to such an extent that business is at a standstill, transportation badly crippled, and the whole place seems almost deserted. On Thursday they succeeded in collecting a great company of men, most of whom were country farmers who had come into town on business. The situation became so serious that the local Chamber of Commerce met yesterday afternoon and in a few moments stopped the conscription and released most of the farmers who had been taken. With such power in their hands one marvels why such strong bodies as the various influential commercial bodies allow the country to get into such a muddle as it is at present.

Again, where are the patriots whose ardour and eloquence are so manifest on other occasions? Why do they not come out now and enlist and save their country, and let the workers and the farmers go on with their work? Which in some instances is almost as important as making patriotic speeches. What fine opportunity to show their loyalty now to the land they love!

Prices are high, and money is tight, and profiteers are coming into their own.

TUESDAY.

WAR MOVEMENT BEGUN

Definite news was received on Monday night that the Nanking forces had begun to move from Quinsan in the direction of Shanghai at 9 o'clock.

According to the "Sinwangpao" correspondent the Nanking Left Wing is moving from Taitsang to Liu Ho (near the Yangtze at the end of the big road that runs northwards from Chapei).

The Centre has reached Huangtu, moving towards Nanziang, and the Right Wing is moving from Anting to Tsingpu.

Ordered Out of Mokanshan.

Visitors to Mokanshan have received orders to quit the resort before next Saturday night, and trains arriving here from Mokanshan are bringing people down daily. They state that all the soldiers and police have been withdrawn, the boys and servants are reported to have fled and it is becoming difficult to procure food.

Last night's train brought down a number of missionaries from this district.

ARSENAL NEARLY BARE OF TROOPS

Speculations on Marshal Chi's Plan of Campaign: When Will Fighting Begin?

There was no sign of military activity at Kiangnan Arsenal on Monday, and it is estimated that the number of troops now stationed there do not number more than 100. On Thursday the troops doing guard duty were withdrawn and replaced by a small force from Lunghua, but these latter also left on Sunday night. It would appear from this that, should fighting begin, there will be no engagement at Kiangnan in the initial stages.

The opinion has been formed that Marshal Chi will endeavour to take possession of the railway into Shanghai and, if successful, would throw out troops round the Arsenal from the Shanghai-Hangchow Railway junction. Presumably, by that time a strong force of Chêkiang troops would have fallen back for defence of the Arsenal and a heavy engagement would ensue. For the moment there are no signs of the least anxiety at the Arsenal itself, so far as the authorities are concerned.

Chinese residents in the neighbourhood have, of course, scurried away as the result of war rumours, but otherwise the place is quite normal, and it is a case of "business as usual."

According to news received yesterday from official Chinese quarters in Shanghai, of sympathies on both sides, the hopes entertained at the end of last week of negotiating a piece are fruitless and hostilities might begin at any moment. When it was suggested that rain might damp the ardour of the troops, it was answered that this time-honoured obstacle to fighting would not avail in this case.

A report reaches us from Soochow that Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan of Nanking has established his headquarters in the Tien Ning Temple at Changchow and is now there.

The Lord of Manchuria.

Persistent reports from Peking, from apparently well informed quarters, are that a hostile move on Marshal Chang Tso-lin's part is much feared.

Movements of Men-of-War Awaited with Interest: Adml. Tu's Fleet

(Through Reuter's Agency).

Peking, Aug. 29.

Reports regarding the movements of the men-of-war in the disturbed regions are awaited with interest. The ships, under the command of Admiral Tu Hsi-kuei, include the gunboats Chu-yu, Chu-tai, Chiang-yuan and Chiang-yen, and five torpedo-boats. These are the boats that accompanied the troops down river from Nanking, and are part of the Yangtze Squadron, which includes the Admiral's flagship and 11 gunboats stationed at various points higher up the river.

There are also under the command of the Chihli party 11 men-of-war at Tsingtao, Chefoo and Lungkow. These vessels are badly in need of repairs and it is believed that only three cruisers and five torpedo-boats are seaworthy.

Admiral Lin Chien-chang, commanding the "neutral squadron" at Shanghai, has the cruiser Haichow (which was recently reported to be disaffected), the gunboat Yung-chi, the destroyer Chien-kang, transport Ching-an, and the torpedo-boats Su and Chen.

According to Chinese telegrams, the Consular Body has recently been in communication, with the rival Admirals with a view to gaining an assurance that there would be no fighting in Shanghai waters.

A Danger to Shanghai At Any Time: How If Seized by Contending Troops?

Twice within recent months have correspondents called attention to the danger arising to Shanghai from the dynamite magazine on the Pootung shore of the Huangpu about half a mile up stream from the mouth of Kajao Creek. Both writers were men who may be allowed to know something of what they write about, and the official explanation which we obtained in answer to the first letter—that from Mr. Gundry written last March—did not satisfy either them nor, there is reason to think, a good many other people.

The dynamite magazine has a capacity, we understand, of 125 tons—not cargo space but dead weight. At the present time it is nearly three-quarters full. The house of the superintendent in charge of it is barely 100 ft. distant—though by the British Home Office Regulations we are told that it ought to be removed at least 600 yds. If an explosion occurred nothing could save him and his family. Even if no great damage were done to the centre of the Settlement, godowns and wharves are creeping farther and farther down the river, and could hardly escape damage. And an explosion might easily so affect the bed of the Huangpu as almost irreparably to injure Shanghai's trade.

Recently a launch has been put in constant attendance at the magazine and there are three Sikh watchmen on guard. But these precautions certainly do not mitigate the general danger.

Without exaggeration or desire to raise unnecessary scares, we think it must be said clearly that the dynamite magazine is a menace to the safety of Shanghai, which ought not to be tolerated. In bygone years it may or may not have been safely placed. But not now.

If Fighting Breaks Out.

A special reason for referring to the matter to-day is the impending prospect of war between Chêkiang and Kiangsu. If fighting begins, it is not in the least unlikely that one side or the other would make a dash for the magazines, especially any troops that might be landed on the Yangtze bank, near the Kiutoan Small Beacon, with a view to marching across land to attack the Arsenal from the Pootung side. The care of a dynamite magazine is distinctly an expert's job, and we might very easily see the magazine in the hands of men who have no idea of the delicate nature of explosives and the precautions that have to be taken with them.

Neutralize It.

It was said yesterday that foreigners should not interfere in the quarrel between Kiangsu and Chêkiang, except to exercise their right to keep troops out of the Settlement. But an exception may be made in respect of the dynamite magazine. No words are necessary, we feel sure, to convince both Marshal Chi and Marshal Lu that if the magazine blew up the whole district of Shanghai would suffer, not more one side than the other but everybody alike. Both the rulers of Kiangsu and Chêkiang have repeatedly voiced their desire that their quarrel should cause as little damage or inconvenience to civilians as possible, and they would surely make no difficulty in agreeing to neutralize the magazine and its surroundings.

Meanwhile an efficient guard should be put at the magazine. The question is a serious one in which the Chambers of Commerce of Shanghai may reasonably and strongly be pressed to move. They may also be requested to make their own independent investigations in the matter.

HOW SHANGHAI HAS BECOME THE BIG PRIZE

Of Minor Importance Even in Manchu Days: Yuan Shih-kai's Defence Commissioners as Watchdogs on Both Nanking and Hangchow

By George E. Sokolsky

The position of Shanghai in the politics of China has become increasingly more important since the founding of the Republic, not only because it is the economic capital of the country, but also because the freedom from governmental control has made it possible for most of the anti-Peking movements to propagate from this centre.

Yuan Shih-kai understood this better than did the Manchus. He took advantage of the possibilities here and established a Defence Commissioner, a new officer, to watch both Nanking and Hangchow and at the same time to suppress any movements which might arise in this city in opposition to himself.

Shanghai in the Past

During the Manchu régime, Shanghai was not an important city. Previous to the coming of the foreigners, it did not compare in political importance with Nanking or Soochow, or in economic importance with Ningpo or Foochow. The Taiping rebellion brought to the small foreign settlements large numbers of Chinese refugees, even as the present war is bringing them. With the growth of trade came the growth in population. Politically, Shanghai was part of the territory of the Viceroy of Liang Kiang, which included Kiangsu, Anhui and Kiangsi and the capital of which was at Nanking. Shanghai was in Kiangsu province, the capital of which was Soochow. It was in the Su-Sung-Tai circuit, which consisted of Soochow, Sungkiang and Taichow.

Hangchow, the capital of Chêkiang, was not concerned with Shanghai affairs. It was altogether under another Viceroy, that of Min-Che, which consisted of Fukien and Chêkiang, and the capital of which was at Foochow. There was a governor of Chêkiang Province, whose seat was at Hangchow.

The Nanking Viceroy

The Viceroy at Nanking was a very important personage in the Government. After the signing of the Treaty of Nanking, he was the Southern Superintendent of Trade and during the régime of Tseng Kuo-fan, he was the doyen of all Viceroys, politically the most powerful figure in the country. The death of Viceroy Tseng and the accession of Li Hung-chang shifted the power to Tientsin. The necessity for military and governmental reforms in Peking and the personality of Viceroy Li Hung-chang were factors in effecting this change. To this power Yuan Shih-kai succeeded.

Yuan Shih-kai realized that his own strength lay in the centralization of authority and in undermining the localization tendencies of the provinces. Some of the provincial Tutuhs and Governors were his equals in rank or authority previous to the revolution. Many of them differed with him on many questions at issue. To counteract oppositional movements, he placed Defence Commissioners in strategic places, whose duty it was to maintain order. Some of these Defence Commissioners appear redundant unless one realizes Yuan's motives. For instance, although Nanking is the capital of a province and the seat of a Tuchun with a large army, there is also a Defence Commissioner in that city. That is true of almost every provincial capital.

Yuan's Defence Commissioners

During the Manchu régime there were very few troops in Shanghai because there was little need for them here. Shanghai is not on the great highroads to anywhere. It is at the end of all things. There might be some use for a navy, were China's naval forces capable of withstanding an attack by a foreign Power, but there never has been and there is to-day no use for a large military force at Shanghai. Yuan placed such a force here under the Defence Commissioner, not to keep the foreigners within the settlements, but to watch the doings of the Military Governors at Nanking and Hangchow and to suppress Kuomintang plots. When Admiral Tseng Yu-cheng was appointed to the post in 1915 his title was raised to that of Military Governor of Shanghai a title which General Ho Feng-lin holds to-day. The position of the Defence Commissioner under Yuan Shih-kai was similar to that of the Tartar General under the Manchus. He was a military officer, commanding troops, directly responsible to Yuan and in no way under the authority of the Governor of the province in which he was stationed. It was under this system that Shanghai became politically independent of Kiangsu.

Lu Yung-hsiang, before he became Tuchun of Chêkiang, was Defence Commissioner of Shanghai. One of his subordinates was General Ho Feng-lin, who had been Defence Commissioner at Ningtai in Chêkiang. General Lu came to regard the Shanghai position as his own. When he was appointed to Chêkiang, he insisted upon his man being sent to Shanghai. He kept his own troops in this city. In a word, at the time when the Tuchuns were asserting their authority over the Defence Commissioners, when the latter no longer had Yuan Shih-kai to uphold them, Lu Yung-hsiang insisted upon the independence of the Shanghai military from the control of the Nanking Tuchun. Therein lies the whole explanation of the present struggle. For as Tuchun of Chêkiang, Lu Yung-hsiang would be a very small man in the military hierarchy of China. As controlling the military organization in Shanghai in addition to being Tuchun of Chêkiang, he became one of the principal figures of the country.

The Influence of Ningpo

For, it is the wealth of Shanghai that matters now—its wealth and political influence. No political movement can go very far which is not financially supported by some group in Shanghai. And that group will either be Ningpoese or Cantonese. For a time, the Cantonese merchants in Shanghai were a political factor, but they quarrelled among themselves, their guild has been split into parts and their interests have been diverse, since some support Sun Yat-sen while others have in the past favoured Chen Chiung-ming and now favour Wu Pei-fu. But the Ningpo men have worked more or less together through all their apparent quarrels. Their rows within the Ningpo Guild have been family affairs, but when questions arose affecting Ningpo or Chêkiang or the interests of the Ningpo community in Shanghai, the personal jealousies and animosities of leaders, the desire for power and fame disappeared. All hands laboured for Ningpo. Today, Shanghai is economically a colony of Ningpo. The largest number of Chinese in the city come from Ningpo. Most of the native banks are controlled by Ningpo money lenders. And Ningpo is a city of Chêkiang and its desires are that Shanghai shall be controlled by Chêkiang. The independence of Shanghai from Nanking therefore has that much support and authority.

Kiangsu Interests Outside

The Kiangsu people in Shanghai have on the whole lost their contacts with Nanking, although Chi Hsieh-yuan has, for two years, done what he could to bring them back into the fold. Kiangsu ends at Soochow, so far as politics are concerned and the great Soochow gentry man, Chang I-lin, is the leading factor in Kiangsu politics at this moment. The Kiangsu residents of Shanghai are so mixed up with the Ningpo men, they have had so many business relations with the Ningpo native banks and the Ningpo compradores that it is difficult for them to realize that the peace of Kiangsu is perhaps as important as the business of Shanghai. At any rate, the Nanking authorities have come to believe that the peace of last summer was made largely by Kiangsu gentry whose interests are in Shanghai. It is therefore interesting to note that the most important question between the two provinces, namely whether Shanghai shall remain independent or shall become again a part of Kiangsu, was never broached. Chi Hsieh-yuan was dissatisfied with such a peace. The Government in Peking was dissatisfied. It was like the Versailles Treaty: it made peace but there was no peace.

Shanghai's Great Wealth

The total foreign trade of China in 1923 was Hk Tls. 1,676, 320,303. The trade of Kiangsu and Chêkiang amounted to Hk. Tls. 871,725,271 or approximately 52 per cent. of the whole country. Shanghai alone contributed Hk. Tls. 712,101,318 or approximately 42 per cent. of the whole. This is foreign trade alone. These figures alone will indicate that there is something to fight for, since where there is money there is power in China, as elsewhere. But these figures in no way show the whole, the wealth of the local banks, the trade in native goods passing through likin stations in the interior of the provinces, the secret, illicit trade which a military man can countenance and which brings him wealth and power. The economic importance of Shanghai and its environs and the ability of a keen Chinese militarist or politician to make money out of it, is the explanation for the continued conflict between Nanking and Shanghai over the jurisdiction of this city. General Lu Yung-hsiang has been able to maintain his independence of the Peking Government because of this economic support. Until that independence ceases, no matter who controls Nanking, the party in power in Peking will fight for the control of Shanghai.

CHINESE PRESS WAR NEWS

Merchants Labouring for Peace: The Profiteering in Rice: When Does War Begin?

The Chinese newspapers on Monday printed various reports giving details of the strong efforts being made by local merchants and bankers to induce Peking to exert whatever authority it has and order the opposing forces to withdraw. A great point is made of the fact that the people of the two provinces have been peaceful neighbours while other provinces have been up in arms, and that the people themselves have no desire whatever that there shall be fighting.

Strong efforts are being made to counteract the work of rice profiteers who have sent prices soaring during the past week quite out of proportion with the slight increase which might have been excusable owing to interference with rice transport boats. The Shanghai merchants who have taken the matter in hand are arranging to fix the price of rice at $12 per picul, and $15 for the best quality, with the promise of reduction immediately circumstances permit.

It is impossible to estimate the number of refugees who have almost raced to Shanghai during the past few days, but the number must now have reached many thousands. Up to the present, food supplies have been quite adequate, but the market is bound to be affected should fighting develop on any big scale and interrupt supplies from towns and villages immediately around Shanghai. For the moment, however, the only serious effect has been in the matter of house rents, and this so far affects only the newcomers. Chinese hotel and lodging-house keepers are reaping a rich harvest and householders are sharing in the big prices refugees are called upon, and most of them willing, to pay for accommodation. That the housing position is likely to become even more acute is evident from the scores of vehicles one sees bringing in the goods and chattels of refugees from all points in the war zone.

The "Shanghai Tribune" yesterday gave what purported to be a statement of the effective strength of the armies. Chêkiang is credited with 75,000 men, in four Divisions and two Mixed Brigades, 25,000 men comprising what is called the Boundary Defence Army, and 13,000 Garrison troops. The forces in Shanghai are estimated at 17,000, 12,000 garrison troops and two Mixed Brigades. The Kiangsu army is said to be composed of four Divisions, five Mixed Brigades and 42,000 Garrison troops, making a total of 81,000. Another report states that Wu Pei-fu has sent 31,000 men to assist Marshal Chi in taking Shanghai.

On Sunday the Shanghai Military Governor sent a number of soldiers to Nanyang University, Siccawei, to seize 200 rifles which were presented to the University by the Government some 10 years ago, for drill purposes.

The Fukien Fleet was to have bombarded Woosung forts early on Sunday morning, but the attack was postponed on instructions from Marshal Chi. The latter is said to have received a telegram from Wu Pei-fu stating that as his preparations against the north-east have not yet been completed he should postpone the opening of hostilities for one week.

WEDNESDAY.

OPPOSING TROOPS ONLY TWO MILES APART

Shanghai-Nanking Railway Cut and Telegraph Lines

In the early part of Tuesday there was but one definite piece of information, and this of importance, viz., that the Shanghai-Nanking Railway had been cut west of Nanziang. With rail and telegraphic communication thus severed, it is impossible to obtain any definite news as to the course of events. It was inferred from a message received by the Red Cross authorities in Shanghai late in the afternoon that hostilities had actually begun. There was a further report that the railway had been cut in another place, at Wangting, some 15 miles beyond Soochow, but this has not been confirmed.

It is a fact, however, that in the early morning the railway line was cut at Huangtu, a short distance beyond Nanziang, as a consequence of which the entire service was suspended.

An authentic report at 6.30 p.m. yesterday to the effect that no fighting had taken place up to that hour was received in political circles in Shanghai. It was, however, expected that fighting in the general direction of Woosung along the Taitsang-Liuho front would commence to-night.

The Chinese Red Cross under the direction of Dr. W. S. New has been ordered to Liuho to receive the wounded. A unit with supplies has been established at Liuho, five motor-cars having been put into service between the Red Cross in Shanghai and Liuho. Nurses and physicians have been sent to Liuho, where the unit will be stationed at the school opposite the foreign mission. The local mission hospital has been placed at the disposal of the Red Cross for surgical cases and for the care of the wounded.

According to information received from the unit, the forces were within five li of each other on this front early yesterday morning.

Protection of the Settlement

During the past few days the various authorities concerned have been in conference with the naval and military representatives and they have discussed all phases of the situation, in particular the measures which it may be necessary to take in the event of any disorganized bodies of troops falling back upon Shanghai. Generally speaking, these would take the form of a series of armed posts all round the border of the Settlement, in close touch with each other, as was done in the Revolution of 1913. Arrangements have already been made for the billeting out of officers along the boundaries, if so required.

In the event of their being needed it is probable that a strong international force of sailors and marines would be landed from the numerous naval units that have arrived in the harbour and these would form a cordon around the Settlement. In addition they would mount guard over various strategic points and public utilities within the city. The Race Club's new stables on Great Western Road have been placed at the disposal of the British force which would do duty on the outskirts, the owners of ponies stabled there having transferred their animals at short notice. It is further reported that H. M. S. Hawkins, with Admiral Leveson on board, is on her way to Shanghai and it is presumed therefore that, as senior officer, he would assume charge of the protection of the Settlement.

British: Cruisers Despatch and Durban, ganboats Bee and Cricket.

American: Destroyers Borie, S. Thompson, Tracey, John D. Edwards, Barker and Whipple, and three others which arrived on Tuesday afternoon.

Italian: Cruiser Libia.

The Chinese Navy.

The Chinese Navy is known to have taken up three distinct positions. The cruiser Haichow and other vessels composing the so-called Independent Fleet, which is in sympathy with Chêkiang, is lying in the river at the Arsenal. The Fukien ships, which are on the side of Marshal Chi, and have so often been reported as coming to attack Woosung, are in the Chusan Archipelago, with a view to keeping off any supplies which may be sent down by Chang Tso-lin from Manchuria through Hangchow Bay for the benefit of Marshal Lu. The six river gunboats, also on the side of Marshal Chi, have moved down from Nanking to Kiangyin, at which point there is a very big land fort.

There was no sign of activity at Woosung yesterday, the position remaining quiet throughout the day. Several Chinese vessels leaving and entering port passed the forts without challenge.

The Chinese Telegraph Administration announces that all landline communication between Shanghai and Soochow has been interrupted since yesterday morning.

Late yesterday afternoon the Shanghai-Nanking Railway issued a notice that all booking for Soochow and the north has been suspended until further notice. The Woosung service is continuing as usual.

CHINESE PRESS NEWS

"Members of the Provincial Assembly at Nanking have telegraphed to General Ho Feng-lin requesting him to evacuate Sungkiang and Shanghai and hand over Kiangnan Arsenal, to be sealed up, and also to dismantle the guns at Woosung."—To be really complete the message should have added that the Generals have been asked to disband their troops and go into retirement, but nothing is said as to this.

General Ho Feng-lin is said to have sent out an urgent message to the tax offices directing that all revenue be remitted before the end of the present month. Another financial story is that the factory for the unemployed at Kiangwan has been closed down and that the funds of the factory, amounting to $700,000, have been "appropriated" by General Lu for military expenses.

The Labourers' Organization in Shanghai have published a "warning" to rice dealers, house owners and lodging house keepers against profiteering. According to the chairman of the Stallkeepers' Association, prices of food are steady, but a shortage of supplies is to be feared immediately hostilities begin. The Canton Merchants Association is organizing a supply of cheap rice, and the Chambers of Commerce are also making plans to keep up the supply at a moderate charge. A consignment has been ordered from Saigon and supplies are expected to arrive in 10 days time.

PEKING'S PRECAUTIONS

Peking, Aug. 30.

A meeting took place yesterday at the residence of Mr. Cheng Koh, Minister of the Interior, which was attended by Gen. Wang Huai-ching (Commandant of the Peking Garrison), Gen. Nei Hsien-fan (Commandant of the Peking Gendarmerie), Gen. Chen Ching-yun (Commandant of the Modern Gendamerie), Gen. Hsueh Chih-heng (Superintendent of the Metropolitan Police) and other officials. Mr. Cheng Koh presided. The main subject discussed was measures to be adopted to preserve peace and order in the Metropolitan Area in the event of civil war in the south-eastern provinces.

Unofficially it is reported that a resolution was passed that martial law should be proclaimed in Peking if war takes place in Chêkiang.—Reuter.

London Liberal Idea of a Federated China

London, Sept. 1.

The "Westminster Gazette" thinks that it is time that some friendly Power conveyed a hint to Peking that almost half of China's provinces desire autonomy, that the vast and unwieldy Republic cannot for ever suppress the reasonable aspirations of the people and that a federation would be the logical development.

Certainly the Powers are placed in a difficulty, the journal goes on, not only on account of risks to their nationals and the threat to their trade but by being compelled to treat as a unity a collection of provinces which are willing to go to war about their claims.

The paper says that mere warnings, even supported by warships, are a barren way of dealing with the situation, which seems to be passing out of control.—Reuter.

THURSDAY.

FIGHTING BEGUN AT LAST

All Day Long in Quinsan Region But With Indecisive Result

At noon on Wednesday rumours appeared in many quarters to the effect that actual fighting had begun on the Quinsan Front between the Kiangsu and Chêkiang forces at about 10.15 a.m. This was subsequently substantiated in many reliable quarters. At the station, officials using the telephone could distinctly hear the sound of the guns.

A Chinese observer who had travelled on a troop train as far as possible along the Shanghai-Nanking Railway returned at 3 p.m. with the information that when he left the front, fighting was still going on, as he could hear. He saw numbers of dead and wounded being brought into the rear.

THE KIANGSU AND CHEKIANG TROOPS FACE EACH OTHER ROUGHLY FROM THE REGIONS OF LIUHO ON THE YANGTZE TO HUCHOW. IN SOME PLACES THEY ARE REPORTED WITHIN TWO MILES OF EACH OTHER.

The Chinese Red Cross, however, had no information with regard to dead or wounded at 5.30 p.m., no returns having been made from their station at Liuho. No casualties have been sent to the hospital in Shanghai.

A detachment of the Chinese Red Cross under the supervision of Dr. W. S. New, consisting of doctors, nurses and supplies was ordered to Kiangwan yesterday. A similar detachment will leave to-day for Woosung.

An informant from the front reports that the Chekiang troops are occupying Lokapang, while the Kiangsu headquarters are presumed to be at Huangtu. No news has yet been received either from the Liuho or the Tsingpu fronts.

An interesting fact was learned yesterday, namely, that Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang's (Chêkiang) men have recently received four months' pay in advance. But it is a fact that many of them have no idea why they have this money and some of them did not, recently, even know there was war in prospect.

Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan left Nanking for the front on Monday night and has been in personal command of his troops since. The report which comes from Nanking from a most authentic source does not state the city at which Marshal Chi has made his headquarters.

At three o'clock on Thursday afternoon the officials at Shanghai North station had no information through from Nanziang as to the course of events. About this time, a couple of troop trains, which came in from Lunghua, were rushed off to Nanziang, the two leaving within half an hour, and carrying about 1,000 men each. The first contingent seemed a fairly useful body of men, but the second was a very mixed crowd, poorly clad and equipped, and of all ages, some mere youngsters and others in the neighbourbood of 50. The men had oil-paper umbrellas strapped across their backs, and they wore flimsy sandals, while the officers, all smartly uniformed, paraded in the customary soft slippers. Nearly all the men were equipped with rifles of an old pattern, some of the Martini type, and fitted with the short bayonet, while a few carried the Mauser pistol. Both trains carried a nondescript collection of stores, and one had three vans loaded with small-arm ammunition.

Bringing in Wounded

At six p.m. the Chinese Red Cross was instructed that casualties were being brought from the front and that they would be transferred to Shanghai that evening.

A report was received by the Railway authorities that the Kiangsu men were believed to have withdrawn about a mile but that the Chêkiang men had not changed their position. The report is however, uncertain. Fighting across the paddy-fields must be extremely difficult.

At 8.30 p.m., the Chinese Red Cross detachment of eighteen doctors, nurses and internes left by railway for Nanziang under orders to establish a station at the front. Dr. New was instructed to be prepared to remain at the front or to remove the wounded to the Naval Hospital at Woosung, whichever might prove most advisable.

No information was available as to the number of wounded. At 11.20 p.m., a hospital train arrived from the front bringing six wounded, who were transferred to the Woosung Naval Hospital.

French Marines Landed.

No definite orders have yet been issued for the landing of any international force from the men-of-war in harbour. It is felt that the war situation has hitherto been too vague and inconclusive to warrant such extreme measures. Full preparations, however, have been made for drawing a cordon round the Settlement.

Four hundred French marines were landed in the French Concession on Wednesday from the French cruisers in port. The men will be stationed ashore until further notice and held in readiness in case of emergency.

The effects of the rice shortage were seen on Wednesday when crowds of poor Chinese gathered at the depôts which have been opened for the sale of rice. Each sales centre was given its quota of rice, and this was distributed in strictly regulated quantities, and at a reasonable price.

Refugees Pouring in

The influx of refugees from the northern country-side has been tremendous during the past two days, and most of them are country people of the poorer class. As an example of the crowds coming in, on Tuesday, in the Louza district alone, over 1,000 strangers were registered in lodging houses.

As regards admission of refugees, it may be pointed out that the Chapei and native city district authorities do not allow anybody to go out of the Settlement into their districts after 9 p.m. Why should not the Settlement authorities do the like? The principles of the strict neutrality which Shanghai is to observe demand at least that no soldiers shall be admitted, armed or unarmed.

Aeroplanes on Both Sides.

General Ho Feng-lin's aeroplanes flew over the French Concession and the Western District late on Wednesday afternoon, probably on their way to the front.

A competent observer reported that the Chêkiang forces have thirty aeroplanes, but only six or eight pilots, some of them being Russians. Chi Hsieh-yuan is said to have two Vickers-Vimy 6-passenger bombing planes and six training planes.

It is not believed that the aeroplane will be of much service in the field because of the condition of the ground on the battlefield. Most of the land is paddy field, soft and swampy. A bomb falling into the ground would probably sink according to this observer, and would do little damage.

Thursday, 1 a.m.

According to reports from Nanziang, the Kiangsu forces opened fire and fought throughout the day. The fighting was stiff on both sides, ending at sun-down. When the Red Cross train reached Nanziang last night, the battle was over, no firing being heard. The Chêkiang forces at Nanziang are not very numerous, although it is claimed that they are being opposed by a large number of Kiangsu men. From all reports arriving through the Chêkiang lines, it would appear that Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan's troops outnumber those of Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang.

Two aeroplanes have arrived at Nanziang from Shanghai for service.

Although claims are being made of a slight victory favourable to Chêkiang, the general indications are that the fighting yesterday led to no results.

The Chêkiang troops are reported to declare they will be in Quinsan by 9 a.m. to-day.

WHY NANKING HELD OFF SO LONG

Marshal Chi Awaiting Orders from Pres. Tsao Kun

Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan's delay in attacking the Chêkiang forces after he had moved his troops from Nanking to Quinsan was inexplicable until an authentic report reached Shanghai on Wednesday to the effect that he was waiting for authorization for the war from President Tsao Kun. He insisted upon the President's sanction for his campaign against Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang on the ground that since he is opposing the independence of Chêkiang Province, he could not undertake a war without proper authority. It is understood that President Tsao Kun waited for assurances from Marshal Wu Pei-fu that he could take care of Marshal Chang Tso-lin, should the latter undertake to assist Chêkiang. When such assurances were forthcoming, the President telegraphed to Nanking instructing Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan to disband the rebellious Fukien troops who had been defeated and driven out of Fukien Province and were now units of the Chêkiang army. The meaning of such a message was of course easily understood in Nanking. As soon as Marshal Chi received Tsao Kun's instructions, he left for the front and ordered the attack..

FUKIEN'S LACK OF FUNDS FOR FURTHER WARFARE

Peking, Aug. 31.

Gen. Sun Chuan-fang does not seem to be moving hurriedly and he has now telegraphed to the Government asking for funds. It is now considered likely that the Fukien troops will do no more than make a demonstration on the Chêkiang border with the object of drawing off part of the Chêkiang troops.

Foreign Protection

The Chinese press reports that Dr. Wellington Koo will resign the Taili Premiership in the event of fighting between Kiangsu and Chêkiang, as Dr. Koo is strongly opposed to civil war. The Chinese papers add that Dr. Koo has drafted and will submit to the meeting of the Cabinet on Tuesday next, a plan for the protection of foreigners and foreign property in Kiangsu in the event of war.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

WAR LOAN RUMOURS

Peking's Reported Efforts to Borrow £1,000,000 from Hongkong & Shanghai Bank

The Chinese General Chamber of Commerce has addressed the following letter to the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank in connexion with rumours that Peking is negotiating for a loan of £1,000,000 to carry on the war against Chêkiang:—

Sept. 3, 1924.

A. B. Lowson, Esq.,
Manager,
Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation,
Shanghai.

DEAR SIR,—I have the honour to inform you that according to a report received from Peking, Wang Keh-min, Minister of Finance, is mortgaging the German Bonds to the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation for the purpose of obtaining a loan of £1,000,000 to pay for military appropriations.

In view of the impending conflict and the belligerent measures taken in connexion therewith, resulting in the severe losses which the people have already sustained, the loan abovementioned, if it materialises, will have the direct effect of prolonging the strife between the two provinces, thereby increasing the sufferings of the panic-stricken people.

Bearing in mind the friendly relations existing between this Chamber and the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, we are writing this letter to your good self to inquire if the report as above stated is correct. Should it prove to be not unfounded, we shall feel highly indebted to you for the termination of all negotiations connected with this loan. On the other hand, if the report is not based on fact, your assurance that the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank will on no account entertain any request for a loan of this kind will ease the mind of the public, the opposition on the part of the people of Kiangsu and Chêkiang to the reported loan under negotiation being firm and unanimous.

Kindly let us have your esteemed illuminative reply at your earliest convenience so that this Chamber being thus enlightened may have with the least possible delay an accurate knowledge of the situation.

Thanking you for giving this matter your early attention.

Yours faithfully,
CHAIRMAN.

DELIMITATION OF WAR ZONE

No Fighting within 15 Miles of Shanghai: Merchants' Suggestion to Belligerents

On Tuesday the following telegram was despatched by the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce of Shanghai to the Cabinet, Peking, Ministry of War, Ministry of Finance, Tuchun Chi Hsieh-yuan, Tupan Lu Yung-hsiang, and Defence Commissioner Ho Feng-lin:—

Although belligerent measures have been taken in Kiangsu and Chêkiang for the short period of 10 days, the exodus caused by war rumours has inflicted horrible sufferings on the people. Reports to hand indicate that the contending armies are drawing near to striking distance, and if unfortunately the conflict becomes unavoidable, it is most important that a war zone should be defined so that within an area of 15 miles outside the boundaries of the commercial centre of Shanghai, no fighting of any kind will take place. You are requested to issue strict orders to the forces at the front to respect the limits of the war zone.

Attention is drawn to the fact that in the year 1913 the view was expressed by the Consular Body that fighting should be forbidden within 15 miles of Shanghai. The evident reason for this lies in the importance of Sungkiang and Shanghai as the premier commercial centres of the country with assets of Chinese and foreigners amounting to incalculable millions of dollars. The existing population of several millions is increased by the influx of refugees, and should the war clouds be allowed to gather here, not only will the refugees have sought in vain for refuge in our midst, but the losses caused by the war will be formidable. Such an eventuality will mean the ruthless jeopardising of the best cultural elements of China. Moreover, the question of diplomatic complications will also arise. We implore that the military movements be kept within bounds, for if our petition is deliberately ignored and our patience exhausted, the authorities will be held strictly accountable for the indemnification of the ruinous losses and unwarranted sacrifices, failing which the people will resort to special measures for indemnifying themselves by means of the proceeds of the Customs surplus.

PRESS GANG KIDNAPPERS IN CHAPEI

Sikhs and Chinese Police Guarding Boundary

Press gangs are hard at work in Chapei, and hundreds of people have fled over the boundary lines into the Settlement for safety. A miniature reign of terror was set up by these gangs yesterday evening, and great excitement prevailed. The press gangs are made up of from twenty to thirty men, partly soldiers and partly police. They are pursuing their work without kid gloves, and when men are caught they are handled rather brutally according to local reports. The people are being impressed, not as soldiers but as labourers, and when a number are gathered up, they are lashed together with ropes, put into motor-cars and sent away to the scene of operations. Eye witnesses state that it was a pitiful sight on Wednesday afternoon and evening to see the women and children hanging on to their men and being broken away by the soldiery.

As soon as a press gang appears in a road, that road is immediately deserted, and it was a strange sight at times on Wednesday to see an ordinarily thickly populated road like Chapei Road almost deserted. Round about Dixwell Road was the chief scene of operations, whilst all along the boundaries Sikh and Chinese police (Settlement) were on duty in order to prevent the pressmen from coming into the Settlement. Hundreds of people who normally live in Chapei were sleeping in the roads on this side of the border last night for the soldiers do not confine their attentions to the people they meet on the roads, but also knock up houses and search for able bodied men.

CHINESE PRESS WAR NOTES

Where Is Fukien's Tupan? Ideas on How to Stop War: Destruction on Railway

A Peking telegram reports that General Sun Chuan-fang, Tupan of Fukien-Kuangtung Border Defences, left Foochow for Yenping on August 25. The journey usually occupies three days, and Sun could not have arrived at Yenping until the evening of August 28. Thence to Puchen, it usually takes five days to cover the distance, but at least eight days in the transportation of an army. Should Sun's troops choose to proceed to Chêkiang viâ Shanjao in Kiangsi, they would travel on comparatively good roads. Should they take the route of Fanlin to reach Mount Hsienhsia, they could only march onward in single file, their guns had to be carried, and it would be simply impossible for heavy artillery and all big supply carts to negotiate these hilly paths successfully.

Public opinion being unable to prevent the war, the most popular suggestion to end the war as quickly as possible is to refuse payment of taxes and dues. It is further suggested that the province which fires the first shot should be starved out of the fighting by the people refusing to pay their taxes and render any willing help whatever. Rather a counsel of perfection.

Report in the "Sinwanpao" state that at 10 p.m. on Monday 3,000 Kiangsu troops at Quinsan advanced to Lokapang along the railway, the vanguard reaching Anting. Several of the Scouts were captured by the Chêkiang troops. Kiangsu troops fearing a surprise attack withdrew to the west while the Chêkiang troops fearing that Kiangsu might make a surprise attack by train destroyed the railway near the No. 24 iron bridge at Huangdu. At 3 a.m. the same day Kiangsu soldiers destroyed the Tsing Yang Kong bridge and a slight skirmish occurred. Chêkiang soldiers have also destroyed the bridge between Lokapang and Anting.

FRIDAY.

FIGHT ON RAILWAY A FEINT?

Kiangsu Men Withdrawing on Railway: Not Best in this Region

According to a report issued by the Chêkiang authorities another battle opened on Thursday morning at daybreak between Anting and Huangtu, the Kiangsu forces attacking and being repulsed. The Kiangsu troops are then reported to have retired to Quinsan, the Chêkiang commanders claiming a victory.

The Kiangsu troops retreated about three-quarters of a mile. An observer states that the retreat was necessary because of the superior numbers of Chêkiang troops on this particular front.

Another report discussing the military plans of Kiangsu states: the war is now taking place on three fronts. The Nanziang-Quinsan front where most of the fighting has taken place includes the sector toward Liuho. The Ihing-Changhing front is west of the Taihu Lake. It is believed that any decisive victory in the present war will be fought out on this front. At present the Kiangsu troops are at Ihing. The Chêkiang troops are at Szean, a few miles west of Changhing. A third front is being made at Kwantehchow, in Anhui, near the Chêkiang border, Kiangsu troops being stationed there. The Chêkiang forces protecting the Taihu are at Huchowfu.

The Centre Not Serious.

At 10 p.m. on Thursday the Chinese Red Cross had brought back to Shanghai altogether 15 wounded soldiers and two wounded civilians. These were immediately treated surgically by the staff of the Red Cross Hospital. It was not expected that any more casualties would be brought into Shanghai last night.

It is now at last possible to obtain military passes to go to Nanziang; until Thursday no foreigner except the railway officials, had been allowed to go even as near the fighting as this. But there does not appear to be much advantage in going, as access to the front itself is still strictly barred and the only available news of the fighting is in the form of communiqués, which naturally give only the Chêkiang side of the encounter.

According to one foreign observer, whose judgment is exceptional, the fighting in the centre is not and cannot be of a very serious nature. The troops employed here on both sides are of the worst possible quality and they have not yet really come to grips.

It seems more than probable that, considering the nature of the ground along the railways, all swampy rice fields, over which fighting is practically impossible, both the rival Marshals have put their worst troops here. If we are to see serious fighting it will be on the wings, particularly in the West, over the Great Lake and towards Huchow and Kashing.

Fighting on Eastern Front

For the first time since hostilities opened there is definite news of fighting having begun at Liuho, on the Yangtze, which continued until after sun-down. Heavy firing took place on both sides. The attacking force came within two and one-half li of the Mission Station at Liuho, driving the people out of the place. The school opposite the Mission Station, which has been used as a Red Cross base was seriously damaged. The air was full of bullets, making it quite impossible for anyone to stay in the vicinity. Artillery, firing shrapnel, and rifles were used.

At 10.30 p.m. the Kiangsu troops had reached Anting, according to a refugee who ran away from that place by way of Liuho. He described the fighting as stiff, on both sides.

At 1 a.m. the "Sinwanpao" received news that Liuho had actually fallen to the Kiangsu troops.

We understand that the Chêkiang forces have six aeroplance at their disposal. Until quite recently, there appears to have been only one man in the whole army capable of operating an aeroplane, and the services of foreigners have been sought—one Russian aviator is actually with the army, we believe. Two machines which had been lying in packing cases at Lunghua for nearly 12 months have within the past two or three days been hastily built up, and both have left for the front, one on Wednesday evening and the other on Thursday morning. Of the six machines, two are of the "scout" pattern, and the other four may be used for bombing. None of them are equipped with machine guns. A Citroen armoured car, of the caterpillar design, has also been despatched to the front.

French Concession Defence

As reported earlier, sailors and Marines from the French Cruisers Colmar and Jules Ferry landed on Wednesday evening and took up positions on the Settlement boundary. The men from the Colmar have been stationed at the Sino-French shipbuilding works at Nantao and others are guarding the Waterworks, while the Jules Ferry contingent have been posted at various points between Pont Ste Catherine and Avenue Haig, where they will be in touch with the International Settlement troops. Arrangements have of course been made for co-operation. In addition to the naval men and marines, 250 Anamite police will be brought into the line if necessary, and the French Volunteers, numbering 150, are in readiness if called upon, while the whole force could be strengthened with a considerable number of ex-service men who are available. By the end of the present week, the Volunteers will have at their disposal two armoured cars, now being completed at the New Engineering Works, and constructed on the model of those operated by the S. V. C.

No orders have yet been issued for the landing of any men from the ships of other nations nor are the Volunteers ordered out yet.

How the Battle Began

An alleged account of how the battle began is published by the "Journal of Commerce." It is contained in a message which General Lu is reported to have addressed to the people of both provinces. Beginning with a disclaimer as to having opened hostilities, the message continues: "At 1.5 a.m. on Sept. 2, the Kiangsu army forcibly occupied Anting station on the Shanghai-Nanking railway. They were then 10 li from my forces, and I gave instructions that there was to be no move. At 1.30 p.m. on the 3rd., the Kiangsu force advanced from Anting in the direction of Huangdu and attacked my force. I then ordered resistance. On the same day the Kiangsu army destroyed railway bridges and molested passengers."

It is to be pointed out that no bridges have been destroyed. The cutting of the line was done by removing a rail.

The Money Market

Business in the Chinese banks eased up considerably on Thursday In the morning, native interest stood at 36 and rose to 55 in the afternoon. The price of Government bonds was better than on Wednesday, the quotations being:

	Wed.	Thur.
Currency reorganization	70.50	71.40
Consolidated 6 per cent.	57	59.90
$96.000,000 loan	17	18.80

There was an improvement in the money market, the banks having recalled their money for localization in Shanghai. The market remained quiet during the day. A report was current that foreign banks are recalling mortgage loans.

Latest.

The capture of Liuho by the Kiangsu forces was reported several times during the evening, both sides fighting backwards and forwards over the field. The Chêkiang forces were alleged to have retired to Lotien, which is approximately li from Shanghai.

From a news agency sympathetic to the Chêkiang side a statement emanates that this report is an invention of the local stock market.

CHINESE DESCRIPTION OF CAMPAIGN

The Three Lines of Attack: Importance of Taihu

According to a military authority, Kiangsu and Chêkiang have each their own plans of offensive and defensive actions. Kiangsu will attack Shanghai in three directions:—

1. Central, from Quinsan and Anting to Nanziang and Huangtu, along the Shanghai—Nanking Railway line.

2. Left, from Liuho and Taitsang to attack the rear of Woosung, while the Navy will attack it in front.

3. Right, from Anting to attack Chukoku and Tsingpu and thence to seize Sungkiang in order to cut communication between Chêkiang and Shanghai. To meet the attacks from these three directions, Chêkiang will always be on the defensive.

Chêkiang aims chiefly at occupying dominating points on the Taihu Lake Changhsin in Chêkiang and Nyihsin (Ihing) in Kiangsu adjoin each other. If the Chêkiang army were occupying Nyihsin, they could go, viâ Kingtan and Kuyung direct to Nanking. Therefore, Chêkiang is using its main forces, about 40,000 to attack Nyihsin. Thousands of small boats are being used in bridging over the Taihu, Gunboats will then bombard the city as a cover for the troops to land by way of these boats, First of all, 22 aeroplanes will be commissioned to drive off or disable all the Kiangsu aeroplanes which are not as efficient fighting machines as their Chêkiang prototypes. Bombs may also play a part. When Nyihsin is taken, all Kiangsu troops east of Changchow will surely became demoralized. But Kiangsu will make a stiff fight for Nyihsin.

ESTIMATES OF RIVAL ARMIES

Aeroplanes from Peking: Impressing of Coolies

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Nanking, Sept. 2.

Marshal Chi left on Monday night for Headquarters reported to be at Changchow. General Lu is appointed Nanking Defence Commissioner. Some foreign gunboats are in harbour. Trains are running to Soochow only. Thousands of coolies have been impressed and sent to the front.

At the yamên, the estimated number of Nanking's troops between Nanking and Shanghai is 50,000 Lu is given credit for 30,000 men. Nanking claims heavy reserves at Hsuchowfu and points north.

Last night an aviator passing through Nanking from Peking reported that Tsao Kun was sending down five aeroplanes which would reach Soochow to-day.

Outwardly, Nanking appears to be in a normal condition again. Conscription has ceased, business is fair and there is but little movement of soldiers. Wealthier families are moving away, however, and foreign institutions and homes are receiving numberless requests for protection in case of danger. The news of actual war would set the nerves of the city on edge again.

The civilian meetings to discuss protection of the city in case of looting have accomplished little yet but talking. Nanking University has advertised that it will open on time on September 4 and other mission schools are planning to open. Immediate provincial support is withdrawn from government middle schools and colleges and they are forced to delay their opening.

DEATH FOR POSSESSION OF ARMS IN HANGCHOW

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Hangchow, Sept. 3, 1924.

A proclamation by the Governor has been issued to the effect that those in possession of or harbouring arms in their houses will suffer the extreme penality of the law.

A Nanking spy was caught last night in one of the hotels and handed over to the authorities to be dealt with.

Tea and provision shops are doing a big business but the silk shops are doing nothing and silk is the chief industry of the city.

FUKIEN GENERALS APPEAL TO MARSHAL CHI

The Men Who Fled from Fukien into Chekiang: Sooner Than Cause a War We will Surrender Ourselfs to You

The following is a free translation of a telegram received from Hangchow on Wednesday:—

The Press, for retransmission to all Peace Delegates, Shanghai.

Since the war declared by the four provinces upon Chêkiang is alleged to have been caused by the stationing of our troops in Chêkiang, we, Tsang Chin-ping and Yang Hua-chao, admiring your extreme love of peace, and being loth to allow any consideration of our unworthy lives, the relics of a hundred battles, to jeopardize the safety of the fathers and elders of the provinces of Kiangsu and Chêkiang, have addressed a telegram to Mr. Chi Hsieh-yuan which please note as follows:—

"Mr. Chi, Nanking,

"In view of the calamities visited by Heaven upon our Republic, we who have been entrusted by the nation with the command of a division and a brigade have always uncomplainingly done our duty in protecting our people and defending our territory. Unexpectedly, we were rejected and persecuted at every step; as we could not bear to see the people suffer, we elected not to prolong our fight.

"As we have always revered Tupan Lu of Chêkiang for his advocacy of upright principles, for his devotion to his duties towards the people, for his enlightened and peaceful rule of the province which has earned him the respect and love of all classes of people whether high or low, we brought our persecuted men to him offering our allegiance, with no higher hope than being accorded a haven of peace. This we can still swear by the bright sun in Heaven as the truth.

"Infamous Rumours."

"To our surprise, scarcely had we dismounted from our war steeds, than all sorts of infamous rumours against us were scattered broadcast, such allegations as that Chêkiang in harbouring us must need offend its neighbouring provinces, Tsang and Yang in agreeing to incorporation in the Chêkiang Army must hold ambitious designs, etc. As all our troops were originally units of the National Army, and as we had been so relentlessly insulted at will for years past, we could not have endured such base treatment silently any longer without casting a reflection on our honour as soldiers as well as causing disgrace to our nation. Therefore, we turned and fought desperately in Fukien, emigrated into Kiangsi and at last found a place of rest in Chêkiang.

"Because we love and wish to preserve our trained men for our nation and because we regard our duties as sacred, so we have brought our whole forces to Chêkiang intact. Even if it were not so, the provincial governors would still have no right to disband any part of our National Army.

We Surrender.

"Now, as your province is using Chêkiang's absorption of our forces as the reason for making war upon that province, and as you have enlisted the united help of Fukien, Anhui and Kiangsi to make a military demonstration to overawe us, and believing that our temporary stay in Chêkiang, which is a matter that concerns us and no one else, and that we cannot bear to see the fathers and elders of Kiangsu and Chêkiang suffer on our account, we, in view of the imminency of the war, are compelled to make an offer to you thus:—Should you think it regrettable that the three provinces, Fukien, Kiangsi and Chêkiang, have not been able or willing to disband our troops, then, we, Tsang Chih-ping and Yang Hua-chao, are ready to leave Chêkiang territory at once and come to your territory to wait for your pleasure; and you may assign us some vacant land in the country side for the temporary accommodation of our forces. Afterwards, you may select the best of your own troops to accompany you to hold an inspection of our men in person, when we shall unconditionally obey your decision either to disband us or accept our service. Do not prosecute a tyrannical war on the merest pretext, to the infinite suffering of our people, we beseech you.

"Awaiting your orders instantly.

Signed: TSANG CHIH-PING, (Seal)
YANG HUA-CHAO, (Seal.)
Sept. 3, 1924.

The First Shot.

On September 3, Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang, Tupan of Chêkiang, and General Ho Feng-lin, Military Governor of Sungkiang and Shanghai, each issued a circular, denouncing the Kiangsu Army for having first attacked their forces and expressing regret that their love of peace has borne no fruit. Both say that it is their duty to defend themselves, in order to protect the people and preserve their territory from marauders. It was Chi Hsieh-yuan who, declares Marshal Lu, gave Tsao Kun the greatest help in bribing the M.P.'s to elect illegally the latter President of the Republic. "If such an arch traitor is not made away, our national turmoil can never be suppressed. The crimes of Tsao Kun will be published in a separate manifesto," concludes Lu's telegram.

AN ULTIMATUM FROM CHANG TSO-LIN?

Grave Rumours of Military Threat by Manchuria

A report was widely circulated on Thursday to the effect that Marshal Chang Tso-lin had issued an ultimatum to the Government in Peking, addressed to President Tsao Kun, demanding that the war against Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang should end at once. Otherwise, Marshal Chang will mediate the differences between Chi Hsieh-yuan and Lu Yung-hsiang by armed force.

It has been known for some days that Lu Hsiao, son of the Tupan of Chêkiang, had left for Mukden to arrange co-operation between Mukden and Hangchow. The report therefore is believed in many circles although confirmation from Peking of the receipt of such an ultimatum has not been received from the usual sources.

Mukden, Sept. 4.

The Eastern News Agency learns from an authentic source that at to-day's emergency military conference, Marshal Chang Tso-lin decided to mobilize the Fengtien troops to invade Chihli and to issue a circular telegram, enumerating crimes as alleged to have been committed by President Tsao Kun.

*The above reports are given under all reserve. It is impossible to verify them, and indeed a foreign report from Manchuria contradicts rumours of military preparation.

FOREIGNER'S NARROW ESCAPE

Woosung Sentry Who All But Fired

Foreigners are advised not to loiter in the vicinity of Woosung Forts. On Thursday eveing the news was brought to Shanghai that a member of the Whangpoo Conservancy Board had a lucky escape from being fired on by a Chinese sentry.

The foreigner was proceeding down stream in one of the Board's surveying junks. The junk had just come to near the bunding between the Forts and Belle Vue Hotels to enable the foreigner to land, when the sentry challenged the laodah. On learning that he could not land, or proceed further down river, the foreigner decided to put off in a small boat belonging to the port authorities. On seeing this, the sentry charged the magazine of his rifle, but was mercifully prevented from firing by the volubility of one of the junk's crew It was soon realized that to land would be to court disaster. Though the tide was running, out, a favourable wind enabled the vessel to return safely up river out of harm's way.

CHINESE PRESS WAR NOTES

Tsiang Cheng-kwe, ex-Tutuh of Chêkiang who is now in Canton, on Wednesday sent a telegram to General Lu informing the Chêkiang commander that he had been instructed by Sun Yat-sen to organize a Chêkiang Relief Expeditionary Force, comprising one Division and one Mixed Brigade.

General Ho Feng-lin has formally notified the Consular Body that hostilities were begun by the Kiangsu army.

The authorities of both provinces have received a letter from the Consular Body informing them that soldiers of either army entering the International Settlement and French Concession will be dealt with in accordance with International law. A map of the Settlement accompanied the letter.

THE PRESS GANG AT WORK

Excitment on the Settlement Border: Mobs of Coolies Fleeing into Shanghai

During the past few days the Press Gang has been busy collecting coolie labour in Shanghai, and on Thursday their efforts caused something like consternation in the Chapei district. On Wednesday afternoon, the Harbin Road district was combed out, and hundreds of coolies thronged into the Settlement to escape capture, remaining inside the border until nightfall and then returning to their homes in Chapei. About 4 o'clock in the afternoon a throng of coolie refugees assembled in North Thibet Road near Kaifeng Road, to escape the unwelcome attention of soldiers gathering forced labour. Three parties worked round the district in motor-cars, promising the coolies $24 a month wages and leaving no choice to any unfortunate individual they happened to lay hands on. The raid caused great excitement and hundreds scrambled inside the Settlement for protection. The presence of a few Municipal police at the point mentioned sufficed to keep order, and the crowd dispersed after the soldiers had gone and the "all clear" was passed round.

The process of, literally, "roping in" coolies was continued yesterday with great thoroughness. Parties of soldiers, some carrying coils of rope, and one or two displaying persuasive pairs of handcuffs, went all about the Chapei district in the vicinity of the railway station collecting men and tying them up in batches. As fast as a dozen or so had been hauled in they were sent off to the S. N. R. godown at the west end of the station and there kept under guard until arrangements for their despatch to various points on the line were made. Some of the coolies managed to escape, but the others sat about in disconsolate groups awaiting the orders of their new masters. Throughout the afternoon crowds of working people crossed the border into the Settlement, and Boundary Road was thronged with refugees

Trains coming in from Woosung also brought loads of people, most of them with all their worldly wealth in a single bundle, and everywhere there were signs that the Settlement is indeed going to be a very crowded place during the next few days.

Digging Trenches at Arsenal

Members of the press gang have also been active on the borders of the French Settlement, according to information received by a representative of the "North China Daily News" in an interview with the Chief of the French Police. In the direction of Siccawei soldiers from the Arsenal have forced the villagers to assist in the digging of trenches for the defence of the Arsenal. Men and boys of all ages have been conscripted and have been paid at the rate of 20 cts. a day for boys and 30 cts. for men. At present there is no report as to what extent entrenchment has been carried out.

Early on Thursday morning an aeroplane flew over the Woosung Forts and later at about 7.30 proceeded to Lunghua where it is believed to have dropped a package containing pamphlets.

The aeroplane is also thought by the French authorities to have come from Soochow where the Nanking troops have an aerodrome.

Affairs across the canal at Lokawei are apparently normal and life proceeds much as usual in spite of the activities of the press gang, save for numbers of Chinese who are to be seen making their way into the Settlement carrying personal belongings and even furniture with them. The press gang have not attempted to conscript labourers from the Chinese City.

Amah's Dug-out

Several Chinese servants employed by a foreigner on the border of the French Settlement fearing further war developments, have started to construct a dug-out at the foot of the garden out of an already existing refuse pit. The pit has been made more habitable and several bamboo poles have been placed across evidently for the purpose of protection from shell fire! Their employer has raised no objection to this far-sighted precaution, thinking that in case of panic it would be better to have the men close on the premises than elsewhere.

THE RUSSIAN LEGATION IN PEKING

Premises Still in Custody of Netherlands Minister; Checking of Inventories

Peking, Aug. 28.

The Note from M. Karakhan in which he complied with the request to nominate somebody to take over the former Russian Legation has been circulated amongst the representatives of the Protocol Powers, who will probably meet during the week to discuss it. In the meantime the Legation premises are remaining in the custody of the Netherlands Legation.

The Netherlands Chargé d'Affaires was nominated to represent the protocol Powers in the matter and M. Karakhan has appointed M. Klishko, Councillor of the Soviet Embassy, to represent him. The former has completed the task of preparing and checking inventories, in order to satisfy himself that everything is still there, but none of the keys, it was stated at the Netherlands Legation to-day, will be handed over until the inventories have been checked over with the Soviet representative. This has not yet been arranged.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

M. KARAKHAN AND THE U.S. NOTE

Soviet Ambassador Still Demanding Its Withdrawal

Peking, Sept. 2.

The communication embodying the American reservation in connexion with the handing over of the Russian Legation to the Soviet plenipotentiary has now changed hands four times. It was orignally sent to M. Karakhan by Mr. Yoshizawa, the Japanese Minister on August 18. The document was returned by M. Karakhan to Mr. Yoshizawa the following day, and on August 29 Mr. Yoshizawa sent it back to M. Karakhan with a covering note, in which he pointed out he was merely carrying out his duty as senior representative of the Protocol Powers.

It transpires that on August 30 M. Karakhan again returned the communication to Mr. Yoshizawa, accompanied by a note stating that he, M. Karakhan, had never any doubt as to Mr. Yoshizawa's position in matter, but he was unable to accept the explanation of the Japanese Minister that the document could not be construed as containing any insinuation against the Soviet.

M. Karakhan declares he still holds the view that the American statement is neither proper nor courteous, and expresses the hope that the American Government will not make another attempt to present a communication which he cannot accept, and which is not supported by International Law and International practice. — Reuter's Pacific Service.

Handing over Delayed Pending Consent of Protocol Powers

Peking, Sept. 3.

The text of the note sent to Sir Ronald Macleay by M. Karakhan on August 25 regarding the Russian Legation, which the British Minister agreed with the Soviet Plenipotentiary to withhold from publication for the time being, is now given out.

M. Karakhan states that he considers that the handing over of the Legation is being effected in view of the fact that the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is the owner of the buildings. Although he is unable fully to endorse all the considerations laid down in Mr. Yoshizawa's note of August 18, M. Karakhan expresses his firm belief that the existing differences will not prevent the establishment of a modus vivendi between the Soviet Embassy and the other Legations in the Diplomatic Quarter.

It is announced from Russian sources that after the receipt of M. Karakhan's note, Sir Ronald Macleay explained that the Legation could not be handed over until formal consent had been given by all the other Protocol Powers.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHANG TSO-LIN AND THE SOVIET

Harbin, Aug. 29.

The preliminary conference between Marshal Chang Tso-lin and the Russian delegates on the question of the Chinese Eastern Railway has closed without any result having been reached.

Marshal Chang has declined to reopen the negotiations until the disorders in the South cease.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHINA AND LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Peking, Aug. 29.

The motion demanding the withdrawal of China from the League of Nations unless she is again given a seat on the Council of the League at the forthcoming meeting of the League, notice of which had been given by a group of members last week, was carried at this afternoon's meeting of the Lower House —Reuter's Pacific Service.

Geneva, Sept. 2.

There is good ground for believing that China will be given one of the Vice-Presidentships of the present Assembly of the League of Nations, and it is also thought likely that her request for the reduction of her contribution to the expenses of the League from 65 to 35 units will be granted probably with the object of neutralizing the clamour of that section of Chinese Parliamentary opposition in favour of China's withdrawal from the League and strengthening the position of Dr. Wellington Koo.

Later.

The Assembly to-day elected the six Vice-Presidents as follow:—

M. Bourgeois (France)
Lord Parmoor (Great Britain)
Signor Salandra (Italy)
Senor Urrutia (Colomia)
M. Skrzynski (Poland)
Mr. Tang Tsai-jon (China).—Reuter.

SOVIET CONSULATES IN NORTH CHINA

Harbin, Aug. 31.

The Soviet Government has decided to establish Soviet consulates in the following places within the domain of China:—

Consulates-General in Harbin, Mukden, and Shanghai; Consulates in Canton, Manchuli, Chefoo, Hankow, Heiho, and Pogranitchnaya; Consulate branches in Tientsin, Kalgan, Tsingtao, Kuanchegtzu, Hailar, and Tsitsihar.—Eastern News Agency.

A CHIHLI PROVINCIAL LOAN

Peking, Aug. 26.

The flotation by the Chihli administration of a short-term provincial loan has been proposed by Marshal Wang Chen-ping, Tuli of the province. The money is required to re-adjust provincial loans and repay short-term foreign debts. It is suggested that the rate of interest should be 10 per cent. and that repayment of the loan should be spread over a period of six years. No announcement has been made as to security.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

OUR YOUNG LADIES

Aug. 30.

ONLY once, one recalls, have the youth of Shanghai been under really heavy critical fire, and this only directed upon a particular genus of the species, viz., that curious social product known as the "lap dog." For some two or three weeks this unfortunate young man suffered metaphorical violence of all the wits and satirists in Shanghai, himself scarcely raising one angry bark before retiring into a profound obscurity. Our young ladies, on the other hand, seem quite unable to escape the eye of the critic. Periodically, one and another arises in wrath and smites the feminine youth and beauty of Shanghai, their dress, their amusements, their social deportment, their alleged passion for cocktails and cigarettes, being condemned with bell, book and candle, and their whole existence scarified when a particularly ruthless scribe comes along. In the past few days, an incipient renewal of the attack has been observed, but probably diminishing trade and the immanence of war (Chinese) has checked what might have developed into a stream of lively letters to the editor.

This is no new thing, nor is it peculiar to Shanghai. The phenomenon, probably of Edenic origin, is common to all times and all places. Was there ever a time when contemporary young ladies escaped the charge of falling short of the splendid and immaculate youth of their aunts and grandmothers? There is always that reminiscent feminine ideal which they just miss. Readers of Mrs. Markham's "History of France" (a volume probably not widely read in Shanghai), will perhaps remember the case of the 15th century Professor of Etiquette who laid down as inviolable the rule that ladies might wipe their lips on the table cloth, but not their noses. That was simply a new fashion of which the professor disapproved, and no doubt he was equally dogmatic on the subject of powdered noses. The point is, that all these criticisms are relative. Things are condemned because they are new. There was a time when ladies who rode bicycles offended against all conservative canons of good taste and modesty; it was positively an outrage for any of them to be seen cycling along a country road in the company of young men, while to take tea at the village inn, in the same bold company, really extinguished all claims to social decency. Critics change with the times, new fashions form the theme of new offences against propriety. What, one wonders, will the critic turn to when his present list of lapses falls into the same easy category of accepted things as those very daring Victorian bicycle rides?

Meanwhile to those fair ladies, who, not unnaturally perhaps, resent thus being held up to the searchlight of "Bachelors of 17" and "Fathers of Seventy," might we recall Smee's sage observation to Captain Hook, who complained that the crocodile, having devoured one of his hands, was always pursuing him to devour some more: "After all," said Smee, "It's a kind of a compliment." Why do men indeed so mightly occupy themselves in all ages with the proclivities of the fair sex? Is it not that there is nothing so divinely worth being occupied about?

MARSHAL LU'S REJOINDER

Sept. 1.

FOLLOWING our interview with Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan of Nanking, we took steps to ascertain the views of Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang of Hangchow, and the results of our special correspondent's visit to his yamên appear to-day. As in the case of Marshal Chi's explanation of his policy and position, the detached observer is bound to see a great deal of reason in what Marshal Lu says. The question of the Fukien troops admitted into Chêkiang has, of course, never been more than a pretext. If there were not greater issues at stake, we may doubt whether anything would ever have been heard of them. But as a matter of dialectics, Marshal Lu's retort is certainly rather neat. As regards the Chihli party's peace terms, for Marshal Lu to accept them now, before the opposing forces are even in touch, would obviously be to accept defeat. And from his general bearing and manner of speaking it is clear that he does not think he need do that just yet. In this connexion Reuter's correspondent in Peking sends down by mail a supposed calculation of the opposing forces, which gives Marshal Lu 95,000 men and Marshal Chi only 42,000. This is an obvious invention of that unblushing institution, the Peking Press Bureau, designed indirectly to represent Marshal Lu as the aggressor and strengthen the Chihli party's argument that Marshal Chi acts only in self-defence. Putting all estimates together, one hazards a guess that the two armies are numerically much of a muchness and we doubt if either exceeds 40,000 men. Of their relative equipment and efficiency, we have no trustworthy information. Those who are convinced that Marshal Chi must have a "walk-over" are probably not more numerous or positive than those who are sure Marshal Lu has nothing to fear.

As for unification by force versus unification by conference, the arguments on paper appear about equal; and if political partisans have been talking for ten years past, as Marshal Chi says, they have equally been fighting, as Marshal Lu reminds us. In China's long history, no dynasty has ever established itself except by force, first in some corner, them gradually expanding its power by dint of arms. But perhaps no true analogy can be drawn from imperial days for these of sainted republican ideals. The most interesting part of what Marshal Lu says is that the will of the people must prevail and that the provinces should elect their representatives and Peking accept them. Assurely if there is to be a republic in China, the voice of the people must prevail, as it does to a modified extent in Western democracies. If we ask why, in China, that voice has not yet had the slightest influence on the course of affairs since the Manchus were driven out, why, indeed, it has scarcely even been raised—at least not above a whisper—the answer can only be that in the West it has taken the people hundreds of years to assert themselves. In England, which is really the forerunner in democracy of all the Western world, it was the Wars of the Roses four and a half centuries ago which first gave the people an opportunity to measure their strength with the feudal barons; and the road leading to the present uncertain blessing of electoral equality for professors, bricklayers and schoolgirls has been marked with many a set-back and sanguinary struggles uncounted. After all the form of government is largely a superficiality. It is the principles of life on which people insist and for which they will shed their blood that make the strength and unity of a nation; and it would be easy to show that both Marshal Chi and Marshal Lu equally represent the people of China.

SHANGHAI AND THE WAR CLOUD

THE Chinese, we are often assured, are anxious above all things to get rid of extraterritoriality. This anxiety is less in evidence at moments of crises like the present. During the past few days the population of Shanghai must have been increased literally by tens of thousands. The refugees, there is excellent reason to believe, include, among ordinary folk, the wives and families of many leaders on both sides in the dispute. And always, as Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan said in the interview we published on Friday, and as we may well believe to be the case, Shanghai is regarded as a heaven-sent asylum by every political conspirator in the country and all the great plots are engineered from within its sheltering walls. This influx of refugees is extremely hard on the normal peaceable Chinese population of Shanghai, sending up rents and prices to unendurable heights; and if there were any conceivable means of damming the flood, we should certainly advocate using it. Meanwhile we would ask, if Chinese themselves, politicians, military men, students, merchants, shopkeepers, have so little confidence in their own authorities to protect them, that at every breath of danger they flee to the nearest extraterritorial area, why should foreigners be more eager to place themselves under the uncontrolled rule of Chinese republican dignitaries?

Last Thursday afternoon representatives of Chinese business organizations invited the foreign chambers of commerce to meet them in the North Honan Road assembly hall. The object of the meeting was to consider the war situation and to suggest co-operation—that blessed word—between Chinese and foreigner—if possible to stop the war; if not, to get it removed somewhere where it would cause the least possible inconvenience to Shanghai. The meeting consumed the usual quantities of tea and cake, debated for about an hour and a half and dispersed unfruitfully. Nothing else, we think, was to be expected. We do not wish to be rude to the Chinese business community, but we feel bound to point out that their foreign confrères are beginning to be a little suspicious of their ideas of co-operation. Much has been heard of it in recent years; it is a nice, easy word to pronounce; it has a most imposing sound; but in practice it means nothing but a Chinese device to get the foreigner, what is vulgarly called, "to carry the baby." At Thursday's meeting, one foreign speaker roundly said that he did not hold with any schemes to stop the war: in view of the futile history of the past ten years, he thought that the only way and the best way was that the quarrel should be fought out to a finish. Another foreign speaker said that before he and his colleagues even considered taking steps to meet the Chinese proposals, they must have a guarantee that representative Chinese business men were wholeheartedly in the movement, would act with the foreigners in full accord and full publicity, not only secretly but on the house-tops, not in council chambers alone, but in the market place. This, to use another phrase which will not be denied, "put the lid on things." The Chinese whispered together and then said they would refer the matter to their principals, of whom, by the way, it was thought by some present that there was a singular absence.

We do not pretend to feel the slightest regret that the meeting ended thus. Since we wrote last Friday that the foreigner's duty in the present crisis is to remain absolutely neutral, we have had abundant evidence that this represents the best and soberest foreign opinion in Shanghai. We may even regret that the Diplomatic Body have thought fit to warn the Waichiaopu that they will hold the Chinese Government responsible for any damage to foreigners or their property. To do so or not do so would not affect their right to claim for any damage; and in view of the miserable record of futile protests and sterile admonitions of the past year or two, such a warning is, to put it mildly, grotesque, merely calculated to exasperate Chinese feeling. Shanghai has every right to protect its boundaries from being invaded by warring or defeated soldiers but then—halte là. If fighting really breaks out between Chêkiang and Kiangsu, the issues involved are so very big, together with the close interests of Marshal Wu Pei-fu on one side and Marshal Chang Tso-lin on the other, that nothing less may be at stake than the question of who is to rule all China; and it is certainly not the foreigner's business to interfere in that. If the conflict, once again, dies out in compromise, we cannot see that foreigners would improve the position by taking a hand in it; and we certainly do not suppose that they have any wish to do so. What would be the result of committing ourselves to any scheme of Chinese and foreign businessmen's co-operation to stop or localize the war? Nothing whatever, but that foreigners would earn the hostility of one contestant or the other, probably both, and sow the seeds of more anti-foreign feeling. They cannot interfere in any way without appearing to take sides; and that, whether between Chi Hsieh-yuan and Lu Yung-hsiang, or Chang Tso-lin and Wu Pei-fu, they have not the slightest excuse for doing.

May we, in conclusion, suggest to the Chinese business organizations, that if they want wars stopped, they are the people to stop them. They may not be able to stay the present fight, having begun to think about it rather late in the day, although our Chinkiang correspondent's report of how the local chamber of commerce put a stop to conscription shows that the merchants still have a good deal of power if they choose to use it. But until the people of China say how their country shall be governed, no one outside can help them. Shanghai must apparently accept the situation of being an asylum for those afraid to live under their own rulers. But it has no intention of being their catspaw.

THE OVERCROWDED TRAMS

Sept. 2.

IN yesterday's issue of the "North-China Daily News" an anonymous correspondent took up the cudgels on behalf of the Tramway Company with no small amount of confidence. Twice he makes practically a demand for an answer to his arguments, thereby conveying the impression that he regards his contentions as unanswerable, or else that we are frightened to join issue with the Tramway Company, an attitude rather difficult to understand. Our correspondent's arguments are, in point of fact, very easily answerable.

A few general observations regarding the recent criticisms of the company may be advisable. Anyone who cares to study the "North-China Herald" of some few years ago, or any old resident with a good memory, will see or will remember that, since the earliest days of the Tramway Company's existence, there have been protests innumerable with regard to overcrowding on the trams and the dangers attaching thereto, yet the practice has continued in spite of the existence of both police and company rules against it. Prior to, say, the last two years, is there any evidence that the Company has made any serious effort to prevent overcrowding? For instance, let us take three years at random and ask what prosecutions for breach of its rules were instituted by the Tramway Company in 1910, 1913 and 1919. If we could get an answer to this it would be interesting to publish it side by side with a list of prosecutions and convictions of mafoos and chauffeurs (especially mafoos) for allowing more than the authorized number of passengers in carriages, or permitting people to ride on the steps of motor-cars, or of truck drivers for allowing dangerous riding on their vehicles. Yet is there any difference?

Criticism became more pointed and eventually—we think it was well over a year ago—the Municipal Council insisted that all tram cars should be fitted with safety gates. Even yet many of them are without gates. Further, it was ordered that numbers signifying the carrying capacity of the cars should be painted in a prominent place, obviously with the idea that none in excess of such numbers should be carried. Thereafter we saw in the cars "20 seats," "22 seats," or whatever the number happened to be, but can any person give evidence of any attempt whatever to limit the number of passengers accordingly? Indeed, as has been remarked before, it seemed to be imagined that the only purpose of the gates was to prevent people falling off the cars, for passengers were packed on as tight as ever and not infrequently it was all a conductor could do to force the gate home. The agitation continued, with the result that quite recently the police insisted that the carrying capacity definitely should be stated and that no excess passengers should be carried. Such a rule is not unique: indeed, it is doubtful whether there is one city in a hundred possessing tram cars that does not enforce it. Now we come to one of the points regarding which our correspondent thinks we have been unfair to the Tramway Company. We have said that the Company appears to have made scarcely any effort to enforce this rule, the contention being that the police will not enforce it and that the company's officials cannot enforce it because one of the inspectors once was held guilty of an offence when the Magistrate said that he used too much force in putting a person off a car. The answer is another question—How is an identical rule enforced without any bother in other places? Obviously the police cannot do anything except when a car pulls up where a policeman is stationed and an appeal is made to him. Must we have policemen stationed shoulder to shoulder along the entire tramway route, or the alternative of a policeman on duty on every car? Recently a member of our staff was travelling in an open tram car. A coolie jumped in on the wrong side and in the wrong compartment, cannoned against the foreigner and broke his spectacles. It happened that a foreign tramway inspector was standing in the roadway some little distance off and when a complaint was made to him he replied, "Yes, it is unfortunate, but you see we cannot help it. The police ought to stop men getting on like that." We repeat the statement to which our correspondent takes exception, "Could anything be more absurd?"

An instance was quoted of a conductor arguing with a Chinese and allowing him to ride on the step outside the locked gate whilst the argument continued, and of a Sikh policeman ignoring the incident. That is no proof that the police refuse assistance, and we have reason to believe that the Sikh concerned has been brought to book for his indifference. The question our correspondent is so anxious to have answered is, "What should the conductor have done to prevent the ex-passenger from riding on the foot-board outside of the locked gate, when the police refused help?" The answer is—The conductor should have locked the gate and the driver should have refused to move the car until the passenger had got off of his own accord or had been removed by the police. That is what happens in London. The police very quickly will take steps to prevent a block of the traffic.

The suggestion that the writers of criticisms of the Tramway Company would be less keen if they purchased a few shares in the company scarcely is generous. Do we say the management of the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank is a scandal because we hold no shares in it: or the Asiatic Petroleum Company a disgrace to the community? Do we belittle Shanghai's shipbuilding yards because we do not share in their comforting dividends? Our correspondent provides the opening for saying that the fact that the Tramway Company makes such huge profits every year, most of which go out of Shanghai, causes us to regret the more that so little effort is made to do something for the comfort and safety of those who provide the dividends.

SHANGHAI AND THE COMBATANTS

Sept. 4.

WITH the opposing troops of Chêkiang and Kiangsu now but a mile or two away from each other in some places, on a semi-circular front extending from the neighbourhood of the Yangtze towards the Hangchow line and about fifteen miles from Shanghai, it appears impossible that fighting should not take place. Up till a very recent date, probably as late as Sunday, negotiations were certainly in progress; but the best opinion is that they have failed. The mediators who averted a war last year have not been "in the picture" for several days past. There appears some reason to think that neither Marshal Chi nor Marshal Lu is particularly anxious to fight, and the rumour that Marshal Wu Pei-fu is the controlling factor is too persistent to be altogether ignored. But the inner history of the past three or four weeks has yet to be written.

With the array of men-of-war now in harbour, we need no further evidence that the Powers take a properly serious view of the situation, and while exact details cannot be given at the moment, readers may rest assured that the precautions taken to protect the integrity of the Settlement will not be less effective than in the revolution of 1913. On this point, however, one precaution may be emphasized. Shanghai has not yet, perhaps, arrived at the degree of having exactly a refugee problem. It has easily enough absorbed those who have come. But we submit that the time has come to shut the doors. Especially do we need to take measures to keep out soldiers from either side, armed or unarmed. The fact that a party of fugitive soldiers have been deprived of their weapons should not be regarded as sufficient passport to entry. Arms are too easily obtained in Shanghai. Marshal Chi and Marshal Lu have repeatedly announced their firm intention of respecting all property and we may well be sure they will keep their word. But if a fight begins they have no control over stragglers. We owe it to the Chinese residents of Shanghai as to the foreign community to do everything possible to keep the doors of the Settlements. The time to shut them is now, not when the fighting has begun.

SHANTUNG ROAD HOSPITAL

IN the interests of the ratepayers the Municipal Council of Shanghai must closely scrutinize every item of public expenditure and resolutely refuse grants in aid to hospitals and other charitable institutions, unless it can be shown that in return for services rendered the Settlement is under some kind of obligation to render help. In justice to the Council and to the ratepayers it must be acknowledged that when the obligation is perceived the response usually has been generous. It is hoped, therefore, that renewed consideration will be given to the correspondence between the Council and Mr. Teesdale, the Chairman of the Shantung Road Hospital Committee, who has just made an appeal on behalf of the hospital to the Municipal Council for financial help. In the main the appeal has been refused.

In financially supporting the Health Department, isolation hospitals, police hospital, vaccination stations, clinics, and other forms of medical work, and in giving financial assistance to various Shanghai hospitals, the Municipality tacitly recognizes that it is under an obligation to provide medical treatment, to some extent at least, for sick and injured foreigners and Chinese within the Settlement, particularly if the patients, because of their poverty, are proper objects of charity. To lay almost the whole burden of caring for the sick poor of Shanghai upon a few struggling hospitals obliged to collect the funds they need by private and public appeals, and which carry on no small part of the work done for the community at a dead loss, is hardly in accord with the wisdom and liberality which the Municipal Council shows in other matters affecting the welfare of all within the Settlement. The Shantung Road Hospital during 1923 received nearly 3,000 in-patients and gave medical or surgical help to 104,662 dispensary and other patients. Many of the patients (4,595) had been injured by tram-car and motor-car accidents, and no less than 1,883 of these cases were brought by the police to the hospital as part of their public duty; cases of attempted suicide numbered 1,043. In addition there were the numerous indigent patients barely able to pay the modest charge of 25 cents a day for their food, the hospital having to bear all other costs and charges. All this kind of work may be fairly described as service to the Municipality.

Turning to the financial situations, the actual cost of each patient in the hospital is $1.50 per day. In not a few hospitals in China the average daily expenditure is much higher. In one mission hospital in the north it is about $2.30; probably in the Rockefeller hospital in Peking it is more than double this amount. So there can be no charge of extravagance in the running expenses. As other charitable institutions in Shanghai are doing similar work to the utmost of their ability—for the suffering and poverty among the Chinese is almost illimitable—if the Shantung Road Hospital did not attend to so many patients the Municipality would certainly have to maintain an institution of its own for their reception and this would involve a large outlay. In addition to the money required for the purchase of land and the erection of a suitable building, there would probably be an annual budget of Tls. 100,000. The total expenditure of the Shantung Road Hospital during 1923 amounted to Tls. 81,278.17. Towards this the Municipally made its annual grant of Tls. 5,000, and at the present time it pays $1 a day towards the cost of treating its employees; in January, 1925, it will begin to pay the full amount, $1.50. This grant of Tls. 5,000 was first given in 1915. Since then the general cost of living has risen very greatly and the cost of medicines and surgical supplies has risen in even greater proportion. The hospital now asks for an annual grant of Tls. 15,000. Surely this is not an unreasonable appeal when all the circumstances are carefully considered.

But the question has a much larger aspect. Foolish and provoking as it is, many of the Chinese in Shanghai think that in municipal affairs they are not treated kindly and justly; consequently they harbour ill will and resentment. Ratepayers may be indifferent to this smouldering hostility, but would it not be a wise policy to show in every possible way our goodwill to the Chinese and thus win their goodwill, by doing more than is perhaps customary in caring for the sick and injured among their poor? It may be said there are numerous wealthy Chinese merchants and ex-officials in Shanghai who can very well afford to provide for the medical and other needs of their own people, but they will not do it, and it may be said further that it is doubtful if they or the Chinese generally appreciate in the least all that is being done for them. Supposing this is true, it is beneath the dignity of the Council to argue and act on the same level and not show a practical and sympathetic interest in the sufferings of the Chinese sick and injured in the Settlement. Considering the amount of good it will do, an additional Tls. 10,000 per annum is comparatively a small sum to add to the annual budget. The Shantung Road Hospital is accomplishing a vast work, quietly and very efficiently, and much of it is community work; its appeal for financial assistance should meet with a generous response, and if it is given we believe the majority of ratepayers will heartily approve.

THE LATE STRIKE IN SHAMEEN

WE have received a very interesting letter from Canton dealing with comments passed in this and other papers on the settlement of the Shameen strike. The writer throws a good deal of light on points hitherto, for some reason, curiously obscure. He shows that the statement of our leading article of August 20 that the foreigners only won on the question of the reinstatement of the police was not correct; furthermore, there was a good deal of feeling, well justified, in Shameen at the assumption (not taken in these columns but in some other quarters) that the strike was weakly handled by the foreign authorities. On this latter subject he writes:—

"If we had adopted the gunboat policy, we were certainly entitled to refuse to meet the strikers' delegates until they had definitely come into the open with their complaint. The only sign of weakness (?) was in obtaining the intervention of the Canton Government, but I for one and 99 per cent. of people would consider that we were behaving against the majority's interests if we had not tried every channel possible for a settlement instead of fighting the strike to a finish by refusing to deal with anybody else except the strikers and their delegates."

In respect of the police our correspondent thinks that they are just as much entitled to strike as anybody else if unjustly treated; but, he says, "What they should not do is to allow themselves to be intimidated in order to assist another body of strikers with whom they had nothing in common, their duty lying entirely in the opposite direction." This is perfectly sound reasoning and in view of the strength of the Bolshevik agitation in Canton the Shameen authorities are much to be congratulated on having upheld their point that the police were in no circumstances to be reinstated. The matter of the passports never presented any difficulty: the foreigners were perfectly willing to carry these themselves in order that there might be no idea of discrimination against the Chinese. As regards Chinese being free to use the Shameen as a thoroughfare, against which there is a very ancient regulation, our correspondent points out that the observance of this rule had long been getting slack and that the determination of the foreigners to reinforce it dated from long before the bomb outrage, and was the cause of much agitation in the Chinese press. On this point the strike agreement entirely gives the victory to the foreigners. In the matter of servants' pay during the weeks of strife, we understand that this was to be left to the clemency of individual masters and mistresses. There has been no difficulty in the matter at all. Whether the money was paid or not, the servants were so glad to get back to work, and set to at once with such energy, scrubbing, brushing, and cleaning, that for a day or two, as our correspondent humorously says, many residents found their houses almost uninhabitable and came very near to wishing that the strike had never been settled!

From the above statement it is clear that the Shameen community won a conspicuous success. The agreement was wrapped up in flowery language for the very natural reason that no one wished to exacerbate feeling unduly. It is important, however, that the rights of the issue should be clearly understood, because it was never really a fight between the Shameen servants and their masters, but between the Bolshevist element in the Kuomintang and the foreign community. As such the latter recognized it from the outset, and with the example of the regrettable climb-down at Hongkong in the big shipping strike, where exactly the same issue was really involved, they were resolved that they would not give in. For five full weeks they "stuck it out," in the height of a Canton summer, doing all their own work, not only in discomfort but it may even have been in danger. In the long run they were victorious, the agitators were completely discomfited and the residents of Shameen won a success on which they are not only to be congratulated but on which, in the circumstances prevailing in South China to-day, they are entitled to the thanks of their fellows in other parts of China.

WHAT IS THE FIGHTING ABOUT?

Sept. 5

WHILE we wait from hour to hour for news of the fighting between the troops of Chêkiang and Kiangsu, with as yet very little on which we can place reliance, the consensus of opinion is that the war is likely to prove either a very small affair or something very big indeed. If it means no more than a quarrel for the possession of Shanghai, there are at least good chances that it will end, as so many other similar quarrels have ended, in a compromise. But there are many circumstances pointing to the belief that the real issue is nothing less than whether Marshal Wu Pei-fu or Marshal Chang Tso-lin shall control all China. It has been pointed out to us that many readers are completely in the dark as to what this issue means and how it has arisen. The story is one of great complication which probably no foreigner could attempt to relate in detail. But in the broadest outline, the following facts may be useful.

To begin with, we must go back to the year 1918 when Hsu Shih-ch'ang was elected President in succession to General Li Yuan-hung. Tuan Chi-jui was then Prime Minister and the famous Anfu Club, (which, with the Chihli party, divides all political power in North China) was at the height of its power. In the spring of 1918 the then General Wu Pei-fu, who already had a distinguished military career, was sent to recapture Yochow, on the Yangtze, and Changsha, capital of Hunan, from the South. Wu Pei-fu is a Chihli party man and an adherent of President Tsao Kun, who was at that time Military Governor of Chihli. Wu Pei-fu's success in retaking Yochow and Changsha made the Anfu Club nervous of his strength. He was told to stop on the Yangtze instead of returning to Peking, but this he refused to do and in the summer of 1920 he returned to the north, met the Anfu troops outside Peking and defeated them. Tsao Kun and, it is curious to recall now, Chang Tso-lin, who had been made Inspector-General of Manchuria in 1918, combined with Wu Pei-fu, and the Anfu Club was overthrown. The Premier Tuan Chi-jui fled to Tientsin; Tsao Kun became Inspector General of Chihli, Shantung and Honan, Wu Pei-fu retired to Honan and was made Vice-Inspecting General of the three provinces just mentioned; and Chang Tso-lin remained the dominating figure in Peking.

In June, 1922, a war broke out between Chang Tso-lin and Wu Pei-fu, the latter declaring that Chang was establishing a military dictatorship in Peking which he, Wu Pei-fu, would not endure. Chang Tso-lin's troops were defeated outside Peking and withdrew into Manchuria. Chang Tso-lin was "dismissed" from his lordship of Manchuria, but refused to accept dismissal and remains well established there to-day in supreme power and possessed of a very powerful army. After Chang Tso-lin's defeat outside Peking in 1922, President Hsu Shih-chang was forced to resign, and was succeeded as temporary President by his predecessor Li Yuan-hung.

We now come to the realm of speculation. Since 1922, it has been the universal opinion that the quarrel between Chang Tso-lin and Wu Pei-fu, which had indeed been left at a very inclusive stage, must ultimately be fought out to a finish. It is for this purpose, according to general belief, that Chang Tso-lin has built up the powerful army mentioned above; also to this end, that he is an ally of Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang of Chêkiang, and has come to an understanding, if not an actual alliance, with Dr. Sun Yat-sen in South China.

It is, again, this belief in another great clash between Wu Pei-fu and Chang Tso-lin, which gives us the clue to Wu Pei-fu's rapid extension of his power nearly all over China during the past two years. He has put in his own lieutenants as Tuchuns of Hupeh and Hunan; the success of another lieutenant, General Yang Sen, has made him overlord of all Szechuan; Shensi he has recently brought under his control; he is himself Inspector-General of Chihli, Honan, and Shantung, having succeeded to that post when Tsao Kun became President a year ago; Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan, Tuli of Kiangsu, Kiangsi, and Anhui, is a Chihli party man; and Fukien is in the hands of the Chihli party. Omitting Shansi (which pursues entirely its own life) and Kansu (which does not count for anything, as being too remote) the whole of China except the four southern provinces (Kuangtung, Kuangsi, Kueichow and Yunnan) and the eastern province of Chêkiang, is either under the direct control of Wu Pei-fu, or of Generals belonging to the Chihli party, which Wu Pei-fu controls.

Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang of Chêkiang, is the last big Anfu chieftain. He was Defence Commissioner of Shanghai and Sungkiang from 1917 to 1919 when he became Tuchun of Chêkiang. At that time the Anfu party were still in control in Peking and Marshal Lu retained control of the Shanghai district with the right to put in his own man as Defence Commissioner. He only barely acquiesced in the temporary Presidency of Li Yuan-hung as an expedient necessitated by the times, and has entirely refused to recognize President Tsao Kun, declaring his province independent. There is thus a double cause of friction between him and Marshal Chi of Nanking. Shanghai is in Kiangsu province, the ruler of which, Marshal Chi, not altogether unnaturally feels that he should have control of it; and while the Nanking Marshal belongs to the Chihli party, the Chêkiang Marshal belongs to the Anfu.

THE WATCHDOGS: A STUDY OF THE HUANGPU

In addition to these facts it must be recalled that Chêkiang and Shanghai are the only parts of Central and North China which Wu Pei-fu does not control. On two occasions the Shanghai question has very nearly caused an open breach between Chi and Lu, once last summer and again last December. It is to be conjectured that at that time Wu Pei-fu, whose hands were very full with the campaign in Szechuan, was not in a position to support Marshal Chi of Nanking. With Szechuan now under his control the position is different. According to the news we received yesterday, Marshal Chi has received full approval from President Tsao Kun, which really means the approval of Wu Pei-fu, in order to attack Chêkiang. Meanwhile, there appears no reasonable doubt that Chang Tso-lin is supporting Marshal Lu with large sums of money. Thus, if Marshal Chi wins, Chêkiang and Shanghai pass under the domination of Wu Pei-fu, who would then be able to turn his attention upon Dr. Sun in Canton. If he could drive him out, practically the whole of China would be under his sway. It would then be a question whether he would advance to attack Chang Tso-lin, or whether Chang Tso-lin would sit quiet and allow his enemy to obtain so tremendous an ascendency.

There have been many wars in China during the past ten years, all of a more or less inconclusive nature. It is perfectly possible that the present war may equally be without definite result. But we trust we have made it plain to those who have not time to follow political manœuvrings from day to day, that the contest for Shanghai may prove in reality the contest for the whole of China.

THE VOLUNTEER CORPS

MR. Van der Eyden's letter in yesterday's paper stating that he was unable to join the Machine Gun Co. because it was British has evoked several replies. We have, therefore, made independent inquiries and learn that Mr. Eyden was not refused admittance to the Machine Gun Co., which is not a British Co., although the great majority of its members are British, but was told that his application would come before a committee meeting of that unit. (Most units subject candidates to scrutiny in this manner.) Without waiting for a reply to his application Mr. Eyden sent us the letter which we published yesterday, and which has evoked letters of which we print two to-day.

There is, we understand, a proposal to form a new battery of light field guns, which we trust will be composed of all nationals. There would be no harm done if this were started at an early date and the initial stages of training, including musketry, taught the men before they were transformed into a field battery. The nomenclature could easily be settled by giving the unit a letter, such as "C" Company, until it is armed with guns. The advantage of having the men trained and disciplined before the actual transformation would be well worth the trial.

No sound argument, however, has been brought forward against the existence of national units, and it must be remembered that many of the units of the Corps were originally formed by a number of nationals getting together and offering their services to the Council as a unit. There, therefore, appears to be no more reason why the Scottish Co., say, should admit candidates who are not Scottish than the American, Chinese or Portuguese Co. Certain units, viz., the Light Horse, Maritime Co., and Engineers, accept, we believe, all nationals, so that Mr. Van der Eyden has an opportunity of rubbing shoulders with quite a various selection of volunteers. An International Infantry Co., however, does not exist at present, but would, we feel sure, be welcomed by the Council if sufficient candidates offered their services to it in a body. May we suggest, especially at the present juncture, when several able-bodied men desire to bear arms should necessity arise, that European, American and Australian volunteers who feel that they would like to belong to such a unit should send in their names, addresses, etc., to the Commandant.

THE MILITARY KIDNAPPERS

Sept. 6.

THE way of him who tries to be neutral in war time usually has only one result, that of earning the enmity of both sides, each thinking that the neutral is favouring his opponent. We hear that the partisans of Chêkiang aver that this paper is pro-Kiangsu; and we have not the slightest doubt that, when we get in touch with the Kiangsu people, they will equally accuse us of being pro-Chêkiang. This is the ordinary course of events and we must do the best we can, conscious, as Lydia Languish puts it, of the integrity of our own hearts. But in one respect, there can certainly be no suspicion of our favouring either side, when we make an equal and very earnest appeal to both parties to put a stop to the brutal and inexcusable oppression of the military kidnappers.

The rounding up of Chinese of all kinds in the districts all round the Settlement, the captives then being bundled off, roped together, to the military lines, has been fully described in our columns. But in reality it is quite beyond power of description. At one time on Thursday afternoon North Thibet Road was so full of fugitives from the Press gangs in Chapei, that it was almost impossible to get along the road. What has been done around Shanghai by the one side has been fully equalled in Nanking, Wusih and elsewhere by the other. Furthermore, it is to be feared that soldiers do not stop short at kidnapping men for transport and manual work, but also help themselves freely to their property. Every report we have received from the interior in China of every war that has taken place for the last ten years, has been disfigured by the same sort of disgraceful tyranny. But it is startling to find that the very some conduct can occur in the two best-known provinces of China, in regions most susceptible to humanizing influences, must open to the shafts of western criticism.

We are quite sure that such acts have only to be brought to the attention of Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan and Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang to incur their severe displeasure. They are both humane men and it cannot be to their liking that the reputation of themselves and their armies should thus be besmirched. Yesterday, according to the Chinese press, General Ho Feng-lin issued an order that soldiers committing robbery shall be shot. This is an excellent move, but it does not cover the whole ground. We can be quite sure of the attitude of the men at the top; it is about their subordinates, acting in little isolated parties, that one cannot be so sure. When, for example, we also read in the Chinese press that kidnapped men were given a day's wages and allowed to go if they were unwilling to work for the army, we cannot but wonder how far they were allowed to express their willingness or unwillingness freely. We trust the Chinese press will not fail to protest and to keep on protesting against the kidnapping of peaceable citizens. Let it not be said of Chinese journalists that when a foreigner boxes the ears of a coolie, they are ready to advocate a general anti-foreign boycott; but that when their own military leaders carry off hundreds of inoffensive citizens by force, to do work which every other army in the world does for itself, they have no word to say.

PRESIDENT Tsao Kun, in compliance with the request of Marshal Wu Pei-fu, is reported to have decided to send Wang Cheng-ping to Tientsin to become commander of the Eastern Sector and Marshal Feng Yu-hsiang to Siyuan as commander of the Western Sector to defend Chihli against the invasion of Fengtien.

THE DYNAMITE MAGAZINE

Sept. 6.

IT becomes necessary again to call attention to the question of the Ma Lu Chiao dynamite magazines. So far as we can ascertain nothing whatever has been done either by the Customs officials or the authorities of the Settlement to give proper protection to the magazines. The silence of officials on this subject is significant. They will, no doubt, tell us that it is not their business and that they have not the time to contradict everything that appears in newspapers. This excuse would carry more weight, if permanent departments never did issue contradictions of journalistic statements, and if the question were less grave than it actually is in respect of the dynamite magazines.

Let us, for the sake of argument, admit that the position of the magazines so near to Shanghai is no danger in normal times. (We do not, in point of fact, admit it: because there never has been an accident there, is certainly no guarantee that there never will be, as the terrible explosion at Plumstead, about twenty years ago, and others like it, sufficiently prove). The point is that these are not normal times, and that if the magazine gets into the untender and inexpert hands of Chinese soldiers, disaster is bound to ensue. During the present week a party of soldiers has been seen in the neighbourhood of Ma Lu Chiao and it is known that they have been making inquiries about the magazine in which, as stated last Tuesday, there is a large quantity of dynamite. Now if the military decide to lay hands on the stuff, of what earthly use are a couple of foreigners and two or three Sikh watchmen? To protest against interference is, at best to be disregarded, not improbably to get a blow from a rifle-stock in the stomach or to be bayonetted: and if, then, Chinese soldiers begin removing the explosives, there is no practical doubt of what would happen. A great deal would be removed besides the dynamite.

Nobody, we believe, will accuse the "North-China Daily News" of scaremongering. But in this matter the responsible officials must be roused to take early and effective action. It is utterly unfair on the few men who are at present guarding the magazine to leave them in a position of so much responsibility and danger; for, if Chinese soldiers descended on them, no help could possibly reach them in time to be of any avail. And if an explosion occurred, though Shanghai might escape, the river might be irreparably damaged and the lives of the foreigners at the magazine would have been wantonly and wickedly sacrificed. An earnest appeal should be made to Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan and Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang to guarantee the neutralization of the magazines, and in the meantime to put them in the charge of an international guard of sailors and marines. They are certainly as much in need of a guard as any public supply works and they need it sooner.

IT is reported that several Shameen residents are being boycotted after having dismissed servants or declining to pay them for the strike period. This boycott is against the spirit of the agreement, which provided that there should be no reprisals on either side. The employees have been treated most fairly by their employers and in almost every case the servants have been given half-pay for the period they were out—an arrangement which appears just to both sides.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

The Three-Mile Limit

It is probable that if the average person suddenly came across the term "the three-mile limit" that person's thoughts would immediately fly to either strong drink or prohibition, as it is in connexion with the enforcement of prohibition in the United States that the "three-mile limit" has been most in the public eye in recent times. The "three-mile limit" has generally been understood to be the distance from its shores to which the sea is owned by a nation. In the 17th century three miles was considered the limit of range of gunfire, and therefore the limit to which a force ashore could exercise its domination over the sea by means of cannon. The term has always been more or less loosely interpreted, however, and with many nations it has been a law, or rule, or custom, rather than a matter decided by international agreement. The recent controversy between Great Britain and the United States of America served to show what already had become apparent in other directions—that the whole question of territorial waters was loosely embodied and capable of much misinterpretation, and it is therefore good news to learn that at the meeting of the International Law Association which is to be held at Stockholm in September a comprehensive scheme for the regulation of maritime jurisdiction will be submitted. The scheme would, if adopted, and carried into effect, standardize the three-mile limit of territorial waters, but would enable powers for certain definite purposes (the prevention of "bootlegging" for instance) to be exercised over a wider belt of sea, and would provide for the establishment of an international commission on a representative basis to deal with questions of maritime jurisdiction. The whole scheme is based on the admirable idea that the high seas should be kept for the common use and benefit.

Prohibition Again

An interesting situation, which not only raises the question of the interpretation of the U. S. coastal laws, but which also involves the prohibition issue, has arisen in connexion with a British passenger liner (the str. Voltaire) and that great American society the Elks on the one hand, and the U.S. maritime and prohibition authorities on the other. It appears that the Voltaire was chartered by a party of some 550 Philadelphia members of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks for a voyage to Newfoundland. En route to Britain's oldest colony the Voltaire stopped at Boston for five days, during which period the annual convention of Elks was being held at that port. As a result of that call the U.S. Government officials have imposed a fine of G.$110,000 on the Voltaire, equivalent to G.$200 per passenger, for alleged violation of the U.S coastal laws, under which it is illegal for a foreign vessel to ply in the American coastwise trade. The prohibition authorities have also taken up the issue, making a strong point of the fact that the vessel carried approximately 10,000 bottles of assorted liquor! While the prohibition authorities would appear to have nothing tangible to work on, as the liquor was placed under seal (in accordance with the recent treaty) before the Voltaire touched port, the question of whether the Voltaire has or has not violated the coastal laws would appear to be much more of an open question. The main question is the legality or otherwise of allowing passengers to land from a foreign vessel during a stop of several days in port. The American shipping companies were the first to take up the matter, and the authorities are supporting their contention that while no objection could be entertained in allowing passengers to leave a ship making a temporary call, to allow them to have exercise on the docks or near by, a five days' stop was violation of the coastal laws and that it appeared probable that the ship with its stock of liquor was really chartered to allow the passengers to attend the convention, with the voyage to Newfoundland as merely an incidental. The huge fine imposed is to be appealed by the owners, and though it was imposed for an alleged breach of the coastal laws, it seems certain that the prohibition people are also going to make a big issue out of it, on the grounds that, if the Voltaire were permitted to go unpunished, the 18th Amendment would be largely annulled. The prohibition laws seem always to be providing a pitfall for someone and to give strength to the old dictum that any law that is difficult to enforce were perhaps better unenacted.

Ricsha Limitation

In connexion with the Municipal Council's decision to reduce the number of public ricsha licences to 10,000 it was explained last week that it had become evident that permission for an almost unlimited number of ricshas to use the streets was neither of benefit to the ricsha people themselves nor to the public. A large number of ricshas in poor, dilapidated condition were brought into use, and there was difficulty in obtaining a sufficient number of pullers, 45,000 men being required, working on eight-hour shifts, three men per day for each ricsha, the result being that a number of old men and quite young boys came to be employed. Now, of course there are two sides to every question and though the above may be considered a fair explanation of the reasons for the change of policy it does not mean that it has been accepted with satisfaction by all. As a matter of fact, a number of ricsha owners consider that they have been very hardly dealt with and they assert that the Council has not behaved very honourably. It was the original idea that, if an unlimited number of ricshas were allowed to ply for hire, the law of supply and demand eventually would afford the automatic adjustment. The ricsha owners perfectly well understood that for a time many of them would suffer, but each hoped that it would not be his trouble, and all were prepared to take the risk, as was shown by the fact that many hundreds of new ricshas were ordered and put into service. Of a sudden came the objection to the vastly increased fleets of ricshas, a hasty conference and the decision again to reduce the number. The result is that many men now are left with a large number of useless ricshas on their hands and it is a question whether they are not even worse off than they were when engaged in the struggle to outlast the others. No one really wants to see unlimited ricshas on the streets, but it does seem a little unfair for the Municipal Council to change its mind so very suddenly.

The Trams

The most important part of "The Devil's Advocate's" letter in today's issue—we refrain from saying the signature—is his admission that it would be possible, by better regulation of the service, for the Tramway Company to put more cars on the rails and thereby considerably relieve the congestion. That is the very thing we have been driving at all the time, but hitherto the company's only idea has been to cram the cars to an uncomfortable and dangerous degree. When requested or ordered by the Municipal Council to do something or other it has been the company's invariable practice to argue and quibble and, on the ground that the matter still is under debate, to postpone compliance. It is for that reason we recently made a determined attempt to get matters set right. We have so criticized the methods of the company that finally they did more than make a showing with their very excellent foreign inspectors, who are a capable and conscientious set of men only too willing to put things right. Now the Chinese drivers and conductors, obviously acting under very definite orders, are enforcing the police and company's rules and the condition of the trams in the past few days has shown that they can do it with very little trouble when they know that they have got to. All this could have been done years ago and with the gradual growth of Shanghai we should not have noticed the inconvenience so much as we do when suddenly it is thrust upon us. The question as to whether mafoos taking up an extra passenger are prosecuted for cruelty to animals or for allowing their vehicles to be dangerously overcrowded is not one for us to answer, but as such prosecutions appear now to have been dropped, one might assume that the allegation is not that the practice constitutes cruelty to animals. Again, the assertion that certain big cities allow unlimited passengers on the trams cannot be contested because the writer has no knowledge of those particular places, but it is remarkable if overcrowding is allowed in Glasgow when the tramways of that city always are held up as the world's model. There is a strict passenger limit on the London trams. The tubes of course cannot be compared with the trams in a single particular. We would point out to "The Devil's Advocate" that for every letter such as his, excusing overcrowding, we have had scores calling for a reform.

War or What?

The interesting question has been put to us by one of our readers whether the present upheaval between Chêkiang and Kiangsu is to be called a war, a rebellion, a civil disorder or what? In point of fact, at the moment of writing, we are by no means sure that it should be called either, as any of the terms used appears to imply bloodshed, and there is no absolutely trustwortly evidence that any has yet occurred. (Since writing this such evidence has come, so we must find a term for what is happening). But the point is that insurance companies are perplexed. If it is a war, they are not liable for damage; if a civil commotion, they would be. (So we gather; insurance business is very technical and we may have slipped.) A question of this kind is for lawyers to decide, not newspapers. But politically speaking here is an interesting consideration. The Government in Peking has been recognized by the Powers as the legal government of China; therefore, technically, from the foreigners' standpoint it is and the insurance companies are presumably bound by the attitude of their Governments. Now Marshal Lu of Chêkiang has declared his independence of Peking. Therefore the latter regards Chêkiang as being in a state of rebellion and it would seem that any disturbance resulting from action taken by Peking or its agents to suppress Marshal Chi would appear to come under the heading of civil commotion. On the other hand Marshal Lu might argue that not only he but also Manchuria and vast portions of South China have never recognized the present Government in Peking, have always declared it illegal and continue to do so. We would no more presume to say which party is right than we would to adjudicate between insurance companies and their clients.

This Amazing China

Since China first became known to the outside world the latter has not ceased to marvel at it. Though the China of to-day may not resemble the China of a century ago in any outstanding particular except possibly the general worship of "squeeze" and "face," we all still marvel at it, and if there is any China and any outside world a hundred years hence it is more than likely our descendants still will marvel at the Chinese and China. Some years ago an observant and literary gifted Commissioner of Customs wrote that, even against all the trials and troubles that beset China, the tenacity, the business spirit and the amazing optimism of the Chinese invariably conquered, and in a surprisingly short while. Since then the same thing has been written by scores of Commissioner and it is repeated every year in their trade reports. It is so obvious a fact and so true an explanation—if not, indeed, the only explanation—that one does not tire of the reiteration nor express contempt at the lack of new phrases to describe the situation, for there is nothing else to say. It has come up a score of times again in the reports for 1923. Much the same story occurs in Mr. W. R. D. Parr's very interesting account of the trade of Canton. He gives a graphic description of the troubles of that hotbed of strife and intrigue and tells of the constantly recurring piracies, one of which yielded $100,000 in loot and one surmises that later on a woeful decline in trade will be recorded. Yet Canton's trade increased by 11 per cent. "and this increased value of trade is not to be accounted for merely by changes in price levels, for in certain important articles of trade the trend appears to have been downward." So again we have it that in a year of continued civil war, taxation that has amounted to barefaced robbery, unchecked piracy and a score of other evils, the unconquerable determination of the Chinese to do business predominated and there was a big increase in trade. Surely China would be almost the world's creditor if ever there came the time when there was space and unity from Manchuria to Kuangtung, Sinkiang to Chêkiang.

Commercial Arbitration

One of the most far-reaching faults to which the human race is prone is a widespread penchant to controversy. This controversy takes on various forms and manners, ranging from wars between nations or groups of nations to backyard quarrels between neighbours. Correlatively, means of settlement of disputes, whether between nations, or provinces, or business houses, or individuals, constitute an equally wide range, though it may be divided into two main classes—fighting it out, and arbitration. Leaving aside all classes but the one of commercial disputes, we still have the same two main means of settlement, though in this case "fighting it out" generally constitutes recourse to the courts. Recourse to courts and the law is still, as it has been for years, by far the more favoured and expensive method of the two (hence the fact that lawyers hold a considerable proportion of the world's cash), but there is every indication that arbitration is coming more and more to acquire that importance in the conduct of the world's affairs which it rightly should have held for many years. It may be remembered that at the 1923 congress of the International Chamber of Commerce, held at Rome about 18 months ago, the question of the wider extension of international commercial arbitration was given considerable prominence. Resolutions then adopted were to the effect that for the benefit of the commerce of the world the practice of international commercial arbitration should be facilitated and extended and that, to this end, the validity of arbitration clauses in contracts should more generally be respected. As a matter of fact, of 25 countries which have an arbitration law, in only three is a general arbitration clause not legally valid. These three are France, Brazil, and the majority of the United States, only New York and New Jersey having laws under which the clause is valid. The international Chamber of Commerce has now issued a report which shows that substantial progress is being made towards the common end of general commercial arbitration. The Chamber has established arbitral machinery in Paris, and up to July last about 70 disputes had been submitted for settlement by bankers, traders and manufacturers of various nationalities, and on the whole, great services have been rendered to those concerned without the necessity of long-drawn out legal actions and the contribution of big sums to the coffers of the lawyers. The International Chamber is now taking active steps to urge ratification by nations of the protocol on arbitration clauses drafted by the League of Nations. Many nations have done so already, and a bill, introduced by Lord Parmoor, is now before the British Parliament to authorize the minor alterations necessary to bring the British law on the subject into line with the international protocol. The International Chamber is to be congratulated on the results of its efforts, and it is to be hoped that before very long arbitration in the settlement of commercial disputes, whether international or otherwise, will be comparatively as general as it is now exceptional.

A Lawyers' Patron Saint

Patron saints are an institition as old as the hills, and whether they have been adopted by nations or cities or sects or churches, or in any other manner, there is no doubt that they invariably have constituted noble ideals and have had—and have still—a moral influence as intangible as far-reaching. Accustomed as we are, however, to saints' patronage of all manner of peoples and bodies, we must confess (without any desire to be cynical) to a slight start of surprise on learning that there is now a patron saint of lawyers; not that lawyers have not as much right as any other section of humanity to such a spiritual head of their profession, but at the unexpectedness of the thing; for (again, we have no desire to be cynical) the average man in the street cannot be expected immediately to associate saintlhood with those gentlemen whose profession is the law and whose hobby is generally understood to be the accumulation of wealth. The Council of the Association—or Order—of Lawyers in Paris has just adopted a patron saint; none other than Pope Clement IV. His Holiness the Pope has given his gracious benediction to the choice and has sent to the Paris lawyers an extremely valuable gift in the form of a likeness of Clement IV. Pope Clement IV is rightly considered one of the most remarkable of the long line of Popes. History tells us that he was born in the year 1200, and before he donned the gown of priesthood which was eventually to number him among the immortals, had achieved fame in other directions—first as a man of the sword and afterwards as a lawyer. He was a man of "much science, prudence and humanity; his judgments were always well accepted by the people, by the nobility and even by the King himself. Any defence he assumed was certainly won and any he declined was as certainly lost." In 1241, at the request of the King, he married a daughter of one of the nobles of the Court. His wife died in 1248 and Guy Folqueis, as he was then known, was so burdened with sorrow that he became a priest. In his new sphere he was as distinguished as in his old ones, for in eleven years he was made an archbishop, two years after was a cardinal, and in 1265 became His Holiness Pope Clement IV. A cultured and a brilliant citizen of the world, a popular and a humane Pope, Clement IV is eminently suited to become patron saint of members of a profession in which brilliance and a knowledge of human nature are among the chief essentials to success.

Dear Master

Leaden skies and sodden lawns inspired the watchman of one of our clubs to write the following letter to his "dear master":—

"I am obliged to infrom you that now it rain always and it dew greatly also; than they have made my shoes and stockings all so damp when I took a walk and watch into the lawn.

Now I beg you and please you to buy one rain coat and one pair of boots for me (new or old), so that may be ready to use for bad weather.

Much thanks to you,
Yours servent obedient,
(watchman) Wong Zang-pah."

The Trams!

The war for the protection of travellers' rights on the trams has been long and disheartening, but a victory has been won and the position now should be consolidated against the several minor counter-attacks that have developed. Privileges so hardly gained are not lightly to be surrendered. As stated before, it was a shock to be told that in Glasgow, whose tramway system always has been styled the world's model, overcrowding was allowed and although so many of the Tramway Company's men received their training on that system the company did not repudiate the distorted evidence given in its defence. So the public will be the more thankful to Dr. Couper Patrick for stating that he has recently returned from Glasgow and that overcrowding is not allowed there. It is for the Company now to put on more trams and to expedite its services. Many people have complained that since the new rule was enforced the interval between trams seems much longer than formerly. That might perhaps happen in the centre of busy routes; there is no reason why it should occur at the ends, yet it does. A lady standing at the Seymour Road stop, at 9.30 yesterday morning, looked at her watch and said, "I just missed a tram when I came here. Several have gone out to Bubbling Well, but this one just arriving is the first that has come back for 29 minutes! Do put it in your paper." That is supposed to be a 9-minute service, but lengthy delays have been noted very frequently of late and trams going out—not to the depot, but to Bubbling Well, to return—take a preposterous time to return.

NEWS FROM THE OUTPORTS

WU PEI-FU AND THE WAR CLOUD

In Full Accord with Marshal Chi and Wholeheartedly Supporting Him

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Nanking, Aug. 30.

An interview this afternoon with a leading official, closely in touch with Marshal Chi and with the direction of events, threw light upon several factors in the present situation.

According to this official, Marshal Chi did not act until he was assured of the full support of Wu Pei-fu and Tsao Kun. Although the report some months ago that Wu was jealous of Chi contained considerable measure of truth, a whole-hearted understanding has now been reached. General Lu is thought to be banking upon the strength of his triple alliance with Mukden and Canton. The "ins" in China are now determined to force the "outs" into line and to unify the country by force. It is probable that a presidential mandate will be issued to Lu to submit to the present central government. He will likely refuse, in spite of the compensations offered, and his refusal will be a clear pretext for a punitive expedition by Nanking, although the anomalous position of Shanghai is already ground enough for attack.

Governor Chi has given orders that foreign and mission property in the fighting zone shall be respected and protected, if possible.

Nanking is much quieter than it was during the panic early in the week. Conscription has practically ceased in the city, but is still going on in outlying towns.

Many families are leaving Nanking, driven by the traditional fear of the uncertain future. Mission schools and the Southeastern Government University are planning to open punctually.

Trains are running through to-day on the Shanghai-Nanking Railway, with much delay. At Changchow this morning, your correspondent found an immense camp out of the city, chiefly Hsuchowfu soldiers. At the stations between Quinsan and Nanziang, there were many soldiers but no evidence of fighting as yet.

FOREIGN MEN-OF-WAR AT TSINGTAO

Tsingtao, Aug. 25.

A dinner party unique in the annals of Tsingtao took place here on Friday when officers of the British, Japanese, French and Italian men-of-war, now lying at anchor in Kiaochou Bay, were the guests of Governor Kao En-hung. It was a brilliant and cosmopolitan gathering. Nearly all the visiting naval officers were present, and also Admiral Wen Shou-teh, Deputy Governor Hsiao; Mr. Chang, Chief of Police; Mr. Tien, representative of Marshal Wu Pei-fu; and the British and Japanese Consuls. At the conclusion of the dinner, the Governor made a speech of welcome.

Admiral Sir Arthur Leveson spoke on behalf of the visiting naval officers. He warmly thanked the Tupan and congratulated him upon the progressive character of his administration and the competent men with whom he had surrounded himself.

There are 13 vessels in Admiral Sir Leveson's squadron. Two French men-of-war are here, and there are also the Japanese battleship Tone and an Italian cruiser. In addition several divisions of the American Asiatic Fleet are expected within a few days. These vessels are now at their summer base at Chefoo.

Not for years has Tsingtao seen so many visiting men-of-war as this summer.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHEKIANG-KIANGSU GUNBOATS

Passing Through the Lines on Motor-boat from Soochow to Huchow

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Soochow, Aug. 31.

At 3.30 p.m. on Friday I left by motor-boat for Huchow, to meet a party coming by houseboat from Mokanshan. We reached Huchow at midnight, after a very easy run. We stopped alongside the gunboats of both Kiangsu and Chêkiang, reporting our business, etc., and received the greatest courtesy in passing through the two lines. The houseboat reached Huchow at noon, and we returned yesterday afternoon, arriving at Soochow at 8.30 p.m. On our return we did not stop, but merely slowed down in passing through the lines, the officers bowing to us very courteously.

From here to the Chêkiang lines, not a boat was to be seen on the Grand Canal except troop boats. Practically no farmers were in the fields, and it was said that practically two-thirds of the population of the various towns had fled. But over in Chêkiang business seemed to be going along fairly well, and almost as many boats were moving on the canals as usual. During the morning yesterday I saw hundreds and hundreds of people, leaving Huchow by boat.

There is not very much to report from Soochow, except that the people are still very nervous. The majority of the stores are open, but little or no business is going on. During the past three days many more coolies have been taken by the soldiers, and carried to the several fronts as forced labourers. Some seen to be treated very roughly. On Friday three coolies in fleeing from the soldiers jumped from a high bridge. One was drowned, and another crushed his ribs in the fall, so that he died soon after. No coolie, or servant, is free from the danger of being made captive, who has not a badge from the police, giving his name, address, and his employment. Even many "North River" sewing women have been forced into sewing for the troops.

There seemed to be very few soldiers in Chêkiang, and no warlike preparations, as far as I could see; but it is quite a different story in Kiangsu. At Pingmong yesterday afternoon I met two large boats loaded with quite heavy field guns, being moved up to the front.

Food prices in Soochow are daily rising.

Just now (at 11.50 a.m.) there was great excitement when a large bi-plane (twin motors) passed over the city, from the direction of Nanking, and flying toward Kashing.

FEARS OF ANOTHER WAR IN CHINA

A Fengtien Offensive Would Start Biggest Conflict Since Revolution

Peking, Aug. 31.

Recent rumours of disaffection on the part of General Wang Cheng-pin, Deputy Inspector-General of Chihli, Shantung and Honan, and General Feng Yu-hsiang, Tupan of Defence on the North-Western Frontier, towards Marshal Wu Pei-fu have been dissipated as a result of General Wang Cheng-pin's recent visit to Peking, during which he had a long conference with General Feng Yu-hsiang. It is now reported that General Wang and General Feng are taking joint precautionary measures against hositile action on the part of Marshal Chang Tso-lin, whose intentions are a subject of profound interest in Peking, where it is pointed out that a Fengtien offensive would precipitate the biggest conflict in China since the revolution.

Marshal Chang Tso-lin's vast military preparations seem all to have been timed for completion next year and the flooded country would make a present offensive in North China very difficult. On the other hand, the danger of the elimination of General Lu Yung-hsiang may influence Marshal Chang Tso-lin in favour of warfare this autumn. The chances one way or the other seem about even.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

HELPING THE FLOOD VICTIMS

Campaign for Subscription in Peking and throughout China: Shanghai to Raise $400,000

Peking, Aug. 28.

The National Flood Relief "Drive" with an objective of two million dollars for the flood sufferers of China is to be opened officially on Monday, September 1. This "drive" is the joint enterprise of the China International Famine Relief Commission to which four-fifths of the proceeds are to go, and of the Chinese National Red Cross.

President Tsao Kun has consented to act as Honorary Chairman. The treasurers are to be the treasurers of the China International Famine Relief Commission, Mr. J. E. Baker, and Admiral Tsai Ting Kan.

The opening here in Peking will be marked by a large public meeting at the headquarters of the Red Cross, 22 Kan Mien Hutung, to which the members of the Cabinet, all the foreign ministers and many of the capital's most prominent men have been invited. President Tsao Kun is unable to attend himself but will send a special representative.

Peking's quota to be raised during the "Drive" has been fixed at $500,000, which will be raised by ten teams, five foreign and five Chinese. Other cities have been given quotas as follows:—Shanghai $400,000; Hankow $200,000; Kaifeng $100,000; Changsha $50,000; Tientsin $300,000; Tsinanfu $100,000; Taiyuanfu $100,000; and Sianful $100,000.

That the situation to be met is even more serious than that of the great famine year is becoming more and more apparent. In most districts the excessive rains were preceded by severe drought which ruined the early summer crops. The water still lying over the country will prevent the planting of any autumn crops so that for a year and a half great sections of the richest agricultural regions of China will be without crops of any kind.

The two organizations participating in the "drive" have divided the relief work between them so that there will be no wasteful duplication of effort. The Red Cross will handle the more immediate emergency relief and will distribute grain and money to supplement the measures taken by the local officials in the flooded areas. The China International Famine Relief Commission on the other hand will devote itself entirely to relief measures of a more permanent character, such as the building of dykes and deepening of river channels and other flood and famine prevention measures.

So far as possible the money expended on these enterprises will be loaned, repayable to the Commission when local conditions permit. In this way, the Commission hopes to add to its permanent revolving fund.

It will be possible to ear mark funds contributed to the Drive for either organization.—China International Famine Relief Commission.

INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE IN PEKING

Endeavour to Improve China's Commerce and Industry: Over 100 Delegates

Peking, Sept. 1.

Upwards of a hundred delegates were present at the opening of the Industrial Conference at the Ministry of Commerce this morning, at which Dr. W. W. Yen presided. Dr. Wellington Koo represented the President.

Dr. Koo, in a speech, said that he hoped that the Conference would be the means of improving both commerce and industry.

Dr. Yen welcomed the delegates, and in a speech covering a wide range of subjects, dealt with various aspects of trade which could be improved.

The Shanghai delegates Mr. Li Shih-mai and Mr. Muao Chu, replying, expressed appreciation of the action of the Government in arranging the Conference.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

FLOOD CONDITIONS IN KALGAN

Peking, Aug. 26.

Last week Marshal Chang Tso-lin sent Gen. Hsu Lan-chow down to Kalgan to investigate flood conditions there. He has now telegraphed to Gen. Hsu announcing his intenion to donate 300,000 piculs of kaoliang for relief of the flood victims in Chihli, Kalgan and Suiyuan, and Gen. Hsu has requested the Peking Government to furnish the rolling stock necessary for transportation of the grain to the stricken areas.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHEKIANG PREPARED FOR FIGHT

Merchants Organizing Their Own Volunteer Corps: Gentry Working for Peace

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Hangchow, Sept. 2.

The Japanese Consul had an interview yesterday with Marshal Lu and was assured that everything that could be done would be done for the protection of his nationals.

The Provincial Commissioner of Finance is issuing $500,000 temporary local treasury notes to relieve the Bank tension.

The silk manufacturers are asking for half a million dollars from the Government in case they have to close down and throw idle 5,000 workers.

The merchants are recruiting their own Volunteer Corps for self protection in case the police force is insufficient. The rumours of war today are, if anything, not so wild as they have been and we still hope for peace. There are many here who hold the cause of peace dearer than party allegiance and the gentry are determined there shall be no war. Marshal Lu is a lover of peace but he will defend himself and do it well if attacked. His troops are well trained, well fed, and well paid, and are expected to give a good account of themselves. They are not the "Scarlet Runners" of the Tsing dynasty.

There was another big fire on Saturday night in the Tartar City, and thousands of dollars went up in smoke. Dr. Tang, one of the doctors of the C.M.S. Hospital, living in a self-contained foreign house, was burnt out and lost his furniture.

KASHING A HIGH ROAD FOR TROOPS

On Grand Canal from Soochow to Hangchow: Fear of Looting: Protection for Foreigners

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Kashing, Sept. 1.

Rumours have had exciting effects. People of means have been leaving the city for many days. Some of them have returned. So far nothing has actually happened.

As maps indicate, Kashing is on the Grand Canal between Soochow and Hangchow, about 10 miles from the Kiangsu border. What is feared is, that if a battle is fought at Quinsan or any point near Shanghai, defeated troops in retiring may loot as they pass and victors, following, will finish up leisurely what the others have begun.

Movements of troops from Hangchow over the railway, and then by canal, indicate that Chêkiang is on the defensive, with the purpose of fighting—if they do fight—on Kiangsu territory (i.e. what was formerly Kiangsu). Reports current for some time say that approaches to Hangchow are well guarded in the vicinity of Huchow and Kashing, formerly prefectural cities.

The attitude of the civil and military authorities is correct in reference to foreigners. Proclamations out to protect with all diligence. One new feature appears in the wording "those who take refuge in hospitals, schools or churches must not take valuables with them." The idea seems to be that mission premises in the interior are for the care of sick and wounded and helpless people, but not storehouses for Chinese possessions in times of disorder. It is surprising to see so many who wish to come into mission compounds as danger threatens.

The schools opened in some cases, but pupils fell off so much that regular classes have been postponed for two weeks (after middle of eighth moon). Money is very tight, silver is offered for currency notes of the foreign banks as being safe and easy to carry.

Conflicting reports come in of engagements near the border line, but none have been verified. Opposing troops face each other, but so far there is no evidence of actual fighting. Dates to begin battles have been changed, postponing from day to day, with a variety of explanation.

Food prices are increasing on a depressed market. Trains on the railway run as usual. The tracks are watched for train wreckers, and two suspects are reported shot. Telephone, telegraph and post-offices open as usual. People are anxious, not panicky.

SEPT. 28 ANTI-OPIUM SUNDAY

Every Place of Christian Worship Asked to Observe the Day Suitably

The International Anti-Opium Association reports that September 28 is to be observed throughout China as Anti-Opium Sunday. It is expected that every place of Christian worship will bring the subject before the congregation on that day, and that the reports of the service may subsequently be tabulated and thus become an expression of the attitude of the churches towards this great menace. The tabulated report will be sent to the League of Nations Conference.

A group of over 30 societies in Shanghai has combined to form the "National Anti-Opium Association." The Association includes the Society for Advancement of Education, the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce, China Medical Missionary Association, National Committee of Y.M.C.A. and Y.W.C.A., National Christian Council, the Council on Health Education, and the Women's Christian Temperance Union. During the recent conference in Shanghai of 48 Bishops of the Roman Catholic Church in China, some strong resolutions were passed making clear the position of the Roman Church in regard to opium and the traffic in narcotic drugs.

A thousand prominent Chinese Educators at the recent conference in Nanking of the Association for the Advancement of Education, after listening to speeches on the importance of the forthcoming League of Nations Conference, unanimously adopted the following resolutions:—

1.—That the association express its firm attitude against narcotics.

2.—That the association ask all other educational organizations in the country to co-operate with other organizations to start an anti-narcotic campaign before November of this year.

3.—That the association show its hearty support of any rules that may be made by the International Narcotic Conference regarding the reducing of the cultivation of narcotic plants, and ask all other organizations to express the same attitude.

4.—That the association request the Government to express its firm and sincere decision against narcotics at the Geneva Conference, and make this decision known to the people throughout China.

5.—That the Association join with all other organizations and use the simplest and quickest way to choose several delegates to represent the people of China at the Geneva Conference to express the real opinion of our people, and also to back up their Government.

6.—That the Association appoint representatives to co-operate with other organizations in this movement.

7.—That the association state the harm of narcotics in the school text books and refer this matter to the Committee on Health Education for action.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

WHAT the "North China Star" characterizes as a somewhat peremptory order has been issued by the Peking Octroi Administration calling for a vigilant watch to be kept for new motor-cars bought in outports and brought to Peking without paying the proper duties on them. It is pointed out that cars are often purchased in Tientsin, and brought to Peking as used cars. The trick is usually done by bringing down the Peking number plates to Tientsin, to be used on the newly purchased cars, which, coming to the tllgates, are represented to be cars of Peking owners and merely returning to Peking from a trip to Tientsin.

2,000 MILES OF NEW ROADS

The Achievement of the China International Famine Relief Commission

Peking, Aug. 25.

The engineering department of the China International Famine Relief Commission has recently issued a report on the engineering accomplishments on behalf of famine relief during the past three years.

Analysing some of the figures, it appears that the new roads constructed by the American Red Cross and the China International Famine Relief Commission since 1920, if put end to end would provide two trunk highways reaching from Shanghai to Chungking in the heart of Szechuan, and from Peking to Canton. In addition to this 2,000 miles of new road over 750 miles of repairs were also effected, the total cost being over $4,000,000, this sum providing food and shelter for both flood and drought sufferers.

In providing water for regions subject to drought some 25 miles of irrigation ditches were constructed at a cost of $51,000 and $6,672 wells were sunk at a cost of $405,000. Over 270 miles of drainage ditches were dug or cleaned at a cost of $220,000, while 500 miles of river dykes were built or repaired at a cost of more than one and a half million dollars.

The most notable expenditure on conservancy work was probably that in Shantung on the Yellow River, where the China International Famine Relief Commission contributed $360,000 towards the reversion of that river at Lichin where it had broken its dykes and flooded the surrounding country. All in all, the Engineering Report thus presented is an interesting testimonial to the past achievements of the China International Famine Relief Commission and gives hope of a wide extension of its usefulness in the future.—China International Famine Relief Commission.

MR. SCHERER STILL IN GAOL

Intolerable Conditions of Dirt and Disease, Bad Water and Vermin

We are informed from Mukden that the date has not yet been set for the appeal case of Mr. E. Scherer, the German citizen who was sentenced to seven years' hard labour for allegedly killing a Chinese child. He is confined in the Chinese prison where conditions are indescribably unsanitary and is suffering keenly. Those familiar with the actual conditions prevailing in the prison are very eager to have the trial in the Higher Court held as speedily as possible.

The prison is built upon filled in ground where the drainage pond of the Chinese city once existed. Indeed the remainder of the pond is just outside the compound, stagnant and foul-smelling. There are said to be 2,000 prisoners, of whom 10 per cent. are constantly in the sick ward in the charge of an unskilled attendant. Each inmate of the prison is entitled to about 15 cents' worth of medicine per month. Extremely ill cases are cared for in the Japanese S. M. Ry. Co. Hospital. Prisoners may bathe every five weeks or so, and 15 men or more, sick and well together, use the same water.

The well has been dug through this refuse-filled ground and is unlined. The water is said to be salty and bitter. Mr. Scherer, however, is allowed to have water brought in from the southeast suburb for the director of the prison. The heat of the summer, with the heavy rains which have turned the streets into quagmires, has added to the intolerable conditions, and it seems hardly probable that Mr. Scherer's health can stand out much longer.

When the wind blows from the southwest smoke and soot blow in from the chimney of the bean-sauce factory which is worked by the prisoners. The prisoners are allowed no exercise, their windows are allowed open during the day but are closed at night, and the premises are, of course, vermin-infested. Prisoners are also brought here to be tortured and their groans, shrieks and curses add to the horrors of the situation.

The only reason given for the delay in the hearing is the difficulty in obtaining the certificate from the Red Cross Hospital with regard to the child's injuries, although Mr. Scherer claims that the certificate was handed to his lawyer six weeks ago and the translation five weeks ago. It is reported that a foreigner was asked by the Higher Court to visit the prison, which was given a "window-dressing" for his benefit, hastily scrubbed, and sprinkled with Chinese perfume to cover the usual stench. It is also said that the foreigner was not shown the sick ward, the sanitary outfits, the crowded conditions prevailing when the labourers return after their day's work, nor did he see the prisoner.

From Our Own Correspondent.

Mukden, Aug. 29.

We are now able to state that the appeal of Mr. E. Scherer, the German engineer under sentence of death in the First Prison of Fungtien, will take place at noon Saturday, the 30th instant, at the Kao Teng Shen P'an Ting.

We also understand that the President will admit people into the Court to follow the proceedings.

PECULIAR EPIDEMIC IN JAPAN

Like Meningitis But With Symptoms Doctors Cannot Grasp: A High Mortality

Tokyo, Aug. 29.

Considerable apprehension has been aroused here over the steady spread of an epidemic, which is a peculiar form of spinal meningitis. A few cases occur annually but this year it has been particularly virulent, and accompanied by an unusually high mortality.

A peculiarity of this disease, which up to the present physicians are unable to understand, is that the victims in the early stages show symptoms of meningitis, after which they fall into a comatose condition, remaining in such till death.

The most prominent doctors of Tokyo have been despatched to the affected districts, which include many of the provinces in West Hondo, and the Tokushima and Kagawa provinces of Shikoku.

The mortality everywhere ranges from 30 per cent. to 60 per cent. mostly among the aged. Latest reports from Kanawa, which is very seriously affected, record 750 deaths out of 1,400 cases.

Ten cases of meningitis, one of which was fatal, have been recorded in Yokohama and also 69 cases, of which 23 were fatal, in Kobe, according to latest reports.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

EDUCATION IN THE PHILIPPINES

Public School Statistics for 1923: Decrease in Expenditure

Manila, Aug. 20.

The total expenditure for the public schools of the Philippine Islands during the year 1923 amounted to $7,220,000 or $221,000 less than for the year 1922, according to figures just made public by the Bureau of Education.

A total enrolment of 1,128,997 school children was recorded in the public schools for 1923 out of a school population of 3,077,467. The percentage of attendance throughout the year was 85 per cent.

A total of 25,780 teachers was employed, of whom 329 were Americans, the great majority being native teachers. In the public schools only the English language is taught. Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, Aug. 29.—The Lower House met this afternoon, but did not deal with the question of Dr. W. W. Yen's nomination for the Premiership.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

QUARANTINE IN THE FAR EAST

Plans for Uniform Regulations

The following paper on "Quarantine Problems in the Far East," read by Dr. Wu Lien-teh, the famous investigator of bubonic plague, at the Pan-Pacific Food Conservation Conference in Honolulu this month, has been sent us for publication:—

The need of a uniform quarantine procedure throughout the Far East, nay the Pacific, grows in importance as "communications" become more frequent between the several countries concerned. This holds as good for food conservation as for human traffic. For a long time interested health officers, working in the Pacific regions have watched with dismay the multitudinous laws affecting international health. Such laws, while unduly severe in some advanced countries, are altogether absent in others, Hence shipping companies, trade organisations and individual travellers have at one time or another suffered on the one hand from laxity of health regulations leading to unnecessary infection and sometimes even death, and on the other from an over-rigid, at times purely theoretical, system resulting in panic and often entire stoppage of human and commercial intercourse over vast areas. The International Sanitary Convention of Paris (1911-12), even with its revised suggestions (1923), deals with only one side of the problem, namely, the protection of Europe from the East. Again, such a disease as plague is treated as a human instead of a rodent infection.

The establishment of the Health Section of the League of Nations with head-quarters at Geneva, has been justly acclaimed as a move in the right direction and the visit of a Health Commission to the Far East under Dr. Norman White in the early months of 1923 is a welcome sign that international health has indeed received the attention that it deserves. For it is obvious that in order to obtain the maximum of benefit for all countries the problem of international hygiene must be treated in the same way as communal hygiene, in other words each unit (in this case a country) should render its best so that the whole may succeed.

For the promotion of this high indeal no country will co-operate with greater zeal than China. Handicapped by the thoughts and practices of a 4,000 year-old civilization, her modern public health officials have often had to fight a hard battle, but the task will be easier if she receives encouragement and co-operation from neighbouring countries possessing more complete organisation. Of the five dangerous communicable diseases, to wit, typhus, bubonic plague, cholera, small-pox and yellow fever, the first is principally found in the northernmost provinces, but only in a mild form; bubonic plague is confined to the two coastal provinces of Fukien and Kwangtung; cholera is often non-existent; smallpox is almost universally endemic; while yellow fever has never been known to exist. The eradication of small-pox has been making considerable headway during the last few years by extensive propoganda and free vaccination among the masses. The control of bubonic plague still awaits proper co-operation between the Chinese and neighbouring governments. The terrors of cholera have largely disappeared since Roger's treatment with hypertonic saline solution, which in our hands has saved 85 per cent. of the most severe cases. There is not much need to fear yellow fever, since it is a rapidly disappearing disease, thanks to the immortal researches of Walter Reed, Carroll, Agramonte, Gorgas, and Noguchi. Lastly the origin of pneumonic plague, that most feared of all known diseases, has now been definitely traced to the Siberian marmot, and we express a hope that the temporary understanding between the Soviet medical organisation and our Service may soon culminate in a permanent agreement for the mutual protection of the two great republics, and therefore of the world.

To summarise them, if all emigrants from China are properly vaccinated against small-pox at their point of departure, the only disease which may be considered of international importance is bubonic plague, and the principal port from which this is conveyed is Hongkong. No standard yet exists for the treaty ports of China, by which one locality may exchange quick reports with the other for mutual protection. In order to clarify matters, a brief summary of the present quarantine problem in this country may be given.

The Chinese Maritime Customs have, since the introduction of quarantine laws in China, been the sole authority in the appointment of port health officers. The latter are usually busy foreign local medical practitioners, who as a rule do not examine any vessel until epidemic disease threatens or invades the locality.

With the exception of Woosung, Tsingtao, Dairen, Newchwang, Harbin and Autung, no quarantine hospitals yet exist, though port health officers are appointed.

Although the Commissioner of Customs of each port, as representative of the Inspector-General of Customs, is nominally responsible for its safety and as such issues instructions to the Port Health Officer, yet before any quarantine regulations may be enforced against any vessel flying a foreign flag, the permission of the local consular body must be obtained according to Treaty. Should any adverse vote be given by any consul, these laws cannot be enforced. Sometimes considerable delay is caused by reference to the respective Ministers Plenipotentiary in Peking or to the Diplomatic Body as a whole. In times of urgent stress, as in cholera or plague epidemics, such a procedure is suicidal from a health point of view. Besides, the quarantine laws of different countries are not the same and often lead to serious misunderstanding when applied.

JAPAN EARTHQUAKE ANNIVERSARY

Tokio, Sept. 1.

The ringing of bells and temple gongs and the blowing of whistles and a general suspension of business and traffic throughout the city for one minute this morning marked the hour of 11.58, at which last year Japan was visited by the most stupendous calamity in her history.

This first anniversary is being duly observed all through the day. Memorial services for the dead are being held, the chief of which was that held in the presence of 100,000 persons, including representatives of the Imperial Family, members of the Cabinet and other notable personages, on the site of the former Army Clothing Depot in Honjo Ward, where thousands lost their lives last year. This service was held under the auspices of the Mayor and the Municipality.

This was followed by other services according to Buddhist, Shinto and Christian rites respectively. Services were also held elsewhere in memory of those who perished in the river Sumida and otherwise.

In Yokohama this morning Bishop Heaslett conducted a representatively attended service in memory of the stricken members of the foreign communities, while in Kobe former residents of Yokohama passed a resolution of gratitude to the residents of Kobe for their generous succour and refuge in time of distress.

The day in general is being observed as a holiday, but without music and without the opening of pleasure and amusement resorts.

Addressing those assembled this morning at a service, Mayor Nagata laid special stress on Japan's gratitude for the assistance rendered from abroad last year. He called on all to remember that assistance in the observance of the anniversary.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

DEATH OF WELL-KNOWN CHEFOO RESIDENT

Chefoo, Aug. 26.

Mrs. James McMullan, who passed away on August 16, was one of the oldest residents of Chefoo, having arrived here in company with the late Mr. James McMullan in connexion with the China Inland Mission in 1890 after a period of missionary service in Western China. They together founded the Chefoo Industrial Mission, which in a short time has blossomed out into what is now known throughout the world as the Chefoo Lace Industry.—Reuter's Pacfic Service.

AN ARMS SMUGGLING ALLEGATION

False Scent and a Mare's Nest: Preposterous Charge Contradicted

Peking, Aug. 26.

Several weeks ago reports reached Peking of an alleged consignment of arms and ammunition of American make having reached Tientsin for the Chihli Party. The reports appeared in the Chinese press, and the Japanese Legation had a report giving minute details in some respects and containing glaring omissions in others.

It was stated that a contract had been signed on the premises of the American Legation between representatives of Marshal Wu-Pei-fu and Gen. Feng Yu-hsiang on the one hand, and the representative of an American arms manufacturing company on the other for the supply of 12,000 rifles to cost $600,000, 10,000,000 rounds of small arms ammunition, to cost $850,000, 1,500 pistols at $97,000, 200,000 rounds of pistol ammunition at $12,000, 250 machine guns $1,675,000, to be delivered within two and a half months at Sanchiatien. This information and the copy of an alleged huchao sealed by the Ministry of War, the Minister of War and the Chinese Government were forwarded to the American Legation by the Japanese Legation. Both the contract and the huchao were dated April 20, 1924. No information could be given as to the name of the boat on which the arms and ammunition had arrived at Tientsin, or the date of arrival.

The American Legation knows nothing of the matter, but immediately instituted inquiries, and on the 25th instant sent a Note to the Japanese Legation saying that it had made inquiries relating to the authenticity of the huchao and it had now been informed by the Vice-Minister of War that no such huchao was ever issued, and that he was of opinion that no such incident had occurred. The Vice-Minister of War had since confirmed his statement in writing, saying that the report that had appeared in the press that huchao (lu No. 1949) had been issued by the Ministry of War was entirely without foundation of fact.

Furthermore, the Customs authorities at Tientsin had notified the Ministry of War that no such incident had occurred. The note concluded by saying that it seemed hardly necessary to inform the Japanese Legation that neither the American Government nor the American Legation in Peking was in any way implicated in such a transaction.

During the interval between the circulation of the original report and the American reply to the Japanese Legation exhaustive inquiries were made by several correspondents both in Peking and Tientsin, and no corroboration of the report could be obtained.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SOVIET'S BID FOR FAR EASTERN TRADE

Conference of Financiers and Merchants to be Held in Chita

Harbin, Aug. 31.

According to the Russian press to-day, a Soviet economic conference of the Chairman of Finance Commissars and representatives of those Russian merchants, who are engaged in foreign trade in various places in the Far East, will be held in Chita in the course of next month. At the conference, reports will be made on conditions of trade and money-markets in various places in the Far East, and deliberation will be made on the exportation of cereals and other subjects. In this connexion, the Soviet authorities here state that the Moscow Government, by holding the above conference, wants to understand the economic conditions in the Far East with a view to pushing its economic policy.

Chefoo has been startled by the appearance of several stars in the heavens at 10 o'clock in the morning.

"SOUTHWARD HO!"

"East, West, Home's Best"

By W. Bruce Lockhart

Hongkong, Aug. 1924.

There's a humorous Scot down here, a pawky lad of the name of Robert MacWhirter, who writes his reflexions in the "South China Morning Post" every Saturday morning. It is the one bright feature of Hongkong journalism, a little piece of terra firma amid the ocean of printers ink, so to speak, to which one can turn of a Saturday morning in the sure and certain hope of finding a piece of writing on local topics that is worth while.

Robert reads the papers. Robert's cunning Scottish eye scans the columns of our very own "North-China," and so, Robert surely happed upon my remarks about the cotton stockings, the mythical Mrs. Brown of Kowloon, and the material Yarmouth bloaters that the Canadian Pacific give you for breakfast when you travel by their splendid ships.

Robert would have none of it for he is a loyal Hongkong mountaineer and woe betide any Shanghailander who dares to scribble base innuendoes and carping cynicism about this blessed Beauty Spot. So Robert put a nice new, bright, shiny and sharp nib in his pen and put it across us properly. Hear him on Shanghai, our Model Settlement!

"Me for Shanghai everytime. And all the time. Ay, yon's the spot right enough. You don't get the dear sweet ladies dancing there in white cotton stockings. Not on your life. Silk every time; maskee who pays for them. None of this deepyawned desire for bed at midnight either. The Shanghai husband is too well trained to permit of that sort of thing. True, he feels like a bit of blotting paper in the morning, but who really wants to work anyway? It's not natural. On wi' the dance; let joy be unrefined! What does it matter what a man does wi' himself after midnight so long as somebody else's wife feels like having another? And look how easily you can get divorce in Shanghai! That's progress for ye. The only way you can get rid of a wife in Hongkong is by the costly process of making some doctor think she's got the sprue, plus three ticket wardrobe trunks and a steamer ticket that makes you feel the best part of an Empress boat is your's for life. They do things better in Shanghai.

And the folk are so companionable up there. None of your stand-offishness in the Model Settlement. Why, I've known perfect strangers—and ladies at that—come up to me on the street and talk lots of conversation. Same in the gardens. They'll sidle right up and sit on the seat alongside ye as if they'd known ye the best part of a life-time. Ay, they're a very engaging lot up there, and no' a bit particular either. A free and frank people altogether.

Quite a cosmopolitan place into the bargain. There you meet all kinds; in fact Shanghai gets more and more like Budapest every day. Take their fine roads for instance. Where in the world can you go and see a street like their Broadway, wi' it's glittering cafes and cabarets? Here in this joyland, the satiated traveller finds fresh impressions and drinks in the mystic atmosphere of the Orient as he flits across the bridges spanning the fairy-like creeks which intersect this beautiful boulevard.

And what about the Rubicon? Who would not cross such and have no regret? And the Russians, the poor dear Russians; wonderful old General Gabblekoff and his delightful cadets—also soon to leave for Serbia. And the pedicabs, the soft-headed riesha coolies, the fleet-footed gharries, the Bubbling Well Road, the bubbly at the Del Monte and the Carlton. Yea, the very life, of a surety."

Yea, fellow citizens, and all ye who leave the Bund, bravely and blithely, business bound to this beauty spot in the South. The brightest spot of all, to my way of thinking, is pawky Robert's corner in the "South China" of a Saturday morning—look for it, it will make you forget the early morning cup of tea served in a coffeecup, that doesn't taste like either, and the look of the banana, the two lumps of sugar, and the piece of rock-like buttered toast all lying down together, like the lion and the lamb, on the plate which the boy brings in to give one sustenance for bearing up through another day—but, thanks be—one day's march nearer home!

Good Fellows All.

There are bright spots here, however. Nearly all the men I have met are first class good fellows. They say there is a great gulf fixed twixt the "milingtary" and civilians, but I haven't noticed it so far. There is one old Colonel, retired from coloneling and ruling his men with the velvet gauntlet in order to administer the manifold affairs of an important institution. I had occasion to go to him in a situation of some awkwardness and he was kindness and courtesy itself to the stranger within his gates. He has my gratitude and profound respect for the delightful and charming manner of his method, and the kind words with which he sent me forth.

The there is a naval chaplain—a man with the intellectual brow of a great Harley Street consultant—with a personality so charming and so friendly that one really thought he was a doctor of medicine rather than one concerned with the cure of souls. No wonder they don't need missionaries to the heathen in Hongkong! So long as they have padres of this type there can be no heathen to convert—a backslider must have slid far indeed if he didn't want to scramble up the slope again at the winning beckoning of this fine fellow. A man's man, and a friend of all.

And the business men, the merchants, the men who run the various shows—all of them,nearlyall—damgood fellows. I have in mind a couple of the lads of the village who told me they live on an island whither they voyage to and fro six days a week, and to which they kindly invited me. They've a cupboard and an ice-box and some glasses hidden away behind the counter of their business house and the noon-tide call finds everything merry and bright.

Sinclair is here, the soul and brains of the Hongkong A.D.C., whom we knew so well over a decade ago when he was in Shanghai. He has pursued the study of his hobby and models of his beautiful "sets" are on exhibition at Wembley, and the Queen herself spent half an hour examining and studying them recently when she paid a visit to the Hongkong Pavilion. They've got a man down here who can produce Dunsany masterpieces of phantasy as they have not been produced in the West End itself, who has Norman Graig beaten to a frazzle—and he came from Shanghai! (I wonder what Robert of the Glittering Broadway will have to say to this testimonial?)

Jury Trial Anomalies.

Turning from the pleasant topic of charming personality to serious matters, one had rather a shock at a recent visit to the Courts of Justice here. A man was on trial for his life, a sordid enough case, and the poor wretch was found guilty and sentenced—an unpleasant enough thing for judge and jury alike, apart from the horror of it for the condemned man.

The system in vogue in Hongkong is in curious contrast to that which, I believe, British Law compels to be followed in the case of a man on trial for his life in the United Kingdom, or even in Shanghai.

They empanel a jury of seven—not of 12 men.

They do not lock the jury up during the continuance of the case but allow them to go about their affairs at the adjournments, and the jury go off to tiffin as they will, and go home in the evening as they please, and assemble again the next morning for the grim business of the trial.

Frankly, one is rather astonished at this licence, which seems so flagrantly opposed to the well established custom of British jurisprudence for murder trials in which the jury is locked up and kept apart entirely from the possibility of any extraneous influence or interference.

Granted the inconvenience of men, performing their duty of citizenship, being segregated for several days from their fellows and their daily affairs, granted the apparent absurdity of a platoon of prominent or simple citizens being shepherded till bedtime, and at their up-rising, by the Marshall of the Court, until their dread or happy duty has been done, it comes upon one with rather a shock to see several of the jurymen from the Courts of Justice near by taking tiffin together at a public restaurant or elsewhere—no more set apart, for the time being, from their fellow men, than they need be supposing they were merely trying the facts of some burglary case or other.

It seems to me that the provision which sets men apart and aloof from their fellows during such time as they hold the scales of life and death in their hands is a wise provision, a seemly and a proper thing under such grim and grave circumstances as being the final arbiters of another human being's existence?

I am surprised, and not a little shocked, to find that in this Crown Colony of Hongkong those responsible for the mechanism of judicial procedure have thought it proper to depart from the dignified, albeit stern discipline, the custom of our great country which decrees that, during the progress of a trial where the issue may be life or death, the jury shall be locked up, shall be set apart and aloof, without the possibility, however innocent of communication with outside influences,—until their verdict has been recorded, and their duty accomplished!

CHINA'S ANCIENT NAVAL BASE

Interesting Archaeological Discoveries at Peitaiho of Han Dynasty

From Our Own Correspondent.

Peking, Aug. 28.

If the surmises of geologists and archælogists in Peking are correct, Peitaiho is something more than a very delightful seaside resort. It is said to be the site of the third Han naval base which apparently has been lost to history and which archæologists have been trying to find for many years.

At the time of the birth of Christ, China suffered from the inroads of very daring Korean pirates, who preyed upon the peaceful Chinese until they and the Chinese themselves were routed by the Mongols. To protect themselves from these incursions, the Chinese established three naval bases, one near Weihaiwei, a second near Port Arthur, and the third is now stated to have been most probably on the site of Peitaiho. According to historical records it was situated in the Gulf of Chihli, a small island. Now Lighthouse Point, which is one of the residential sections of Peitaiho, mostly occupied by the summer residences of the Peking Union Medical College, is a neck of land jutting out to sea, and was at one time a small island. Since it was first 'settled,' numerous discoveries of iron piece have been reported, and Mr. Carl W. Bishop, of the Smithsonian Institution, who has been conducting excavations in various parts of China for several years, has lately brought to light other iron pieces, among other things, which have led him to suppose that Peitaiho was the mystery base. He has also located remnants of what he believes was the old city wall.

So interested was Mr. Bishop that he came back to Peking for his surveying instruments, and it is understood that he is now cooperating with Mr. F. R. Tegengren, of the Geological Survey, Mr. George B. Barbour, of the Yenching University, in an attempt to test the truth of the deduction.

MURDEROUS ATTACK ON GEN. FUKUDA

Tokyo, Sept. 1.

General Fukuda was unsuccessfully attacked this evening by a Socialist, who was arrested on the spot. General Fukuda was the commander of the Tokyo Garrison at the time of the arrest and murder of the Socialist, Osugi Sakaye, in September last and his assailant is declared to be a follower of Osugi.

Sept. 2.

Gen. Fukuda's assailant, Kyutaro Wada, declared that he intended to kill the General in revenge for the death of Osugi Sakaye, for which, he said, Gen. Fukuda was to blame.

Kyutaro Wada's revolver contained one blank and five ball cartridges. Only the blank cartridge was fired, the wadding striking Gen. Fukuda in the left shoulder blade, causing a severe burn. The assailant was seized before he could fire again. Gen. Fukuda required medical treatment.

YANG SEN'S SWAY UNDISPUTED

Era of Peace and Prosperity Continues Despite Plotters

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kiating, Sze., Aug. 17.

Old dame rumour keeps a lot of the world's unemployed busy. This week we were favoured with a telegram to the effect that the Military Governor had entered into a coalition with the 1st Army. That is to say Yang Sen has joined forces with his old and bitter enemy, Hsiung Keh-wu, who would have his head, against Marshal Wu Pei-fu, his friend and benefactor, who made it possible for Yang to gain ascendancy in Szechuan.

A couple of weeks ago "General?" Cheo Hsi-cheng made overtures to Gen. Iang Chuen-fang requesting the latter to give the former and his "troops" some rice as they were starving. The rice was forthcoming from Iang Chuen-fang, and Cheo took his leave. But where did he go? to Yuin Nin, if you please, and this is one of the outposts of Yang's army, facing the Kueichow border. This strategic centre he surrounded with the aid of Tang Tsi-muh and that part of Yang's troops were cut off. These two generals are said to be receiving aid from Hsiung Keh-wu, who it is publically said, is now recruiting men and means to re-open the attack upon Szechuan and its progressive government.

There are those, of the class mentioned above, who say that Yang Sen sits on his throne with fear and trembling and that he keeps the back door open for escape at any moment. Be this as it may, we must acknowledge that no one of recent years, indeed in the past decade, has done as much for the province; we are sure that he has many backers among the gentry who will be glad to see him continue his progressive schemes. The back door may be open, but Yang for the present sits securely on his throne. As long as Chang Tso-lin leaves Wu Pei-fu alone Yang has a splendid chance of prosperity and peace.

There is some rumour of unrest in the north of the province. One or two Generals there are trying to re-arrange their boundaries but one is not sure that this is any move against Yang Sen. As long as Liu I-chiu, Cheng Hong-fan Liu Tzi-chien and Iang Cheng-fang remain neutral or pro-Yang little will happen in the province.

Cargo Market Brisk.

The steady wet season makes it possible for steamers to come to port. We have had a visit from the U.S.S. Palos, but her stay was short owing to fear of falling water. The French motor gun-boat is in port and the m.v. Chwan Lan and Chwan Tong make their regular trips from Chungking. They can find all the cargo they can carry.

The market is pretty well supplied now with kerosene. Indeed there seems to be a little indifference on the part of the agents of the companies as to whether they carry any quantity in stock or not. This is partly because the merchants of the city find it a profitable business to slip to Suifu and buy a cargo of kerosene on credit for two months and bring it up to Kiating where they sell it at the Suifu price losing the transportation charges. This they make up, however, as they can sell the oil for cash and then have money on hand to purchase other goods and take them to Suifu, and making a profit on these goods purchase more oil and bring it back to Kiating where they undersell the regular merchants of the companies. Thus there is little inducement for the agents of the companies to carry a heavy stock here which they fear they will not be able to get rid of when the street merchants undersell them from ten to 20 cents per case. Some scheme like the raising of the price in Suifu will have to be resorted to if the agents here are to be expected to sell any oil. One of the agents here has said that he is with the company only for the kudos it brings him. Perhaps six months will see another agent in his place. Possibly not that long.

Bumper Crops.

Crops this year are abundant. The rice crop is already being harvested despite the heavy rains, and it bids fair to be a bumper crop. Other crops are in proportion. This year's lumber business has been very good, but the silk industry has been hampered by the excessive rains.

There have been several bad ferry accidents despite stringent rules and regulations as to the number of passengers per ferry. Crowding is the worst trouble especially on some of the ferries which run from markets, near at hand. The result is that the boats with their human freight, loaded to more than capacity strike a small rapid and soon fill with water. Last week 11 were drowned from two boats just as they were turning in at one of the busiest gates of the city. The week before, two boats became unmanagable in a rapid just above the city, and they struck and went down with all hands on board.

The Officer's Training School is going ahead. The men are neat, clean and have a soldierly bearing and seem to be taking their training seriously. They show the results of it on the drill grounds and in the streets. The course includes lectures on army sanition and hygiene. There are 320 in the school which is divided into three classes.

Numerous visitors who have passed through the city include the Rev. J. P. Davies, from Ningyuenfu, an old Kiatingite who is now on his way to Shanghai, where he will take up work, and Mr. J. R. Muir, on his way to Chengtu on a business trip.

Russian Peddlars Busy.

There are ten Russians here who are selling serge and other drygoods. Business with them seems brisk, if one is to judge by the number of cases of goods which come up for them on the steamers. The price for their goods is not excessive.

Mr. M. O. Berubé, the new Assistant District Inspector of Salt Revenues, has taken up his duties at Shutongchird.

CHEFOO RACE CLUB

Training in Full Progress for Autumn Meeting

The Autumn Meeting of the Chefoo Race Club is to take place on September 5 and 6 and has aroused much enthusiasm on the part of local jockeys. Training has been in full swing for two weeks.—

MANILA SCOUT MUTINY

Sentences of from Five to 20 Years for Ringleaders

Manila, Aug. 30.

Private Tomas Riveral, the principal ringleader of the mutinous scouts, has been sentenced to 20 years' hard labour. Eleven other ringleaders have been sentenced to terms from 15 to 5 years at the Fort McKinley court martial.

Riveral addressed the court stating that he had had no intention to mutiny and claiming that Porto Rican and negro troops of the United States Army had done the same thing without penalty.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE Pope's action regarding faminine dress has produced alarm and no little resentment, says a Rome message. The "Observatore Romano" says the Pope insists that a standard of modesty must be conformed to by women attending religious services and ceremonies and in visiting the Vatican. In both instances the dresses must have long sleeves and high necks, and must extend to the ankles, which should be just covered. The material must not be transparent. The "Corrispondenza," the official Vatican organ, confirms the report that the Pope has decided to offer special gold and silver medals for the best designs of a woman's dress suitable for wear in cathedrals and churches, and the task of adjudicating on the designs sent in will be entrusted to selected members of the Diocesan Councils.

CHAPTER II. FISHERIES.

Article 5.

The provisions contained in the annex to this article shall regulate as between the contracting parties, the fishery in waters contiguous to the northern coasts of the territory of the Union of Soviet Republics.

This article shall not be deemed to prejudice the views held by either party as to the limits in international law of territorial waters.

Annex.

1. The provisions of the present annex, the object of which is to regulate the police of the fisheries in the waters adjacent to the northern coasts of the territory of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics outside the limits hereinafter defined within which citizens of the Union shall enjoy the exclusive right of fishing, shall apply to nationals of the contracting parties.

II. Citizens of the Union shall enjoy the exclusive right of fishery within a distance of three miles from low water mark along the coast of the territory of the Union as well as of islands dependent thereon, and in addition, in such waters in the White Sea and the entrance thereto as lie to the southward of the parallel of 67 degrees 40 north latitude.

As regards bays, the distance of three miles shall be measured from a straight line drawn across the bay in the part nearest the entrance at the first point where the width does not exceed 10 miles.

III. The miles mentioned in the preceding clause are geographical miles, whereof 60 make a degree of latitude.

IV. The geographical limits for the application of the provisions of the present annex shall be fixed as follows:

On the south by the limits referred to in Clause II of this annex.

On the West by the meridan of 32 degrees east longitude.

On the east by the meridan of 48 degrees east longitude.

V. Boats arriving on the fishing grounds shall not either place themselves or shoot their nets in such a way as to injure each other, or as to interfere with fishermen who have already commenced their operations.

VI. No fisherman shall make fast or hold on his boat to the nets, buoys, floats, or any other parts of the fishing tackle of another fisherman.

VII. When trawl fishermen are in sight of net or of long-line fishermen, they shall not come within a distance of one mile from them, and shall take all necessary steps in order to avoid doing injury to them. Where damage is caused the responsibility shall be on the trawlers, unless they can prove that they were under stress of compulsory circumstances, or that the loss sustained did not result from their fault.

Provided that no vessel shall be responsible for injury to lines or other fixed gear, the position of which is not clearly indicated by lights or buoys or by a vessel standing by them.

VIII. Except in cases of salvage no fisherman shall, under any pretext whatever, cut, hook, or lift up nets, lines or other gear not belonging to him.

When a fisherman fouls, or otherwise interferes with the fishing gear of another fisherman, he shall take all necessary measures for reducing to a minimum the injuries which may result to the gear or to the boat of the other fisherman.

IX. The use of any instrument or engine which serves only to cut or destroy nets is forbidden.

The presence of any such engine on board a boat is also forbidden.

The contracting parties engage to take the necessary measure for preventing the embarkation of such engines on board fishing-boats.

X. Fishing-boats shall conform to the general rules respecting lights and sound signals, as well as those concerning steering and navigation, which have been, or may be, adopted in respect of these boats by mutual arrangement between the contracting parties with the view of preventing collisions at sea.

XI. All fishing-boats, all their small boats, all rigging, gear, or other appurtenances of fishing-boats, all nets, lines, buoys, floats, or other fishing implements whatsoever found or picked up at sea, whether marked or unmarked, shall, as soon as possible, be delivered to the competent authority of the first port to which the salving boat returns or puts in.

Such authority shall inform the consul or consular agent of the country to which the boat of the salvor belongs, and of the nation of the owners of the articles found. They (the same authority) shall restore the articles to the owners thereof or to their representatives, as soon as such articles are claimed, and the interests of the salvors have been properly guaranteed.

The administrative or judicial authorities, according as the laws of the respective countries may provide, shall fix the amount which the owner shall pay to the salvors. It is, however, agreed that the contracting parties reserve the right of regulating, by special arrangements between themselves, the amount of salvage at a fixed rate per article salved.

Fishing implements of any kind found unmarked shall be treated as wreck.

XII. The fishing-boats of the contracting parties shall be registered in accordance with the administrative regulations in force in their respective countries.

For each port there shall be a consecutive series of numbers, preceded by one or two initial letters, which shall be specified by the superior competent authority.

Each Government shall draw up a list showing these initial letters.

This list, together with all modifications which may subsequently be made in it, shall be notified to the other Government.

XIII. Fishing-boats shall bear the initial letter or letters of the port to which they belong, and the registry number in the series of numbers for that port.

XIV. The name of each fishing-boat and that of the port to which she belongs shall be painted in white oil colour on a black ground on the stern of the boat, in letters which shall be at least eight centimetres in height and 12 millimetres in breadth.

XV. The letter or letters and numbers which shall have been assigned to a vessel on its registration shall be painted in white oil colour on a black ground, and so as to be clearly visible, on each bow of the vessel, eight or ten centimetres below the gunwale, provided the space admits it. The letters and numbers of vessels of 15 tons burden (gross tonnage) and upwards shall be 45 centimetres in height and six centimetres in breadth.

For boats of less than 15 tons burden (gross tonnage), the dimensions shall, if possible, be 25 centimetres in height and four centimetres in breadth.

The same letters and numbers shall also be painted in oil colour on each side of the mainsail of the boat, immediately above the cross reef, and in such a manner as to be plainly visible; they shall be painted on white sails in black, on black sails in white, and on sails of an intermediate shade in black or in white, as may be decided by the authority superintending the marking, in accordance with Clause XII of the present annex.

Steam fishing-vessels shall, in addition, bear the above marks on the funnel in a plainly visible manner. These marks should be of the same dimensions as those on the bow.

The letter or letters and numbers on the sails shall be one-third larger in every way than those placed on the bows of the boat.

XVI. Fishing-boats may not have, either on their outside, on their sails, or on their funnels, any names, letters or numbers other than those prescribed by Clauses XIII, XIV, and XV of the present annex.

XVI. The names, letters and numbers placed on the boats and on their sails and funnels shall not be effaced, altered, made illegible, covered or concealed in any manner whatsoever.

XVIII. All the small boats, buoys and trawl boards shall be marked with the letter or letters and numbers of the boats to which they belong.

These letters and numbers shall be large enough to be easily distinguished. The owners of the nets or other fishing implements may further distinguish them by any private marks they think proper.

XIX. The master of each boat must have with him an official document, issued by the proper authority in his own country, for the purpose of enabling him to establish the nationality of the boat.

This document must always give the letter or letters and number of the boat, as well as her description and the name or names of the owner or the name of the firm or association to which she belongs.

XX. The nationality of a boat must not be concealed in any manner whatsoever.

XXI. The superintendence of the fisheries shall be exercised in such a manner as may hereafter be agreed by the contracting parties by vessels hereinafter referred to as the superintending vessels.

XXII. The superintending vessels shall be competent to authenticate all infractions of the regulations prescribed by the present annex and all offences relating to fishing operations may be the nation to which the fishermen guilty of such infractions may belong.

Provided, however, that if it is agreed under clause XXI of the present annex that separate vessels shall be appointed by each of the contracting parties, the execution of the regulations respecting the documents establishing the nationality, the marking and numbering of boats, &c., and of fishing implements, as well as the presence on board of instruments which are forbidden (clauses IX (second paragraph), XIII, XVI, XVII, XIX, and XXI shall be placed under the exclusive superintendence of the superintending vessels of the nation of each fishing boat. Nevertheless, the commanders of the superintending vessels shall acquaint each other with any infractions of the above-mentioned regulations committed by the fishermen of the other nation.

XXIII. When the commanders of superintending vessels have reason to believe that an infraction of the provisions of the present annex has been committed, they may require the master of the boat inculpated to exhibit the official document establishing her nationality. The fact of such document having been exhibited shall then be endorsed upon it immediately. The commanders of superintending vessels shall not pursue further their visit or search on board a fishing-boat which is not of their own nationality unless it should be necessary for the purpose of obtaining proof of an offence, or of a contravention of regulations respecting the police of the fisheries.

XXIV. The commanders of the superintending vessels shall exercise their judgment as to the gravity of facts brought to their knowledge, and of which they are empowered to take cognizance, and shall verify the damage, from whatever cause arising, which may be sustained by fishing boats of the nationalities of the contracting parties.

They shall draw up, if there is occasion for it, a formal statement of the verification of the facts, as elicited both from the declaration of the parties interested and from the testimony of those present.

XXV. The formal statement referred to in the preceding clause shall be drawn up in the language of the commander of the superintending vessel, and according to the forms in use in his country. The accused and the witnessed shall be entitled to add, or to have added, to such statement, in their own language, any observations or evidence which they may think desirable. Such declaration must be duly signed by the commander of the superintending vessel, and shall be prima facie evidence in the courts of law of both countries of the facts which it contains.

XXVI. Resistance to the direction of commanders of superintending vessels charged with the police of the fisheries, or of those who act under their orders, shall, without taking into account the nationality of the superintending vessel, be considered as resistance to the authority of the nation of the fishing-boat.

XXVII. When the act alleged is not of a serious character, but has nevertheless caused damage to any fisherman, the commanders of superintending vessels shall be at liberty, should the parties concerned agree to it, to arbitrate at sea between them, and to fix the compensation to be paid. Where one of the parties is not in a position to settle the matter at once, the commander shall cause the parties concerned to sign in duplicate a formal document specifying the compensation to be paid.

One copy of this document shall remain on board the superintending vessel, and the other shall be handed to the master of the boat to which the compensation is due, in order that he may, if necessary, be able to make use of it before the courts of the country to which the debtor belongs.

Where, on the contrary, the parties do not consent to arbitration, the commanders shall act in accordance with the provisions of Clause XXV.

XXVIII. The prosecution for offences against, or contraventions of, the provisions of the present annex and proceedings for the recovery of compensation for injury due thereto, shall be instituted by or in the name of the State.

XXIX. The contracting parties engage to propose to their respective Legislatures any measures which may be necessary for ensuring the execution of the provisions of the present annex, and particularly for the punishment, by either fine or imprisonment, or by both, of persons who may contravene the provisions of clauses V to IX and XIII to XX, and for the recovery of compensation by persons injured by such contravention, and for the enforcement of any award made under clauses XXVII of the present annex.

XXX. In all cases of assault committed, or of wilful damage or loss inflicted by fishermen of one of the contracting parties upon fishermen of the other nationality, the courts of the country to which the boats of the offenders belong shall be empowered to try them.

XXXI. The proceedings and trial in cases of infraction of the provisions of the present annex shall take place as summarilt as the laws and regulations in force will permit.

XXXII. The contracting parties agree to proceed, as soon as is practicable after the entry into force of the provisions of the present annex, to a joint scientific investigation of the biology of the plaice and other fish in the region defined by clause IV of the present annex. They further agree to cooperate in framing and putting into effect as soon as possible such regulations for the conservation of the stocks of fish in that region as may prove to be necessary and practicable.

XXXIII. The provisions of the present annex shall come into operation from and after a day to be fixed upon by the two contracting parties, and shall continue in force until the expiration of one year from notice by either party of their termination.

The contracting parties, however, reserve to themselves the power to make by mutual consent any modification in the present annex which experience shall have shown to be desirable, provided it is not inconsistent with the principles upon which the annex is based.

CHAPTER III. CLAIMS AND LOAN

Article 6.

In pursuance of the Declaration annexed to the Trade Agreement of the 16th March, 1921, the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics declare that by way of exception to the decree of the 28th January, 1918 (concerning the annulment of debts of the former Imperial and Provisional Governments) it will satisfy, in the conditions prescribed in the present Treaty, the claims of British holders of loans issued or taken over or guaranteed by the former Imperial Russian Government, or by the municipalities of towns in the territory now included in the Union, payable in foreign (non-Russian) currency.

The Government of His Britannic Majesty recognises that the financial and economic position of the Union renders impracticable the full satisfaction of the claims referred to in the preceding paragraph of this Article.

The Government of the Union agrees to meet the claims referred to in the first paragraph of this Article in respect of holdings by British subjects or companies other than holdings which were acquired by purchase since the 16th March, 1921, and were in other than British ownership on that date.

After negotiation between the parties concerned, the terms on which the claims referred to in the first paragraph of this article shall be satisfied will form the subject of an agreement with His Britannic Majesty's Government, which will be included in the treaty referred to in Article 11, provided that His Britannic Majesty's Government is satisfied that such terms have been accepted by the holders of not less than one-half of the capital values of British holdings in the loans referred to in this article.

Article 7.

All questions connected with the claims of the Government of the Union of Societ Socialist Republics against the Government of His Britannic Majesty, or with the claims of the Government of His Britannic Majesty against the Government of the Union, arising out of events which took place between the 4th August, 1914, and the 1st February, 1924, are reserved for discussion at a later date. This provision includes claims in respect of.

(a) War loans advanced by the Government of His Britannic Majesty to the former Russian Imperial or Provisional Governments;

(b) Gold belonging to the former Russian Imperial or Provisional Governments, and handed over to the Government of His Britannic Majesty by either of those Governments;

(c) Russian gold handed over to Germany under the Supplementary Agreement to the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk;

(d) Sums owed by the former Russian Imperial or Provisional Governments to British Government Departments, or vice versa;

(e) The claims advanced by the Government of the Union on the ground of intervention between the 7th November, 1917, and the 16th March, 1921; and also any adjustments made or to be made in the accounts relating to such claims on either side.

There shall similarly be reserved all questions connected with claims by the Nationals of either party against the other party, in respect of loss or damage suffered in the territory of the party whose national the claimant is, and resulting from warlike operations or hostile measures during the above-mentioned period.

Article 8.

Claims by Nationals (including juridical persons) of the one party against the other party in respect of loss or injury due to events which took place between the 1st August, 1914, and the coming into force of the present Treaty, other than (1) claims covered by other articles of the present Treaty, and (2) claims arising out of normal trading relations between the Government of the Russian Socialist Federative Soviet Republic or Governments allied to or federated with it, or its agents, and British Nationals, or between the Government of His Britannic Majesty and citizens of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, shall, in view of the admitted preponderance of the claims of British Nationals, be finally settled as between the contracting parties by the payment of a lump sum by the Government of the Union to the Government of His Britannic Majesty.

The distribution of this sum shall be effected by the Government of His Britannic Majesty in such manner as they shall consider just. The Government of the Union undertakes to furnish the Government of His Britannic Majesty with any relevant papers or information in their possession which may facilitate the just distribution of such sum.

Article 9.

Each of the contracting parties shall appoint three properly qualified persons to examine the claims of which the settlement is to be effected by the payment of the lump sum provided for in article 8. These six persons shall make a joint examination of the claims, and shall report to the two contracting parties the amount at which they consider the lump sum should be fixed. If they are unable to agree as to the amount of the lump sum, they shall present separate reports. They will arrange their own procedure, and shall, in particular, be entitled by agreement between themselves to refer the examination of any particular category of claims to two of their number.

Each of the contracting parties shall defray the remuneration and expenses of the persons appointed by it, together with one-half of the expenses incurred jointly.

Article 10.

Being desirous of re-establishing the economic co-operation between their two countries, the Government of His Britannic Majesty and the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics agree as follows:

The Government of the Union will, by way of exception to the decrees nationalising industrial businesses and land, negotiate with British Nationals (including juridical persons) in respect of industrial businesses or concessions which have been nationalised or cancelled by it, in order to arrange for the grant of just compensation for such claims.

Furthermore a Commission shall be appointed to examine the validity and ascertain the amount of the claims.

Each of the contracting parties agrees to assist the Commission so far as possible with regard to supplying or collecting papers or information required for the proper accomplishment of its task.

If the members of the Commission are unable to agree on a joint report in respect of any particular property, they may present separate reports.

In cases where the Government of the Union concludes an agreement with an individual claimant, the Commission shall be informed of such agreement in order that the claim in question may be withdrawn from the competence of the Commission.

The Commission shall consist of six persons possessing the necessary qualifications for their task, three being appointed by the Government of His Britannic Majesty and three by the Government of the Union.

The Commission shall settle its own procedure, which shall be approved by the two Governments. Each of the contracting parties shall defray the remuneration and pay the expenses of the persons appointed by it, together with one half of the expenses incurred jointly.

Article 11.

A second treaty will be entered into which will contain:—

(1) The conditions accepted in accordance with article 6.

(2) The amount and method of payment of compensation for claims under article 8.

(3) An agreed settlement of property claims other than those directly settled by the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Article 12.

Upon the signature of the Treaty referred to in Article 11 His Britannic Majesty's Government will recommend Parliament to enable them to guarantee the interest and sinking fund of a loan to be issued by the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

The amount, terms and conditions of the said loan and the purposes to which it shall be applied shall be defined in the Treaty provided for in article 11, which will not come into force until the necessary Parliamentary authority for the guarantee of the said loan has been given.

Article 13.

The provisions of this Chapter constitute a single and indivisible unit.

CHAPTER IV. MISCELLANEOUS

Article 14.

On the coming into force of the Treaty referred to in Article 11, Article 10 of the Trade Agreement of the 16th March, 1921, will be abrogated, until which time it will be maintained in force, article 1 of the present Treaty notwithstanding.

Article 15.

Documents and papers of every kind, which on November 1st, 1917, belonged to individual subjects or citizens of either party, and are now withheld from the owners and are in the possession or under the control of the Government or a public institution of the other party, shall be returned to the owners, or to such representative as they may appoint, within two months from the date of a request to that effect.

Article 16.

The contracting parties solemnly affirm their desire and intention to live in peace and amity with each other, scrupulously to respect the undoubted right of a State to order its own life within its own jurisdiction in its own way, to refrain and to restrain all persons and organizations under their direct or indirect control, including organizations in receipt of any financial assistance from them, from any act overt or covert liable in any way whatsoever to endanger the tranquillity or prosperity of any part of the territory of the British Empire or the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics or intended to embitter the relations of the British Empire or the Union with their neighbours or any other countries.

Article 17.

The present Treaty is drawn up and signed in the English language. A translation shall be made into the Russian language as soon as possible and agreed between the parties. Both texts shall then be considered authentic for all purposes.

Article 18.

The present treaty shall be ratified and the ratifications shall be exchanged in London as soon as possible.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present Treaty and have affixed thereto their seals.

SOLDIERS TIRED OF PEACE

Deserters Off to Look for Armies Where There May Be Some Fun

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Junghsien, Sze., Aug. 16.

The feeling of security so long felt by these residing in the sphere controlled by General Ch'eng Hongfan of Kiating was somewhat rudely disturbed ten days ago by the report of the mutiny of two companies of his soldiers stationed in the neighbouring hsien city of Weiyuan. These two companies mutinied, "borrowed" what they could from the pawnshop and the Postoffice and deserted. Others sent after them had a little skirmish but they got away toward Tzicheo and the north. It is variously reported that they were going to join either Lai Shi-huei or Tien. Junghsien was scared that they might come this way and the magistrate showed his anxiety by sending several sections to patrol the north road and to protect the foreigners summering at Douglas Heights. Spies were sent out and when they reported that the deserters had gone off in another direction the precautions were discontinued. One is at a loss to know why these men deserted for General Ch'eng's soldiers received their pay regularly and in the full amount, and have an easy time, generally. The man on the street surmises that the men hoped that, if there was something doing, they would stand a chance of promotion, for where all is peace and quiet such fellows find life rather tame. The fact of companies deserting with their arms and ammunition and going off to be received by another command when there is no fighting and all are presumably on the same side, seems to mark a new stage in the military game. Such procedure can only lead to more discoveries and one can never be sure of what may happen even in regions where actual war does not often penetrate.

The Curse of Conscription

Movements of troops toward Luchow and the East take place every week or so which would indicate that we may look for trouble in the eastern part of the province or about Chungking before long.

"La fu" is the order at such times and we have had many instances of its hardships. The demand for soldiers is such that any likely-looking chap is pressed into service. A few weeks ago some stone-masons were made to carry for the soldiers passing through and at the end of the day they were told that a stone-mason's job was a hard life while that of the soldier was all play and a cap was put on their heads and a rifle into their hands and they were told that they were enlisted and dare not desert for they would be shot if they attempted to do so. The poor fellows are thus forced off and their families are left to shift for themselves. The "la fu'd" men are beaten, maimed or shot as suits the pleasure of the soldier forcing them and no one raises a protest.

Rice and Dollars High

The lack of rain in the rice planting time and the export of rice has forced the price of that staple up to over 6,000 cash per deo. The harvest which is now in full blast has shown a good crop in lands which were planted but the price has only come down a few hundred cash so that many look with apprehension to the winter.

The dollar continues its upward climb 3,400 cash being now obtainable However, a dollar may be purchased for 2,900 in 50 cash pieces or those of smaller denominations. These are exported to the mints in Chentu or even away down river as far as Wuchang. Even 100-cash pieces are few, the prevailing type being the 200. When the unit of coinage is quickly raised from a small cash to two hundred it must raise a serious economic problem among people whose wages continue to be reckoned in small cash.

Douglas Heights Booming

Douglas Heights, the local summering place, now boasts of 17 bungalows all of which, except one, have been occupied this year. A Bible school for Chinese with a registration of about 50 was carried on for a month, and those of the staff who went up and down the "high stone steps" twice a day to the school building found it a good weight reducing exercise. The foreigners have come from six cities and they conducted a two day conference on mission work, ideals and policy. A successful concert and a stunt night have demonstrated what a variety of talent we can muster while tennis and the swimming pool have given opportunity for physical refreshment.

The Canadian Methodist Mission is building a new dispensary so as to be better able to attend to the out-patient clinic which runs about the 200 mark. They also propose erecting a modern residence for the Chinese physician, Dr. Liu, who does such a large share of the medical work. The extension together with street widening and repairs will cost about $6,500. The city fathers have shown an appreciation of the work by taking a voluntary share in the street improvements.

Tennis and Concerts at Chikungshan

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Kueiteh, Ho., Aug. 25.

The first part of the season at Chikungshan was just one day after another of mist and rain, so tennis and picnics were not possible. Towards the end of July, however, the weather cleared up and it has been gloriously fine every day since with just a few showers of rain to keep things fresh. The bathing pool was in very good shape this year and the kiddies especially had the time of their young lives splashing around in the shallow part reserved for them and any other non-swimmers.

The annual tennis tournament was started before the fine weather set in and dragged out to a very weary length, but apart from this many good games were played and the three public courts were seldom without players at any time of the day. The dozen or so residents in the new concession have built a court up there also, and are approaching the General Committee to take it over and look after its upkeep.

The Wednesday evening concerts have been a great success again this year, especially one might mention the last two, the first being the Oratorio "The Crucifixion" given by the Community Choir and conducted by the Rev. F. Cotter, of Wuchang, and the latter the Annual Sacred Concert given by the Lutheran Choir, an event much looked forward to and appreciated. With the continual additions being made to the foreign community who make Chikungshan their summer quarters, the Chinese trademen are also increasing each year in numbers and in ascending and descending one has to run the guntlet of a fair sized Chinese village now, situated on each side of the road near the top of the hill. This makes it very convenient for those who live in upcountry, stations where foreign boots, clothes and various stores are not to be purchased.

One of the favourite outdoor sports is trying to get coolies to carry goods and chairs for the official prices settled upon between the General Purposes Committee and the Chinese officials. It is not so difficult to play this game when going up the hill on arrival, but it is probable that no foreigner has learnt to do it when wishing to get away from the hills at the end of the season. The coolies now refuse to carry by weight, as the old-timers, some of whom have been known to carry as much as 200 catties, have apparently killed themselves off or retired from the business. The present day coolies consider 50 catties a good load and it seems to have been a very general experience that they would not carry unless a fairly generous amount of labour was agreed upon, for instance paying 15 men's wages for what 12 men eventually carried. Still it is hard to blame them perhaps for their harvest season is short and their labour after all is very cheap.

CANTON MERCHANTS' STRIKE ENDED

Martial Law Rescinded and Amnesty Granted: Arms, etc., to be Released

Shameen, Aug. 29.

Dr. Sun Yat-sen's gunboat, the Wingfung, yesterday steamed up the river and cleared for action. This was probably in the nature of a demonstration. She then anchored off Shameen. The rumoured threat to bombard Saikwan did not eventuate and the Wingfung returned to the Generalissimo's Headquarters the same afternoon.

No merchant volunteers have been seen in Saikwan. The department stores have not opened to business and the streets are barricaded. The strike situation is unchanged.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Shameen, Aug. 30.

Reuter's correspondent learns from an authoritative source that the strike of the merchants as a protest against the seizure by Dr. Sun Yat-sen of the arms ordered by the Merchant Volunteer Corps has been settled.

All the shops reopened to-day.

The terms of the settlement are stated to be (1) that the strike shall be cancelled; (2) that martial law shall be rescinded; (3) that Mr. Chan Lim-pak shall issue a public repudiation of his alleged treasonable intentions and resign the command of the Merchant Volunteers shall be reorganized and be be granted; (5) that the Volunteers; (4) that the amnesty shall subject to the Civil Governor; (6) that Dr. Sun shall release all arms and ammunition seized by him on the steamer Hav; (7) that the Volunteers shall pay the Government $500,000; and (8) that all the troops recently recalled to Canton by Dr. Sun shall leave the city.

Defiance of Dr. Sun.

Canton, Aug. 25.

Mr. Chan Kung-shau, second-in-command of the Kuangtung Provincial Merchants Corps, is now directing the people's movement in Fatshan, a city some 15 miles west of Canton. The 138 volunteer units in Canton and vicinity outside the police jurisdiction of the city proper of Canton are under his command.

The merchants of the leading cities of Kuangtung met at Fatshan on August 21 and passed a resolution which, in brief, states:—

"The uprising of bandits and pirates in Kuangtung has made the life of the people intolerable and rendered it necessary for a union for common defence and general welfare. The Government, as self-constituted by Dr. Sun Yat-sen and his party, has failed to afford the people the desired protection and, upon the coming of the people together to devise measures for self-protection, has seen fit to prevent their union through an amalgamation of the volunteer units of the province and confiscate the arms and ammunition they have legally imported for common defence. Under the present tyranny and misrule of the Government, it will be impossible safely to carry on trade in the province and the merchants are advised to suspend their business in order effectively to arouse the Government to its proper sense. At the same time it is asked that the volunteers of the province of Kuangtung shall be permitted to amalgamate without further interruption by the Government, that all arms and ammunition illegally seized by Dr. Sun Yat-sen shall be unconditionally and immediately returned to their proper owners and that the liberty of the officers of the volunteer movement in Canton shall not be restrained by the Government."

Aug. 26.

The Canton Merchants Volunteers Corps have removed their active headquarters to somewhere outside Canton. It is understood that they will have nothing but unconditional return of their newly-imported arms. Dr. Sun, seeing that the people as a whole are for their volunteers, has offered through Dr. C. C. Wu, his Secretary of Foreign Affairs, to return the arms and ammunition under certain conditions, these including repudiation by the volunteers of the general strike and their future submission to new regulations to be drafted for their control.

KUOMINTANG PARTY'S "RED ARMY"

Canton Labour Corps Formally Organized: Triple Murder Due to Paper Money

Canton, Aug. 29.

The first battalion of the Canton Labour Corps, known in Canton as the Red Army, was formally organized on the afternoon of August 26 under the auspices of the Kuomintang Politically Party. Mr. Sze Bok, a labour union leader, has been elected commanding officer, with Mr. Lau Kung-soo and Mr. Soo Fei-chen as his lieutenants. The quarters of these men—who now number nearly 300—will soon be located at the residence of Mr. Chan Kung-shau, the second in command of the Kuangtung Province Merchants Volunteers Corps, whom Dr. Sun Yat-sen charges with treason, as a result of his protest against the arms seizure by the authorities. The residence of Mr. Chan has been confiscated by Dr. Sun.

In addition to the Labour Corps, the Red Army of the Kuomintang Party is also organizing a farmer corps. There will be 20 battalions of farmers trained to fight for the Kuomintang cause. The 16th Battalion was inspected by the Civil Governor, Mr. Liao Chung-hoi, who is also chief of the labour division of the Kuomintang, on August 27. The commander of the 16th Battalion is Mr. Choy Shing-chung, a former army officer.

Later.

Three lives were lost on the afternoon of August 28 in Canton consequent upon the attempt of Dr. Sun Yat-sen to force his Central Bank paper money on the market.

Two members of the newly organized "Red Army," also known as the Canton Labour Corps, bought a carry of pork and demanded change in subsidiary coins from a butcher at Yau-lane-mun for a five dollar note. The butcher offered to give the pork to the "Reds" instead of changing the note, but the "Reds" declared that they had been instructed by Dr. Sun not to take anything from the people by force. In the dispute, one of the "Reds" attempted to shoot the butcher, who killed his would-be assassin first by chopping him on the head with his butcher's knife, whereupon the other "Red" shot the butcher, but before he could escape, he was seized and shot on the spot with his own revolver.

Arms Seizure Compromise

Later.

Whether Dr. Sun Yat-sen will be able to carry out his part of the compromise on the arms question is doubtful. It is known that the arms have been divided though they may not have all been actually delivered to the various commanders.

The Merchant Volunteers now fear that after circulating the telegram as arranged, announcing their support of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, they may be told that "the arms and ammunitions were to have been delivered as agreed upon but, owing to pressing demands for their use for the relief of Chêkiang and prevention of Gen. Chen Chiung-ming's return to Canton, it is earnestly requested that they be left with the Government as a loan until peace is restored in China."

Besides this difficulty, it is very unlikely that the Volunteer Corps throughout the province will willingly submit themselves to the control of Dr. Sun's Government.

To the leaders of the Volunteer movement the question of supporting Dr. Sun does not trouble them, it is said, as they have never denied his claim to be head of the Canton Government.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

MINDANAO EARTHQUAKE

Considerable Damage Done

Manila, Sept. 3.

The damage done by an earthquake at Mindanao on August 31 is reported to be considerable. In Agusan and Misamis buildings were overthrown. There were no dead.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

It is unlikely that the terms offered by Dr. Sun will be accepted and, in the meantime, the people will suspend their trade as a protest and cease paying taxes to the authorities.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SUN YAT-SEN AND HIS GENERALS

FROM A CHINESE CORRESPONDENT.

In connexion with the following it is to be recalled that last week Dr. Sun's gunboat the Wing Tung, steamed up river to Saikuan, cleared for action, but withdrew without firing.

Canton, Aug. 29.

Realizing that his mercenary commanders are by no means all for him, Dr. Sun Yat-sen has called for no more conferences of his military council since August 26, according to one who is in much with him.

At the council of August 26, Dr. Sun Yat-sen intimated that he would take drastic measures against the merchants on strike in Canton, evidently expecting his supporters to agree. Much was his disappointment, however, and he withdrew from the meeting in anger when his several suggestions were overruled.

Dr. Sun called for the bombardment of Saikuan, the western suburb, one of the most prosperous and best residential and business sections of Canton. General Hsu Chung-Chi, of the Cantonese Army, was the first to oppose this mad proposal, saying that the merchants had contributed all the military finance, while the labourers had done nothing. He also doubted the value of Dr. Sun's proposed Labour Corps the members of which have no means of living without getting work from the merchants, whose volunteers may be equipped and fed by the business firms.

General Tan Yen-kai of the Hunanese Army advised Dr. Sun that no self-respecting commander would order his men to raid the shops of the people whom he was supposed to protect.

General Yang Hsi-min of the Yunnanese Army told Dr. Sun that he and his men were supposed to fight for the defence of the Constitution only and not on a local issue. General Fan Shek-shang, also of the Yunnanese Army, expressed the fear that, should they begin to loot and fail, he as well as his fellow Yunnanese, and perhaps Dr. Sun himself, might have to quit Canton in a hurry which would not be easy.

General Liu Chen-huan's Kuangsi troop representatives and General Fen Chung-hsao of the Honanese Army, who were in favour of Dr. Sun's measures, did not express any opinion, finding the majority against them.

The overseas Chinese, on whom Dr. Sun Yat-sen once depended wholly for his financial support in his revolutionary schemes, are now with the people in the arms dispute. Among the messages received by Dr. Sun Yat-sen on the issue during the last few days was one from the Chinese in North Borneo, asking him to release the arms and ammunitions, for the import of which the Canton Merchants Volunteer Corps had taken out all necessary legal permits. The overseas Chinese considered that by first issuing a permit and then seizing the consignment, the Government, had lost whatever confidence it otherwise deserved.

THE COPYRIGHT LAW

Rival Book Shops: A "Breeze" in a Hongkong Court

Summonses for infringement of copyrights were brought by Messrs. Kelly & Walsh against Messrs. Brewer & Company and the Chinese Commercial Press before Mr. R. E. Lindsell, at the Central Magistracy in Hongkong on August 27.

Mr. J. A. G. Leask prosecuted, whilst Mr. N. T. Brewer appeared for Messrs. Brewer and Company.

Mr. Brewer said he protested against the case being brought within the jurisaiction of the Court, on the ground that the summons was bad, because it was directed against Brewer and Company. It accused Brewer and Company of knowingly selling books, and, Brewer and Company being a non-existent personage, could not do anything knowingly. A summons, to be effective, must be either against the manager or partner.

Mr. Leask.—In that case I shall ask your Worship to amend the summons to one against D. Pasco, trading as Brewer and Company.

Mr. Brewer:—If your Worship grants this amendment, I shall ask for a remand of the case, as I know nothing about it.

His Worship:—In a summons of this character, defendant can be represented either by counsel or solicitor.

Mr. Brewer:—I am appearing in a personal character, and I appeal on the grund that the summons has never been served.

Mr. Leask:—I am sorry to trouble your Worship so much, but I shall now ask your Worship to amend the summons again to one against N. I. Brewer and D. Pasco.

Mr. Brewer:—I am not accused of knowingly selling books, as it is fairly common knowledge that I don't sell books, knowingly or unknowingly.

Mr. Leask:—My trouble is that I don't know who represents Brewer and Company.

His Worship:—I don't think it can do any harm to name N. I. Brewer in the summons.

Mr. Brewer:—It can do considerable harm, your Worship. It is a gross travesty of the criminal procedure of the Colony. This summons is an act of malice on the part of Messrs. Kelly and Walsh. It is simply a case of a rival firm trying to throw us out.

Mr. Leask:—I must protest against that, your Worship.

His Worship:—I adjourn the summons until this day week, the 3rd. September at 10 a.m., to fix a date for the hearing.

Mr. Brewer again raised the point of wrong service. Brewer and Company, he said did not exist as a party that could be summoned. The firm might be sued, but it could not be party to a criminal charge and it was a quasi-criminal charge that had been brought against them.

His Worship said the summons would be served on the Manager of the firm. He would put it simply this way: "The Manager, Messrs. Brewer and Company." This would meet the case.

The summons against the Commercial Press was similary adjourned.

SHOPMEN FORCED TO OPEN

But Shutting As Soon As Guard Has Gone On: Comic Sides of the Canton Strike

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

(Since the above was written news has come that the strike has been compromised.)

Canton, Aug. 28.

The situation in Canton has passed from a somewhat serious to an amusing point. The military authorities, with guards going from one shop to another with machine-guns, but, also with placards to be posted outside each shop expressing loyalty to Dr. Sun Yat-sen, are forcing firms in the city to re-open. But as soon as the guards go off to other shops, the merchants again close. The Sincere Company on the Bund, Canton, had to keep open for about 20 minutes on the afternoon of August 25, when a guard of nearly 60 men of the Provincial Gendarmerie with two machine guns were sent by the Canton City Police to "protect" its opening for business. But the company soon advised the Police that it had to close earlier that day because of a change in the hours for business. It appears that the whole Canton business community has changed its hours of business.

Freedom of the Press.

The whole newspaper fraternity in Canton has been aroused by the arrest of Mr. Lee Chok Dor, of the Canton "Yan Kun Pao," a popular local daily, August 24, for having prepared matter for his paper which the police censors did not approve of for insertion. The Canton newspaper men, including those belonging to papers supporting Dr. Sun, believe that the suppression of news and comments by prohibiting their publication should have served the purpose of censorship by the Government and that the punishment of authors whose manuscripts do not meet with the views of the Government is a step which even those close to Dr. Sun should condemn. The printing shops in Canton have practically been forced to close without the order of the general strike committee, as every piece of job work has to be approved of by police agents before it may go to press.

On August 24, the Police shot a circular distributor for delivering hand-bills of which he himself did not know the contents.

TIBETAN MARCHES PEACEFUL

Ex-Border Commissioner Flirting with North and South: Fresh Strife in Szechuan

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Tachienlu, Sze., Aug 5.

Chen Hsia-lin, it is reported, the late Border Commissioner, is on his way back to Tachienlu. After resigning the Commissionership, Gen. Chen proceeded as far as Mili, the headquarters of a stretch of country ruled by the Yellow Lama. From there, it is reported, Chen sent messengers to Gen. Tang Chi-yao asking permission to pass through Yunnan to Kueichow. This Tang Chi-yao was forced to refuse. Why? One reason may be his compact with the Szechuan generals Hsiung and Liu. Tang is still very friendly with Szechuan and is not prepared at the present moment to make enemies of Hsiung and Liu. Gen. Chen was travelling, apparently on official business, his objective being Marshal Wu Pei-fu and Loyang. Chen gave out himself that he was coming back in four months. Neither Hsiung or Liu are favourably inclined towards Loyang and its policy—nor it is believed is Tang Chi-yao—therefore to allow Gen. Chen to proceed there at the present juncture was inadvisable. Tang evidently explained his reasons for not permitting Chen to pass through Yunnan and Chen accepted them. Another reason why Tang refused permission may have been because Chen was travelling with a small military retinue. If Chen Hsia-lin had travelled as a civilian with his destination Hunan, there is no reason whatever why Tang should not permit him to pass through Yunnan to Kueichow. Unfortunately Chen had to give out that he was returning in order to appease the Hunan soldiers on the frontier. Again, Gen. Chen might have gone north, being in sympathy with the northern party, the officials of Kansu would have allowed him to pass through their borders.

Chen now finds himself in an awkward and peculiar position. He has resigned the Border Commissionship; Sen Chao-luan has officially taken over the seal of office: Chen comes back to what? Will he again assume the position of Frontier Commissioner or will he proceed north and try to reach Loyang by Kansu, or simply wait here in Tachienlu and watch the turn of events?

Szechuan is already getting unsettled again. Large armies are being gathered together and the military leaders are getting ready for another clash. "North and south, Szechuan for the Szechuanese," is now the slogan. Chen Hsia-lin has some friends in the province and among them is Hsiung Keh-wu. Should Hsiung and his party, in the coming affray, be successful against Yang Sen, then Chen, with a friend in camp, may find his position somewhat easier.

In spite of the unsettled, undecided, unknown condition of affairs existing on the Tibetan frontier the border remains quiet. Should China desire to change her policy with regard to Tibet, now would be an opportune time to do so. The Tibetans are not aggressive nor are they taking advantage of the absence of the Chinese army of occupation to strengthen their own position in eastern Tibet. Now would be an opportune time to readjust, and if possible, restate the whole frontier question. But war looms large in Szechuan and we are afraid the border question will simply have to wait—perhaps for ever.

THE preparations for the Olympic Sports at Harbin are going on apace and already a number of the competitors have arrived in Harbin, From such places as Hailar, Tsitsikar and Pogranichnava leading athletes have been selected to take part. Changchun is sending quite a number.

AMERICAN LAWYERS IN ENGLAND

A Series of Delightful Entertainments: Garden Party at Buckingham Palace

The following extract from a letter from a Judge of Virginia, U. S. A., to his niece in Shanghai gives an interesting and chatty account of the visit of the American lawyers to England:—

We sailed on the Berengaria from New York on July 12 and landed at Southampton on the 19th and were in London by noon that day. Our trip was a delightful one and the sea like a pond. There were 39 Virginians on board and many friends. Our reception in London was simply wonderful. We were "wined and dined and received" and by Saturday night worn out. On Monday the Lord Chancellor, Chief Justice, etc., etc., in all their gorgeous robes, received us in historic Westminster Hall and fine addresses were made; that afternoon we went to a Garden Party given by Lady Fillimore in her beautiful place adjoining Holland House. Tuesday p.m. we went to a tea given by the Lord Chancellor and his daughter, Miss Haldane, in the House of Parliament, and met the Duchess of Atholl, Lady Parmoor and other "big bugs"—one of whom took Maymee into the House of Commons and House of Lords whilst another took me into the House of Lords. That night I went to a big dinner at the Inner Temple. On Wednesday afternoon we had a beautiful reception and garden party at Lincoln and Gray's Inns and at night went to a reception and concert at Caxton Hall given by the Lord Mayor and Mayoress of Westminster.

Thursday afternoon we went to a garden party at Buckingham Palace and were formally—or rather informally—presented to the King and Queen. They were both peculiarly gracious; the King and I had quite a chat about freemasonry. His sons have just been made provincial Grand Masters of two English Counties and he said he was quite proud of it. He is a small man—like his pictures—and quite chatty, as simple as if he were an ordinary personage.

The Queen was quite gracious; shook hands with both of us and asked Maymee where she was from? On being told Virginia, she replied, "Oh! we know Virginia very well." It was a wonderful occasion and the "eats" were very fine. We had the only decent cup of coffee I have had since we left New York.

Friday, with Judge and Mr. Christian, we got a machine and motored to Stoke Poges, Eton and Windsor. Then to Lord Astor's magnificent place "Clevedar," once the residence of the Duke of Sutherland whose wife was one of the most beautiful women in England and Queen Victoria's Mistress of the Robes. Nanny Astor gave a large garden party, but it simply "poured," so we did not see as much of the exquisite grounds as we wished; but the house was thrown open and there was a great roaring fire in the immense fireplace in the beautiful and big hall. Nanny introduced me to various Lords and Ladies as "Judge Tom Duke whom every nigger and white man in the County of Allum knows." Despite the rain it was a great affair. I forget to say we went to a reception (not given to the lawyers, however, but a sort of private affair) at her town house, No. 4 St. James's Square, and she was very cordial and pleasant to us. Told us to talk to anybody we wanted to, as that was expected, and so we did.

Friday night there was an immense reception in the House of Parliament (the first time they have been thrown open to a mere social function). It was a wonderful affair. Beautifully gowned women, sparkling with jewels and some of the women superbly handsome. Men in uniform; men in kneebreeches and braided coats decorated with all sorts of orders and ribbons. Refreshments were served in Westminster Hall and a fine band furnished splendid music. It was an affair worth crossing the ocean to see. Never were men treated like we lawyers were and no more beautiful and genuine hospitality could have been shown. This week we have been "doing the sights" of London Town. Sunday we go to Cambridge, and thence by slow degrees to Scotland and then down through Wales and back here, and then to Paris, returning from Cherbourg on the George Washington on September 19.

BOBBED HAIR AND MORALS

Japanese Hair Dressers' Strictures

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Tokyo, Aug. 25.

Bobbed heads are synonymous with easy morals and lack of self-respect!

So declare 500 hair dressers of Tokyo who have put on record that bobbed hair indicates degeneracy and are praying to all the gods and goddesses in the below, on the land and in the waters above to preserve Japanese women from this new "foreign defilement."

The aid of unseen forces was sought because of the increasing number of Japanese girls who are forsaking the coiffure of Old Japan and are going in with all earnestness for bobbed tresses, shingled heads, Mary Pickford curls and that method of doing up the hair whereby ears, both big and small, are coyly concealed.

A regular religious ceremony was gone through during which supplications were made to the deities to rescue this land of the gods from such contamination. Next followed harangues in which imprecations were called upon the "traitorous" young women who have forsaken the coiffure customs of old and, with hardened hearts, persist in dressing their looks in foreign fashion. Then came a rite during which six repentant damsels were led to the "seat of forgiveness" and prayers chanted to exercise them of the evil spirits that caused them to dress their tresses in any other way but the accepted customs of old.

Anathemas and Exorcisms

The supplications, anathemas and exorcisms took place on the monthly holiday of the Hair Dressers' Guild and was directly prompted by the injury sustained by the profession owing to the invasion of foreign modes of doing up the hair.

The speeches generally dwelt on the grace and beauty of the Japanese mode of making up a woman's looks and on the hideousness of the foreign methods! Bobbed hair was characterized as proof of loose morals and loss of self-respect!

One hair architect called the women who dress their hair otherwise than in the customary and conservative Japanese manner "strumpets who will accept any new-fangled foreign thing," while all exhorted their erring sisters to return to the good old methods of old and urged young men not to keep company with lassies who refuse to have their hair done in the shimada and marumage styles of Old Japan.

Japanese beauty parlours—faithful imitations of their foreign counterparts—which do a good trade in doing up women's tresses in the foreign fashion are contemplating as "come back" at the champions of native hair dressing, whose chief anxiety is that the number of their patrons is rapidly dwindling, especially with Japanese women more and more taking to foreign clothes.

FINANCIAL PANIC IN WUCHANG

The Result of Shanghai Bank Failures: Another Loan Story

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wuchang, Aug. 30.

The native banks in this centre have been seriously affected by the financial panic which has spread from Shanghai, caused by the rumours of threatened war between the Tuchuns of Chêkiang and Kiangsu.

The native press reports that, in order to allay the panic, the Hongkong & Shanghai Banking Corporation has offered a substantial loan.

At a meeting of Chinese bankers which was called to consider the situation, the big banks all promised to stand behind the smaller ones, and to give them what assistance they need in order to avoid disaster.

Even these measures are not expected to be sufficient to enable the banks to tide over the usual run of the Mid-Autumn Festival. They have therefore approached the Tuchun, with the request that he will permit them to make use of the large supplies of copper at present in the Wuchang Mint. The ready cash thus gained, if granted, will be offered as security for a loan of $1,600,000 from one of the foreign banks.

Visit from Senate Vice-President.

Mr. Chang Peh-lieh the Vice-President of the Senate, is a Hupeh man. He has been spending the summer at his own residence in Kuling. A few days ago, on his journey back to the north, he called upon the Tuchun in Wuchang. A special launch brought him across the river from Hankow, and the Tuchun's own carriage was waiting at the river bank to convey him to the Governor's Yamên. Mr. Chang spent several hours in conversation with the Governor, after which he was conveyed back to Hankow. On the following morning he left by train for Peking.

A City of Dreadful Night.

Two evenings ago, a little after darkness had set in, the electric light failed and the whole city of Wuchang was plunged into black night. From the Governor in his Yamên down to the smallest porkbutcher who can afford to rent an electric bulb, all alike had to submit to the inconvenience. The barracks and police-stations were also in darkness, special guards were sent out with lanterns to patrol the streets as well as they could. But the evil-minded portion of the populace, who are always ready to seize these occasions for their own ends, were not altogether to be controlled, and a good many petty thefts were committed. By half past nine, the Electric Light Co. had managed to put things right, and the lights shone out again much to everybody's relief.

The cause of the trouble is said to have been worn-out boilers. Owing to the use of impure water, the old boilers have become corroded. But they have been used to the bitter end. New boilers have already been obtained for use when needed, and when the old ones had given their last gasp, it was the work of a few hours to replace them by the new. So, the interests of the city have to be subordinated to the instinct for economy.

ANGLO-JAPANESE TRADE TREATY

Article VIII to be Repealed

London, Sept. 3.

Correspondence between the United Kingdom and Japan issued in the form of a White Paper shows that article 8 of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty of Commerce of 1911 and the schedule annexed thereto will be abrogated from March 11, 1925, at the desire of Japan.—Reuter.

Moscow, Sept. 2.—The reported general mobilization of the Red Army directed against Poland and Rumania is denied.—Reuter.

A meeting was held at Peitaiho on August 19 to consider the project of establishing a boarding school for foreign children at that resort. For some time past boarding school education has only been available for foreign children at the Chefoo School, Weihaiwei School and Tientsin Grammar School. At Tungchow an excellent boarding school has recently been established, but the accommodation is limited and the school is practically restricted to older children, while the Weihaiwei school has been given up save for very small children. The Chefoo School is not only overcrowded, but has the disadvantage of having to be reached four times a year by a voyage across the Gulf of Pechili. Peitaiho certainly offers unrivalled possibilities for a school owing to its accessibility by rail from all parts of North China. There is a definite prospect that the committee of the Stewart Evangelistic Fund would place their conference premises at the disposal of such a school during term time, but before proceeding further with the project the promoters are anxious to ascertain what measure of support they will meet with in the Treaty Ports. Parents who may be interested in the scheme are invited to communicate with Mr. G. P. Littlewood, Kai Yuan, viâ Mukden.

NEW DEVELOPMENT IN CANTON STRIKE

H. M. Consul's Alleged Threat of Naval Intervention if Saikuan Bombarded

Shameen, Sept. 3.

While the strike of the merchants is practically over, a new and serious situation has developed from a note which the British Consul-General is stated to have sent to Dr. Sun Yat-sen, threatening to use British gunboats against the Canton authorities should the latter carry out their threat to bombard Saikuan, the stronghold of the Merchant Volunteers.

Dr. Sun has issued a strongly-worded manifesto, repudiating any intention to bombard Saikuan and characterizing the alleged British note as an ultimatum encouraging rebellion against his government.

Dr. Sun is also said to have cabled a protest to the British Prime Minister which, in part, declares: "The Canton compradore of the Hongkong and Shangahi Bank is organizing a so-called Chinese Fascisti, the aim of which has been revealed to be the overthrow of my Government by using arms from the steamer Hav. . . Since the seizure of the Hav, there has been a state of rebellion in Canton in the guise of a strike. While deciding on measures to cope with the rebellion, I received a letter from the British Consul containing the following: 'The Commodore at Hongkong has been ordered, in the event of the Chinese authorities firing upon the city, to take immediate action against them with all the British naval forces available.'"

Dr. Sun's cable continues: "I am forced to conclude that the real object of this ultimatum is the destruction of my Government. I have to protest in the strongest terms against this latest act of imperialist intervention in the internal affairs of China."

Dr. Ma Soo, Dr. Sun's former representative in the United States, Mr. Chow Sou-shou, a Commissioner of the Hongkong Exhibit at Wembley, and Mr. Liang Shih-yi, the former Chinese Prime Minister, returned to China by the Empress of Canada. They are stated to have been in constant conference during the trip.

Dr. Ma Soo arrived in Canton on Tuesday on a four-weeks visit to confer with Dr. Sun.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

MANILA, Sept. 3.—Pte. Frank Cota, an American of the Thirty-First Infantry, is held by the military charged with attempting to sell a map of Corregidor. The authorities state that the map has slight military value.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

INTERPORT LAWN BOWLS

Shanghai Defeat Hongkong: Aitkenhead's Fine Performance

The first of the Interport Lawn Bowls games took place on Wednesday, when Shanghai annexed the first flag by beating the Hongkong team by 6 shots.

The heavy rain of the previous days had no ill effect on the turf, in fact, the opinion of the contestants was that it had benefited, the onlookers' point of view the woods took their natural bias on both hands and some perfect bowling was the result. Despite the threatening weather the rinks, both inside and outside the barriers, were thickly lined with spectators who showed their approval of the clever play in no half-hearted manner. The respective teams were:—Shanghai.—R. C. Aitkenhead (skip), G. L. Campbell, G. B. Stormes, A. Macgregor; Hongkong.—G. Wotherspoon, S. Mill, J. Clark, A. A. Omar.

Shanghai won the toss and at a medium end scored one shot, a toucher by Stormes remaining undisturbed. The second end Wotherspoon rested on Shanghai's wood saving two points. The next end saw some very good play. Omar leading with a toucher which was removed by Stormes' second wood. Mill came up with a beauty, gently kissing the shot away leaving Hongkong lying one shot. These were augmented by two "peaches" from Wotherspoon.

The next few ends were evenly contested the teams peeling at the 9th with the score six all. Up to this point Stormes and Aitkenhead had played splendidly, whilst Macgregor and Campbell seemed to be out of touch with the length of the Jacks thrown.

Wotherspoon was playing like a trojan and his saves were very little below the merit of his opponent. A neat two put the visitors into the lead, but three shots at the next end put Shanghai ahead again and they stayed there to the finish.

For several ends Hongkong were out played the score at the 15th end being 15-9 against them. A three and one at the next two end made the score 13-16 and at the 18th end the most exciting play of the match was witnessed. Omar led with one just behind the Jack and Macgregor laid a short one in the line of fire. His opponent sent down another practically blocking the fore hand and with his second Macgregor just failed to find the green and lay short on the back hand. Stormes electing to draw, just missed the shot with two yards on and his next lay short.

Meanwhile the opponents were lying three. Gavin Campbell, who had found his form, tried two drives, but went slightly narrow whilst Mill laid his two on their short shots laying his team five shots Aitkenhead tried to save on the back hand without success whilst Wotherspoon had put down still another shot which left the game 19-16 for Hongkong if they remained undisturbed. With one wood to go Aitkenhead played a perfectly delivered wood, which narrowly missing the block, quietly mingled with the counters and laid second work.

The remaining ends were evenly contested mainly owing to brilliant play by Gavin Campbell, and the game ended 20 to 14 in favour of the homesters.

WEEK-END CRICKET

Two Drawn First League Matches

Saturday's League cricket was remarkable for the general ascendancy of bat over ball. In the two matches—S. C. C. "B" v. S. R. C. and "A" v. Machine Gun Company—no less than 741 runs were scored for the loss of 27 wickets; only two batsmen of those who went to bat failed to score and the average per batsman was the respectable figure of 25.44 runs. The batting was generally consistent, in all four innings the bat was easily the master of the ball, and naturally the averages of some of our local bowlers suffered considerably.

A winged incendiary rocket which the inventor, Ernest Weich, declares will spread a rain of molten metal over a wide area with devastating effects, has been given preliminary tests with satisfactory results, according to persons who were present. Full Government tests are to be made shortly. The British, French and American governments have displayed interest in the invention, it is declared, and a definite offer is reported to have been received from America. Mr. Weich asserts that the explosion of the rocket will destroy everything in its range, penetrating even steel and asbestos.

THERE is a rumour floating around that bobbed or shingled hair will soon be out of fashion, and that women who wish to remain in the world's gaze must grow (or otherwise acquire) the liberal tresses that were aforetime their bright, particular glory. It is even said that many of those who wish to be right on the night, so to speak, are going to quiet seaside or country places for their holidays, instead of to crowded fashionable resorts, in order that the natural process of renewal may be carried on with as little publicity as possible. The rumour was indirectly confirmed by a West End hairdresser, who, while refusing a definite "Yes," incidentally mentioned that there had been a sudden and surprisingly large demand for tonics intended to foster the hair's growth.

Silver.

After having been as high as 34½d. ready and forward, the price came yesterday at 34⅜d. ready and forward, the same as a week ago. The Continent continues to buy and China is reported to have sold. Reuter reports the market in London on Thursday as steady.

Bars in stock 2,902, including Silver Yen 10 lakhs. Stocks of Sycee and Dollars amount to Tls. 400 lakhs and $450½ lakhs, against Tls. 402 lakhs and $437½ lakhs last week, and Tls. 251½ lakhs and $329 lakhs on September 4, 1923.

Exchange.

Exchange left off last week with the official quotation for T.T. at 3/3½d., where it still remains. The market opened steady yesterday morning at T.T. 3/4d., Gold $74½ for any delivery to December, and gradually firmed up till at the tiffin interval 3/4⅛d. and 74⅝ were easily obtainable, and T.T. 3/4 7/16d. inter-bank business has been done.

THE SILVER MARKET

Reporting from London on July 30, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

The tone of the silver market has been good, governed mostly by a scarcity of supplies and a measure of support afforded by the United States of America which, just now, does not seem to have much silver available. A few China sales have been made during the week. Bear covering and some Continental demand have readily absorbed the offerings. Owing to patchiness showing in the development of the monsoon, a certain amount of uneasiness has been shown in Bombay, but this did not appear to have much effect upon bazaar silver operations, save perhaps somewhat to retard buying. The latest news as to the monsoon is more satisfactory.

The silver quotations to-day for cash and two months' delivery are each ⅛d. above those fixed a week ago.

A Firmer Tone.

The silver market has had rather a firmer tone during the past week and the price advanced from 34 7/16d. to 34⅜d., which was reached on the 29th inst. and is the highest quotation this month. There has since been a slight reaction, but the undertone of the market remains good and about the present level seems likely to be maintained. America has been more of a buyer than a seller in this market and the Continent has bought quietly throughout the week. On the other hand, China has sold on most days, which, with a little profit-taking by London speculators, has supplied the requirements of the market. Until to-day, when it has widened to ⅛d., the difference between spot and forward had remained at ⅛d., most of the buying being for forward delivery.

THE GOLD MARKET

The Bank of England gold reserve against its note issue on the 23rd inst. amounted to £126,449,540, as compared with £126,448,150 on the previous Wednesday.

India has taken a moderate proportion of the substantial amount of gold available this week. Gold to the value of $885,000 has arrived in New York from London during the week. United States gold import, for the last fiscal year amounted to $417,025,638 in value and compare with $284,089,550 for the year preceding. The exports were $10,206,941 as against $49,-021,975 in the preceding year. Since 1870, there have been no exports in a fiscal year less than $13,-500,000. The net imports in the last fiscal year were $406,818,697. During June last imports totalled $25,-181,117 and exports $268,015. The imports were the smallest in any one month since June, 1923, whilst the exports were the smallest of any month for a number of years.

"Whilst America issteadily adding to proportionately, India under the preher gold and expanding her currency sent 2-shilling gold standard is being starved of the currency which it is now expansion of her trade and industries. generally admitted is necessary for the Professor Cassel, who is one of Europe's leading monetary experts, has estimated the currency requirements of the United States at $200 millions a year at present and $300 millions a year in the next decade, and it is for Inbe the additions to Indian currency to dian economists to decide what should meet her growing requirements."

SHANGHAI MARKET REPORT

Another Idle Week as the Result of Provincial War: Produce Merchants Seeking Business

Sept. 6.

Until the war of the provinces, if really there is a war, comes to an end business in Shanghai in any line will be impossible. The markets all were closed last week and they have remained closed this week. In the ordinary course there would not have been anything doing next week, which is a holiday period, so there will not be any lost time to be written off there, and, unless this present war is going to beat all local records, it should be about finished by then.

As stated last week, the Chinese produce dealers, the disturbances notwithstanding, do not appear at all disinclined to discuss business and would be willing to consider transactions were there not other adverse factors. However, inquiries from the home markets have been inconsiderable and very few actual transactions have been reported.

Cotton, Yarn, etc.

The local cotton and yarn markets remain in the same disorganized state, with absolutely nothing doing, but for the first time for several weeks there were spot quotations yesterday for Chinese cotton, these being given as follows:—Ningpo, 44.50 to 45; Tungchow, 42. Tungchow prices on the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange were:—September, 41.85; October, 39.90; November, 39.05; December, 38.20; January, 38.05; February, 38.30.

Yarn quotations on the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange were:—September, 163.06; October, 162.10; November, 159.60; December, 158.70; January, 158.30; February, 158.40.

JAPANESE COTTON MILL

The local Japanese cotton millowners have formed an association under the title of the Japanese Cotton Millowners' Association of Shanghai. This body henceforth will act as their official organ and all communications bearing upon any matter connected with the local Japanese cotton mills should be addressed to the Association's office, 69 Boone Road.

LONDON TEA MARKET

London, Sept. 3.

The whole budget reduction of tea taxation was swallowed up by an increased price several weeks ago. A large firm of retailers announce another reduction of 4d. a pound. Keen buying in the wholesale market yesterday resulted in an average rise of 8d. a pound for high-grade Ceylons and 3 farthings a pound for the lower grade.—Reuter.

COAL OUTPUT

The total output of the Kailan Mining Administration's mines for the week ending August 23 amounted to 91,107 tons and the sales during the same period to 86,210 tons.

JULY RUBBER OUTPUT

The output of rubber from the Taiping Estates for the month of July was 6,336 lb.

PHILIPPINES SUGAR CROP

Large Increase Estimated

Manila, Aug. 18.

The centrifugal sugar crop of the Philippine Islands for the coming season—1924-1925—is estimated at 418,000 metric tons by the Philippine Sugar Association. This is an increase of 107,911 tons or 34.7 per cent. over the previous year. In a statement the Sugar Association says:—

"This is expected to be the largest increase in tons shown since the development of modern sugar culture in the islands, although not the largest percentage of increase shown in any year. The big increase in production here will mean much more money for the planters and better times for the islands generally, especially if the upward tendency of price continues. Practically every sugar central in the Philippines will have a big increase in output this year as compared with last year."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SUPDT. MELLOWS' RETIREMENT

Dinner and Presentation by His Old Colleagues on Police Hulk

Superintendent T. Mellows, of the Shanghai Water Police, retired from the service on Monday, his time expiring at midnight. Superintendent Mellows has been in the force for a great number of years, and has become as popular with its members, both foreign and Chinese, as with his fellow townsmen in Shanghai. Accordingly, on Monday his old comrades, the Water Police, both Chinese and foreign, entertained him to a farewell dinner on the Water Police Hulk, when a very enjoyable evening was spent, and presentations were made.

As Superintendent Mellows appeared on the wharf, ready to step into the launch which was to take him on board the hulk, he was met with crackers and cheers, and proudly conducted aboard. Superintendent Woodfield (his successor) met him on board the hulk and escorted him to the mess room, where the dinner was held.

In the course of the evening Superintendent Woodfield, making the presentation, spoke of Mr Mellows' record with the force, and of the intimate way in which he had been bound up in its history in Shanghai. With regard to the presentation, Superintendent Woodfield said they had some difficulty in knowing what to give him at first. Silver, which was the usual thing in such cases, was somewhat at a discount in the case of Mr. Mellows, for as the result of his prowess as a yachtsman, a marksman, jockey and at most other sports, he already had enough silver to set him down as a mark for all the burglars in town. But they then bethought them that he had intimated his intention of going Home some time in the future. Therefore they were pleased to present him with a handsome leather travelling trunk, handbag and suitcase and they sincerely hoped he would live to get a considerable amount of wear out of all three.

Superintendent Mellows made a suitable reply, and was obviously touched at the tribute (albeit so thoroughly deserved) to his popularity. He entertained his listeners with a graphic account of his experiences with the force, its history and the adventures and vicissitudes he had passed through with it.

Chinese Colleagues' Gift

The sailors (Chinese) attached to the force followed up with the presentation to their retiring superintendent of a handsome silver shield, inscribed with a tribute to Mr. Mellows' character. The presentation was made by the bo'sun, who reminded Mr. Mellows that of the 29 years he had spent with the service, 22 had been as Mr. Mellows' bo'sun, with sail and steam.

Mr. Mellows thanked the Chinese staff for their compliment, and testified to the assistance he had always received from them.

The bo'sun and his mates, and the Chinese police constables, at this point flatly refused to leave the mess room until they had been photographed with Superintendent Mellows, a proposal to which he willingly acquiesced.

When Superintendent Mellows left the hulk late last night he did so to the accompaniment of crackers, cheers and the singing of "For he's a jolly good fellow."

MR. J. Gray-Buchanan, J.P., who has just been appointed a member of the Department of Overseas Trade, is the senior partner in Messrs. William Jacks & Co., the Shanghai firm with branches in London and throughout the East. Mr. Gray-Buchanan is also deputy chairman of the London Chamber of Commerce, a member of the Imperial Institute advisory committee on mineral resources, a member of the executive council of the Association of British Chambers of Commerce, and a director of half a dozen engineering firms.

YACHT SHANGHAI LOST AT SEA

Halifax, Aug. 28.

A former Shanghai yacht, in which Judge Wells and others were voyaging from Bergen to New York, was wrecked to-day in a hurricane off Canso. All were rescued owing to the heroism of a Norwegian seaman, who swam through the breakers and climbed the bluff with a line. The vessel was smashed to pieces.—Reuter's American Service.

•••The yacht above referred to is the yawl Shanghai, which recently made the voyage from Shanghai to Denmark, manned by a Danish Corinthian crew. Under date of July 12, a special correspondent at Copenhagen of the "Christian Science Monitor," said:—

"The small yacht, the Shanghai, famous through its adventurous trip from Shanghai right to Copenhagen, is again on the point of setting out on a long cruise. The boat has been purchased by a former New York judge, F. de Witt Wells, who had seen the exploits of the little craft and its gallant crew mentioned in the papers. He was so impressed that he at once set out for Denmark and purchased the Shanghai, which is now being thoroughly overhauled. When this has been completed Mr. de Witt Wells will proceed to Bergen on board his new yacht and will there be joined by his son and the painter-author, Mr. Rockwell. From Bergen the party will start on the homeward voyage by way of the Shetland Islands, the Faroe Islands, Iceland, and perhaps Greenland. This is the route chosen by the Norse Vikings in the distant past."

The yacht must have met with the same hurricane which caused so much damage to the White Star liner Arabic, as Canso is an inlet on the coast of Nova Scotia.—Ed.

THE EXORBITANT PRICE OF RICE

Profiteers Making Evil Harvest Out of War Scare: Relief Measures

The increase in the price of rice during the past two days from $11 per picul to $20 per picul led to the Cantonese Merchants Association, 129 Range Road, holding a conference to decide what steps shall be taken to see that the poor classes of Cantonese in Shanghai shall not suffer. It was ultimately decided to make preparations for obtaining rice from Wuhu, the funds to be raised by public subscription. It is estimated that about $50,000 will be needed, and this will be used for the chartering of ships to bring the rice down here. It will then be distributed to poor Cantonese. If more money is needed a further subscription will be called for.

BURGLARY IN KINNEAR ROAD

The police are searching for a burglar who entered the house of Mr. S. H. Lewis, 44 Kinnear Road, shortly after midnight on Sunday.

The thief's entrance was the signal for a dog's barking which awoke Mrs. Lewis. On looking towards her dressing table she saw the burglar coolly regarding her. When she cried for help, her husband immediately rushed downstairs after the intruder, who escaped by way of the bathroom adjoining Mrs. Lewis's apartment. The room was considerably disarranged, but it was found that nothing had been stolen.

It appears certain that the culprit is a man whom the police have been looking for for some time. His usual methods are to get into a house at the back, lock the kitchen door and escape from the front of the premises. Electrical appliances and gramophone records seem to be the chief objects of his housebreaking exploits.

MISS Mabel Winnifred Gould, a former pupil of Hankow British School now at Helena High School, Burgess Hill, Sussex, has just won the Senior Scholarship of the school, value £60, the senior scripture prize and a prize for French.

OBITUARY

Mr. A. G. Stephen

It was with very deep regret that many friends in Shanghai learnt last Friday of the death of Mr. A. G. Stephen, chief manager of the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank. Mr. Stephen was taken to hospital some days ago suffering from bronchial-pneumonia; complications rapidly set in and he passed away at eight o'clock on Wednesday evening, August 27. Mr. Stephen was unquestionably the finest financier of his day in all the Far East; it is even said that his superior was never known in this part of the world. He was also a man of great personality, a commanding character, of wide interests, and withal a most genial host, an excellent companion and a good friend.

Mr. Stephen was born, we think, at Huntly in Aberdeenshire in Scotland, a town whose pass word, the same as that of the famous Scottish regiment, the Gay Gordons, he took for a pony that brought him success, namely, Bydand. He began his career in a Scottish bank, but, in the year 1882, he went to London and joined the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank. In 1885 he came out to the head office in Hongkong, and there is a legend that in those early days he cashed a cheque for Admiral Sir Alexander Duff—then a very junior lieutenant—on the strength of his excellent Scottish name. At any rate the two were life-long friends. Mr. Stephen remained for four years in Hongkong, then he was for seven years in Java, four in India, four in the Philippines, where he became a great friend of General Leonard Wood, and three in the Straits, where we believe he showed his interest in journalism (among many other things) by contributing ocasional leaders to the "Penang Gazette."

Manager in Shanghai.

In the spring of 1911 he came to Shanghai and assisted the late Mr. H. E. R. Hunter in the management. A year later he succeeded on Mr. Hunter's retiring and remained manager in Shanghai until April, 1920. During this time he had many most anxious crises with which to deal, including the terribly anxious week of Revolution in 1913, (the only occasion on which the present writer can remember seeing Mr. Stephen's normal imperturbability at all shaken), and the financial crisis of May 1916, when the Chinese Government declared a moratorium which very nearly threw the Chinese bankers into hysterics. On all these occasions Mr. Stephen's calm and dominating personality was of incalculable value in keeping the local market steady. Chinese bankers were deep in admiration for him and, on his going Home in 1920, they presented him with several valuable testimonials. It may also be recalled that at the end of the war, the Diplomatic Body in Peking unanimously invited him to liquidate the Deutsch-Asiatische Bank, which was done with a thoroughness that earned him the peculiar hatred of the Germans.

Among other recollections, it was Mr. Stephen who proposed that if the Chinese Government would establish in Shanghai a properly managed and controlled mint, which should coin dollars of stable value, other provincial mints being abolished, foreign banks would be prepared to accept these dollars as the coinage of the country and keep their accounts in them. We all know the fiasco in which the project ended, but that was not Mr. Stephen's fault. He also took no little trouble for the formation of a Bankers Association in Shanghai, which would have included both Chinese and foreign banks, but in this he could not bring all concerned into line. It may also be mentioned that he was very strongly in favour of the Municipal Council issuing its own coinage in order to counteract the evil of depreciated copper; this idea was scoffed at when he advanced it, but one has since heard it advocated in two or three different quarters.

Chief Manager.

In April, 1920, Mr. Stephen went Home for eight months' leave in the same ship with Sir Havilland de Sausmarez and Dean Walker. He returned a year later to Hongkong as chief manager, and under his charge the prosperity of the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank has certainly "moulted no feather." In illustration of Mr. Stephen's breadth of view, it may be mentioned that the great Wayfoong building in Shanghai was almost entirely due to his advocacy: left to themselves, the Court of Directors would probably have built something much more modest. Mr. Stephen had great ideas of embellishing the old Bank House in Hongkong. It was due to his influence that the Court of Directors purchased the wonderful collection of Chinnery's drawings and paintings, when they came into the market a few years ago, which now hang in that house. He also bought, out of his own means, not a few pictures and handsome pieces of furniture, to present to the chief manager's house. He was for several years a member of the Legislative Council of the Governor of Hongkong.

Rowing and Racing.

As a young man Mr. Stephen was a keen oarsman, as a number of silver cups in his house bore witness; and of course, as his nationality became him, he was at all times an assiduous golfer.

He always took a lively interest in racing and as an owner met with considerable success. From 1918 to 1920 he was in partnership with Mr. A. W. Burkill as a racing owner. Their pony Bydand was third in the Maidens in 1918, won the Champions in the spring of 1920, and was second in the autumn of the same year after winning the Shanghai Stakes. In later years Mr. Stephen was in partnership with Mr. Stitt in racing both here and at Hongkong. Their best pony was undoubtedly Cock o' the North, which won the Eclipse Stakes and was third in the Champions at the Shanghai spring meeting last year. Other good and well known ponies in the same ownership, specially over short distances, were Benz and Silver Idol.

An Authority on Shakespeare.

It may not be generally known that Mr. Stephen was an authority on Shakespeare, such as is rarely met with. He could, from memory, place practically any quotation, not only from the well-known plays but also from those less familiar and from the sonnets and other verse. His knowledge generally of English literature both prose and poetry was extraordinarily wide and accurate. He was also a great lover of music though he did not perform himself. He was a good speaker, with no pretentions to oratory, but a fine instinct for the appropriate word and always a dry keen sense of humour.

His eldest son, who was in the Flying Corps, was killed during the war. Mr. Stephen leaves two daughters, the twins, well-known to many friends, who have just finished their education in Switzerland and were in London with their father at the time of his death. To them as also to Mrs. Stephen we offer the heartfelt sympathy of many friends all through the Far East.

Mr. Charles Stuart Barff.

Very many residents in Shanghai will learn with regret that Mr. Charles Barff passed away last Friday afternoon at 4.20 at the Victoria Nursing Home, after a brief illness.

Mr. Barff was born at Patras, in Greece, on August 14, 1863, his father being British Vice-Consul in that city. He came out to Hongkong when quite a child, returning to England for his education, at Shoreham school. He began his business career in the office of Messrs. Butterfield & Swire at Hongkong, afterwards being with Messrs. Gibb, Livingston & Co. in Hongkong, Foochow and Shanghai. He then became a sharebroker, and was one of the oldest members of the Shanghai Stock Exchange.

In his youth, Mr. Barff was very prominent in sport, particularly cricket. He was a member of Hongkong interport teams against Singapore and Shanghai, and he also played for Shanghai against Hongkong upon coming to reside here, and in all these matches proved his value as an excellent fast bowler. Every racing man knows Mr. Barff's keen interest in the sport. In partnership with Mr. Toeg, he won several important races, and in his own ownership won the Champions two or three times with Moriak, in some famous duels with the renowned Brockton.

The deceased leaves a widow, son and daughter, all at present in Shanghai, and very sincere sympathy will be extended to them.

The funeral took place at Bubbling Well Cemetery last Sunday in the presence of a large number of sympathizing friends, including members of the Shanghai Stock Exchange, the Shanghai Race Club and the Shanghai Cricket Club.

The service was read by the Very Rev. Dean C. J. F. Symons, M.A., and the coffin was borne to the graveside by Messrs. Ellis Hunter, A. W. Olsen, F. W. Schwyzer, R. I. Fearon, F. A. Sampson and W. R. Parkin, the chief mourners being Mrs. Marion Barff, the widow, and Mr. Lionel S. Barff (son) and Miss Patricia Barff (daughter).

Amongst those present were:—Messrs. P. Crighton, K. Martin, W. E. Schroeder, S. W. Pratt, L. Midwood, C. E. Sparke, A. E. Stewart, S. R. Owen, W. M. Wood, A. B. Thompson, A. E. Lanning, H. B. Ollerdessen, H. Veitch, W. A. Dalgarno, A. J. Rea, T. Addis Martin, V. J. S. Rumble, L. Andersen, P. O. Moore, R. O'Brien, A. E. Roggers and R. B. Wallace.

X-RAY WONDERS

Shanghai Equipped with a New and Complete Laboratory

To the layman, the "fairy tales of science" always make fascinating reading, and when these wonders of the modern world are made concrete in the form of experimental and practical apparatus one's appreciation deepens. This was the experience of a representative of the "North-China Daily News" who recently spent an interesting hour at the offices of Messrs. Andersen, Meyer & Co., where there has lately been installed a complete set of X-ray apparatus, embodying the latest practical developments in Professor's Rontgen's great discovery. The exhibition, which is in charge of Mr. Carl Foss, of the Victor X-Ray Corporation of Chicago, an expert long experienced in this work both on the Continent and in the United States, comprises the most recently developed equipment now in use, and is a revelation of the marvellous ingenuity which has been brought to bear in applying the rays to uses of the most practical and valuable kind.

Mr. Foss, who is an enthusiast as well as an expert, has been demonstrating to numbers of interested visitors the manner in which X-Rays, the mysterious Violet Rays, and High Frequency and Physiotherapy apparatus are used in assisting medical and surgical science, and also dentistry, to which the apparatus has become an extremely valuable aid. Among other novel sensations in store for the visitor may be that of standing between the X-Ray tube and the fluorescent screen and seeing his own heart beat, while another feature of special interest is the Violet Ray, a beautiful light which actually is artificial sunshine and gives off ozone.

In addition to the larger stationary apparatus there are smaller portable outfits for use at the bedside and in the dentist's surgery. These include the apparatus used in what has become popularly known as "bloodless surgery"—technically, Diathermy, or treatment with High Frequency apparatus—the use of a current somewhat similar to the welding arc process in cutting steel, by which means the tissues are closed to infection and a hard surface is produced which prevents infected blood from coming in contact with adjoining tissues. Finally, there is a well designed dark room from which the visitor, having been X-rayed, may carry away as an interesting souvenir the evidence of things not seen with his own eyes.

This laboratory of the science of X-rays constitutes a real acquisition to the many modern facilities which are being added to the Model Settlement, and it should prove of great assistance to radiography in China. Already, Mr. Foss has rendered welcome assistance to the medical profession, particularly to doctors engaged in the mission field, in regard to installation and correct use of various pieces of apparatus, and he has given many lectures upon the science generally at Shanghai and in various parts of the country, these having been received with great interest in professional circles and at the schools and colleges visited by him.

A cordial invitation is extended to the public to visit the laboratory which has so many features of interest for the non-professional as well as the professional men.

MR. TONG SHAO-YI ON THE CRISIS

A Geographical Problem: British Liberal Solution the Only Effective Way

BY GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY.

Tong Shao-yi, former Premier of China, on Wednesday at his residence when told that fighting had actually begun, could only say: "It is too bad that it could not be avoided. The sufferings and hardships of the people will be terrible.

"The Westminster Gazette seems to have a remarkably clear conception of the situation in China and the way to peace in my poor country. Liberal British opinion seems to have a keen insight into the possibilities for peace and the article which was published in the 'North-China Daily News' this morning shows that British opinion is not ignorant of the causes for the strife which is continuous and of which the present war is but a battle.

The Central Government.

"I have always said that regardless as to which party is in power, the present Parliamentary system of government is unsuited to China. China is too vast and widespread for any central authority in any city, whether Peking or elsewhere, to control the situation by parliamentary enactment. It requires much more than that. It requires government by consent of the governed and consent is not to be found in either Parliament or the various military dictatorships which establish themselves. At the present time, a large part of the country does not recognize any central government and if these provinces are put down, others will rise up to combat the central government. It is not that I object to the present central government in particular. It is but a product of the system. I object to the whole method of government in China which to my mind is fundamentally wrong.

"General Lu Yung-hsiang seemed to grasp this idea in his interview with you. But as soon as he said that the central government should heed the voice of the provinces, he missed the whole point. That only means that the central government in power at a given moment should listen to the voice of those provinces which it favours and ignore the voice of those provinces which it opposes. The representatives of the provinces should be the government. It should not be possible for any group of them to constitute themselves a government of China and to say whether they would or would not listen to the voice of a given province. Such an idea is not in keeping either with the history or the traditions of the Chinese people.

Wars Settle Nothing.

"This present war is largely over a geographical question, the political position of Shanghai in the government of China. No matter who wins the present war, this question will have to be settled along geographical lines. Shanghai is part of Kiangsu. It can never be anything else. But the general question as to the future of China cannot be settled by this war or by any war. For wars somehow localize themselves and never seem to settle anything. It will have to be settled by a peaceful revision of the system of government of China based upon the experience of the last 12 years which must prove that we are on the wrong track.

"My own plan is very simple. Each province selects a representative or several representatives, which are responsible to their own provinces for their conduct. These meet and form the administrative branch of the government. The President or whatever one wants to call him, is selected by lot. He is not a Chihli man or an Anhui man. The office cannot be monopolized by any great province near the capital. The representatives or any province, even Yunnan, might become President by the device of lot. The drawing of lots was considered an honourable method of distributing positions in olden times among the literati, because the Emperor would not show favouritism in making his appointments so far as provincial preferment was concerned. The cabinet would consist of capable men, whose business would be administration, work, and not talk and politics. The Administrators would lay down general rules for the guidance of these permanent officials. This would eliminate all the private wars, which under the present system seem necessary.

Wasteful and Useless.

If there is a boundary dispute between Kiangsu and Chêkiang, today, it is necessary for the military men of these provinces to fight it out, to see whether the boundary can be readjusted. If Marshal Chi wins, Marshal Lu will begin to plan to get back at him. If Marshal Lu wins, the question is as open as it was before the war. What a wasteful, useless system. Sir Robert Hotung's Round Table Conference would have settled such a boundary dispute. My suggestion I hope would create a permanent method for such settlements, a method based upon history, tradition, the psychology of the Chinese people, and common sense."

CHECK TO AVENUE FOCH METALLERS

Race Club's Formal Protest to Both Councils against Useless Waste of Money

The agitation commenced in the "North-China Daily News" against the utterly useless waste of money on the metalling of Avenue Foch over its entire width, and subsequently supported by many correspondents in our columns, has borne fruit and now is further emphasized by the following letter which appears in this week's Municipal Gazette:—

The views of the French Municipal Council re the metalling of the Avenue Foch riding track have been asked for in terms of the following letter:—

Council Chamber.
Shanghai, August 27, 1924.

SIR,—I have the honour to refer to the correspondence which has passed between the Council and the French Municipal Council on the subject of metalling the existing riding track in Avenue Foch.

In respect thereto, I have the honour to inform you that a letter has been received from Mr. A. W. Burkill, Chairman of the Shanghai Race Club, protesting against such action being taken. As from Mr. Burkill's letter, it is understood that a similar communication has been addressed to the Chairman of the French Municipal Council, and with a view to unity of action in the matter, I have the honour to request that you will be so good as to favour me with an expression of the views of the French Municipal Council on the subject.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
E. S. B. ROWE.
Acting Secretary.

The French Municipal Gazette recently published an unsolicited testimonial from one foreigner who professed to see in the proposed metalling a great public benefit designed for the general good, and two or three of our correspondents declared that all their acquaintances were in favour of the waste, but it was obvious in the beginning that the scheme had not been favourably received by the majority. Thanks are due to the Stewards of the Race Club for the action they have taken. They never act against the wishes of the members and it must not be forgotten that the Race Club probably has a bigger membership than any club in Shanghai, a very large percentage of whom also are owners of motor cars.

For the benefit of the French Municipal Council before it sends an answer to the letter, and for the complete conversion of the Shanghai Municipal Council if it is not yet convinced of the folly of the original proposal, the reasons for objecting to the metalling of Avenue Foch may be repeated. They are:—(1) The existing riding track, which is but a very narrow strip, fulfils a useful and humane purpose: (2) the trifling additional benefit to a few motorists to be gained by metalling the whole of the road does not justify the expenditure of the money that would be required for the purpose; seeing that they are served by five other good roads westwards; (3) expenditure of money on Avenue Foch urgently needed elsewhere is therefore wanton waste.

SIXTY days' imprisonment, the maximum sentence for using vile and obscene language, was passed by Mr. Lurton at the U. S. Commissioner's Court on Tuesday on Samuel B. Fair. The sentence follows a previous conviction on July 26 for a similar offence, when accused was fined G. $25.

SHANGHAI COLLEGE REOPENED

Large Number of Applicants in Spite of War Rumours

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

The rumours of impending war do not seem to have affected the numbers that apply for admission to Shanghai College. Entrance examinations held on Tuesday and Wednesday from 8.30 a.m. to 4 p.m. were taken by 90 per cent. of those previously registered while many new applicants came straggling in on both of these days.

So that students already arrived in Shanghai who have left their homes earlier than usual in anticipation of a complete suspension of communication, may remain at the college until classes begin, the Administration has provided accommodation in the dormitories. Any student may secure accommodation by applying at the Business Office immediately after arrival.

Several new buildings have been completed during the summer vacation. A new dining hall for the Middle School, Georgia Hall for the kindergarten normal training department, and three additional residences are ready for occupancy.

President and Mrs. F. J. White are expected to arrive from America on September 9 after a year's furlough spent in travelling through the United States.

Among the other teachers who have returned to strengthen the College faculty are, Mr. and Mrs. T. N. Johnson of the English Department, Dr. and Mrs. Elam J. Anderson, of the Educational Department, Dr. and Mrs. Westbrook and Miss Paterson who returned from a year's study at the Peking Language School, Mr. and Mrs. Helfrich in the Department of Business Administration, Dr. Zellweger in the Chemistry Department and Dr. Cressey, Professor of Geography and Geology.

Dr. Cressey has recently spent three months on an expedition in Kansu where he investigated the geological conditions attending the recent earthquake in that region.

Dr. Anderson in addition to his work in the Educational Department will resume charge of the Shanghai College Glee Club which has become famous under his direction.

A number of new teachers have been secured for the College and Middle School this year. Miss Miriam Horrel, formerly a teacher in the High School at Dayton, Ohio, and last year on the faculty of Yale-in China at Changsha, Miss E. E. Mitchell, Mr. Pan En-ling, Mr. Djang Tsi Gung, Mr. Chen Seng Gen and Mr. Ting Shui Sen begin work this term.

Miss Kethley, Dean of Women, comes to take charge of a growing number of College "co-eds."

Miss Bryan, daughter of Dr. R. T. Bryan, a veteran missionary of Shanghai, will have charge of the Kindergarten Normal Training School. It is hoped to make this a model school for this district.

Pre-medical students who intend to enter the Peking Union Medical School will do their preparatory work in the well equipped College Science Hall where there are laboratory facilities rendered possible by the munificent gift of the Rockefeller Foundation.

The Business Administration Department can now offer several new courses since Mr. Helfrich has joined the faculty. This department certainly promises to do well.

Mr. Victor Hanson, who was Acting President during the absence of Dr. White, will now be released from administrative duties, and will take up full time work in the Department of History and Political Science.

Enrollment of old students and successful candidates in the recent examinations will take place from September 8 to 10. Classes commence at 10 a.m. on September 11.

Students must return on time as no places can be kept open for late comers owing to the large number of new students who have applied for admission.

THE FRENCH BOXER INDEMNITY

Protest by Chinese Chamber of Commerce Against Payment in Gold Francs

We are informed by Mr. Francis Zia, Foreign Secretary of the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce of Shanghai, that on Wednesday the following telegram was despatched by the Chamber to the Cabinet, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Ministry of Finance, Peking, opposing the payment of the French Boxer Indemnity in gold francs in consideration of the postponement of payment for a period of two years:—

"Referring to the case of the French Government's request for the payment of the Boxer Indemnity in gold francs, and the non-compliance on the part of the Chinese Government with this request in consequence of the outburst of popular opposition, we find that although a year has gone by without the controversy being settled, the authorities in Peking are now reported to have abandoned their former vacillating attitude and to have suddenly decided to accede to the request in question on the understanding that the payment of the French Boxer Indemnity will be postponed for a period of two years. While this will afford some relief to the financial tension in Peking, the burden of the people will thereby be exceedingly increased. The present critical moment is most inopportune for taking further steps in this matter, and if the reported decision is correct, it will be repudiated by the people. Having telegraphically registered a protest with the French Legation Minister, we hereby urge you to proceed cautiously.

LIEUTENANT William Manning, the last survivor of Commodore Matthew Perry's expedition to Japan, is dead.

CHINESE SERVANTS AT CENTRAL BUILDINGS

With reference to the recent disturbance between the Chinese servants at the Central Buildings and a resident, the following correspondence has passed between the latter and Mr. Frank, manager of the establishment.—

Shanghai, Sept. 2. 1924.

The Manager,
Central Building.

DEAR SIR,—With reference to the report appearing in the "North-China Daily News" relative to the incident in your building, this is to inform you that the report contained therein is inaccurate and that I, personally, gave no information whatever to the paper is question.

The publication has caused me a great deal of annoyance and I would be glad if you would accept this assurance that I have made no complaint whatever against the management of the Central Building.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) L. W. HARTMANS.

Shanghai, Sept. 2. 1924.

L. W. Hartmans, Esq.,
Shanghai.

DEAR SIR,—I have to thank you for your letter of to-day's date which clears up the whole matter so far as we are concerned. We are glad that you took no part in the attempt to discredit the management of the Central Buildings, and we wish to extend our thanks to you for the assistance you have thus given us in getting at the truth of the matter.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) P. FRANK.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE WICKED WASTE OF WAR IN CHINA

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—It may not be generally known that Shanghai played a great part in forcing the abdication of the Young Emperor after this market had had the general upset to trade which we have again experienced during the past few days. It appears to me that the trade organizations should now approach the Ministers in Peking and urge one of two schemes. Either the removal or demolition of the Arsenal or the appointment of a Boundary Commission to adjust the borders of the two provinces. So long as the Arsenal remains in its present position it is bound to cause friction between the man sitting at Nanking and its opposite number at Hangchow, and it is a thousand pities the question of its abolition was allowed to drop in 1913. The easiest solution would be to adjust the boundary of Chekiang Province to embrace the district including Woosung and even as far as Kiàngyin.

We are back to mediæval days in this country when two Tuchuns are in a position, by showing fight to one another, to upset the whole equilibrium of hundreds of thousands, and the Central Government doing nothing to avert it. China is suffering from enormous flood damage, taxes are being paid to help sufferers, yet the resources of two wealthy provinces are squandered on arms and ammunition. Chambers of Commerce and kindred bodies should now move and perhaps something might be done.

I am, etc.,
L. E. C.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—To-day the clash between the Kiangsu and Chekiang forces is expected at any moment, and doubtless the authorities of the Settlements are engaged in planning how to safeguard the lives and properties within the Settlement limits. But in doing this, must not they give due regard to the interests of those outside the Settlements? The Chinese part of the city is so closely connected with the Settlements that any disturbance occurring in the former will expose the latter to serious danger. Besides, there are many foreign lives and properties in Nantao and Chapei, especially in the latter, so that whatever violence is created there will inflict damages upon foreigners no less than upon the Chinese, because fire and shots have no eyes and cannot discriminate foreigners from non-foreigners.

It has often been recommended by well-wishers of Shanghai that if this city is going to reach its real greatness, there must be a joint government for the Greater Shanghai consisting of delegates from various municipalities of the foreign Settlements as well as the Chinese city. It impresses me very deeply during this occasion that if Shanghai is going to maintain its greatness during this turbulent state of China, there must be a joint police force consisting of detachments from various constabularies of the settlements as well as the Chinese city and reinforced by the Shanghai Volunteer Corps. This joint police force is to guard the outskirts not of the Settlements but of the Greater Shanghai by keeping away any armed soldiers from this neutral zone, in order that all the lives and properties within the zone will be safe. It will be called together only in time of internal warfare and dispersed as soon as normal order is resumed. As to the peace and order within the outskirts thus safeguarded, it will be left at the hands of the police of respective jurisdictions as usual. Being thus limited in time and space, this system is by no means a menace to the sovereignty of China.

CHINESE PROFITEERING.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—As you may be aware, the prices of a great many necessaries have, on account of the rumours of impending war, been greatly increased during the past few days, and in the vast majority of instances without real justification but merely for profiteering purposes. Take rice, for example, the price was only $11.60 per picul for the best quality about five days ago, but I understand it is being sold to-day by the profiteering rice shops at as high as $17 per picul, and further advances are in view. Of course, inferior grades of rice have gone up in price proportionately.

I dread to contemplate the pitable plight in which Chinese hand-to-mouth workers, such as ricsha coolies, cargo coolies, and street hawkers, etc., (particularly those with families to feed) find themselves at present, and no doubt very many of them are wishing they had not been born.

Purveyors of foreign supplies will, I am afraid, soon raise their prices too and foreigners will accordingly suffer financially as well.

As far as I know, there is no law yet in China under which the rice and other profiteers could be forced to adhere to fixed prices and so mitigate the sufferings of the poor.

Some will probably suggest the intervention of the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce, but I am rather inclined to think that the members of this august body already have their hearts jumping feverishly in their mouths and cannot be prevailed upon to do anything. They are mostly men of affluence, so what care they for their poor brothers and sisters? Even in normal times they have been known to be apathetic in such matters.

I hardly think the Municipal Councils have the requisite power to maintain prices at levels that might be considered reasonable to sellers, so that apparently there is no remedy for a state of affairs entailing tremendous hardships on the Chinese poor.

Personally, I do not think that, rumours and material preparations notwithstanding, there will be any actual fighting, because the issues between the contending parties could without much difficulty be settled by parleying or other unobtrusive methods so familiar to Chinese officials, especially in view of the fact that one party is overwhelmingly stronger than the other in both actual power and political influence.

However, the main question with which I am concerned is, cannot something be done quickly to prevent prices soaring further and so lessen the very real sufferings of our poor Chinese fellow creatures?

ANTI-PROFITEERING.
Shanghai, Aug. 28, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In your issue of to-day appears a letter signed "Anti-Profiteering" charging the rice dealers with profiteering.

Why not include our banks and stores in the charge? It is usual for stores to accept small money for purchases up to cents 50 and to demand "big" money for purchases in excess of cents 50. If, for example, the purchase comes to cents 70 and a big dollar is tendered in payment the store calmly hands back cents 30 in small money. The change ought also to be in big money and therefore they ought to return cents 30 in silver plus a few coppers.

Not many days ago I cashed a small cheque over the counter of our biggest bank and the Chinese handed to me the dollars in big money but the odd cents 90 he handed to me in small money. Whem I suggested that instead of his handing to me cents 90 in small money I should give him cents 10 and take a big dollar from him he grinned and walked away.

CUIQUE SUUM.
Shanghai, Aug. 30, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In this morning's issue of your paper "Cuique Sum" makes reference to my letter with the above heading which appeared in your publication of August 30, and thinks that my charges of profiteering might well include banks and stores.

It is quite true stores accept small money for fractions of a dollar up to 50 cents, but when the amount is, say, 60 cents, a big dollar is required and 40 cents small money handed over to balance the account, which at the present "best" exchange rates means a loss to the customer of about 27 per cent., and in these extremely hard times the difference albeit small in amount is not to be despised. I agree with "C. S." that all small change handed back against a big dollar ought to be on the big dollar basis in the case of stores, because many of them include in their prices not only a reasonable profit but provision for bad and doubtful debts against their credit customers, which addition the unfortunate cash buyer has to pay.

A few days ago I entered the oldest confectionery shop here to buy a tea-cake of the market value of 70 cents. As the proprietor was present I said that I supposed "big" money would have to be paid, to which he replied that small money would be quite acceptable to him. This no doubt is only an isolated instance.

With regard to the other instance concerning the banks there is, from the point of view of "olo custom" or established usage, as much difference betwen the two instances as there is between a snub nose and an aquiline nasal protuberance. In both cases, of course, rectification is necessary, but there is a difference. In the case of banks the paying out of small money for big dollar value is entirely in the hands of the compradore—the same applies to firms' compradores—and the differences retained are his perquisites, which are an insignificant contribution towards his annual "nett profits" usually totalled up in the first few days of February. Therefore, partly with these exchange differences the compradore doles out the New Year cumshas or bonuses to the numerous members of his staff, not forgetting himself of course.

I do not know whether "C. S." is the taipan or other employee of a local firm with a compradore: if so, he must have had exchange transactions with his compradore and found that if his tael pay cheque worked out into so many hundred dollars and say 96 cents he received the correct number of big dollars but only 90 cents in silver and 6 coppers.

These practices on the part of banks' and firms' compradores are very deep-rooted and, I think, countenanced by the banks and firms, and after all there is something to be said for them. If you complained to the responsible party you would most probably get the reply "I am sorry, but it is really the compradore's business."

But for the stores to mulct their customers of the differences in exchange seems to me to be a matter calling for correction.

THE DYNAMITE MAGAZINES

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Your article in this morning's issue is both timely, and, in my opinion, hits the nail on the head. The magazines are a silent menace to the safety of our port, more especially at this critical time. It is high time the Powers-that-be opened their eyes to the danger they are keeping right outside our doors.

Your article states, that recently a launch has been put in constant attendance at the magazine, and that three Sikh watchmen are on guard. On paper this sounds fine, but what would three Sikhs be able to do in case the magazines should be attacked by one side or the other of the contending forces? And what hopes would the Superintendent have of getting his family away to safety? From your article, I gather the Superintendent's family are still living at the magazine. Do the Powers-that-be consider it is fair to compel a woman and children to remain in such a dangerous place (with no means of communication other than a launch), or have they made provisions whereby at the first signs of danger, they would be looked out for? In a previous letter, I pointed out the danger if the magazines happened to be struck by lightning; now the danger is far greater, as, if the magazine fell into the hands of the Chinese, the Superintendent would not be able to exercise his usual authority and forbid anyone entering before they were searched, and it is almost a certainty that through careless handling, a serious explosion would be bound to occur, as it only requires one stick to detonate the lot.

Dynamite, as anyone who has had any dealings with it knows, must be treated with the utmost respect, and should it fall into the hands of ignorant persons, it will, without doubt, do more damage to Shanghai than all the fighting which might take place.

Your suggestion that the magazine should be declared a neutral zone, and that an efficient guard be put over the place, is very sound and wise, and shows that you at least realize the danger (even if the authorities do not), but there is still another suggestion which should appeal to the Powers-that-be, and that is, (if not already done) remove the family of the Superintendent to some place of safety. Think of the strain it must be on the nerves of a mother with her children around her, to be constantly exposed to a danger which is both ruthless and sudden, more especially at this critical junction. It must be bad enough in ordinary times but what must it be for them to-day, not being able to tell from hour to hour what is likely to happen. If a raid took place, would the raiders show any respect for the foreigners living at the magazine? I am certain they would not.

I am a married man, and would not care to have my wife exposed to the danger of a raid from Chinese soldiers, however well behaved or disciplined they might be, especially if I was living at such a place as the magazines, and I am certain those in authority would not like to have their wives and families placed in a like position; they should therefore have some consideration for their subordinates. No apology is needed for asking you to give space to this letter as it is a subject that is of vital importance to the welfare of our port, far more to-day than it was when I wrote you before.

I am, etc.,
INTERESTED.

GREATER SHANGHAI

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—There is no time like the present to begin agitation for a Greater Shanghai. Whether there should be peace without bloodshed or whether peace will only come after a series of sanguinary battles, this must be the last time that Shanghai should find itself exposed to the dangers and the consequences of a quarrel which is not her own.

The nucleus of Shanghai is, of course, composed of what are known as the Foreign Settlements. Through the energy, courage and perseverance of the foreigner Shanghai has, in 80 years, become the premier city of Asia.

The Settlements have always been first in the arts of peace—whether industrial, commercial or educational, also first in times of war as a haven of refuge for the countless thousands of Chinese seeking protection from the acts of their own countrymen. Foreign pretige has, and will be the sure pledge of the safety of Chinese who come here. That is why those who have resided here know that the Settlements are a good place to live in and good to invest in. The Chinese have bought up the best residential and business properties in the Settlements and they continue to buy. They are not unwelcome to do this if they come willing to co-operate with the foreigner for their mutual benefit. The foreigner, for whose residence the Settlements were originally intended, now finds himself compelled to go and live in the outlying districts.

The time has now come for the Chinese to give a quid pro quo and the proper authorities should ask for and obtain it. For every good reason, Shanghai should become Greater Shanghai, with the Settlements as their nucleus.

(a) The Settlements should be made to include the outside districts in which foreigners now reside (such as the "Rubicon District" and the Hongkew Park District)

(b) The formation of a Special Administrative District around the extended Shanghai Settlements to include Woosung, Paoshan, Chapei, Zikawei, Lunghua and the Native City, to be under a Chinese Municipal Council (composed of commercial and educational elements only) with a foreign Advisory body attached.

The presence of foreigners at the deliberations of the Chinese Municipal Council will ensure smooth co-operation between the Foreign Municipal Councils and the Chinese Municipal Council on matters which concern their common interests.

(c) The formation of a demilitarized zone around Greater Shanghai in which no forces, whether military or naval, of the Chinese nation or of the provincial governments may be stationed. This would put Shanghai on about the same footing as Tientsin.

The police of the Shanghai Municipal Councils will continue as at present, with or without an Advisory Chinese Committee, the compliment to be returned in the case of the Special Administrative District in order to ensure uniformity of administrative measures. The demilitarized zone will mean that Shanghai will be spared the anxieties and horrors of any future "war" which may happen between jealous provincial governors; that Shanghai will be left in peace to continue her development, which can only be for the good of the Chinese themselves.

Apologizing for the length of this letter, which please publish if you think fit,

QUEEN VICTORIA AND SOME OTHERS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Mr. Gargi Devi in a letter under this caption has been good enough to bring in my name, censuring me for my antagonism to democracy.

I had the honour to be in the Honourable Artillery Company and to be reviewed by the late Queen Victoria at a special Birthday Parade at Windsor when detachments from "all my loyal Trained Bands of my City of London" were requested to send contingents. This was I think Jubilee year, 1887.

Since then I have had personal talks with the late King Edward (he was at one time Colonel-in-Chief of the H. A. C.) I have shaken hands and been personally spoken to (on account of my decorations) by King George before proceeding to France. Have shaken hands with and had converse with the Prince of Wales who recognized my "Boxer Rising" ribbon. Trivial perhaps but to me an honour! Now all this is merely to illustrate that I am more inclined to the old order than to Modern Democracy. Also I am a descendant through my mother of the Lairds of the Isle of Syke and as such have the instinct for Royalty as opposed to Demos.

Mr. Gargi Devi, I question your right to censure me or anybody else on expressing a matter of opinion re the Government of Great Britain or any other country. That Government or its representative might have such right but an anonymous Gargi Devi—never.

Now let me be generous and explain that according to the best English Dictionaries one meaning given for the word "coolie" is—"A European's name for a hired native labourer (used principally in India and China but also in other parts of the world). (Derivation Tamil Kuli—to hire).

Seeing that our legislators in office and in Parliament are now "paid" that is "hired" for a consideration to run the Government of the country, the Government of Great Britain is now "Kuli" "paid" or "hired." "Coolie" the modern translation of the Tamil word "Kuli."

In the days of Palmerston, Disraeli, Gladstone, Salisbury, etc., the term could not be applied for though Ministers have always been paid for offices held and managed by them, their Parliamentary duties have, until Labour Government became prominent, not only been free to the Country but expensive to themselves. They therefore were not giving "Kuli" or paid service to their Country. To-day I understand all M. P.'s are paid and therefore they are not free individuals but paid servants—of the King, No!—of the People? of Political Parties? perhaps;—of the British Empire,—No!

Once again, Mr. Gargi Devi, you state that "a labourer is not a coolie."

Again I turn up my dictionary and I find that Labourer "is one who labours: one who does work requiring little skill." This seems to me about the same qualification as that of the coolie (or Kuli).

The Labour Government appeals to the workers unskilled as well as skilled and many members who have at one time or another represented Labour in Parliament have belonged to the unskilled workers class. John Burns was a rough man but he was an engineer or at least an artificer. Will Crookes was rough, but I never heard of his having any skilled training. Landsbury, I do not know, professional agitator is my impression, as also was Tom Mann.

This does not matter, but, Mr. Gargi Devi, I do not see on what grounds you can accuse me of insolence in classifying such men as these or even numbers of men of similar origin in the present Parliament who are working for "hire" as being coolie or Kuli (paid) legislators on the national pay roll.

The Parliamentarian is just as much a paid labourer or Kuli as the Chinese who sweeps out your office. His grade alone is different. And is it a term of contempt to be called a worker for pay?

I am, etc.,

A. L. HALL.

Shanghi, Aug. 29, 1924.

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Mr. Hall has not cleared himself from censure by his long letter of to-day. His arguments do not show that he was right in using the word "coolie" in connexion with so vital a question as government. I maintain he is wrong and though he may be an out-and-out "royalist" and a "lover of the old order" there is no reason for him to call the Party he opposes by such a term. I am not a believer in Democracy yet would not on any condition run-down a democratic government. The majority of mankind is not ready for Democracy. The ordinary man of the street does not know what to vote for, nor really cares what Party is in power so long as that Party leaves him alone and makes life happier.

It is all very well to give dictionary meanings, but, Mr. Hall to speak frankly, I don't believe you used that word in its proper meaning, you used it and intended it to be taken as a term of depreciation and would never have applied it to any other Party, paid or not. In the East this word applied to any but the most menial worker is regarded as an insult—even though it should not be so if Mr. Hall's dictionary interpretation is correct. I wonder what the gentleman would say if he found himself classed as a "coolie" in the "Hong List," that is if he is a paid or hired worker. His language would be far from pleasant and perhaps he would sue for libel. Call any Chinese workman a "coolie" and he may not say anything but sullen looks and bad work would be the result.

Mr. Hall tries to defend himself by quibbling with words and seeks shelter under dictionaries and other books of reference, but his efforts are far from being successful. Many words have good wholesome meanings but used in certain ways they become insults. Mr. Hall would not dare to use this expression in England, and in spite of all his decorations would be thoroughly "ragged" if he dared to speak of the Government in these terms to any self-respecting British subject.

I am, etc.,

GARGI DEVI.

KUANGTUNG FLOOD RELIEF

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—It will ever be a source of gratification to the public that about $200,000 have been raised by the charitable co-operation of the various public organizations and $50,000 granted by the Hongkong Government in aid of the relief of the wide-spreading flood in Kuangtung, but in my humble opinion much remains to be done.

As the flood is of one month's duration and worse than that of 1905, many dykes have been swept away and the distressed from it are too numerous to count. What is worse still, it is said according to a traveller from Shiuhing that, owing to the heavy continuous downpours of rain within the past few days, there has been a relapse into flood and the water is five or six feet deeper than on the 1st or 2nd instant; that if the destroyed dykes should not be repaired in time, there would be no hope of reaping a harvest in autumn; and that although some of the dykes have not been broken down, the sea-water has gained so much on land and the rain-water has become so stagnant, that the sluices cannot give vent to the pent-up water and seeds cannot consequently be sown. From this, it is evident that, if the dykes should not be re-constructed and the courses of the rivers not cleared, the people in the devastated area would certainly have nothing for their subsistence; and, if ever they should, when pressed by hunger and cold, become lawless bandits, the consequences are too terrible to imagine.

In the interests of the welfare of Kuangtung as well as the future of the commerce carried on by the friendly nations, I, the undersigned take the liberty to ask you, Sir, to make an appeal to the Diplomatic Corps at Peking for the appropriation of that portion of Customs surplus due to Kuangtung to the relief of the flood by having the ruined dykes reconstructed and the courses of the rivers in flood cleared. Should apprehension be felt for the would-be seizure made by the militarists in our country of the said sum of money when delivered, or for any other embezzlement, I beg leave to propose that control should be exercised over its expenditure by a committee consisting of representatives appointed by the Diplomatic Corps and of those elected by the Hongkong Chinese Chamber of Commerce and by the various district associations.

The reason why I make this appeal to you is that there is no better way in which the said surplus could be used than to devote it to the welfare of Kuangtung, for, since it is the share of the province, it should be used in the right way in its (the province's) own matters of public interest. For the present what should be the right use but in the reconstruction of the broken dykes and in the clearance of the courses of the rivers in flood?

Thinking that you will sympathize with this suggestion and hoping that publicity will be given to these statements in your columns,

I am, etc.,

WONG KAM CHI.

Chairman, Wui-ning Association.

HIGH SPEED EXPOSURES

To The Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Your correspondent "An Ambitious Beginner" would appear to imply that he fears under-exposure in the case of his plates exposed at 1/250th of a second, though he does not give sufficient data as regards light, stop used, kind of plates used, nature of subject, etc., etc., to enable an opinion to be formed as to whether or not his plates are under-exposed.

In any case. If I may be permitted to say so, your correspondent is labouring under the delusion that development can materially help in correcting wrong exposure. This fallacy has been exposed in recent years and it has been shown fairly conclusively that, given a certain developer of certain strength at a certain temperature, the same time of development will be best for all exposures—correct, under and over. Varying the time of development will only have the effect of changing the character of the negative, i.e., making it harder or softer.

As regards fog this can be ignored as far as development is concerned. Modern plates are so perfect that development will cause fog only when forced in a hopeless attempt to develop out a latent image which is non-existent or when the developer contains an enormously disproportionate amount of alkali (accelerator) without an adequate amount of restrainer (bromide). With the time and temperature method mentioned below the only fog your correspondent has to fear is that caused by light getting to the plate before or during development.

As regards the developer to use all are good but I would strongly recommend your correspondent to give Rodinal a trial. It is one of the easiest to use, gives beautiful clean negatives of excellent printing quality and is very handy, merely requiring to be mixed with water. Let him keep solutions at a uniform temperature of 65° F. and work with a solution of one part Rodinal to 50 parts of water. Time of development will vary with the different brands of plates, the faster the plate (as a general rule) the longer the development necessary. He might begin with 20 minutes at the temperature named. If his negatives are found to be too thin for his purpose he has only to increase time of immersion or use a stronger solution, decreasing time of immersion or using a weaker solution if too hard. To avoid all possibility of light fog I would strongly recommend him to carry out development in complete darkness and not bring them out to the light until they have been at least 10 minutes in an acid fixing bath.

If "An Ambitious Beginner" cares to communicate with me through you I shall be delighted to give him all the assistance in my power.

GRAMMAR TRAPS

To The Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Your issue of the 27th instant states under "Lawn Tennis" telegrams . . . . . "a feature of the first round was Kelleher's defeat to-day of Norman Brookes 0-6, 9-7, 6-2, 6-2." The "Peking & Tientsin Times" of the same date states "Norman Brookes Again" . . . . . "a feature of the first round was Kelleher's defeat by Norman Brookes 0-6, 9-7, 6-2, 6-2."

Which is literally and grammatically correct? The only difference is a preposition. Those of us who have followed Norman Brookes' career for years would like to know.

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—There are many here who would do well to remember the little story of the drowning Welshman. To a crowd of potential rescuers on the river bank he called pitifully, "I will drown! nobody shall save me!" To a racial inability to use two small words aright this unfortunate man owed his untimely demise. The probabilities are that many of your correspondents in similar circumstances would come to the same sad end for "will" and "shall," "should" and "would" are often used indiscriminately, and without any sense of shades of meaning, by many local scribes, Neither is the confusion peculiar to the careless speech of the man in the street; indeed the daily paper journalist is one of the worst and most persistent offenders. "If the present trouble lasts much longer," wrote a leader-writer in one of the dailies a little while ago, "we will have an unprecedented amount of unemployment" He was determined to have that unemployment at all costs.

We are appallingly loose and haphazard in our use of words and phrases, and colloquial English certainly embraces some curiosities of phraseology, but have we any other to match the utter lunacy of the admonitory "Now then!"? Past, present and future foolishly tossed in a blanket, eternity compressed into tabloid form and shot at the head of an unfortunate interlocutor as a warning, could anything be more utterly insane? Yet who among us has not done it?

THE TOO RAPID PACE

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In reply to "Bachelor Girl of 20's" letter. All men, or at least all normal men, probably quite unknowingly, look at the rapid life question from a very natural point of view. My assertion that C. T. drinking and smoking to excess by young women leads to loss of looks and physique, and occasionally virtue, "B. G. of 20" does not deny. And whilst I agree with her that some men may, in a passing spasm, pander to and humour this type, I maintain that the genuine, normal man, looks for something far superior—for decency, looks and physique and above all womanliness in his future bride. The life many of our young women lead stifles all these wonderful gifts of nature—hence my prediction of the "shelf" and all its attendant miseries for those who defy her.

A BRITISH BACHELOR OF 32.

Shanghai, Aug. 27, 1924.

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Inability to mind one's own business—vide "Bachelor Girl's" letter in yesterday's "North-China"—is a failing peculiar to all mankind and mine was accentuated by my fruitless attempts to find a spouse among my Bachelor girl friends. For to be quite candid Sir, I was, several weeks ago, strongly on the matrimonial market. Being one quarter Scotch I took the precaution to sum up in a cool, calm and calculating manner the qualities a man would under the circumstances expect them to possess. And then came the shock.

The majority sadly lacked all that makes a woman womanly and sympathetic and lovable. They drank C. T.'s and smoked and were to a lesser, though certainly noticeable extent, vamps. Wherefore, I decided to take no risks and am still a

BRITISH BACHELOR (NOT GAY) OF 32

Shanghai, Aug. 30, 1924.

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Reading the correspondence under the above heading, I should like to make known to the British Bachelor (not gay) of 32, that there are still some decent and respectable girls in the heart of gay Shanghai, a class to which I am proud to say that I belong. They are:—

Girls never seen out alone with a man till the small hours of the morning, but girls that are always chaperoned no matter who the man may be, in spite of the low whispers of "Oh, how prehistoric?" When such a remark is passed the girl knows whom she is dealing with for any decent and respectable man never objects to a chaperone, whether it be the girl's father, mother, married sister, brother, or family friends. Neither does any decent and respectable girl go out unchaperoned, a thing unfortunately done by most girls in Shanghai.

Then the decent and respectable girl does not pour down one cocktail after the other, neither does she puff away at a cigarette, which is so dangerous to the health, and of course her pretty fingers are soiled by the nicotine. Her breath is only that of a smoker, when a woman's mouth should smell of roses. She in all sense is a man's pal or a good sport for she can keep him company in all his doings and therefore her dignity is lost.

Women now-a-days try to imitate men, and therefore much disegard is shown women, and unfortunately the good, sympathetic and lovable girls are included in the lot until a man finds out that she is the decent and respectable girl spoken about; then if he is of her nature and disposition he admires and loves her, or else he turns on his heel to find his girl pal or his good sport till he intends seriously to marry. Then good-bye to the girl pal and good sport, and hurrah for the decent and respectable good girl, for that's the only Woman in the world that he thinks a lot of, for he then chooses her for his wife to settle down in Life with.

Thanking you, dear Sir, for your very valuable space.

ONE OF THE BACHELOR GIRLS THE BRITISH BACHELOR (NOT GAY) OF 32, HAS NOT YET FOUND IN SHANGHAI.

Shanghai, Sept. 1, 1924.

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—May I congratulate you on the far-reaching, undreamed of importance of your correspondence column? To-day's panegyric of "One of the Bachelors, etc., is a very appropriate suggestion, hint and counsel to the "British Bachelor (not gay) of 32", and, if followed and acted upon, it is you, dear Mr. Editor, and your valuable paper that will have had the merit to have made known to each other two bachelor souls, and,—who knows? to have largely contributed to make them happy hereafter. Think for a moment of the cruel distress of two good specimens of solid and unbiassed morals, in the quest of surrender to each other's respectable charms, and not able, in the darkness of this town of evil-doers, to locate, or simply to signal to one another. He, the British, Bachelor, (or mainly Scotch?) of 32, rightly indignant at the light ways of the girls of this century; and she, the bachelor maid who "never goes out unchaperoned" and is the embodiment of all the requisites that go toward the making of the wife befitting only the said British Bachelor of 32.

And then came the "North-China Daily News" to rend the darkness, and to make the light.

Will you not, dear Mr. Editor. let your faithful readers have a glimpse of the blissful encountering of the two reunited souls, as without doubt, you will be graciously invited to take part in the rejoicing.

The epistolary effusions of your two bachelor correspondents would make one laugh to tears; if there were not such a pathetic sincerity beneath them.

SUNDAY OBSERVANCE

To The Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—The letter of Mr. Archdeacon W. S. Moule published in your to-day's issue annent Sunday observance calls for a reply. The following statement made by him cannot pass unchallenged:—

"It is, in short, the will and appointment of God that we should observe one day in seven, before Christ the seventh day, since Christ the first day of the week. That is our assertion and belief."

The attempt to make black white and white black has gone far enough. Prof. Fisher of Yale, in his history of Christianity, says, "I have searched the entire New Testament and fail to find any reference to the first day of the week as a holy day, save in Revelations, where it is referred to as the Lord's Day—a day of thanksgiving commemorating the resurrection of Christ. It was first observed by the early Jew Christians. It has only been adopted as a concession to sun-worshippers."

Archdeacon Moule should ponder well over this and realize that he has a weak case to defend. The change of the seventh day Sabbath is positively a violation of one of the Ten Commandments and is regarded as such by the Seventh-Day Baptists who observe the traditional Sabbath in accordance with the the Word of God: "Six days shalt thou labour and on the seventh (not on the first) thou shalt rest." Jesus kept the seventh day and made it clear that He did not come to violate or change the Law but to fulfil it.

A WAR FOR THE TRAMS

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I really think you are a bit too hard on the Tramway Company and I felt impelled to rush into print on reading the tit-bits under "And yet again, the Trams" in Thursday's paper.

Take the case you mention where a passenger glaringly contravenes the Police Regulations, and also holds up a tramcar at two stopping places.

The Police are appealed to and "smiled broadly" and allowed "the ex-passenger to travel on the footboard on the outside of the locked gate."

What do you suggest that the conductor should have done?

Instead of slating the Tramway Company so much, I think, Sir, it would be better if you thought out a way of remedying matters. The Tramway officials lay themselves open to prosecution if they use force, and a good deal of force is sometimes necessary.

You admit that an inspector was held guilty when he ejected a man from a car for disobeying rules, yet you appear to think that it is perfectly simple for conductors or inspectors to prevent breaches of rules.

What do you think of making the Tramway officials Special Constables whilst on duty in the interest of the Company? This would of course not be necessary if the police had instructions to help the Company in enforcing the Regulations, which would be the case in any other city in the world.

In conclusion I ask you to answer my question, What should the conductor have done to prevent the expassenger from riding on the footboard outside of the locked gate, when the police refused help?

I am, etc.,

A. SHAREH OLDER.

Shanghai, Aug. 29, 1924.

P.S. On reading your article over again it is palpable to me that the writer was feeling very peeved. Allow me to suggest that the purchase of a few Tram shares might cure this. I also note that you say "Could anything be more absurd" when the Company, after one of its inspectors has been found guilty for ejecting a passenger, doubts its ability to enforce the rules. Now please Sir answer my question, which is twice repeated so that you may not miss it.

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In one of your periodical attacks on our trams, in yesterday's editorial, you use several two-edged arguments. Your first is that it would be interesting to publish a list of tramway prosecutions side by side with a list of prosecutions of mafoos, chauffeurs, etc.—implying, I suppose, that the Tramway Co. is let off lightly. If this be the case why not attack the Municipal Council or the Police? Why always the Tramway Co.? It looks like a case of "My Council right or wrong."

And there is a difference between the prosecution of a mafoo—not for overcrowding but for cruelty to animals, and the Tramway Co. for overcrowding only.

Your idea that not one city in a hundred allows its Tramway Co. to carry passengers in excess of the stated number is a peculiarly imaginative one. In Glasgow, Hull and Portsmouth I can say that no regard whatever is paid to the stated number. People are simply packed in. And what of the London tubes? It is no uncommon sight to see an uncontrolled mass of people literally fighting for a place on a car, and the conductor keeping the gates open until the car is jammed full. In Montreal likewise, both the aisles and the rear platform are packed with people during the busy hours.

You say, "How is an identical rule enforced without any bother in other places?" Where it is enforced it is no doubt because the conductors are foreigners, not Chinese. No rules or regulations can endow a Chinese with authority of this nature; it is a fact only too well known to those who have to employ Chinese that they would often rather lose their job than accept responsibility. And you further remark, "Must we have policemen stationed shoulder to shoulder along the entire route, or a policeman on duty on every car?" It would seem by your article that either you must or the Tramway Co. must, for you suggest no other alternative.

I have no interest, financially, in the trams, but occasionally ride in them, and would rather put up with rush-hour overcrowding than wait for the next. With their present slow speed and frequent stops it hardly seems possible to cram more trams on the rails. The solution would appear to lie in the abolition of about half the stops (in no Western country are they so frequent) for more cars.

THE DEVIL'S ADVOCATE.

Shanghai, Sept. 2, 1924.

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In to-day's issue, writing about the trams and the overcrowding in them in Shanghai, a correspondent signing as "The Devil's Advocate" says—"In Glasgow, Hull and Portsmouth I can say that no regard whatever is paid to the stated number, people are simply packed in." This is not correct for Glasgow. Last winter I lived for several months in Glasgow. I used the trams almost daily going on several different routes. Overcrowding is not permitted. Often at a stopping-place I have been one of a disappointed crowd told—No room! And the crowd does not question that, it waits its turn for the next tram. Any attempt to rush it simply means that the tram does not start till the extras get out. Many a time I have seen men get on while the tram was in motion, just starting perhaps and made to get off at the nearest stop. I have seen a gentleman giving up his seat to a lady who got on while the conductor was on top, made to get off because to the conductor's eye he was the extra, and not the lady who had got on when the car was full. I remember once a man got on a tram last of a crowd. He was told to get off and was just about to step down. I was leaving at the next stop about a hundred yards on. It was a quiet street and the conductor allowed him to stay on. But if I had not mentioned my leaving soon the newcomer would have had to go.

There was seldom need to get police help to control the crowd, even at the business rush hours. They are a patient folk in Glasgow and they know that trams may be full but may not be over-crowded, and the next tram will be along soon.

THE VOLUNTEER CORPS

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Being a resident of only short standing, I am diffident in writing upon the above subject.

I offered myself to the Machine Gun Company, but was told, I must say with great courtesy, that only Britishers were wanted, I being a Hollander.

Next I saw the Headquarters Staff and they suggested the Maritime Company. This suggestion appears to be rather absurd after my explanation that I have served in our Artillery Section and have discharge papers.

In any case, why is it that the Maritime Company can take non-British? Is it that this Company is beneath the grade of the others, or is it that my nationality is not fit for rubbing shoulders with Britishers???

I am still keen, (though the keenness is chafed) on giving my voluntary services, but certainly I do not want charity.

Do the Council want a Volunteer Corps or are they trying to make it all British?

In any event I have done my best and can still hold my head up amongst my fellows and subscribe myself,

Respectfully yours,

VAN DER EYDEN.

Shanghai, August 31, 1924.

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Your correspondent Mr. Van der Eyden asks "Do the Council want a Volunteer Corps or are they trying to make it all British?" Mr. Eyden provides the answer to this in his remark that he is a resident of only short standing; if he were of longer standing he would know that the Council has very little to say on the subject, and that it takes what offers in the way of volunteer units.

A reference to the Hong List shows that there are 15 active units in the Corps, made up, I believe, as follows:—

Mixed		5
British		3
National Units:—
American	2
Italian	1
Portuguese	1
Japanese	1
Chinese	1
		15

The 3 British units, it must be remembered, include British Islanders, Canadians, Australians, South Africans, etc., and in proportion to other national units are probably neither stronger nor weaker.

The war, which passed Holland over, is mainly responsible for the national colour of S.V.C. units. If fifty or a hundred Welshmen, Dutchmen or Norsemen get together and offer themselves to the Council as a unit they will, it is nearly certain, be accepted; and it would ill become a Scotchman to write to the paper because he was courteously told that he was unacceptable to a Dutch unit. It may also be remarked that certain units have a strength which they must not exceed and are possibly full up.

I am, etc.,

SILURIAN.

Shanghai, Sept. 4, 1924.

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—The letter published to-day by Mr. Van Der Eyden opens up a controversy, or perhaps a discussion rather, which has been going on for years, namely in which corps should Dutch, Swiss, Danes, Swedes and Norwegians serve as Volunteers.

Any volunteer has naturally the feeling that when he offers his services they should be readily accepted and not subject to half hearted admissions or rejections.

I have been sufficiently long in the Far East to have learned that our British friends out here are most congenial fellows and splendid sports, and there is nothing but appreciation of a good man whatever is his nationality.

Unfortunately there is "olo custom" also in the Volunteer Corps and this "olo custom" is the cause, not our British friends of to-day, of making us Scandinavians, Dutch and Swiss rather sore, because we are debarred from joining the units where our British friends are serving.

We have from time to time discussed the possibility of forming a Scandinavian Unit. The Dutch and the Swiss have perhaps done the same, but nothing has so far come thereof.

If it shou'd not be desirable for the Council to change the present ruling of the Shanghai Volunteer Corps it may perhaps be possible to establish a joint Scandinavian, Dutch and Swiss Volunteer Unit, but I must admit that personally I should much rather see the different Nationals stand shoulder to shoulder in an International Unit than to have these same Nationals split up into different units. After all is said we are living as world citizens in an International Settlement and we could do more to create goodwill and good fellowship among the different Nationals by coming more closely in contact, than by fostering nationalistic ideas in a community so splendidly cosmopolitan.

I am, etc.,

THE CHIEN SOCIETY OF CHINA

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—The "Chien" Society of China, as the name indicates, has the sole purpose of creating a New China on the "constructive" side not the destructive. This new society was organized mainly by a group of Chinese students in Seattle, Washington, U. S. A. on October 10, 1923, whose duty it is, as we vehemently believe it ought to be, to cultivate, stabilize, and maintain that union of spirit which has so long and so happily subsisted between China and the United States of America, and which we hope to be the seed of the world peace.

It is in response to this important inspiration that we, a group of Chinese students in Shanghai, have founded the Shanghai Branch for carrying out our ideas into effect. A meeting was held on August 29 in the Far Eastern Commercial College and the following gentlemen were elected as officers of the Shanghai Branch for 1924-1925:

President, Mr. Tuan-moh Kei of the Soochow Law School

English Secretary, Mr. Sung Hyau Kwaung of the St. John's University

Treasurer, Mr. Chang Tin Haw of the Fuh Tan University

Manager, Mr. Zung Zung Ying of the Fuh Tan University

I beg to inform the public that, hereafter, any matter concerning the Chien Society of China, especially that which deals with the future of the "Chinese Art and Industrial Exhibition," which will take place next January, 1925, in the New Olympic Hotel of Seattle, may be communicated with the Shanghai Branch which has its office at present in the Far Eastern Commercial College, Weihaiwei Road, Shanghai.

I sincerely request you to publish this account in your correspondence column with the hope that the public may be thus acquainted with our Society and that all constructive and good advice may be henceforth received.

Thanking you in advance for your valuable space,

I am, etc.

SUNG HYAU KWAUNG.

LAW REPORTS

RETURNING FROM DEPORTATION

Indian Who Was Suspected of Sedition During the War

Mit Singh, the Indian against whom the British Magistrate recently made an order for deportation, appeared before his Honour Judge Grain in the Supreme Court on Wednesday and, on the application of Mr. A. G. Mossop, acting Crown Advocate, the Magistrate's order was confirmed. The Indian was deported in 1916, having been caught in a gambling raid and then found to be interested in sedition, and he now said that he returned because others who were deported had come back to Shanghai.

Mr. Mossop said that two men had returned, but they had been sent away under martial law and had the authorities' permission to come back. The present man's case was different, he having been deported under the new Order in Council, article 83, sub-article 11, and could not return without permission from the British Government. It was possible that other cases under this article would come before the court.

Mit Singh told the court that he did not want to go back to his native village in the Punjaub; he preferred to stay in Shanghai, but his Honour ruled otherwise and ordered that he be sent home on the first available ship.

CHINESE PRESS AND SUB-INSP. DUNNE

Publication of Untruthful Statements: Journalists' Responsibilities

Six Chinese newspaper men appeared before Mr. Whitamore (British Assessor) and Magistrate Loh, at the Mixed Court on Saturday, charged with having published libellous statements against Sub-Inspector T. Dunne in connexion with the Louza coolie case. The statement alleged that the Inspector had behaved in a cruel and barbarous manner, and had beaten the coolie to death, whereas investigation showed the death of the coolie was due to disease and not to a blow. The defendants were:—

Zung Pao-lai and Lee Tsung-woo, "Shanghai Journal of Commerce," Hsu Chien-ping (alias Jabin Hsu), and Sun Tsoong-woo "Shanghai Tribune," and Dih Tsoo-tshing and Chen Lang-hyosh, "Eastern Times."

Mr. E. T. Maitland, Police Prosecutor, conducted the prosecution, and defendants were represented by Mr. A. M. Preston, Mr. H. D. Rodger, Mr. A. Covey and M. Premet. Mr. Reader Harris watched the case on behalf of Police-Sgt. Dunne.

Mr. Arthur Covey, appearing for the relatives of the deceased coolie, informed the court that on the previous day he made application to the Magistrate of the British Court for the issue of a warrant for the arrest of Sgt. Dunne upon a charge of doing grievous bodily harm, the relatives being the complainants. That application was sub-judice, and points were raised which might call for the higher Court's decision. In the circumstances, he asked that all cases then before the Court be adjourned until the British Court had given its decision as to whether further charges against Dunne could be proceeded with or not.

Mr. Maitland—You have no right to be here, the family having nothing to do with this prosecution, which is one by the Police.

The Assessor said the Court would proceed with the case, reserving its decision if they thought it likely to affect a judgment elsewhere.

Mr. Rodger then argued that the defendants were not subject to the jurisdiction of the Mixed Court. The "Eastern Times" was a French company with French money in it, and the "Journal of Commerce" was registered with the French Mixed Court, as also was the "Shanghai Tribune." The French Consular Court, in the case of the "Eastern Times," and the French Mixed Court, in the other cases, were therefore the proper tribunals to hear any charges against the defendants. The point was material to them in view of the difference between French and English law affecting the powers of the press.

Mr. Preston supported this argument, emphasizing that defendants were charged not as individuals, but as members of a newspaper staff.

Action Against Individuals.

Chief-Inspector Wheeler, acting Registrar, informed the Court that since the last hearing of this case civil suit had been filed by Inspector Dunne against all the defendants, individually. An officer sent to the French Consulate to get the summonses counter-signed was informed that only one of the newspapers, the "Eastern Times," was registered at that Consulate. The summonses against these two defendants, therefore, were held for consideration, and on the following day were returned with counter-signature. The other defendants were served, the French Consulate not claiming jurisdiction in their cases. "Later," continued Inspector Wheeler, "I received a letter from the French Consul informing me that the "Eastern Times" was a French commercial enterprise, and I replied that the action was not against the company, but against individuals."

Asked what he meant by saying the other papers were "registered" at the French Mixed Court, Mr. Rodger said they had the "chop" of the French Mixed Court put on.

The Assessor—What is the effect of that?

Mr. Rodger—They accept jurisdiction over these companies.

Mr. Maitland pointed out that defendants were, individually, being summoned as newspaper managers and editors responsible for what they published, and they were all Chinese and not registered at any other Consulate.

The Court decided to take jurisdiction, and the hearing was proceeded with.

Case for the Prosecution.

In opening the case for the prosecution, Mr. Maitland gave an account of the circumstances which led to the prosecution of Sub-Inspector Dunne on a charge of manslaughter, subsequently dismissed, and quoted the offending newspaper articles published while the matter was sub judice. Under the heading "Foreign Police assaults Chinese servant to death," the "Shanghai Journal of Commerce," in its issue of August 15, said that the officer's action was "barbarous, outrageous and inhuman," that the nature of the case was more serious than that of Loh Tse-wha, and that after reading the account of it, all persons would become so angry "that their hairs will stand on end." The writer proceeded: "If the foreign policeman lost his temper he could have inflicted some slight punishment, but there was no reason for him to kick the coolie to death. After kicking the coolie in the buttocks, he assaulted and stamped his feet upon the back and chest of the coolie as the latter was crawling away. This shows that the foreign policeman treated Yieh Chien-tsang as if he had been an ox, a horse, a chicken or a dog. It might be alleged that the foreign policeman looks upon Chinese as an inferior class of people whom he could treat with contempt without fear. Alas! if the people can bear up with this, what else will they not be able to tolerate?" Mr. Maitland suggested that the object of this criticism was not only to libel the Inspector, but to create anti-foreign feeling in the Settlement. He went on to say that the "Shanghai Tribune" had an article written on very similar lines, but the "Eastern Times" was not quite so violent and had not the same anti-foreign strain. In conclusion, Mr. Maitland characterized the articles as the most gross and scurrilous libels ever produced.

Translations of the three articles, a verbatim report of the proceedings in H. M. Police Court (when the charge against Inspector Dunne was withdrawn), and a copy of the Mixed Court inquest proceedings were then sworn to by Inspector Sullivan, Mr. H. L. Pearce, and Chief-Inspector Wheeler, acting Registrar.

This completed the evidence for the prosecution, and Mr. Rodger at once asked that the defendants be dismissed, saying that there was no evidence that they wrote the articles or circulated them.

The Assessor—We have evidence that defendants are editors or publishers of the newspapers containing the matter complained of, and an editor is responsible for what appears in his paper.

Mr. Rodger—Is a managing director responsible?

The Assessor—Yes.

Mr. Rodger—Supposing a libellous article appeared in the "North-China Daily News," could the managing director be brought up for criminal libel?

The Assessor—Most emphatically.

Mr. Preston asked that the charge against the "Eastern Times" representatives be dismissed, pointing out that while the statements contained in the article were now found to be untrue, they appeared to be true at the time the report was written, and it was upon them that a charge of manslaughter was made.

The Assessor—The statement says that the Inspector beat the coolie to death. That he did not do.

Mr. Preston—We know that now. But at the time he was charged everybody thought he had done so.

The Assessor—Surely it is the duty of a newspaper editor to ascertain the accuracy or otherwise of statements before they are published.

Mr. Preston—Newspapers would be greatly reduced in size if they did that.

Evidence for the Defence.

For the defence, a reporter of the South Eastern News Agency was called and stated that in order to find out the exact truth of the case he went to the Ningpo Guild, of which he was a member, and saw the brother of the deceased coolie who was reporting the matter to the Executive Committee of the Guild. It was upon this man's statement that the report issued was based.

Mr. Maitland—Did you say in your report that the Inspector stamped on the coolie's back, or that the coolie crawled away groaning?

Witness—No. The report added that he did not take the trouble to attend the inquest or the British Court proceedings.

The Assessor—Is all the information published by your agency as malicious and full of lies as this?

Witness—We always state the source from which all news issued is obtained.

A brother of the deceased coolie gave evidence that the story he told to the Ningpo Guild Committee was the story told to him by the deceased, and was without addition or falsehoods.

Dih Tsoo-tshing, managing director of the "Eastern Times" said he had nothing to do with writing the article, which was the work of the editor in charge of local news. No steps had been taken to rectify the libel, or to express regret, said witness in cross-examination, but it was reported that the doctors had made an examination and that the charge had been withdrawn.

Cheng Lang-hyoeh, editor in chief of the "Eastern Times," said that he only wrote editorials and had no supervision over news. He never saw the article in question before it appeared.

Hsu Chien-ping, late manager of the "Shanghai Tribune," said their article was written by the local news editor. He himself had nothing to do with it and did not see it before publication.

Asked if the article headed "Obstacles to Sino-Foreign Friendship" was inflammatory, witness said it might be or might not. Had it been his own work, he would not have written in the same strain. The writer had written too strongly.

The other defendants all gave evidence disclaiming personal responsibility, and their evidence having been concluded, the hearing was adjourned.

BOARDING HOUSE SCENE

Foreign Guest's Alleged Assault Upon Proprietor: Trouble over "Lady Friend"

P. A. Russell was summoned at H.M. Police Court last Friday, before Mr. G. W. King, for an assault upon Kao Yung-mow at 1434 North Szechuen Road.

Complainant, who said he kept a boarding house, told the court that on Monday evening defendant asked him to inform a Chinese lady friend that he was earning $450, but witness refused. Defendant thereupon made an uncomplimentary remark and hit him in the eye. First of all he threatened to kill witness, and when he heard that two Chinese were coming to court on witness's behalf he said he would kill them also. They were scared, and would not attend.

Defendant, who said he had resided at complainant's house and was still living there, informed the court that the trouble arose through a lady who called to see him. Kao made a nasty remark about her and, upon this being resented, he pushed his fist in witness's face. "I pushed him away," defendant continued, "and immediately a Japanese woman and six Chinese jumped on me. I let go in self-defence and I believe Kao was the first one to get it. The woman then got her arm round my neck, and one of the men caught hold of my legs, the seven of them pummelling me on the ground." Defendant added that he had lived in Shanghai since 1906 without having any trouble at all. He gave complainant's house an extremely bad character, but said that, being broke, he had been compelled to live there.

The Magistrate dismissed the case, saying it was one man's word as against another's and complainant had not fully proved his case.

SHANGHAI TRAM CO. PROSECUTED

Charge of Overcrowding Dismissed: Difficulty in Counting Passengers

The Shanghai Electric Construction Co., Ld., were summoned at H. M. Police Court on Tuesday, before Mr. G. W. King, for carrying a greater number of passengers than the number authorized, on car B48 at 11.5 a.m. on the 21st. ultimo.

Mr. E. T. Maitland appeared for the prosecution and Mr. H. Lipson Ward for the company.

Sub.-Inspr. Milne gave evidence that when the tramcar arrived at the Nanking Road-Szechuen Road stopping place he saw it was overcrowded. There were two foreigners on the front platform, and in the first-class compartment there were 47 passengers, foreign and Chinese, while in the 3rd class section there were 21 passengers, and seven Chinese standing on the rear platform, making a total of 77. There was a printed notice exhibited in the car giving the authorized number of passengers as 57. The trailer was not crowded.

In answer to Mr. Ward, witness said that he counted the passengers from the outside of the car just before it stopped, counting from one side and going round to the other side to check.

How did you know you did not count the same people twice?—Because I knew what I was doing.

Your instructions are to render every asistance to the Tramway Company?—I generally do.

Did you point out to the conductor that the car was over-crowded?—Those were not my instructions on that day.

Did'nt you think it was your duty, having received instructions to render assistance, to tell the conductor there were too many people on the car?—The offence had already been committed.

In answer to further questions, witness maintained that he had accurately counted the number of passengers. The entry in his note book was written with different pencils, the explanation being that he afterwards made an addition—the number of the car and the time. The figures '68' which had been scratched out referred to another case, a motor-car.

This concluded the evidence for the prosecution.

Inspr. Milne's Figures.

Questions were put by the Magistrate as to the number of passengers authorized, and by whom, his Worship observing that this ought formally to be proved, but Mr. Ward said he would not take that technical point, but would put the numbers in himself and confine the defence to a question of fact.

The Magistrate—I still want to know what the authorized number is.

Mr. Ward—We admit the figures, and I will give my friend a letter from the acting Commissioner of Police containing them.

This was done, Chief Inspr. Lynch formally proving the letter.

Mr. Ward, for the defence, said the question was whether the Police Inspector had counted accurately, and pointed out that the counting must have been done while people were standing up in the car in readiness to alight, and that the 77 must have been counted while the car travelled but two feet. On the evidence which had been called, the Magistrate ought not to convict, and after hearing the evidence for the company he thought the court would agree that an obvious mistake had been made with regard to this particular car.

Car Not Full!

Angus Mackinnon, a Traffic Inspector in the employ of the Tramway Company, gave evidence that he was on the car in question, and from Shanse Road travelled on the front platform with the conductor. At that time there were not 57 people in the car. The regulation allowed 20 people seated and 10 standing, and there were not more than 30 on the car, nor had the number increased by the time they arrived at Szechuen Road. Witness did not see a police inspector there. Had he done so he would have reported to the company.

In answer to Mr. Maitland, witness said that he did not count the number of passengers and could not say exactly how many there were.

In answer to the Magistrate, witness said the car was not overcrowded at Shanse Road, and many people got off, so that there could not have been overcrowding at Szechuen Road. It was possible that the Inspector had taken the wrong car number.

In giving his decision, the Magistrate commented upon there being a direct conflict of evidence. The Inspector had probably counted the passengers under great difficulty, but even if the number he stated was not quite exact it could be taken that there was an excess and a conviction could be entered upon that. But then there was the evidence of the Tramway Inspector who said quite clearly that the car was not overcrowded. The only possible explanation seemed to be that Inspector Milne had got the wrong number of the car. The evidence being absolutely contradictory the case must be dismissed.

UNPAID MOTOR-CAR CHITS

Charge of Obtaining Credit by Fraud from Two Garages to Go Joy Riding

A story of unpaid motor car chits was told at H. M. Police Court on Wednesday, when a young man named Trevor C. Watson appeared before Mr. G. W. King charged with having obtained $24 credit from the Taylor Garage by fraud other than false pretences. A similar charge was made by the Star Garage in respect of $27.

Mr. E. T. Maitland, prosecuting, said that defendant ordered a car from the Taylor Garage in a name which appeared to be "Phillips" and, after using it from 12.10 a.m. until about 6 a.m., signed a name like "H. Possin." This was done because the Taylor Garage had informed him he would get no more credit there. The Star Garage chit was signed "T. Wanston," 136 Szechuen Road, but defendant was not to be found there.

A chauffeur from the Taylor Garage gave evidence that he picked defendant up at the Parisien and drove him to the Del Monte and afterwards round the Rubicon, the car being occupied for six hours. There was a lady, Mrs. Watson, who left the car at Ward Road, and defendant went on to the Chapoo-Seward Road corner, where he sign-

Defendant said that his real name was Phillips.

Mr. Leach, of the Taylor Garage, said that, as the defendant had an outstanding account, he was told he would not be given credit again, and that if he tried to get it the matter would be put in the hands of the police. As soon as this charge was made, Watson offered to settle the account.

Defendant said he would be pleased to pay now if Mr. Leach would accept payment.

A chauffeur employed by the Star Garage gave evidence as to calling for defendant at a house in Route Vallon on the afternoon of August 10, driving to Range Road, where two more passengers were picked up, and then proceeding to Woosung, returning at 8 o'clock in the evening, defendant signing the chit.

Not at Home.

Mr. W. C. Henderson, secretary of China Motors, said the address given on the chit was 136 Szechuen Road, but the shroff found the place empty.

Defendant explained that his mother had lived at that address and had only just moved, and if the shroff had inquired he would have been able to get the new address.

Mr. Henderson added that the shroff was unable to find defendant either at Route Vallon or Range Road. At the first address it was said the defendant was not known, and at the second the shroff was advised to try the Great Northern Garage, and this was done, with the same result.

Mr. A. de Sheimo spoke as to his wife and himself accepting defendant's invitation to go for a ride to Woosung. Watson told them that he had two cars of his own and witness thought they were going in one of them, but he saw at once that the car was from a garage.

Defendant—I think Mr. de Sheimo is mixed up slightly. All I told him was that I formerly worked at St. George's Garage and used to drive two cars.

Witness—No. I understood very well, you said you had two cars.

Det. Sgt. Forkin gave evidence that defendant was not living at 136 Szechuen Road at the time he put that address on the chit, but his mother and sister had lived there.

Magistrate's Strong Comment.

The Magistrate—Have you any explanation? I must tell you candidly I am against you at present. You ran up this heavy chit with the Taylor Garage after you had been told you would get no more credit, and you must show me you did it honestly.

Defendant—I had no intention of getting a car from the Taylor Garage, but the man at the Parisien told me that was the only place I could get one, so I told him to get it.

The Magistrate—Do you call that honest, getting someone else to get the car for you?

Defendant said he was prepared to settle the debts in half an hour.

The Magistrate—Unless you can give me a clear explanation of these transactions I shall have to find you guilty. I will adjourn the case until 2.30 to give you a chance of considering your position.

Defendant's Further Chance.

In the afternoon, defendant repeated that he could have been found through the address he gave and that if the chits had been presented the money would have been paid, and he expressed his readiness to pay now.

The Magistrate, warning defendant about his behaviour, told him that he had been qualified for prison, but would be given another chance. He would be bound over to be of good behaviour for two years, and must be careful not to get in debt or in trouble of this sort again.

BREACH OF TRAFFIC REGULATIONS

An Incident in Chaoufoong Rd.

C. T. Parsons was summoned on Thursday before Mr. G. W. King for a breach of traffic regulations in Chaoufoong Road.

Mr. E. T. Maitland, prosecuting for the police, described the case as rather a bad one. Chaoufoong Road being under repair, only one-way traffic was allowed, and defendant was informed of this by a Chinese constable on point duty, but he deliberately pushed the chauffeur from his seat and himself drove along the road which was closed.

The Chinese constable gave evidence that, when informed that he could not proceed along Chaoufoong Road from Yuhang Road, defendant stamped his feet and insisted on going on. He then took the driver's seat and drove the car on.

Defendant admitted that he drove past the constable, but said he was aggravated because the chauffeur had three times asked the policeman the way and got no satisfactory answer.

An Eastern Garage chauffeur told the court that, finding Chaoufoong Road was "up" he tried Tsingkiepang Road and found that also was "up." He then turned into East Yuhang Road, but workmen were making up the creek there, so he had to return to the Chaoufoong Road—Yuchang Road corner. Here he asked the policeman which way he could go, to get to Broadway, and the constable said he did'nt know. Defendant then jumped from the back of the car into the driver's seat and drove on along Chaoufoong Road.

Defendant explained that he was in a hurry and did not wish to make the wide détour necessary in reaching Broadway.

The Magistrate—Is that any excuse for breaking traffic regulations? If everybody did the same, there would be chaos. There must be a fine of $10.

Mr. R. P. Melhuish was fined $2 for failing to obey a traffic signal at the corner of Nanking and Szechuen Roads.

$2,500 DAMAGES FOR MR. HUSAR

Shipping Companies Responsible for Accident in President Lincoln.

At the U. S. Court last Friday Judge M. D. Purdy awarded Mr. L G. Husar, the District Attorney, G.$2,555 damages in his suit against the U.S. Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation and the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. for injuries arising from an accident sustained on a voyage in the President Lincoln from San Francisco to Shanghai.

Mr. Husar originally claimed G.$50,000. The accident occurred on February 3, 1923. Late on the afternoon of that day while engaged with the ship's surgeon and another passenger in a game of medicine-ball on the upper deck, plaintiff threw the ball upwards against a beam or awning-spreader, causing it to be dislodged from its fastening at the ridge-pole end, whereby it fell on plaintiff's head inflicting the injuries complained of.

These were a laceration one inch above the right eye and about one and a quarter inches in length, involving the skin and superficial tissues, but not involving the bone. Plaintiff alleged that some time after the autumn of 1923, he had eye trouble and spells of dizziness. Acting upon the advice of his doctors he ultimately submitted to an operation commonly known as a lumbar puncture, and said he was relieved somewhat by that operation. Evidence was given that plaintiff had worried considerably over his condition as he knew of a case of a man whom he thought had been similarly injured and developed meningitis and died.

Dealing at some length with the question of defendants' alleged negligence, his Honour, in the course of his judgment, said that the awning-spreader was admittedly insecure, and such insecurity due, of course, to its peculiar construction, was by no means apparent to all. He held that the awning-spreader was only partially secured and was capable of being dislodged by a blow from beneath. Its insecurity could not have readily been detected even by a person of reasonably good vision. Passengers were invited to go upon this deck and indulge in the sport of tossing about a heavy medicine-ball without any warning as to the insecurity of the awning-spreader overhead.

Defendants' Plain Duty.

It was to be remembered that the awning structure presented to the casual observer an appearance of permanency and security. Plaintiff himself had often played medicine-ball under the self-same awning-spreaders, and it was practically conceded that for a long time prior to this accident, this particular deck had been resorted to by the ship's passengers for such a pastime. No one but the ship-owners and their agents knew of the manner in which these awning-spreaders were fastened. Certainly the passengers had no reason to believe that danger was to be encountered by tossing about a medicine ball, and it seemed to him (the learned Judge) that it was the plain duty of the defendants either to make these awning-spreaders perfectly secure, or to have prohibited the deck altogether for the indulgence of such sport. He, therefore, held that defendants, and each of them, were guilty of negligence.

No Contributory Negligence.

As to the question of contributory negligence raised in each of the separate answers, the only evidence which had the least bearing upon the subject was that of the doctor, who stated that plaintiff threw the ball to him. He believed plaintiff was somewhat blinded by the sun, because instead of throwing it at witness he threw it at the awning supporter, or vertically upwards. Weighing nine pounds, the force of the ball was sufficient to lift the awning support from its socket.

Of course, it was not necessary for Husar to throw the ball vertically in the air and against the awning spreader, but when it was considered that he was engaged in playing a game of ball which consisted in throwing the ball to his companions and that he was perfectly oblivious to any danger overhead, could it be said that his act in tossing the ball vertically into the air so that it came into contact with the awning-spreader, was an act of negligence on his part?

"When people are indulging in games of an athletic nature, they are not always likely to observe proper decorum and restraint, and do only those things which are absolutely necessary to be done in the pursuit of the sport in which they engaged. Much of the joy and zest of games would be greatly diminished, if not entirely lost, if one were to observe those rules of conduct which were necessary for a mere indifferent participation in the game. I find no difficulty in reaching the conclusion from the evidence in this record, that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence."

With regard to damages, in addition to the recovery of medical expenses (these amounting to G. $555 or Tls. 750) plaintiff was also entitled to recover such an amount of money as would reasonably compensate him for injuries sustained and pain and suffering endured. The Judge said he had given the expert and other evidence bearing directly on the question of damages full and fair consideration, and had reached the conclusion that G. $2,000 would fully and fairly compensate plaintiff.

Judgment would be for plaintiff for G. $2,555, with costs.

THE STEWART-CRANE RECEIVERSHIP

Mr. Bowen's Claim for Fees Vigorously Opposed by Creditors

The motion for payment of receiver's fees to the amount of Tls. 3,500 in the afairs of the Stewart-Crane Co. Inc., in liquidation, was made by Mr. W. S. Fleming in the U. S. Court on Monday morning, and was opposed by several of the creditors (represented by Mr. C. S. Franklin, Major Holcomb and Mr. Sidney Moss).

Mr. Fleming pointed out that the services rendered by the receiver, Mr. F. A. Bowen, manager of the Commercial & Credit Information Bureau, had extended over almost two years, during which time it was estimated that 66 days had been devoted to this work by Mr. Bowen; that the service was of an expert character, and that the small amount of net funds turned over by the receiver in his final report, Tls. 8,456, did not represent the labour involved.

Mr. Bowen, in reply to questions by opposing counsel, stated that this duties included certain supervisory functions, such as visiting buildings under construction, the sale of property comprising two cranes, two hoists, one truck, a concrete mixer, and the scaffolding and refuse matter left over when the "North-China Daily News" and McTyeire School buildings were completed. He denied that this property "practically sold itself."

To Mr. Franklin's question: "Did you ever file a report that was not objected to by all the creditors with the exception of the American Trading Company?" Mr. Bowen smilingly replied, "I never did anything that was not objected to by some of the creditors."

When asked how he estimated the amount of labour expended at 66 days, the witness replied that he reckoned it, "just as you lawyer's would estimate the time spent on a case." He said that he had not kept a diary or any record of the actual time expended day by day. Mr. Moss objected to the charge for stenographer's services as excessive, and Major Holcomb to the item for rent.

In answer to these objections Mr. Fleming brought out the point that under the contract any profits on the building transactions taken over by the American Trading Company for the Stewart-Crane Co. were to go to the latter firm and that the receiver had to keep very careful watch upon the accounts rendered to determine this point, that the job was a big thing any way you looked at it, and that the charge of Tls. 3,500 was reasonable.

In fixing the fee Judge Purdy commented upon the difficulty of determining proper charges, especially when the work had extended over about two years. The receiver he said claimed 66 days' work at Tls. 50 odd a day, but he could not explain to the satisfaction of the Court how he estimated that time. Undoubtedly he wrote some letters and sold some property, but when people do not keep an accurate account of what they do from day to day they are at sea in making up a bill. To charge entirely upon the results obtained was a method somewhat deprecated now in the minds of the Bar and yet it must enter into consideration.

"I am inclined to think," continued the Judge "that 66 days is a very ample time and that the amount of labour was magnified in memory. The results were 8,400 odd taels and even that would probably have come in without any very special work on the part of the receiver who carried on his own business at the same time. The Court in fixing the fees takes into consideration the amount of work done and the results obtained and considers that 5 per cent. of the amount handed over is adequate, so that the fee will be set at Tls. 422.80."

DETECTIVES' SMART ARREST

The story of a clever arrest of an alleged arms dealer was told at the Mixed Court on Wednesday, when Borxo B. Stanoyevich, claiming to be a Serbian, appeared before Mr. Jacobs and Magistrate Loh on a charge of illicitly dealing in arms.

Det.-Sgt. Tinkler stated that the accused was arrested at the Great Eastern Hotel on Tuesday at 6.15 p.m. having been led there by a subterfuge. Information was received that the accused carried on a traffic in arms. Two Chinese detectives were therefore commissioned to buy arms from the accused. A meeting was arranged to take place on Tuesday morning at 9 a.m. at a room in the Great Eastern Hotel, one detective impersonating the role of a Commander in the Kiangsu army, while the other played the part of his attendant. Detective Sergeants Tinkler and Tabrum awaited the arrival of the accused in an alcove outside, while a third Chinese detective disguised in the uniform of one of the Hotel attendants remained at the door.

The accused appeared as arranged and was made to hand in his card by the so-called Hotel attendant. He was then received by the military commander and a conference took place. The accused was, however, a little suspicious and had therefore brought no firearms with him. He argeed, however, to sell arms to his client and a little opium as well if necessary, but the latter assured him that it was arms that he needed most. The interview then broke up and it was arranged to hold a further meeting at 5 o'clock. The accused again appeared but still brought no firearms. However, he stated that he could sell 12 German pistols at $76 each and 24 French pistols at $62. This price, as pointed out by the Commander, was too dear. He was persuaded to return again and bring some samples with him. Returning at 6 p.m. a third interview took place, the accused this time producing three Mausers. The Commander attempted to question him as to where his offices were situated, but the accused told him not to mind about that. A bargain was concluded and the Kiangsu Commander paid over $100 in notes, the numbers of which were previously registered by the police. The detective who played the part of the attendant was then sent to purchase some cigarettes which was the signal agreed upon for the arrival of the other detectives upon the scene. This the accused refused to allow though he was assured that everything was quite safe and that there were no detectives about. The attendant therefore called to the Hotel attendant who gave the signal and the accused was arrested. A search made at the premises of the accused at 8 Yuhang Road revealed two pistol cleaners, but no arms were found.

The accused though he claims to be a Serbe was, according to police investigations at one time registered as an Italian subject.

M. Lemiere, who appeared for the defence, asked the Court to grant a remand and that the case should be referred to the Italian Consulate. A remand of one week was granted and notification to the Italian Consulate will be made.

ALLEGED ATTACK ON POLICE

Supposed Gun-runner Acquitted Owing to Lack of Evidence

Two Chinese who were arrested on June 26 in connexion with the attempted murder of a Chinese constable appeared before the Mixed Court on Monday.

Mr. Maitland appeared on behalf of the police and Mr. Moss for the first accused.

The alleged attack took place on June 8 at 5 a.m. when two police constables searched two ricshas, suspecting the occupants of carrying arms. The search was met by an assault in which the occupants escaped. The two accused were subsequently arrested. The first accused was formerly employed by the Commercial Express & Storage Co. His duties were to attend at the unloading of passengers' luggage as performed by that company.

A representative of the firm stated that the accused had been a good worker and had often come to his notice.

Five Chinese constable claimed to have recognized the accused, and further evidence showed that the man had left his work at 11 p.m. on the evening of the June 7 after helping to unload passenger luggage. It also appears that he had previously had a quarrel with one of the five constables who identified him.

The second accused, who had formerly been expelled from the Settlement, stated that he had visited the house of his uncle in Yuen Fong Road. He had returned that evening and had been arrested.

The charge was dismissed on the grounds of mistaken identity, the second accused receiving the usual sentence of three months for returning from expulsion.

LONDON AGREEMENT ADOPTED BY GERMAN REICHSTAG

Berlin, Aug. 28.

Late to-night, after the adjournment of the Reichstag, the Nationals and the Government parties were negotiating to find a formula to enable the former to vote for the London Agreements:—Reuter.

Berlin, Aug. 29.

The Reichstag has begun voting on the Dawes Bills and has adopted the Bank Bill by 259 votes to 172. There were two abstentions. The German Nationalists voted against the Bill.

The Reichstag also adopted the Railways Bill by 314 votes to 127, thus giving the necessary two-thirds majority. The Nationalists voted in favour of the Bill.

Later.

The Reichstag to-day adopted the London Pact by 314 votes to 127.

Scenes of Excitement

Tense excitement marked the proceedings. The galleries were packed and there was a full muster of Deputies. Various Nationalist amendments to the London Agreement were first rejected, whereupon the House by majorities round about 85 successively gave the final reading to the various Bills carrying out the Dawes scheme that only required a bare majority, with the Nationalists voting against the Bills.

The excitement rose to fever heat on commencement of the voting on the fateful Dawes Railways Bill which required a two-thirds majority. It was noticed that many Nationalists ostentatiously flourished the red voting cards denoting "No" but slyly dropped the white cards denoting "Yes" into the ballot urns.

When the result was announced in deathly silence, showing that the two-thirds majority had been exceeded by 20 votes and that definite ratification of the London Agreement was thus assured, there were shouts of anger and disgust from the Communists and General von Ludendorff's followers, who shook their fists at the applauding galleries.

The covering law embodying all the Bills and the London Agreement was finally adopted by a plain majority.

An Extreme Nationalists' motion of non-confidence in the Government was rejected by 251 votes to 94, with 85 abstentions.

Ludendorff's Bitter Taunt.

General von Ludendorff, who was one of the very excited participators in the Reichstag debate, when the result was announced walked out with a red face and gesticulating violently called out to Admiral Brueninghaus (German People's Party): "It is a scandal for Germany. Ten years ago I won the battle of Tannenberg, you to-day won a Jewish Tannenberg."

The Admiral replied: "Your Excellency, history will decide that" and turned his back on General von Ludendorff.

Repudiation of War Guilt.

Evidently in return for the Nationalists' support of the London Agreement, the Government has issued a proclamation, which will be brought to the notice of foreign Governments, terming the declaration in the Treaty of Versailles relative to Germany's responsibility for the War as contrary to the facts of history, and saying that, until the German people are freed from the burden of this false charge, no true understanding or reconciliation between peoples is possible.

It is reported that several Nationalists will be admitted into the Cabinet next October, when probably Herr Marx and Dr. Stresemann will vacate their present offices.—

Aug. 30.

The Reichstag has adjourned till October 15.

The debate on the Tariff Bill was dropped as the Communists who opposed the measure left the House in a body and consequently there was no quorum.—Reuter.

The French View

Paris, Aug. 30.

French correspondents in Berlin describe the Reichstag debate as a lamentable spectacle of blackmail, intimidation and bargaining which lowered the prestige of the Reichstag at home and abroad and made the Nationalists worse than ridiculous. They declare that the Nationalists voted as they did because they feared to face fresh elections.

"Pertinax" says that the bargaining of the People's Party with the Nationalists has dissipated once for all the illusion that republican Germany resolved peacefully to acquiesce to the European solution of 1918.

Aug. 31.

An official communiqué says that, while the German proclamation denying war guilt has not yet been received, the French Government protests theoretically against the thesis as conflicting with facts and also the formal terms of the Treaty of Versailles.

The facts, says the communiqué, are that ten years ago Germany attacked without warning a heroic country whose neutrality ought to have protected it, while France of her own accord withdrew her troops ten kilometres inside her frontier. Germany's denial of these facts, the communiqué declares, renders a disservice to the cause of truth.—Reuter.

London Newspaper Comment

London, Aug. 30.

The newspapers do not display a tendency to enthuse over yesterday's decision of the Reichstag. There are only a few comments on it.

"The Times" describes it as a triumph of commonsense.

It says that refusal to pass the bills would have rekindled bitterness against Germany in every quarter.

The "Daily Chronicle" observes that great injury may be done to British industry if Germany gives way to pressure and concedes the commercial advantages demanded by the French.

The "Daily News" points out that in view of France's present unprecedented prosperity she can afford to be generous and wise as well as exacting and just.

The "Morning Post" expresses the opinion that the Dawes scheme is bound to cause misgivings but only in Allied countries, for in spite of her obligations Germany now is a free agent.—Reuter.

Compliments to Italy

Rome, Aug. 30.

Herr Schacht, the Director of the Reichsbank, who has arrived here to confer with the Italian Minister of Finance regarding the new bank required under the Dawes plan in respect of Italo-German trade relations, told pressmen that Italy's collaboration in solving economic problems was very valuable to Germany. He was convinced of the utility of the collaboration of great central issue banks.—Reuter.

Pact Signed in London

London, Aug. 30.

The London Pact was signed at the Foreign Office at one o'clock to-day.

There were five documents, namely, the protocol and four annexes. The delegates signed in alphabetical order, the British Empire delegates following Sir Eyre Crowe, who signed on behalf of Great Britain.

The Dominions were represented by their High Commissioners and the other Powers by their Ambassadors or Ministers.

The signing of the London Pact was very brief and informal. There were no speeches.

The American Ambassador was present but he did not sign the Pact.—Reuter.

France Evacuating Dortmund

Paris, Aug. 30.

It is announced that the French Government this evening or at the latest, to-morrow, will issue orders for the military evacuation of the Dortmund-Hörde area and also of strips of territory outside the Ruhr occupied since January 11, 1923.

The military evacuation will proceed pari passu with the economic evacuation, which is estimated to last several weeks.

The Director of Mines confirms the report of an agreement concluded between French and German potash producers.

It is understood that this agreement provides that 37½ per cent. of the American business will go to French producers, and 62½ to German.

In order to note officially the promulgation of the laws enforcing the Dawes plan, the Reparations Commission meets on September 1. The time limit stipulated in the London Agreement for the economic evacuation of the occupied regions also operates from September 1. The collection of Customs duties on the frontier between occupied and non-occupied territories ceases on September 9. The measures initiated in order to check traffic on that frontier will be suppressed as from September 20.—Reuter.

Cologne, Aug. 30.

It is understood that the handing over of German railways to the new company under the Dawes scheme is tentatively fixed for October 7. This does not apply to the Régie, which will be handed over two months later.—Reuter.

Paris, Aug. 31.

It is officially announced that the Reparations Commission has appointed the American, Mr. Owen Young, interim Agent-General of Reparations Payments; the Belgian M. Delacroix, Trustee of Railway Bonds; the Italian, Signor Nogara, Trustee of Industrial Bonds; and M. Madfadyean, Commissioner of Revenues from Pledges.—Reuter.

GERMAN DAWES LAWS PROMULGATED

Payment of First Instalment for Service of Impending International Loan

Paris, Sept. 1.

The various stages fixed for the re-establishment of German economic sovereignty in the Ruhr will be calculated from to-day as the result of a meeting of the Reparations Commission officially registering the promulgation of the German Dawes laws.—Reuter.

Berlin, Sept. 1.

The Minister of Finance, Dr. Luther, stated that Germany to-day paid into the Reichsbank on account of the Agent-General for Reparations 20,000,000 gold marks, being the first instalment for the service of the impending German International loan.

Later.

A difficult domestic situation will confront the Reichstag on its re-assembly on October 15, for it must immediately decide whether the Cabinet is to lose its present slight Democratic tincture and become distinctly reactionary as the result of the bargain to secure Nationalist support in the adoption of the Dawes Bills, under which the Centre Party and the People's Party pledged to help the Nationalists into the Cabinet.

A pretty squabble is now proceeding for, while the Nationalists claim that their action secured the adoption of the Dawes Bills, the Democrats and Socialists point out that the Nationalists voted solidly against the Bills requiring a simple majority while 54 Nationalists, including the leaders, Herren Hergt and Westarp, voted against the Railway Bill and only 40 for it.

If the Nationalists are admitted into the Cabinet their numbers will give them the dominating influence and a claim to the Chancellorship, with consequent power to wreck the plan which they have consistently opposed. Hence the Democrats and Socialists are working for dissolution and an election which they are convinced will enormously increase their strength in the Reichstag.—Reuter.

Ruhr Restrictions Lessened

Duesseldorf, Sept. 3.

In accordance with the London Agreement, General Degoutte has issued an order restoring, from midnight on September 10, freedom of circulation of wheeled traffic, and abolishing the pass system for persons entering the occupied territory and also the duties levied on goods passing between the occupied and unoccupied territory.—Reuter.

U. S. Agent-General of Repartions

Paris, Sept. 3.

Mr. Seymour Parker Gilbert, former Under-Secretary of the United States Treasury, has accepted the post of Agent-General of Reparations. Mr. Gilbert will arrive in Paris in the middle of September.—Reuter.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS ASSEMBLY

Settlement of Reparations Question Approved: The Disarmament Problem

Geneva, Sept. 1.

The fifth assembly of the League of Nations opened here to-day. The public galleries were packed.

M. Hymans, the Acting President, received an ovation. In a speech he described the progress of the League and affirmed that the League was indispensable to the life of nations.

M. Hymans lauded the settlement of the reparations question by the London Conference as ushering a period of peace, tranquillity and progress, but referring to the disarmament question he said that the very serious problem of security remained. Europe was not able to live in a state of insecurity and peace must be built on firm legal and political foundations. All eyes were turned to the League in the hope that it would find a solution. The presence of M. Herriot and Mr. Ramsay MacDonald testified to the growing importance of the League.

M. Motta (Switzerland), amid prolonged applause, was elected President of the Assembly by 45 out of 47 States voting.—Reuter.

London, Sept. 2.

Mr. MacDonald departed to-day for Geneva. The Premier, conversing with pressmen, said that he was trying by his presence in Geneva to demonstrate his confidence in the power of the League to do good work, and he was very anxious that every nation should send the strongest delegation there possible.—Reuter.

Appointment of Chairmen of Committees: Reduction of Armaments

Geneva, Sept. 2.

The chairmen of the six committees of the Assembly of the League of Nations include Sir Littleton Groom (Australia), chairman of Committee One, Mr. Adachi (Japan), chairman of Committee Four, M. Duca (Rumania) is chairman of Committee Three, which is the most important as it deals with reduction of armaments, which the Assembly will discuss on Thursday in the presence of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and M. Herriot.

The Chinese Delegation is very gratified at the election of Mr. Tang Tsai-fu as a Vice-President, by 39 votes out of 46.

Later.

M. Herriot arrived here to-day. He was given an enthusiastic ovation.—Reuter.

Mr. MacDonald Interviewed

London, Sept. 2.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, interviewed by a representative of Reuter's News Agency en route to Geneva, said that the road was clearer than ever for a real discussion of armaments and national security. Nobody had yet devised a satisfactory disarmament scheme, but we were nearer to it as various obstacles were being successively removed.

A lot of nonsense, said the Prime Minister, had been written about the Anglo-Soviet Treaty. The whole position of the negotiations was altered by the Russians' surrender to us. We had in no way altered our position and it was as clear as ever that unless a settlement of debts and obligations was reached there would be no loans or guarantees for Russia.

Mr. MacDonald defended the Government's rejection of the Mutual Guarantee Pact, which would probably have led to the secession of certain British Dominions and other nations from the League of Nations and would have for ever closed the door to the adherence of America and other States.

The Prime Minister emphatically disfavoured using force to enforce decisions of the League of Nations which would only destroy its power.—Reuter.

"Vive MacDonald!"

Geneva, Sept. 2.

Mr. MacDonald arrived this evening. A crowd at the station loudly cheered him and shouted "Vive MacDonald! vive la Paix."—Reuter.

U. S. State Dept. Explains

Washington, Sept. 3.

The State Department is publishing the correspondence with the League of Nations. It declined to be represented at Geneva in the discussions of a convention for the control of arms traffic, and says that the United States Government understood it was improbable that the League Assembly's Arms Control Committee would attempt to do more than consider whether the draft convention afforded a satisfactory basis for calling an international conference in order to conclude a convention. As the United States Government's position on every point was well understood, it did not think any useful purpose would be served by attending the meeting of the Committee.

The United States Government, however, would be disposed to consider favourably participation in an appropriate international conference to negotiate and conclude a convention.—Reuter's American Service.

Mr. MacDonald Suggests a Court of Arbitration and Another Disarmament Conference

Geneva, Sept. 3.

Mr. MacDonald to-day raised the veil from his disarmament plans. Addressing journalists, he suggested a Court of arbitration, the constitution of which should be decided between the various Governments. He was convinced that America would participate ad hoc in a conference on disarmament, which should be held in Europe, possibly in Geneva. In the meantime the American plan on disarmament would be referred to the Committee of the League of Nations for examination.—Reuter.

Rousing Reception Given to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald

Geneva, Sept. 4.

The Salle of Reformation was packed long before the assembly met. The delegations dribbled in slowly. Lord Parmoor, Mr. Henderson and Mrs. Swanwick all took their places, and only Mr. MacDonald's seat was empty. Presently, Mr. MacDonald, wearing a lounge suit in an unostentatious manner and unnoticed, appeared in the hall having already had a great reception outside.

Although he had worked to a late hour, Mr. MacDonald was early astir giving the final touches to what was expected to be a historic speech. He had previously conferred privately with all the Dominion representatives, and explained fully the main lines to be followed.

Mr. MacDonald opened the debate on reduction of armanents in a speech of an hour's duration.

Later.

Mr. MacDonald received an ovation of some minutes, then there was complete silence when he rose to speak. His speech was frequently punctuated with applause, especially when he said "we here lay the foundation of peace."

Mr. MacDonald declared that his presence was a pledge that Great Britain intended to use every means in its power to widen and increase the influence of the League.—Reuter.

M. Herriot Non-committal as to France's Attitude Towards Disarmament

Geneva, Sept. 3.

An army of 200 pressmen, who are attending the Assembly of the League of Nations, to-day were received by M. Herriot, who, while he did not indicate the specific line he would take at to-morrow's disarmament debate, declared that France would do everything in favour of peace and would continue the good work begun in London in a spirit of goodwill and loyalty.

At this morning's sitting of the assembly of the League of Nations, Viscount Ishii on behalf of Japan thanked the League for the interest and sympathy displayed on the occasion of the earthquake.—Reuter.

TRADE UNIONISM IN GREAT BRITAIN

Congress at Hull: Sympathy with German Workmen under Dawes Scheme

London, Sept. 1.

The Trade Union Congress opened at the City Hall at Hull to-day. There were 700 delegates representing 4,500,000 members. Mr. A. A. Purcell, M.P., presided.

Referring to the position of the German workers, Mr. Purcell said that British trade-unionism ought to insist that if reparations and indemnities had to be paid under the Dawes scheme, they should be paid without injury to the recipients. The burden should fall upon the exploiter and profiteer.

Mr. Purcell commended the Russian Treaty and warned the Congress that possibly opposition to the Treaty might decide the fate of the Government.

Mr. Cook, the secretary of the Miners' Federation, said that he had received a telegram from French miners strongly protesting against the Dawes scheme and its effect on the German workers.

Mr. Marchbank, a railwayman, said that he hoped an opportunity would be given to discuss the Dawes report, which, he said, was designed to benefit international capitalism and to ruin the working-class movement.

Mr. Pollitt, a boiler-maker, impassionedly demanded that the trade union movement should control the policy of the Labour Government and that the Congress should emphatically repudiate the threat to introduce the Emergency Powers Act in trade union disputes and denounce the Dawes report, which made war inevitable.

Mr. Robert Smillie, on behalf of the Executive, while not denying the right of the Congress to criticize the Government's policy, defended the latter. He said that the Dawes agreement was in the best interest of the workers of both Britain and Germany.

A portion of the Council's report declaring that it was not the function of the Congress to enlarge upon Labour Government legislation was carried by a large majority in spite of an attack by the Communist section.

The Congress then adjourned.—Reuter.

Council Given Extended Powers to Intervene in Strikes

London, Sept. 2.

The Trade Union Congress at Hull to-day carried by an overwhelming majority an amendment to the Standing Orders, giving the General Council extended powers to intervene in strikes, lock-outs or threatened disputes.

The mover said that federated capital was showing its hand more strongly every week. The battle in the industrial field was becoming fiercer. The workers wanted central leadership and control.

The Worker's Utopia.

Sept. 3.

The Trade Union Congress adopted the workers' charter, providing for the nationalization of land, mines and railways, a 44-hour working week, and a minimum wage in each industry, also adequate provision for unemployment, adequate housing, full educational facilities and pensions for all at the age of 60.

There was a remarkable scene when the President of the Congress introduced the American, Canadian and Russian delegates. When the Russian delegates, headed by M. Tomsky, the Chairman of the All-Russian Council, came on the platform, the delegates rose and cheered for some minutes.

The Trade Union Congress rejected the recommendation of the General Purposes Committee in favour of allowing an emergency resolution to be submitted instructing the General Council to work for the convening of an international conference of all Trade Union organizations, and take steps to bring about unity in the international Trade Union movement, and bring the organized workers of the world under international fighting leadership.

The President said that if the resolution were accepted, it would probably do less than already has been done. In certain respects the General Council has already agreed that the Amsterdam International should invite Russian Trade Union representatives to a conference for the purpose of endeavouring to remove existing difficulties.—Reuter.

Extraordinary Powers Granted to General Council: System of Arbitrary Control

London, Sept. 3.

The significance of the decision of the Trade Union Congress yesterday evening extending the powers of the General Council has been much commented upon as investing the Council, numbering 32 members, with power not given to any single body of men since the Labour movement was launched a century ago. When a proposal, which was equivalent to appointing a Trade Union General Staff, was first submitted three years ago, it was rejected by a three to one majority. It not merely permits the Council to take the initiative in any dispute whether requested to interfere or not, but authorizes it to render the union or unions in the dispute all the moral and material support possible.

Mr. Cook, the Secretary of the Miners' Federation, who seconded the resolution, told an interviewer that the Council could go to any length without calling a ballot or consulting the rank and file and could even call a general strike at any time and impose levies on all unions for running any strike it liked.

Mr. Ben Tillett takes a less drastic view of the resolution. He expressed the opinion that individual members would be able to check the power of the Council, but the Liberal, Commander Kenworthy, who is attending the Congress as a guest, said that the united trade union front was now the greatest spectre employers had ever confronted.—Reuter.

PRINCE OF WALES IN AMERICA

Joining in All Deck Sports of Berengaria: Glad to Be Back in America

New York, Aug. 29.

After an uneventful crossing in the course of which His Royal Highness whole-heartedly participated in dances, tugs-of-war, potato races and other merry-making, and in boxing, swimming and exercise, the Prince of Wales arrived here to-day on board the Berengaria.

His Royal Highness was met by the British Ambassador and State Department officials on board a private launch. The Prince is proceeding to Syosset, Long Island, where he will be the guest of Mr. James Burden. His Royal Highness will go to Washington to-morrow to visit President Coolidge.

As the Berengaria was nearing land, Governor Smith and others wirelessed viâ an aeroplane 7,000 feet above the liner a message of welcome to the Prince.

It is understood that strict measures are being taken to shelter His Royal Highness from the inconvenient attentions of newspaper men, but before leaving the ship in a private yacht for Glen Cove, the Prince granted a two-minute interview to a launch-load of reporters, declaring that he was glad to be back in America again.

The whole bay was crowded with pleasure craft filled with cheering crowds as the Berengaria anchored. Ears were deafened by the screaming of a hundred whistles, while three Army planes swooped down and hovered over the bridge where the Prince stood beside the Captain.

Asked by pressmen whether he would marry an American heiress, the Prince laughed and replied that he did not know. He shook hands with a number of the reporters.—Reuter's American Service.

Washington, Aug. 30.

Immense cheering crowds greeted the Prince of Wales on the occasion of his visit to the capital this afternoon. His Royal Highness drove triumphantly to the White House, where he was welcomed by President and Mrs. Coolidge. The introductions were carried out by the Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, who then left the Prince to his hosts, with whom he lunched and remained a couple of hours.

The Prince departed for Long Island later in the afternoon. His Royal Highness, in a message to the people, reminds them that his holiday is in the nature of a visit and expresses delight at the cordial reception accorded him.—Reuter's American Service.

Many Outdoor Attractions: Polo Practice, Yachting and Racing

New Yory Spet. 1.

The Prince of Wales yesterday morning spent two hours exercising his polo ponies at the polo grounds near Westbury. One of his mounts was the pony Kitty, which Major Metcalfe will use in the Cup matches. After that the Prince took a long motor trip and a sail up Long Island Sound in steam yacht.

To-day His Royal Highness will participate in a scratch game of polo and will possibly visit Belmont Park to see Epinard meet some of the best American horses, including Zev and Ladkin, in a six-furlong race, the first of a series of three international sweepstakes.—Reuter's American Service.

NOTED ANTI-BOLSHEVIK SENTENCED TO DEATH

Moscow, Aug. 23.

The well-known anti-Bolshevik, M. Boris Savinkoff, was arrested on Russian territory on August 20 and is now being tried by the Supreme Military Court.

He is alleged to be the leading spirit in most of the counter-revolutionary plots in recent years, operating outside Russia.

Aug. 29.

M. Boris Savinkoff was to-day sentenced to death by the Supreme Military Court, but recommended to mercy, in consequence of a remarkable statement, in which he said that he considered that in all his counter-revolutionary activities he had been mistaken. He recognized the justice of the revolution, and acknowledged that he was guilty of the charges made against him. He concluded by saying: "I recognize the power of the Soviet, and say that he who loves the Russian nation must recognize the Soviet Power. I do not ask for pity."—Reuter.

Death Sentence Commuted.

Moscow, Aug. 29.

The Executive of the Central Soviet has commuted the death sentence on M. Boris Savinkoff to 10 years' deprivation of liberty, in consideration of the promise given by him not to fight against the Soviet in the future.—Reuter.

Savinkoff was condemned as an archcounter-revolutionary. At his trial he declared he had come to recognize the Soviet as the supreme and lawful government, acknowledged the justice of his sentence and asked for no mercy.—Reuter..

BOLSHEVIK PROPAGANDA IN EAST AFRICA

Nairobi, Aug. 30.

A Yugo-Slav, reputed to be a dangerous Bolshevist propagandist among negroes, boarded a liner at Aden, having booked for Tanganyika. The police were waiting to seize him, but he escaped when the liner called at Mombasa, by landing in the night in a small boat, leaving his luggage behind. He was traced to Uganda in a goods-train which stopped in the wild-game country, where the Yugo-Slav disappeared, although the police closely watched the railway. A few Indians in the train were compelled to wash their faces, lest the fugitive was disguised as an Indian.

A photograph of the Yugo-Slav, taken by an amateur cinematographer aboard the liner, was exhibited privately to an audience of police at Nairobi, while a reward was offered for his capture, but all efforts have so far proved fruitless.

The Yugo-Slav is of a swarthy complexion, and easily disguisable as an Arab, an Indian or a Goan.—Reuter.

SERIOUS SITUATION IN MOROCCO

Large Reinforcements Being Sent from Spain

Madrid, Sept. 2.

The seriousness of the position in Morocco is emphasized by an official communiqué describing heavy fighting consequent on persistent and violent attacks on Spanish communications in the western zone.

The communiqué says that great forces must be employed and consequently eight battalions are being despatched immediately from Spain; "The situation calls for great coolness and firmness, and the Directory feels compelled more than ever to exercise all its authority both in Spain and in Morocco."

Gibraltar, Sept. 2.

Gunfire from Morocco is audible in Tangier and Gibralter, Tribesmen in the vicinity of the Tangier enclave are joining in.—Reuter.

Raisuli's Adherents Joining the Rebels.

Gibraltar, Sept. 2.

It is learned from a Spanish source that 50,000 reinforcements have been despatched to Morocco within the past fortnight.

London, Sept. 2.

The latest official report from Madrid speaks of a slight improvement in the situation in Morocco, but the fact that the situation is still serious is indicated by announcements from Tangier.

Diplomatic correspondents in London deal with the political reaction on European Chancelleries in the event of Spanish withdrawal from an appreciable portion of the Protectorate, which is in no wise not to be expected. They point out that the question of the repartition of Morocco will affect the vital interests of the Mediterranean Powers and Great Britain and also of the United States.

It is believed that Spanish reluctance to make unduly heavy efforts for the sake of the retention of the present large zone has considerably increased since the conclusion of the Tangier Convention last year, under which the claim of Spain to the premier position in Tangier has been virtually subordinated to that of France.—Reuter.

No Signs of Spain Withdrawing: Large Preparations for Active Work

Madrid, Sept. 3.

No hint of a likelihood of Spanish evacuation of Moroccan territory is given in official quarters. On the contrary, the latest communiqué referring to the general insurrection of the natives, which is imperiling the Spanish positions, warns the country to prepare for operations on a larger scale than ever.

General Grund, commanding the artillery at Ceuta, has been recalled.—Reuter.

THE SOVIET CLAIM TO WRANGEL ISLAND

Ottawa, Sept. 2.

The Canadian Government has advised the Colonial Office, in respect of the reported mission of the armed Soviet vessel "Red October" to Wrangel Island with a company of infantry, to take the island and seize the men left there last year by Mr. Harold Noice after his expedition to rescue the survivors of the Stefansson party, that the Canadian Government, which did not authorize the Stefansson adventure, will leave any action to the British Government.

It is believed here that the right to possess the island will be finally adjudicated by the League of Nations.—Reuter's American Service.

FIRMER BRITISH HOLD ON SUDAN

Mr. MacDonald's View that Egyptian Ministers Engineered the Recent Revolt

London, Sept. 2.

Interviewed by the "Daily Press" correspondent at Paris, Mr. MacDonald declared that Zaghlul Pasha had ignored his last invitation to come to London. Meanwhile, the Premier said, he was convinced that the recent disturbances in the Sudan had been engineered by members of the Egyptian Government, and added that, in spite of his original intention to maintain the status quo in the pending discussions, he would be obliged to strengthen and determine the British position in the Sudan.—Reuter.

GREAT BRITAIN AND MEXICO

Retiring President's Attack on British Policy: Mr. Cummins Assailed

Mexico City, Sept. 2.

In his final address to Congress as President of Mexico before handing over the Government to the new President, Gen. Obregon vigorously attacked the policy of Great Britain in connexion with the suspension of diplomatic relations and the expulsion of Mr. Cummins. He declared that the latter did not possess a diplomatic or official character, but the administration was given him for personal considerations despite the fact that he mixed in politicai affairs, from which foreigners were absolutely barred.

Mr. Cummins's attitude towards the Mexican Government from the beginning of 1922 was one of "offensive dignity." Gen. Obregon alleged that Mr. Cummins sent exaggerated reports of the Mexican revolt to London and encouraged British subjects in Mexico to make "impertinent representations?" and asserted that he was preparing a scandalous incident in order to halt Sir Thomas Hohler's voyage to Mexico. The attempted expulsion of Mr. Cummins had not been due to his representations on behalf of British subjects in Mexico, but to his discourteous attitude towards the Mexican Government.—Reuters American Service.

SATURDAY'S TELEGRAMS

TRADE UNIONISTS AND COMMUNISM

Foreign Delegates at Hull Congress: Efforts to Effect a World's Peace

London, Sept. 4.

The foreign delegates to-day addressed the Trade Union Congress at Hull.

Mr. Brady, of the American Federation of Labour, said that they believed in international kinship because Trade Unions were the only substantial bulwarks against despotisms like Kaiserism and Bolshevism, but it was impossible for the American Federation of Labour to participate in the International Federation of Trade Unions, which by a vote of a few individuals could commit them to a policy completely at variance with their ideas.

Mr. McClelland (Canada) said that the workers of Canada were troubled over the question of immigration. The gates of Canada were opened wide and 133,000 immigrants had entered last year, but 193,000 had left Canada to find a living in the United States.

M. Tomsky, the Chairman of the All-Russian Council of Trade Unions, said that the labour movement throughout the world was realizing the necessity for greater concentration and centralization to meet the growing internationalization of capital. The vanquished in the Great War were the workers of the world; the victors were small groups, of profiteers in each country. The iron hand of world capitalism was now seizing the starving German proletariat by the throat. The Dawes plan was only a new scheme of exploitation, which would only result in increased trade competition. He said in conclusion that Russian workers desired to cooperate in the fight against the common enemy, exploitation.

Labour Rejecting Bolshevism.

Later.

The anti-Communist revolt of labour exemplified in the speeches and resolutions at the Trade Union Congress, is further illustrated by a decision of the Executive of the Labour party at the meeting at Hull that members of the Communist party may be accepted as delegates to the Conference, but cannot be endorsed as Labour candidates.

Mr. Pollitt, a boiler maker and one of the Communists affected by this decision, interviewed, said that it would compel many Trade Unions to consider their relationship towards the Labour party, but he was confident that the Labour Conference would reject this decision.

Sept. 5.

The Trade Union Congress has agreed to empower the General Council through the International Federation of Trades Unions to take all possible steps to bring together the different elements of the Labour movement in Europe in an effort to establish solidarity making for world peace.

The President said that communications received from France, Italy and Germany were showing that the continental nations were looking for a lead to Britain, where unity was very firmly established Therefore it seemed incumbent upon the British movement to take steps to consummate this desire and thus fulfil its great destiny—Reuter.

Sept. 5.

The Trade Union Congress passed unanimously a resolution congratulating the Government on the signing of the Anglo-Russian Treaties, and calling upon the Government, and the House of Commons specially, to facilitate the ratification of the Treaties, the application of which is most important for the peace and economic recovery of the world.

A resolution was also adopted instructing the General Council to call a special congress to decide on industrial action immediately there was danger of war.—Reuter.

"Hands off China"—Russian Delegates

Moscow, Sept. 5.

The Russian Federation of Labour has appealed to the Trade Union Congress at Hull to support the "Hands off China" movement which was started by Russia.—Reuter.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS ASSEMBLY

British Premier's Address: Reasons for Withholding from Mutual Pact

Geneva, Sept. 3.

Continuing his address, Mr. MacDonald said that he would do his utmost to lay the foundations of peace. (loud applause.) He emphasized that all the delegations of which he was the chief, had determined all their ideas in a common pool. Great Britain, he said, had not subscribed to the pact of Mutual Assistance, not because she was indifferent to public security, but because it was felt they had not yet properly prepared the soil of Great Britain, and they wished to carry out every letter of her obligations. They would not sign, however, an indefinite proposal which, if Great Britain tried to carry out, public opinion would probably make impossible; but the last word had not been said in regard to the Pact. However, we must have the whole world with us.

The Premier declared that they could not afford to allow Germany to remain outside the League. The London Conference had created new relations, and should bring Germany into the Assembly (cheers). The matter should be taken up by this Assembly.

Russia believed in revolution, Mr. MacDonald went on to say, therefore she had not favoured the League. But Russia had changed, and the Anglo-Russian agreement was paving the way for Russia to enter the League.

Arbitration and Disarmament

Sept. 4.

Dealing with the question of security in his speech at the League Assembly this morning, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald pointed out the difficulty of establishing who the aggressor was. He dwelt on the system of arbitration and said that, if we were not able to elaborate a proper system of arbitration, then we must return to military pacts. The pact of mutual assistance he went on, should clearly define the nature of the obligation of each State and also when arbitration should operate. He emphasized that the optional arbitration clause should be thoroughly examined before Britain and the Dominions could adhere to it. Arbitration was directed at the problem of armaments, Mr. MacDonald said, and pointed out that as regards naval armaments Britain had fulfilled the Washington Agreement as she had fulfilled all her agreements.

The way must be prepared for a conference on armaments, as without preparations the conference would be a faliure. All nations must participate in that conference. The London Conference had helped to this end.

Great Britain adhered to the Covenant of the League of Nations. She did not desire to weaken it. Certain articles of the Covenant could be embodied in a charter of peace.

The matter should be referred to a committee before the Assembly separated, while members worked to enlighten public opinion in their own countries.

M. Camerlynck translated the whole speech into French.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and M. Herriot warmly shook hands before leaving the Assembly, which adjourned till the afternoon.

When the debate was resumed, M. Irrzynski (Poland) strongly favoured arbitration and advocated disarmament, but, he said, security must come first.

Mr. Charlton (Australia), who was warmly cheered, urged the convoking of a conference on disarmament without delay. Disarmament was the only sound foundation of the League.

Jonkheer van Karnebeek, explaining why Holland had not subscribed to the guarantee pact, said that for him strict application of the Covenant of the League was sufficient to assure the peace of the world, providing all disputes were submitted to the ruling of the Hague Court.

French Premier's Call for International Effort.

Geneva, Sept. 5.

The public galleries of the Assembly were again packed. M. Herriot received an ovation. He said that he hoped that one result of this Assembly would be to consecrate the principle of arbitration (applause). He declared that the aggressor was the party who refused to abide by an arbitral award. This assembly had a moral responsibility to the world. Arbitration, security and disarmament were inseparable from each other. Arbitration was as necessary as peace, and must became a reality, and the loyalty of small nations must be protected (loud applause).

The French Premier emphasized the need of upholding justice for all. He endorsed the remarks of "my excellent friend MacDonald" yesterday. He declared that all nations were clamouring for peace, so let them give them peace by international cooperation. He welcomed American cooperation in regard to disarmament, and said that France was not animated by hatred to Germany. France fought German militarism. France adhered to the Covenant, but desired to make it a living thing. France aspired to peace by right and dignity. Owing to her own sufferings, she wished to assuage the sufferings of other nations. He concluded "France is striving for peace."

M. Herriot declared that without arbitration, security and disarmament, international solidarity would be impossible. France joyfully received any proposals of conciliation. France offered all she could offer. She wanted peace, and hoped that the efforts of the League would lead to it.

The former Prime Minister Signor Salandra in a written speech said that Italy gladly associated herself with the views of Mr. Macdonald and M. Herriot, and would willingly co-operate in the work of reconstruction.

M. Herriot spoke for 45 minutes. He was loudly cheered, the whole assembly rising to their feet.—Reuter.

BRITISH COLUMBIA LETTER

Whale Sunk by Liner: Portuguese Airmen on Way Home: Japan Importing Foreign Cattle to Improve Dairy Produce Whiskers Culled from Bottom of the Sea

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Vancouver B.C., Aug. 14.

Trans-Pacific travel to-day is so safe it is often uneventful. Passengers aboard the Empress of Canada on her last voyage from China to Vancouver, however, came near to getting a thrill. The liner was about 24 hours out of Yokohama, stated the officers, when on the bow a huge black object was seen to be clinging tenaciously. Investigation proved it to be a whale weighing about 20 tons which the boat had struck squarely amidships, running the bow of the ship into the hold of the big fish about three feet. No impact had been felt on the vessel, but the force of the liner's speed was so great that the whale could not get away. Captain Robinson ordered the vessel astern and as she drew back the whale went to the bottom, making a fair sized suction.

Commander Slade Arrives.

On the ship with the captain as she entered Vancouver was Commander Sir Edmund Slade, who was in charge of the British East Indian fleet for many years but is now retired. He was on his way to London. Others of interest in the cabin included Mr. E. S. Kadoorie and his two sons, from Shanghai, Mr. Kadoorie being described over here as "The Rockefeller of the Orient;" Messrs. E. Saddick, private secretary to Sir Paul Chater; Robert de Vos, director of the Banque pour L' Estranger, Peking; General Li Ten and party, of Shansi; Capt. M. D. Kennedy, of the Rising Sun Petroleum Company, and B L. Foster, a noted merchant of San Francisco.

Admiral Sir Edmund Slade K.C.I.E., K.C.V.O., R.N., an acknowledged authority on naval strategy who retired from the British navy in 1912, was here in the course of a leisurely trip around the world. Mr. E. S. Kadoorie, the millionaire financier, spent several days with his sons on the Pacific Coast before proceeding to Montreal on his way to London on holiday.

Several prominent professional men and a Russian opera singer were among notables aboard the Canada. Dr. A. Fuchs of Vienna, famous as an eye specialist, disembarked at Victoria en route to points in the United States. Dr. J. B. Pratt, professor of philosophy at Williams College, Williamstown, Mass, was returning with his family after a year spent in China, Korea, Siam and Japan, during which time he devoted his entire time to the study of Buddhism.

Around World Airmen Return.

Outstanding in the passenger list of the steamer were the three Portuguese aviators whose recent 11,000 mile flight from Lisbon to Macao recalls the exploits of their countrymen in the 15th country. They proceeded to Seattle. The aviators were Squadron Commander Brite Paes, commander of the flight from Lisbon to Macao; Lieut. M. Gouveis, who acted as mechanic, and Leader Sarento de Bieres. Commander Paes told a long story of the hardships that the party was forced to put up with, especially at Bushire, where the Persian Government held them for three days because they did not have passport vises from the Persian consul; the wreck of their first plane at Badana; the leg from Benghasi to Cairo; a non-stop jump of 850 miles, and the forced landing in a Chinese cemetery near Sun Chun, within a few hours flight of their goal. The airmen went via San Francisco and New York to Montreal, on their way to Lisbon.

Prize Cattle for Japan.

"The need of fresh milk and European food in Japan is greatly increasing" stated Mr. Keitara Mukai, prominent cattle breeder of Osaka, who has come over here to make extensive purchases. His mission is the importation of Canadian prize cattle into Japan in order to offset the huge annual consumption of canned milk there. Purchases have already been made by Mr. Mukai of prize cattle from the famous herds at Raymondale Farm, near Montreal, and elsewhere in Canada. Mr. Mukai said the recently announced import tax on canned milks and similar commodities made it necessary for Japanese to produce those things in their own country. He hopes, by shipping Canadian prize cattle to Japan, to breed the prize cow of the world. Ice-making machines, as well as other up-to-the-minute equipment for the establishment of a most modern dairy at his farm near Osaka are being purchased by Mr. Mukai while on this side.

Chinese Crew Protested.

The freighter Edgar Bowling, of the Garland Steamship Line, of New York, which was recently in Vancouver for a small quantity of cargo, and left here for her home port, ran foul of the authorities when she arrived there. An affidavit charging that the freighter was preparing to sail for Baltimore, Norfolk, Va., and the Pacific Coast with a crew of Chinese, only three of whom could speak English, was made public by Silas B. Axtel, counsel for the Neptune Association of Masters and Mates. An investigation was put under way. The basis of the affidavit was that the Edgar Bowling left New York several months ago with an American crew which was discharged in China and displaced by Chinese at a lower rate of wages. This, it was claimed, was a violation of the Seamen's Act which provides that 75 per cent. of a vessel's crew must be able to understand orders given by the captain and officers.

Adventists Go to China.

Twenty-four Seventh Day Adventist missionaries, with 12 children, sailed to-day on the Empress of Canada for the Far East. All but three of the couples will go to China. This party is the largest that the foreign mission board of the denomination has sent out this year and will greatly strengthen the work in those fields.

Pacific Gives up Whiskers.

Little do the moving picture audiences know how their heroes and "heavies" of the screen get their whiskers. A few days ago a Grand Trunk Pacific boat arrived here with a shipment of six tons of such whiskers, clipped from the bed of the Pacific Ocean, near the Queen Charlotte Islands, off the British Columbia coast. The whiskers have been shipped from here to the Orient. According to the ship's manifest, the shipment is agar-agar, a gelatinous sea grass which grows in profusion on the floor of the ocean near the islands. A year ago a Japanese company sent a boat to the Queen Charlottes with three divers to ascertain the extent of the grass beds. Later a small community was established on one of the islands and the inhabitants fish and drag for whiskers. The finer quality of the grass goes to make stage whiskers and the heavier is made into gelatine, singlass and kouri cake.

Tagged Salmon is Caught.

A male sockeye salmon, weighing six and three quarter pounds measuring 26 and a half inches in length, and bearing an aluminum button No. 2047 U.S.B.F. 24 was caught in the Skeena River, northern B.C. in the last week in July. J. F. Babcock, Canadian Deputy Commissioner of Fisheries, says the fish is unquestionably one of the fish tagged by the agents of the United States bureau of fisheries at stations in Alaska this spring. The purpose of tagging the fish is to secure information regarding the course followed and the time required for the sockeye salmon to pass from the marking points into the streams and to establish the natural spawning grounds of fishing passing from the marking stations. As the fish in question was taken from American traps in Alaska to be marked and liberated, it demonstrates that the sockeye which frequent the Skeena River are at times associated with the schools of sockeye that breed in Alaska streams and that Skeena River (Canadian) sockeye are subject to capture in Alaska waters by American traps. The date regarding the fish, together with the aluminum tag, has been forwarded to the United States Fish Commission by the British Columbia Fisheries Department.

Japanese Honour Maclaren.

Captain C. D. Neroutsos, marine superintendent for the Canadian Pacific Coastwise Service, has received from Col. Broome, British flyer, who is with Major MacLaren in Siberia, a copy of the official welcome given the flyers by Mr. G. Matsubara, governor of the Prefecture of Aomori, Japan. The address is interesting for its flowery style. It says:—

To Major Stuart MacLaren and his party of world-around flyers. It is the greatest pleasure and honour to the citizens of this prefecture to have the opportunity to welcome their long-expected friends, Major Stuart MacLaren and his party, the British heroes of the air. Since that time when the news of your leaving Southampton on March 21, the people of our country which has the history of special intimacy with yours, have been praying for your success in this never-been-heard-of-before enterprize. Despite the continuous difficulties over 100 days you have successfully brought to us your victorious selves. We cannot but cheer to have such aerial conquerors before us. We hope and expect that from this northern extremity of "Hondo" of Japan with renewed power and spirit and with the greater and more difficult remainder of the journey, making the even greater caution you will conquer greatest record that the world has ever seen. Again we here sincerely express our hearty welcome and hope for your happy success.

Shanghai Editor Returns.

Mr. Y. P. Wang, assistant manager of the "Shun Pao," at Shanghai, recently sailed from Vancouver for home after spending two years in an intensive study of journalism on this continent. At Columbia, Missouri, Mr. Wang earned the degree of Bachelor of Journalism and at the Pulitzer School of Journalism, New York, he obtained his master's degree.

Interesting Exhibit.

Perhaps the most interesting exhibit in the entire display at Vancouver's great annual fair is that of a rug, five feet by eight feet, made by three Chinese of lowly station in Peking. The rug, which is owned by a Vancouver man, is the only one of its kind in Canada. In the centre is displayed the coat-of-arms of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes. The background is finished in blue and the border in blue and white. The rug is to be forwarded to the Government of Serbia.

Banking and Betting.

Behind the prosecution of 28-year-old Tyson Goon, teller employed by the Bank of Montreal at its Chinese branch here, looms the race track. It is alleged that Tyson, in the course of a few months, lost more than $40,000 on the race track and this is about the amount of the defalcations charged against him. During temporary spells as a winner Tyson invested $1,000 in oil stocks and purchased a house and an automobile on terms. The prosecution claims that the method used in the alleged embezzlements was the alteration of bank deposit slips.

APPENDICITIS PUZZLE

Team Work Needed to Solve It

Dr. Caiger's suggestion to the British Medical Association that the cause of appendicitis would be a suitable object of research for the general practitioner has met with widespread approval.

Medical science has hardly obtained any clue to the origin of the disease, although it is known that primitive races are practically exempt, and that savages only lose their immunity on coming into contact with civilization.

There is nothing to afford an explanation in the inflamed appendix, as the surgeon sees it. It is only rarely that swallowed objects, such as pins or cherry stones, are found in the appendix.

A hardened secretion has in the past often been mistaken for a stone. Appendicitis may be an infectious fever of which the special brunt falls on the appendix. A combined study is needed of all the conditions of environment and habits of life when the attack occurs. Such a study could only be made by a team of general practitioners.

OUR PARIS LETTER

Journalist's able Defence of Policy of Independent Action against Germany

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Paris, July 18.

Although the success or failure of the London Conference on reparations will be a matter of history before this letter reaches Shanghai, it may not be uninteresting to record the feelings with which the French negotiators approached this momentous assembly. Their state of mind, and the atmosphere prevailing at the opening of the proceedings, are admirably explained in the "Journal des Debats" by M. Pierre de Lacretelle, one of the ablest and most impartial of the French writers whose business it is to describe the repeated attempts of European statesmen to solve one of the most difficult problems ever put before the world.

M. Pierre writes: "The British programme remains what it was at the Chequers interview. It is narrow and rigid, almost absolute and perfectly clear.

To understand its simplicity, we must remember first of all that the British Premier has not had time to go inside the frightfully complicated labyrinth now constituted by the reparations problem. He is thus inclined to simplify it by reducing it to a few essential principles. Without going into details for the moment, I may confine myself to saying that the principal object is to prevent France, once and for all, from taking any isolated action of a coercive nature.

The Loan's False Lure

We are told that not a single one of the German bonds suggested in the Dawes report will be taken up unless we immediately and definitely surrender the security we were compelled to seize. Attempts will then be made to induce us to agree to an extremely precise formula which will admit of no future arguments over wordings and no personal interpretation, and will tie our hands completely. In short, the holders of the future bonds are to look to us, and not to Germany. To bring us to this point, the advantages of transforming the German debt into a business proposition will be dangled before our eyes Attempts will be made, as at Chequers, to prove that the loan has been placed in the United States, England and neutral countries, all the Governments concerned will unite to defend the interests of the bondholders should Germany fail to fulfil her obligations, and that she will thus be compelled to give in.

What better guarantee could we expect? That is all very well, but we have not yet forgotten the case of Russia and of Turkey. At Genoa, The Hague, Lausanne and London, even now, we have seen Governments making fruitless endeavours on behalf of holders of Russian and Turkish bonds. Anything may happen in the state of chaos produced in Europe by the deliberate bankruptcy of the Reich.

Bondholders Beware

What guarantee have we? The instability of the present political system in Germany is not a dogma. If it suffices for the leaders of Germany to cease paying the coupons of the new loan, to go bankrupt a second time, and to offer systematic resistance to the trustee whom the Dawes report proposes to appoint, and thus to escape the 30 annual payments for reparations, it is quite easy to understand the tranquility with which Germany accepts the financial yoke. We must think twice before we agree to the 'turkification' to which the experts' report would lead. Mr. MacDonald himself said, at Chequers, that if Germany takes up an attitude of systematic obstruction and fails to carry out her new obligations, there will be no remedy except war; but if we come to this point, we can hardly expect firm action from the party to which Mr MacDonald belongs. Under these circumstances, why should we not retain full right of action as laid down in the Treaty of Versailles?

"To sum up, we must ask ourselves whether the advantages we are promised are worth the surrender of our right to take action against a debtor who has made up his mind not to pay. It is a question of ordinary common sense. The greatest prudence and coolness will be needed at the conference if we are not to be stifled by flowers of rhetoric and plausible arguments. For all these reasons, we must expect that the debates will be difficult, and even painful; for, at the point we have now reached, there is hardly anything left for us to give up. If we may judge by appearances, it is the creditor and not the debtor who inspires mistrust in the future holders of German bonds. This, at any rate, is what we are asked to believe, inasmuch as we are required to give so many guarantees which are really much more political than financial."

Typical French Politics

The new French Chamber has lost no time in carrying out the general chambardement, or turning everything upside down, which no self-respecting political victors can omit. It has granted an amnesty to M. Caillaux and M. Malvy, to the men who were identified with the "Bonnet Rouge," to condemned "defeatists" and to men who evaded military obligations. It has also given the Government power to extend the amnesty to deserters.

In the short space of a month M. Herriot and his supporters have done their best to destroy the ideas that have generally prevailed in France during the past ten years. Only three months ago the country appeared in the eyes of the world to be adequately represented by two men—MM. Millerand and Poincaré. The former, originally a Socialist, was a living proof that the highest positions in the land are open to all citizens of no matter what class. M. Poincaré was a typical specimen of the higher bourgeoisie. At this period, so close at hand and yet so distant in reality, M. Caillaux and M. Malvy were looked upon by the vast majority of their countrymen as politically impossible. Without going so far as to regard them as actual traitors, public opinion held them to be hopelessly compromised. It was difficult to forgive M. Caillaux for keeping in touch with the enemy or to forget that the Germans looked upon him as the one Frenchman who could help them to bring about a favourable peace. As for M. Malvy, his familiarity with Almereyda, the infamous editor of the "Bonnet Rouge," the sheet that took German money and preached peace at any price, disqualified him, it was supposed, from ever again holding any important public position.

The new majority has now granted an amnesty which officially erases the records of these politicians, not as a measure of forgiveness but as compensation to men supposed to have been unjustly convicted. A Caillaux Cabinet is now discussed in political circles as the most natural thing in the world. It remains to be seen whether the Senate will lend itself to the system of party whitewashing now projected on so big a scale.

FLIGHT TO INDIA

R33 Trip in Autumn or Next Spring

The airship R. 33, sister ship of the famous R. 34, which flew across the Atlantic and back, is being reconditioned with a view to undertaking an experimental flight to India and back either late this autumn or early next spring, writes Major W. T. Blake, the "Daily News" air correspondent. It may be remembered that the Labour Government decided not to carry out the Burney scheme, but brought in a modified scheme of their own. It is under this scheme that the partly dismantled R. 33 will be reconditioned, and two airships of 5,000,000 cubic feet capacity, length 760 feet, and diameter 110 feet, the largest in the world, will be built.

The R. 33, which is only 643 feet in length, with a diameter of 79 feet, is now at Cardington, near Bedford, but she will be moved to Pulham so that work may proceed on the enlargement of the shed, where one new aerial giant will be built. At the same time work will be begun, either at Howden or Barrow, on the second giant ship.

OUR SCOTTISH LETTER

Scots' Humour: Rory the Pet of Park Lane: The Opera "Robert Burns"

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Edinburgh, July 23.

The honour of Doctor of Laws which has been conferred by the University of Edinburgh upon Sir Owen Seaman, editor of "Punch," once more calls attention to the survival in the South of the fallacy that the Scots have no humour in spite of the notorious fact, referred to by him at the dinner to the honorary graduates, that a great deal of the humour of London journalism is supplied by Scotsmen. Perhaps the finest humourous artist who ever drew for the great journal whose tradition Sir Owen so well maintains was Charles Keene. Half Scots by birth, and wholly by temperament, Keene not only drew largely on the native stock of sardonic humour illustrated by Dean Ramsay, but also, with an exquisite double turn of artistry, exploited the supposed Scottish lack of humour, a feat which since his day has been repeated by several Scots writers, to the delight of their own countrymen and the mystification of the slower-witted Southron. Humour, indeed, has always been the strongest suit of Scottish writers. That a nation which produced Lyndsay, Urquhart, Arbuthnot, Smollett, Burns, Galt, Scott, and Stevenson, and which in our own day has enlivened the English stage with the elusive fancies of Barrie, should ever have been regarded as deficient in humour can be explained only by the sardonic element in the Scottish mind, and by the fact that the average Scot is often so content with his own appreciation of a subtle jest that he declines to dilute it for English consumption. In the matter of humour, in short, the Scot follows art for art's sake.

In this connexion there may be given an extract from a speech delivered by Sir Owen Seaman at one of the social functions. A little while ago, he said, it was asserted that he had told somebody he got 75 per cent. of the humour for "Punch" from Scotsmen. Shortly afterwards he was called upon by an interviewer who wanted to know what he had to say about it. He was rather busy at the time, and in a rather peevish mood, and he dismissed the interviewer a little curtly with the statement that he had said nothing of the kind. He did not know whether it was out of revenge for this, but a few days afterwards he received a cutting from a Dundee paper to the effect that —"Sir Owen Seaman states that he never said he got 75 per cent. of the humour of his paper from Scotsmen. We do not know who spread the rumour, but for years we Scotsmen have been writhing under this aspersion."

Cap and Bells

Edinburgh graduation was the occasion of many small jokes. No less a person than the Principal of the University started the game, and everybody seemed bound to follow him with little efforts good, bad, and (mainly) indifferent. It must be said that quips of the cap and bell variety do not come naturally to the Scots whose mental constitution lies rather in the direction of humour. Sir Alfred Ewing at the graduation dinner drew attention to the fact that one of those honoured with the degree was the Rev. James Black and another Sir Frederick Whyte by saying that the list began with a Black and ended with a White. Referring to Mrs. Sydney Webb he recalled that her maiden name was Beatrice Pôtter, and said he now understood better how it was that the world was "clay in the hands of the potter." Referring the gift of a Greek poem to Eric Liddell, the Olympic Champion, Sir Richard Lodge expressed the hope that a full translation was also provided. In turn Liddell made the confession that the poem was Greek to him. This enabled Sir Alfred Ewing to score a point when he asked why Liddell should not be able to read the Greek seeing he was a combination of Liddell and Scot. (Liddell and Scott are the authors of a famous Greek lexicon.) "I don't know how long he wore the thing," wrote one scribe about the wreath of wild laurel, "but no doubt he remembered the maxim that man wants but Liddell here below, nor wants that Liddell long."

And another suggested that the sprinter should write a book about his track career under that title—"Eric, or Liddell by Liddell."

Scots Success in London

Since his appearance in the Rodeo, and his "interview" with a Champion cowboy, the Marquis of Graham's young Highland bullock "Rory Beg," has become one of the most prominent figures of the London season. It is very unlikely that he will return to Arran. Not since Mary Pickford's first visit has London so completely taken a stranger to its heart; "Rory Beg"—dashing and debonair, romantic and mysterious, picturesque in his own wild Celtic fashion—is the pet of Park Lane and the toast of Tooting. No one who knew him as an inconspicuous little stot on his native island, with his hair unbrushed, his manners rude, his fascination yet unsuspected, would recognize him now. He is groomed and combed to the pink of perfection. Manicurists put a daily polish on his gorgeous horns. His hoofs are systematically filed and brought to a dazzling lustre, Marcel-waving has made the most amazing improvement on his head and tail despite the rush for hirsute souvenirs by practically the same collectors who almost left Paderewski bald.

When "Rory Beg" made his sensational debut in the Wembley Stadium he had no English. There is little evidence that he knows the language even yet, but his natural taciturnity carries him through interviews and receptions without this being suspected. When stroked on the flanks by ecstatic young ladies who say "Isn't he a dear?" he simply stares at them from under his noble fringe, all the speculation of the Hebrides in his mild, magnificent eyes, and gives a Gaelic bellow, registering, if they only knew it, the utmost contempt and disapproval. "Rory Beg's" bellow is the talk of London. It has a fierce sombre suggestion of vacant wind-swept spaces, storm and passion: when it is accompanied by foaming at the mouth (as happened when the wife of the Patagonian Ambassador one day referred to him as a cow), the effect is electrical. A series of admirable gramophone records of Rory's more amiable vocal performances has been prepared by His Master's Voice Company, and it is understood that the British Broadcasting Company will at an early date relay a few remarks of his or how life in London has impressed him. It is confidently expected that this will be an even more widely popular wireless item than the recent broadcast nightingale.

Little of the quiet and meditation of Brodick is possible to our distinguished compatriot in London. A host of engagements fills up every day. Rory poses for the pictorial press photographers, and for poster artists. It must frankly be admitted that the very look of these gentlemen infuriates him, but as it has been shown to him that this is all to be helpful to his Coliseum season, he has not repeated his first practical blunder in tossing the Daily Squirt and its camera through the window. The afternoons of Rory are mainly taken up by his publicity agent, who is arranging for a provincial tour with municipal receptions when the London engagement terminates. In the evening, attended by his very competent and gentlemanly valet, Mr. Peter Cameron, who came with him from Arran, "Rory Beg" takes an hour of exercise, incognito, in Holland Park, kindly placed at his disposal through the influence of the Duke of Atholl.

Mr. Peter Cameron's views, as expressed in his native Doric to an interviewer, seem, in the circumstances curiously unsympathetic. "Just makin' a d—d dod o' the beast!" he says. "It would be better for his health if he wass home in Brodick."

Dedication of Dr. R. V. Liddell.

Dr. R. V. Liddell, brother of Mr. E. H. Liddell, the Olympic victor, was dedicated to the medical missionary service in China in the Morningside Congregational Church, Edinburgh. There was a very full congregation. The Rev. W. Nelson Bitton, home secretary of the London Missionary Society, described the field of work to which Dr. Liddell is going; the Rev. William Blair, Helensburgh (and formerly Dr. Liddell's father's minister at Stiring) gave the dedicatory prayer; and the Rev. H. Moffat Scott, minister of the church, gave the charge to Dr. Liddell, who made his own statement of belief.

Engagement

A marriage has been arranged, and will take place in Bombay early in November, of Frank Ewart Nicoll, Hongkong & Shanghai Banking Corporation, Bombay, son of John Nicoll, Fintry Place, Broughty Ferry, and Isobel Mary only daughter of G. Malcoln Stuart, W.S., 19 Lyndoch Place, Edinburgh.

Gretna Going

Gretna's romance did not end with the closing of the blacksmith's shop as a centre for north-bound lovers from over the Border. Its dedication to death in the war years was a much more impressive spectacle. Over many square miles of quite unoccupied land there was built a city in which 30,000 people were employed, and where, in a series of small buildings, all carefully placed at a safe distance from each other, huge quantities of propelling charges of cordite, and of T.N.T., and other high explosives for shells were manufactured without any accident. And now the Gretna that fed the guns is on its last legs. It comes under the hammer piece by piece. I saw some useful huts when I was down there the other week. Who wants a little hut that did its bit?

"Robert Burns"

It is still uncertain when the long-awaited opera "Robert Burns" will make its initial appearance. Meanwhile Mr. Frederick Austin, of "Beggars' Opera" fame, is completing his musical setting of Mr. John Drinkwater's book of the opera. In the hands of Mr. Drinkwater, who deals with the poet's complex psychology in an entertainingly ingenious way, and Mr. Nigel Playfair, who, it is said, is "the best living undertaker of the dead," the production is certain to arouse the keenest interest, if not, indeed, a good deal of controversy on the part of students of Burns.

Holyrood Relics

There has just been restored to Holyrood Palace in Edinburgh a portion of the hangings of Mary Queen of Scots' bed and of portions of one of Lord Darnley's gloves, and the story of their removal is a striking commentary on the disregard which seemingly prevailed a century ago for national relics. Today all the buildings in the care of the Office of Works are, along with their contests, under the personal supervision of trusted custodians, many of whom have already proved their worth in the King's service; but in the early decades of last century things, apparently, were otherwise. The custodian of those days was sometimes "a superannuated Abigail," whose main interest in a visitor was measured by the value of the gratuity which she anticipated. In July, 1822, an English collector learned from a friend that an Edinburgh acquaintance had asserted that such was the laxity of the custodian at Holyrood that it would not be a difficult matter to purloin articles from the museum there without fear of detection. So convinced was the Edinburgh man of what he had said that he went the length of entering into a wager. He visited Holyrood, and, having distracted the attention of the old woman in charge, clipped a small piece off the hangings of Queen Mary's bed. His next move was even more audacious—not to mention vandal—he opened a case, abstracted Lord Darnley's glove, and before replacing it cut off two small pieces. These fragments eventually passed into the possession of the English collector, and on his death some 30 years ago they became the property of his son. The latter is now dead, and it has been left to his representatives to right a century-old wrong by restoring the stolen portions to their "Caesar"—the Scottish nation.

HEIR TO THE THRONE OF POLAND

Manila Storeman's Claim

Manila, Aug. 18.

Charles S. Hendel, a clerk in a dry goods store here, claims to be the rightful heir to the throne of Poland, should monarchy ever be proclaimed in that country. Hendel claims to be in possession of papers which will prove that he descended from John III of Poland (Sobieski) who gained the throne of Poland by his victories in 1673 over the Swedes, Tartars and Cossacks and 10 years later the Turks.

Hendel fled from Poland when a boy and went to America, but returned to his native land at the outbreak of the Russo-Japanese war, during which he served in the Russian ambulance corps. He was personally decorated by the Dowager-Empress of Russia.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE END OF THE SESSION

Plethora of Private Members' Bills: The Housing Situation

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

London, Aug. 7.

The situation with regard to the first Session of the Labour Party is not badly summed up by a cartoon in "Punch," in which the Labour maid-of-all-work who is about to leave for her summer holiday, expresses to matronly Britannia the hope that she has been satisfied with what she has done. Britannia remarks, "I will not say, my dear, that you are quite the treasure you represented yourself to be, but at all events I am glad to say that there have not been as many breakages as I expected."

Never has there been such a vast number of Public Bills produced in any Session. When a man has five minutes to spare he sets about evolving a Bill, formally introduces it, and then never troubles about it again. He has had all the limelight he wants from a brief debate on its introduction, and with that he is satisfied. The Government has introduced a few Bills of its own, but very few—it has allowed its followers to introduce them wholesale. The idea in the Ministerial mind is that it will be able to go to the electorate and say: "Here you see the Bills we were allowed to introduce—there you see the Bills which we would have sponsored had we had power as well as office." Let me therefore in the first place carefully summarize what has been done this Session.

Old-Age Pensions.

Under this measure, which is intended to meet the criticism that the present scheme discourages thrift, means derived from any source other than earnings are excluded from calculation in so far as they do not exceed £39 in the case of a single person or £78 per annum in the case of a married couple.

Housing (Financial) Bill.

This, the star measure of the Session, is the Government's contribution to the housing question. It is exceedingly complicated, but, in its broad lines, it takes the regulations as to the size and number of houses per acre of the Conservative proposals of 1923, but greatly increases the subsidy. Under the old proposals £6 a year were to be paid for 20 years; under the new proposals the provision is £9 per year for 40 years, or, if in the agricultural districts, £12 10s. a year for 40 years. The original intention was that all houses should be built by local authorities, and that these only should benefit by the subsidy; the measure has been remodelled largely now to admit of subsidies for private enterprise. The Bill assumes that 2,500,000 houses will be built in 15 years, at a cost to the Exchequer spread over the period from 1924 to 1980, and reaching its maximum from the period 1940 to 1964, when the annual cost will be £23,156,000. At that time the annual cost to the rates will be £11,250,000. Everything turns on whether the men and materials will be available, though nobody anticipates they will. The Government has threatened to pass a Bill controlling the production of all building materials, but has not yet forced it to the front. It has not yet succeeded in making any really satisfactory arrangement for the increase of available workers.

Pensions (Increase) Act.

This is substantially the old Conservative Measure of 1923, though it is not clear how it differs from the original proposals of the last Government, since these were never published. The proposals which have become law are not generous. In the case of the humblest pensioners, they add 20 per cent. only to the 15 per cent. increase in pension enjoyed under the Act of 1920. Other pensioners get less, and those above the same limit as in the Act of 1920 get nothing. The limit above which any increase does not operate is £100.

Unemployment Insurance Acts.

There have been three of these this Session, the main features of which have been (1) increase in the benefits; (2) abolition of the "gap system," so as to make benefit continuous; (3) unrestricted payment of uncovenanted benefit, which means that a man can receive full benefit not for what he has paid into the Fund, but for what he hopes to pay in; (4) modification of the regulation which has hitherto debarred people distantly affected by a strike from receiving unemployment benefit. Generally speaking all these changes mean extra payment of £20,000,000 in unemployment benefit.

The Finance Act.

This Act gave effect to Budget proposals, certain of which, in the shape of relief of taxation, did not need legislative sanction while others did. The main features of the Budget and the Finance Act were the reduction in the duties on tea and sugar, the abandonment of the duties on dried fruits and mineral waters, some very slight modification of the Entertainment Tax, and the dropping of the Inhabited House Duty and the Corporation Profits Tax. In the Finance Act itself as introduced there were few changes, though the Government was obliged to accept the decision of the House that the Entertainment Tax should not be charged on agricultural shows, horticultural shows, educational functions and the like.

Agricultural Wages.

This Act creates local Agricultural Wage Committees which, with a neutral chairman, have the power to fix wages for the district. The Minister will have the power to suggest reconsideration of awards with which he may not agree. The Conservatives successfully opposed the establishment of a Whitehall Central Board with wide powers of interference and the establishment of a minimum wage of 30/- demanded by Liberalism for purely Party purposes.

Of smaller measures the Government has passed the County Courts Act, which establishes the County Court Officials as permanent Civil Servants. It has passed the Diseases of Animals Act, which devoted a large sum of money to compensate farmers whose animals had been slaughtered in connexion with the outbreaks of foot and mouth disease. It has passed the Prevention of Evictions Act, somewhat limiting the powers of landlords to secure possession of their own houses. The Labour Bill itself on this theme proposed that landlords should not be allowed to dispossess unemployed tenants, but the House declined to accept it, and the measure passed is really sponsored by Mr. Ernest Simon, a Manchester Liberal Member. A small meaure has been also carried regularizing the superannuation of school teachers, as well as one or two small Departmental Acts having no public significance.

The Eight-hour Day Bill.

In addition there have been two or three official bills brought into the House, of which the two chief are Mr. Henderson's Factories Bill, legalizing an industrial eight-hours day, and quietly making other drastic changes, and Mr. Wheatley's Buildings Materials (Charges and Supply) Bill, which may later on be the cause of a good deal of trouble. There is no need to touch on the unofficial legislation procession, because very little has been passed. Parties have made a point of objecting to each other's Bills good or bad.

The Labour Party have not, I think, lost any weight in the country. They are very far yet from being found out. They have already, it is true, scrapped nearly all their promises to the electors, but they are coming forward with a lot of nice ones. No one thinks that they will offer these to the electors before the Budget next year, and when this time arrives the various Ministers will, whatever happens, have made quite a useful little pile for themselves. You may not think this is a factor, but it is, since they are subject to the impulses of human nature very much as we, the commoner herd, are also.

THE French aviator, M. Laporte, has broken the world altitude record with a hydroplane carrying a load of 500 kilogrammes, says a Reuter Paris message. M. Laporte, who reached an altitude of 5,100 metres, will depart for China shortly as flying instructor at Mukden.

OUR AUSTRALIAN LETTER

Tangled Politics: Tariff Board Attached: Parliament to be Asked to Reduce British Preference: Crime Wave Follows Melbourne Police Strike

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Melbourne, July 14.

Parliamentary parties in the Commonwealth Government and houses are anxiously awaiting the result of the Inter-state gathering of Farmers' representatives which commences this week. To these gentlemen will be submitted the proposal of the Prime Minister and the Treasurer, as representing the two branches of the ministerialists, that at the next election both sections shall support sitting members, and that second votes, or preferences, shall be exchanged.

The Farmers' Unions of Victoria and Western Australia, especially, object to this arrangement as calculated to lesson the chances of their increasing their numbers and so becoming an important party; in some of the city and suburbam electorates around Melbourne the argument is used by the Nationalists—or other section—that the agreement is equally harmful to their prospects of becoming or remaining one of the great political parties of the Commonwealth. Thus neither section is unanimously supporting the Bruce-Page Pact, as it is called, and it is quite likely that the two ministers will find some compromise that will prevent the early dissolution of the Cabinet, which must follow upon a straight-out repudiation of the Pact by the inter-state farmers' conference.

As to the Labour party it resembles the bird of prey, which, sitting on a tree, overlooks the struggle between the two lords of a flock, awaiting the result merely to swoop down and pick out the eyes of the defeated and harry the fleeing remnants of his following. Indeed the bird is getting restive on its perch. It believes the time for its sanguinary feast is near, and in parliament is threatening to create a series of those uproarious scenes, which are Labour's chief evidence that it has been grossly mishandled by the representatives of capitalism.

Mr. Anstey, who is to be acting leader of the Labour Opposition in the House of Representatives, has already warned the Government that his following will compel the application of the "gag" until every member has been expelled from the House. If Mr. Bruce, the Prime Minister is wise, he will have his legislative measures so well prepared that their introduction and passage, while Mr. Anstey and his following are in suspension, will present no serious difficulties. It may be interesting, as illuminating the character of the acting leader of Labour, during Mr. Charlton's absence, to remind ourselves that it was Mr. Anstey who was regarded as personally responsible for the bogus telegram from Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, practically advising the least possible attention being paid to the visit of the Special Service squadron of the British fleet. It will be remembered that the British Prime Minister declared the whole message an "unmitigated lie."

What Labour Suspects.

Until one has heard Labour members make speeches on the subject of banking, he can have no idea how absolutely rotten financial society is. In connexion with the Commonwealth Bank Bill the Opposition fiercely opposed the substitution of a Board of Directors for a single Governor, though it was quite prepared to prove that the single governor—even of its own creation—failed to do all that was expected of him, was guilty of nepotism and harsh treatment of the Bank's employees.

Had some other Government (not Labour) appointed him any one of these offences or failures would have raised an absolute clamour of protest, and a condemnation of single control. But when the Government proposed a directorate of business men representing various interests, the Labour Opposition saw in the Bill a deliberate attempt to hand the infant bank over to the strangling propensities of wicked persons who had interests in other banks, owned by private corporations. Members juggled with millions of credits and debits, and talked about the national bank and the People's Bank, but they never got very far from the accusation that the Government proposed to kill the Commonwealth Bank. They did not appear to realize that they themselves by their speeches went nearer to performing the happy despatch than any directorate of business men of high standing could do.

The Government were accused of being bushrangers, and it was asserted that the directors would go on to the Board with nothing in their pockets, and in a year or so come off it with their pockets bulging with loot. And, be it noted, the Australian Labour Party arrogates to itself the right to lead in international affairs, and be considered the finest example of the intelligent working man coming into his own. The Government had to apply the guillotine provisions of the Standing Orders so as to cut the travesty on debate short, and get the measure through the Representatives. Though the Opposition violently protested against the guillotine, so much so that the Speaker had to threaten to suspend the sittings, it was probably very glad that a Bill, about which it understood so little, was well out of the way.

The Preliminary Budget.

Though it has its disadvantages the Commonwealth Treasurer has again this year made a sort of preliminary statement as to the financial position. The result has shown that the past year closed with an accumulated surplus of at least £10,000,000, and that had certain moneys—safe and due—arrived by June 30, the balance would have been more like £12,500,000. Of course this information sets the country agog—more agog than is useful.

The Taxpayers' Association claim that such wealth means the reduction of taxation, while the mere contemplation of so much money means that small demands upon the Treasury of six months ago are now doubled. The State of Tasmania actually threatens to drift and drift (under a Labour Government) to financial disaster, if it is not granted by the Commonwealth an annual gift of £200,000 a year for 10 years. The island State has already received over a million from the Commonwealth. This sudden demand for two millions takes one's breath away, and is only explainable by the fact that the very version of the enormous accumulated surplus of the Commonwealth has acted like the news of an inheritance does upon all needy relatives.

Already there is evidence that Tasmania will get a "cut" out of the surplus, the citrus-growers are to get £10,000, also the hop-growers as a guarantee on their exports, and so forth and so on. With these claims, especially coming from the primary producers, who are the Treasurer's particular care, it is by no means certain that the demand for reduced taxation will be complied with. Indeed there is reason to suppose that the broad policy of the Government is to collect all the revenue it can for the purpose of meeting the demands created by the promises to place the primary producers on a footing equal with that of the protected manufacturers.

In Dr. Page's table of figures it is worth noting that bounties on iron and steel products show an increase over 1922-23 of something like £100,000, which encourage one to hope that these industries are not in such a bad way as the Tariff Board seems to think.

Agitation for Increased Tariffs.

One cannot ignore the attitude taken up by the Tariff Board, in its last annual report. The Board was created chiefly for the purpose of interpreting the doubtful wording of the schedule of duties, and then for the purpose of advising the Minister on the general working of the tariff.

The report, which has just been tabled in Parliament, is an unusual document. It declares that the chief attacks made upon the Board come from those importers who were busy trading with ex-enemy countries or countries with greatly depreciated currencies, and their criticism of the Board was largely due to its efficiency in carrying out the provisions of the Australian Industries Preservation (Anti-Dumping) Act. The Board, however, seems very doubtful as to the future of iron and steel, and other products where cheap material semi-manufactured in countries with depreciated currency comes into Australia under the conditions of preference to British goods, because the last 25 per cent. of their cost has been incurred in Britain.

Parliament is to be asked to reduce the British preference, so that the £8,000,000 a year which we now forego as preference to British should not chiefly go to helping foreign countries at our own expense.

The Board also reports that several of the primary industries are seeking increased protection, and some even an embargo upon imports. Amongst the productions, which after supplying local requirements have to export, and for which increased duties are sought, are dried fruits, maize, butter, sugar, etc. The Board's report states that it is considering some method of protecting industries without greatly increasing local costs, and it seems possible that a plan like that adopted in regard to sugar may be recommended.

In the case of sugar, which is under a Board of Control representing all sections of the industry and selling through what is really a compulsory pool, there is an embargo on imports and prices are fixed at which the Board can sell in Australia. The effect of this was to stabilize the price of raw sugar at £27 a ton, though last February the world's price was £30 and to-day it is £17. Nearly all last year Australians obtained their sugar at beneath world's party, but now that they are paying above it there is considerable outcry. The higher price, however, does not affect consumption, and rebates are granted on the sugar contents of such exports as jams, canned fruits, confectionary, biscuits and preserved milk. It is a popular belief that to reduce prices is necessarily to increase consumption, but in a country such as Australia with its high wages and high standard of living the cheapness of the local production turns the consumer to the imported article.

Heavy Falls of Snow.

Most people know that there are a few isolated places in Australia where snow falls for a few weeks every year, but generally speaking the present is a record winter for bitter weather. It follows upon an unusually cool summer. The mountain resorts of Victoria and New South Wales have had heavy falls of snow, and even special trains have been run out to the nearest stations in order that the citizens who have never actually seen snow may make its acquaintance.

There have so far been few accidents. At Mount Buffalo, in the Victorian dividing range, 5,300 feet high, a fatal accident happened the other day, when Dr. Varley, a Melbourne medico, essayed to descend a particularly steep gorge with an almost perpendicular slope of 2,000 feet. Right at the very top he managed to slip, lost his balance and fell headlong. His body was eventually found where it had been caught by a slight ledge 400 feet down. The place was very difficult to reach, and the efforts put forth by those who descended by ropes to reach him were heroic.

An even worse mishap was very narrowly avoided in the case of three young men, who lost their way amidst the snow and for six days were absolutely without food and only subsisted on water. When found they were utterly exhausted and suffering from the cold and privation. They were not tourists but simply young men looking for work.

Trams v. Buses.

The cynical onlooker in Melbourne is thoroughly enjoying himself to-day observing the fierce controversy which has arisen out of the recent tram strike in the city. The strike was caused because a man who had disobeyed orders had been sacked. With the stoppage of the trams the motor-'bus started—largely experimentally—but it was soon apparent that it had come to stay. The trams resumed, but the employes soon saw that the 'bus was going to be a very serious competitor. At once the official press of the Tramway Association demanded that the 'buses be taxed off the roads. Melbourne howled with delight at this sudden Trades Hall sympathy with capital's representatives. The Tramway Trust approached the matter more earnestly, and tried to explain that if the tramways were driven out there would be an additional £1,000,000 to be found in direct taxations. It seems that, unknown to themselves, the users of the tramways were contributing nearly £100,000 a year to the State Treasury, a similar amount to the rates of the city and suburban councils, and also keeping their own roads in repair—roads which were used by the general public almost as much as by the trams. Now those who travel by tram want to know why these extra payments have been made with the consequent inability of the Trust to reduce fares. The newspapers add to the general hilarity. Those which have always declared against all government or municipal enterprise, who pin their faith to private enterprises, are in a quandary. If they support private enterprise they are going to raise the municipal rates on property, so they declare that the Tramway Trust should run its own 'buses. But the Trust has let the private 'buses get ahead of it, and though it has ordered some 50 or so to be delivered as quickly as possible, it sees its competitors well "dug in" before it can get them on the streets.

The Trust proposes that special taxes should be placed on 'buses, and that they should be driven off those streets where they are likely to come into competition with the tram 'buses. The public is by no means indifferent, even if it is amused, and any serious attempt to deprive it of its 'bus services will be very strenuously opposed.

Armed Robberies Daily.

Whether the police strike in Melbourne has had any influence in the matter, it cannot be said, but there is certainly an unpleasant activity amongst armed criminals, especially in the suburbs.

The other Sunday three masked men forced their way into the private premises of a barber, where there was a small crowd of men playing cards, fired a revolver to enforce their orders to put up hands, and then methodically searched and robbed every person present of any valuables.

In one evening no fewer than three robberies by armed men were committed in suburban streets, and judging by the newspapers, robberies—successful or thwarted—are of almost daily occurrence.

The police have succeeded in putting away for six months one notorious criminal, a man who was alleged to be the brains of several desperate crimes, including that for which the man Murray was hanged not so long ago.

Taylor or "Sqizzy" as he was called, had been in the public eye for a long time. He absconded from bail and was able to clude the police for months, though he used to write letters to the Press, and explain that when he had attended to some private affairs of his own he would give himself up.

He did give himself up eventually, and the police appear to have rewarded him by keeping a particularly close watch on his movements. He has been arrested about 20 times since, but has always evaded conviction. Murray was arrested in the house occupied by Taylor, but they failed to convict the latter of harbouring Murray. Then the police prosecuted Taylor for occupying a house frequented by thieves and a petty sessions court sentenced him to six months, and to be dealt with as an habitual criminal.

Taylor appealed, arguing that he was not occupying the house, and did not necessarily know that reputed thieves frequented it. A supreme court judge upheld the conviction and sentence, but seeing that Taylor had not been convicted of any serious crime since December, 1917, quashed that part of the sentence treating him as an habitual criminal.

There was much mystery surrounding "Squizzy," the public having an idea that he was a master criminal who stood in with the police on occasion. Buckley, the man who actually killed the Glenferrie bank manager, was believed to have stayed at Taylor's house, but he has never been caught. Taylor is said to have owned many motor-cars, and to have dodged the police by driving in one, and then changing into another. He was supposed to have driven one without lights which killed a woman, and refused to stop, but the prosecution for this was eventually abandoned. He is a small and quite insignificant-looking man, but his story, if written as to half the affairs with which he is said to have been mixed up, would outrival the most lurid shilling shocker. He described himself as a clerk working for his brother, who was a book-maker.

PROHIBITION IN CANADA

Rejected by Saskatchewan After Four Years Trial

Regina, Sask, July 17.

Voters of Saskatchewan refuted a temperance act of four years' standing in a plebiscite yesterday by a majority that approached a landslide, it was indicated to-day as further computation of the vote was made.

The act was condemned both by City and country, with four of the leading cities rejecting the act by almost 10,000 majority.

Asking for a decisive expression of opinion through the plebiscite, the Government intimated no change in the present temperance act would be given until such a dicision was made. The present vote leaves no doubt that the changes are greatly desired.

A vote in favour of prohibition of 36,385, and of 53,657 against was reported from 830 polls out of 2,581, with indications of an increase against the dry act as votes continued to dribble in.—Reuter's American Service.

Omaha, Neb., July 29.

Thirteen Sleek rats, penned in a cage in a chemist's laboratory, were instrumental in government agents obtaining conviction of an Omaha man and his wife on a liquor selling charge, with subsequent sentence of a year in jail and a heavy fine for each in federal court.

The question of sampling the liquor which the pair sold was brought up in court, and to determine whether it was fit for human consumption, the agents submitted it to a chemist. He fed it to the rats and then watched their reaction.

The rodents displayed many of the characteristics of an intoxicated human, the chemist reported. Not one died, rather they all thrived, he declared on the witness stand. Although defence counsel questioned the admissibility of the experiment as evidence, it was allowed to stand as indicating the potency and possibilities of the liquor for beverage purposes.—Reuter's American Service.

PAUL ON JESTING

Notes of a Sermon Preached on in Union Church, Tientsin, on June 15 by the Rev. C. E. Darwent

Ephesians V. 3; "Jesting, which is not befitting."

It is astonishing what an amount of excellent and valuable matter is permanently lost to the world in the monthly magazines. Nearly every month, there is in magazines like the "Contemporary Review" or "Nineteenth Century and After," an article so full of thought, so timely, that it ought to be printed in millions of copies and distributed as widely as possible. Explorers are busy digging up buried cities, like Carthage, and so I want to make you grateful to me, for digging up, and bringing to light an article buried in the May number of the "Nineteenth Century After" which cannot have been seen by 999 out of the 1,000 eyes of people, who grievously need to read it. Indeed, we all need to read it. Its title is "The Bible and the Jester." It is by one, Vernon Rendall. "Vernon" is rather a favourite pen-name of lady writers, witness, "Vernon Lee." However, we shall take for granted that the writer is a man, and say "he."

The Spice of Irreverence.

Vernon Rendall is troubled, as he may well be, by the growing jesting references to the Bible in public speeches and in print. It has been so for a generation. It is getting worse. Democracy has many virtues, but it does not seem to have made for reverence in its allusions to sacred things. A speaker has to make a hit, if he can, and he finds too often, that a spice of irreverence, euphemistically called "daring," is a great help.

It is often said that the Bible is not known as it once was. Whatever truth there may be in that statement, the fact remains that it is far better known than any other book, and allusions to its incidents are picked up more quickly by an English-speaking audience than allusions to any other book. And so the temptation to all kinds of speakers to raise a laugh at the expense of some of its telling incidents and phrases, proves overwhelming. People say, what a clever speaker he is to make us laugh over a book that our fathers used to call, "Holy Bible, book divine."

Petty Blasphemy in Parliament.

Let us take examples. There are election misuses of the Bible. I remember a very popular one in the first great Home Rule debate. There was a great changing of sides politically. Many Liberals became Unionists. Then someone, describing a Liberal, who had gone over, said he had "Found salvation." This caught on amazingly. People who ought to have known better used it freely.

Now, considering what the New Testament means by "finding salvation," was it "fitting" to use it of a political act? Think of all it meant when the mighty soul of Saul of Tarsus found salvation; when he saw the Lord Jesus himself on his way to Damascus, and the man's whole nature was transfigured! Jesus said His whole business was to "save" men; He died to save us. All the agony on the cross was to enable us sinners to "find salvation," from sin, guilt and the wrath to come. Yes; it was surely" not befitting" to use the sacred phrase to raise a clap-trap laugh.

Mr. Rendall quotes Parliamentary speeches as increasingly sinning in this way. He quotes a scoffing reference to the Sermon on the Mount, I think, as "not practical politics." Why, even the port-drinking Parliament of 100 years ago, would have been ashamed of saying that. Pitt, Fox, Sheridan, with a couple of bottles of port inside them, could not have said that.

He quotes a recent case. A member of Parliament of the Jewish faith was greeted on rising with cries of, "Who killed Christ?" I wonder, did the member, who shouted that out first, care two pence who killed Christ? As Mr. Rendall says, "Joke on the Trinity, and it will go down."

We find the same thing in a great deal of our humorous literature. There is the famous riddle by Mark Twain, "Where are the English named in the Bible?" The answer is, "The meek shall inherit the earth." I remember that coming out. Clever, no doubt; but Mark Twain had such an overflowing spring of real fun and humour in him, that he might have let that pass, even when it occurred to him. He was so rich in humour that he might have remembered that if he himself had no faith in the New Testament, in Jesus Christ, his readers had. It was "not befitting," when we remember who said that the Lord of all, the Son of God who came from God to save us.

Mark Twain an Offender.

We find the same tendency in the drama. Would plays entitled "Salomé" or "Methuselah" have been allowed 100 years ago? I doubt it. The Bible can be used rightly. The old Masters painted its scenes seriously and reverently. The peasants at Ober-Ammergau act Bible scenes with the greatest decorum. But these cases are entirely different from the use of them to raise a cheap laugh. They make for reverence; the latter does not.

And altogether apart from the cases of jesting at Bible subjects, we must all see, that there is such a straining all round to raise a laugh, that the temptation to raise one at the expense of things that ought to be spared the degradation is a very severe one. It may be as well, at this point, to say a word about this matter of "raising a laugh." Henry Ward Beecher once put it very well. He said, "It is one thing to say something in order to make people laugh, but quite another to to say a thing, that is so true that people cannot help laughing when they hear it. "God has so made us that one method human nature employs to signify its recognition of a truth is a smile. We all have heard preachers, like the Rev. W. L. Watkinson, who keep us smiling all the time we are listening. They are so pithy and pointed and apt. That is good. It is entirely different from the irreverent use of sacred things just to make people laugh.

St. Paul on Jesting.

Paul is not condemning all jesting, let us notice. He only condemns jesting that is bad, "not befitting." This implies that there is jesting, that is befitting.

Surely there is! Real jesting is one of God's best gifts to us. We have to thank the men who have the gift. Real jests don't violate anything sacred. They play like lights on the ordinary things of life, and are a "joy for ever." There is one by the late Sir Thomas Chambers, who was for years Recorder of the City of London. He had a seaside house at Rottingdean. In a neighbouring house was a family of very stout people, parents and children all stout. They went down to bathe every day in their bathing suits, and returned home to dress. Sir Thomas said, "They go down fat, and return dripping." Brilliant is the man, and a benefactor to the rest of us dull people, who can turn out things like that. What real pleasure Lamb has given to four generations of men by his answer to the doctor who advised him to "take a walk on an empty stomach." Lamb asked, "On whose?" Or the answer of the great Artemus Ward to a lecture agent, who telegraphed to him to ascertain what Ward's terms would be for a 40 night's lecture engagement. The agent's telegram was, "What will you take for 40 nights?" The great Artemus's reply, "Whisky and water" when published made the fortune of the series. No wonder! There is a jesting then that is fitting, a joy, a sparkle in the drab round of life, that injures no sacred thing. All this may be taken as the first reason against irreverent or semi-irreverent jesting. Life is so full of opportunities for the real innocent joy-creating jesting, by anyone who has the capacity for it, that there seems no excuse for the kind of jesting Vernon Rendall condemns. If you cannot be funny except by riskiness and semi-blasphemy, do not be funny at all.

An Example from the Classics.

Paul says, that such jesting is not "befitting." What is the exact meaning of that? The word he uses is eutrepalia. It is from eu, well, and trepo, to turn. So the fitting is the well-turned, the well balanced. Fitting conduct, is just the right conduct for the occasion. Sometimes you cannot exactly give the reason why a certain line of speech or conduct is wrong, but you feel it is wrong. It is'nt seemly. The best illustration, that I can remember is from Thucydides, the entertaining old Greek historian. A young man had made a very brilliant engagement to a charming and wealthy lady. He was so pleased, says Thucydides, that he danced for joy and wound up by standing on his head on the table. Whereupon the young lady's father said to him, "You have danced away your wedding." Yes, it is perhaps hard to set out a list of arguments showing, that it is is a wrong thing to stand on your head, if you can do it, but all the same, it was "not befitting." The lady's father was right. There was a lack of dignity and seemliness in it. That is what Paul says about jesting of certain sorts, it is "not befitting."

And no one, who has any serious views on this great thing that we call life and religion, can deny that he is right. I read that Athenaeus, an old grammarian, says that Paul's word is, midway between coarseness, or boorishness and low-down vulgarity, the latter word being from Bomos, an altar. It appears, that the riffraff of cities used to crowd round the altars to pick up bits of meat and any old offal. And the Greeks meant that irreverent jokers were like this rabble. They will snatch at anything to serve their purpose. Do not be like that. As Mr. Rendall says, boys have not had their sense of reverence cultivated. Perhaps, that is the one faculty that is the last to be developed in any one of us. So, as he says, boys would play at hide-and-seek in Westminster Abbey; but what should we think of grown men and women who did that? Unbefitting jesting is just so. It is playing with the great serious things that give life its salt, its nobleness, its grandeur. And the surest way to cease to have any reverence for anything at all, in heaven or on earth, is to jest at the Bible, its story and its words.

Playing with Great Things of Life.

Jesting at sacred things is "not befitting," as we must all feel, on account of the dignity and greatness of divine things. There is a right and a wrong attitude to be taken in regard to everything according to its measure. It is not right to be always joking and jesting about the great things of human life, let alone the great facts and truths of religion. Life is a happy experience if we take God's view of it, as He has revealed it; and religion is no kill-joy, but life has its roots in tremendous realities. God is our Maker and Father. He is august in His love and glory. Reverence and respect are due to Him. He is not a force. He is a Person, who can be pleased and grieved. "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain."

Don't imagine that this old Commandment is abolished. It is "not befitting" to treat lightly the name of one's own father, man though he be. Much less the name of God. Take the Bible. What a position it holds in the world, the stay and light to the soul of millions, if not, alas, to some people.

You remember the story of Sir Walter Scott. When dying he asked his son-in-law to read to him. Unguardedly Lockhart asked what book he should read from. "There is only one book for a man in my case," said the saintly Sir Walter. It is "not befitting" to jest at a book like that. It is like joking at a death or at the ruin of Yokohama by the earthquake. People, who did it have lost all sense of spiritual values. Jesus Christ is too great, his words too vital to be turned to folly. He did say when He was here that a man shall give account "of every idle word" he speaks. That saying, if literally true, is enough to paralyse us all with dread. In any case, it must have some profound truth as to the assessment at the last day of our lives, to stop all "unbefitting jesting" with divine things. As Mr. Rendall says pithily, "Who spits at a rose?" But that is just what "unbefitting jesting" at sacred things is.

The Importance of Reverence.

Jesting at sacred things is unfitting for our own sakes. Those who do it habitually come to have nothing sacred left. Their life is like a countryside at Vancouver that I saw. It was nothing but a sweep of gaunt and burnt stumps of what had been splendid trees. So it is with the soul, that never takes anything seriously. It is nothing but a sweep of moral imbecilities and follies, instead of the lordly trees of reverence, faith, and hope.

Lord Beaconsfield once said a wonderful thing, that we are great or mean according to the number of things we reverence. How true! No wonder many people cannot find God. Jesus says that if you seek God in the right way, with the appropriate state of mind, you cannot help finding Him. People as for proofs and evidence. But it is as Dr. Glover of Cambridge says, "If a man be candid with himself, if he faces the common facts of life with seriousness and in the doing of duty, perplexities vanish."

The way to find Christ as Saviour is to go to Him in a reverent and humble spirit, to familiarize yourself with Him and His truth. Then either like the leaven, gradually, or like a lightning flash, as in the case of Paul, you will feel His power in new thoughts, new outlook, new everything. But this will never happen to us if we are given to "jesting that is not befitting."

Finally I think we shall all agree that this better and more reverent attitude to sacred things is what the world needs to-day. There does seem to be abroad a spirit that takes nothing seriously. Man's responsibilty to God, the eternal consequences of sin, indeed the sense of evil as sin against God, seem under eclipse. Fun is made of all kinds of venerable and sacred things which are the rock foundations of human life, law, ancient morals, purity, marriage and all the rest. We can all do something, at any rate, towards bringing back the truer way, and that without letting life lose its brightness.

EGYPT'S DEMAND FOR THE POSSESSION OF THE SUDAN

The Reasons Why England Will Not Withdraw

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

Manchester, Aug. 1.

Egypt has virtually recovered her independence from England. This result was made certain by the war. The same impetus which led to the success of the Swaraj movement in India and the recovery by Afghanistan of her complete sovereignty, caused a Home Rule agitation in Egypt so strong and persistent that England had eventually to yield to it. Egypt is now, for all practical purposes, ruled by her favourite peasant son, Saad Zaghlul Pasha, and the treaty with England, so far as Egypt herself is concerned, will certainly be consummated before long. But at the last moment, so to speak, a new and serious difficulty crops up. What is to become of the Sudan? Egypt demands it for her own. England will not surrender her control. For the time there is an impasse.

Since 1899 the title of the territory has been "The Anglo-Egyptian Sudan." It is what is called a "condominium," being ruled jointly by Egypt and England. Thus, the Governor-General is appointed by the Sultan of Egypt but the Sultan must, under the treaty of 1899, appoint the man (always a general) whom England nominates. The Governor-General is both civil ruler and General Commanding the Garrison. He is really an absolute ruler and the proclamations which he issues have the force of law. There is thus no doubt about England's legal position. The same treaty stipulates expressly that England "by right of conquest" is entitled "to share in the present settlement and future working and development of the system of administration and legislation." The "right of conquest" was obtained when England broke the Dervishes and recovered the Sudan which Egypt had possessed but had lost by a long course of weakness and mismanagement.

Egypt's Tyrannous Misrule

Egypt had held and ruled the Sudan from 1820 for a period of 60 years before the rise of the Mahdi drove her out. She had failed completely in the enterprise. The Sudan had at one time a population of eight and a half million inhabitants. It is a vast country about two-thirds the size of China, being nearly 1,200 miles long by a thousand miles broad containing a million square miles of territory of which only a small part, from lack of irrigation, is cultivated or occupied. In the south it stretches right down into Central Africa and includes great tracts of desert and swamps and forest. In the north its inhabitants are Moslem and by descent largely Arab—fierce, fanatic tribesmen, born fighting men and robbers, ignorant and superstitious, and the ready prey of any religious prophet or impostor. In the south they are mostly pagan blacks. General Gordon declared that the Sudan was, and always would be, "useless." Egypt, so long as she ruled there, found it only useful for the slave-trade and it was under Egyptian rule that the slave-trade flourished in its most luxuriant and most horrible forms in the Sudan. From 1820 to 1885 the Egyptian Pashas sought from the Sudan nothing but gold and slaves and gave it nothing but oppression and misrule.

It was for this reason that the Mahdi and after him the Khalifa found it easy to win over the Sudan tribes to revolt against Egypt. At the height of their power they had the whole of the Sudan in their hands and even threatened Egypt itself with invasion. The last effort of the Egyptians by themselves to hold the Sudan resulted in the absolute annihilation of Hides Pasha and his army of 10,000 men. After that came the Gordon Expedition, the fall of Khartoum, and the abandonment of the Sudan until England took the problem in hand, sent Kitchener and his army and defeated the Dervish power at the battle of Omdurman.

The Revival Under Britain

It is estimated that under the Egyptian régime the population of the Sudan sank altogether from eight and a half millions to almost one and a half. Three and a half millions had died of famine and disease and nearly as many from warfare of various kinds, especially the continual warring between the tribes. As a result of the peace which English rule has given to the Sudan the population has now grown to between five and six millions.

As the demand of Egypt, voiced by Zaghlul Pasha, is that the Sudan should be handed back to the undivided control of Egypt and England be eliminated it is reasonable to describe the sort of things which took place in the Sudan when Egyptian authority had broken down and the tribes were left to their own devices. The story has been told by Lord Cromer, the organizer of modern Egypt, in his book. Sir Reginald Wingate visited in 1902 a district which had previously contained 800 villages; he found that not one of them remained. In the Berber region villages which had produced 500 fighting men had now only from 50 to 60 adults, or even less. The town of Metemmeh, which formerly had a large population, had only 1,300 inhabitants when Lord Cromer visited it after the battle of Omdurman and of these 1,300 only 150 were men. Metemmeh had belonged to the tribe of the Jaalin which had revolted against the Khalifa and had, in consequence, been almost exterminated. These cases illustrate the devastation which went on in the Sudan until its reconquest by the British, to which of course Egypt contributed a certain number of troops.

For over 20 years now the British Government has, through the Governor-General, ruled the Sudan and given it peace. Egypt has supplied the troops of occupation and has paid about a million pounds a year for their upkeep. She is fully entitled to her share in the "condominium." But it is not disputed that the marvellous progress which the Sudan has made is due to the administration and the quietude which have been the fruits of the British control.

The Land of Superstition

The first of all needs in the Sudan is to maintain order, prevent inter-tribal fighting and suppress at once any religious imposter like the Mahdi who may arise. A false prophet who is not taken in hand immediately will always find a dangerous supply of material among the fanatical tribesmen and there have, as a matter of fact, been one or two imposters of the kind since the fall of the Mahdi who have had to be handled very firmly. It has to be remembered not only that many of the Southern Sudanese are pagans and savages, natives not of northern but of Central Africa, but that virtually all the Sudanese are ignorant and superstitious in the extreme, as the following instance may show:—

"A Shillouk named Kwab Wad Awaibung was tried on the charge of murdering Ajak Wad Deng. He pleaded guilty and made the following statement:—

"'The murdered Ajak Wad Deng owed me a sheep, but would not pay me. He said he would show me his work, and next day my son was eaten by a crocodile, which was, of course, the work of Ajak Wad Deng, and for that reason I killed him. We had had a feud for years, as I was a more successful hippopotamus-hunter than he was, and for that reason he was practising witchery over me and my family.'

"Mr. Bonham Carter, the Legal Secretary of the Sudan Government, in reporting on this case, said:—'The accused's belief that the crocodile was acting as agent of the murdered man in killing the accused's son was supported by several other witnesses, and represents a common local belief.'"

British Suppression of Slavery.

Having preserved peace and order, the next duty of the British was to abolish the slave-trade, which under the Egyptian régime had been the course of the country. (There was a great and notorious slave-market at Khartoum). Slavery has been abolished almost completely. It is necessary to say "almost" because the Sudan is so vast that it is not yet possible to eliminate every vestige of slave-raiding along the borderland between Abyssinia and the Sudan. Here, at all events, a great and beneficent work has been accomplished.

With peace maintained and the slave-trade crushed, the principal needs of the Sudan are population, irrigation and development by means of foreign capital. The population is now rapidly recovering. Irrigation works on a great scale are being carried out. The dam and reservoir which are in course of construction at Makwar on the Nile will irrigate 300,000 acres of what should prove to be most valuable land and will provide water during the months in which at the present time the Sudan cannot have Nile-water because of the superior needs of Egypt herself. Cotton-growing is a rising and important interest in the Sudan and foreign capital will be increasingly attracted to it provided that there is a proper security in the shape of a stable, upright and orderly administration. Schools, colleges (there is a famous Gordon College at Khartoum) and a good judicial system are other fruits of the "condominium" of the last 25 years. It is these fruits, and the future of the Sudan in general, that are in the balance when Egypt demands the undivided possession of the country.

The Peace that Britain Keeps.

The population of the Sudan is not Egyptian at all. On racial grounds Egypt has no title to it. It is, as India has been, and still is, a medley of tribes and races where a "Roman peace" is kept by the British. Just as, if the British were compelled completely to evacuate India, the most probable result would be an invasion from the north and the subjugation of the Hindus by the Moslems, so it is almost certain that the Sudan, once the British had gone, would overthrow the weaker and softer Egyptians, and if an actual invasion of Egypt did not follow, wars and anarchy would follow in the Sudan as they did in the last 20 years of the 19th century. All the civilization which has been growing up since 1899—the works alike of commercial enterprise, of education and of good government—would be swept away. There would be an infinite possibility of international friction.

It is quite certain that to "get out" of the Sudan at the present moment is a thing which England has made her mind up not to do.

,, 30th at 7.5 p.m.

Mars Still Highly Brilliant.

Mars, which has been very near our earth at the close of the preceding month, remains still very bright, diminishing slightly in brilliancy towards the end. During the month the planet will be visible throughout the whole might, rising on the first about 6 p.m., and setting the next morning at 5 a.m. At the close of the month, it hastens its rising, and sets in the early morning about 3 a.m.

Venus at Greatest Elongation West.

Venus, which was in inferior conjunction with the sun on July 1, became henceforth a morning star, and moved westwards, crossing the constellations Gemini, Cancer and entering Leo. Here it attains its greatest elongation towards the West, 46°, on the 11th. After this long swing to the West, the planet speeds away in space, returning on its orbit till it reaches its next superior conjunction. From inferior to superior conjunction Venus is West of the son and a morning star; from superior to inferior conjunction, it moves Eastwards from the sun, and is an evening star.

Square of Pegasus Visible to Northeast.

The Great Square of Pegasus is well visible this month, and may be observed at 9 p.m., midway up in the north-eastern quadrant. The constellation is a little below Andromeda, and above Pisces. It contains 4 brilliant stars, all of the second magnitude. Alpheratz. in the head of Andromeda, Algenib, both forming the Eastern horns; Markab and Scheat on the Western side. The constellation once observed may be followed with the naked eye till the end of the year.

The Autumn Equinox.

At the autumnal equinox the sun crosses the line, moving South on its orbit. Autumn commences at the same time in the North temperate zone, and Spring in the South temperate one. The days and nights are equal over the whole earth, the sun rising at 6 a.m., and setting about the same time in the afternoon, exactly in the East and West, where the equinoctial line intersects the horizon.

AMATEUR PHOTOGRAPHY

VIII.—On Projection Printing

By R. V. Dent.

By means of projection printing through a lens, enlargement and reduction is available to the photographer. Brought to its present state of perfection comparatively recently, it has enabled the hand-camera to do all the work formerly done by large, cumbersome cameras, do it better, and perform much work no large stand-camera could ever do. The perfecting of the hand-camera has taken place contemporaneously with the development of projection printing until we have now reached the point where 95 per cent. of the finest exhibition work is done by hand-cameras using plates or films about 80 per cent. of which are quarter-plate or smaller. Projection printing alone made this possible.

Enlarging or reducing is nothing more nor less than re-photographing, the process being the exact reverse of photographing through a camera; the negative is the object photographed while the enlargement or reduction is the image produced. The body of the camera is replaced by the dark-room or dark-box while the lens remains the same. It is an entire error to assume, as many amateurs do, that definition is necessarily inferior in an enlargement as compared to a contact print. On the contrary, the definition as such is superior to a contact print, amazing as it seems. The idea of loss of definition per se comes from inaccurate observation; indistinctness due to magnification on such a scale that the actual grain of the photographic film becomes visible is not loss of definition; it is simply a physical limitation inherent in the nature of the medium; but "graininess" showing is a proof of extreme definition.

It is overcome by using rough paper or softening by diffusion. The more experienced a photographer becomes the more he realizes that extreme sharpness and definition is not as a rule desirable and is only required for strictly record, commercial, or technical work and scarcely ever for any kind of pictorial effects. Hence the popularity of rough paper, diffusion, and some control processes. It must not, however, be overdone as general blurriness is not at all desirable. In much of the best work it is so skilfully achieved that the observer is not aware that any softening has been done; all he knows is that for some reason the result is more pleasing to him than the average photograph.

Projection printing is the greatest of all control processes available to the photographer who wishes to produce a desired effect by purely photographic means and the result of which is entirely photographic. Light and shade, definition, and relative values are controlled while the perfection of photographic truth of image and outline is retained. All this is what the process is capable of; we are not assuming for a moment that these powers are generally availed of; indeed, it is the exception. But we state them in the hope that the keen amateur will see possibilities in enlarging which he has hitherto neither utilized nor even anticipated.

The Various Types.

Pages could be filled in a discussion as to the merits and demerits of the various types of apparatus available for projection printing, but it can all be found in text-books on the subject. Briefly, the types are the enlarging camera, the camera itself used as an enlarger, the fixed-magnification box-form, the self-focussing made for limited magnification for the amateur, the same type much larger made for commercial use, and the lantern with condenser type with all movements. For the amateur desirous of apparatus with unlimited scope the last-named is far and away the best in every way.

Usually the amateur must work by artificial light so this eliminates the box-form type except for Saturdays and Sundays; also control is next to impossible. But it is splendid for those workers who need only occasional enlargements resembling contact prints. Very excellent work of that type can be done with these box-form enlargers and they are very reasonable in price. In all enlarging a dark-room is required for loading and unloading the plate or paper used.

Enlarging cameras are cumbersome and practically only used for the production of enlarged negatives for processes requring contact printing. Such enlarged negatives can of course be produced by any other enlarging apparatus.

Using the camera itself as an enlarger is perfectly satisfactory if suitable illumination can be arranged; sun-light is usually used in which case the worker is limited as regards working-time. The small auto-focus enlargers are beautifully simple to use and within their capacity are ideal; but their scope is necessarily limited and large-scale work from a portion of a negative cannot be done by them.

The lantern type, with large condensers. . . . at least as large as the diagonal of the plate or film. . . . medium-power illumination (say 100 c.p.) anastigmatic lense of about f.6.3, rising and falling front, rising, swing, and revolving carrier, with sufficient extension for reduction and slide--making, mounted on runners and used with a rising and swing easel,describes an ideal outfit and is the type used by the best workers. With it any degree of magnification can be attained and moderate distortion corrected. All composition should be done on the easel before printing, in composing within the work a mask should be used. This is very much better than masking the negative. Too powerful a light is a disadvantage as exposures become unmanageably fast.

This is all we need say here regarding apparatus. The important thing is to know to use it. All that was said about bromide printing in the article on printing is taken as noted, and we shall not repeat it again except to stress the point that full development and correct exposures are essential to fine bromide prints. Use the system previously outlined to arrive at correct exposures; in enlarging the use of one sheet for a test is a great economy as the paper is expensive.

The Best Negative.

An important point for the worker who makes enlargements from his best negatives is that over-developed negatives of heavy contrast will not give good enlargements. A rather soft negative is required, as for some reason all projection-printing increases contrasts. Thus negatives intended for making enlargements must on no account be over-developed. It is possible to make projection-prints from harsh negatives, notably by the chromic acid (Sterry's) process, but it is troublesome to say the least and all these processes but try to make the best of a bad job.

Choice of the quality of base-paper is largely a matter of individual taste. Glossy paper is suitable only where fine detail is required and is not desirable for pictorial work. Speaking generally, a somewhat rough texture is preferable to a perfectly matt surface; it is not only more pleasing but is better for subsequent spotting while the slight roughness conceals any tendency towards graininess. If the enlargement is to be toned to silver-sulphide (sepia) a faintly creamtinted base paper is sometimes effective.

Do not expect fine definition and straight lines when a poor lens is used for enlarging. Use at least as fine a lens as that which took the negative; the finest lenses are not too good for projection. Do not confuse poor definition with softening, which latter is produced by a scattering of properly focussed rays at the focal-point whereas lack of definition is due to a wrong focal-point. For this reason enlarging a sharp negative through a soft-focus lens does not give the same effect as sharp enlarging of a negative made through a soft-focus lens. Diffusion attachments on the camera are better than on the enlarger. Here a tip may be useful. . . . a piece of black chiffon placed over the front of a properly-focussed lens will give a first-rate imitation of the work done by the best soft-focus lenses. This can be used for enlarging also.

Focussing a soft-focus negative on the enlarging easel is always a troublesome affair; the easiest and most accurate way is to scratch the negative just outside the picture-range and focus that tiny scatch absolutely sharp; everything is then dead sharp. Another way is to focus before spotting; yet another is to focus a sharp negative and then change to the soft negative, but this system has the grave drawback that composition cannot be done on the easel as the negatives are not identical.

Before any attempt at printing is made, every small defect and pin-hole in the negative must be spotted out, using a fine brush and Chinese-ink. Use the brush when almost dry and just touch the centre of the spot. Spots missed will give black unsightly spots on the print which take a lot of removing. It can be done chemically but wastes a considerable amount of time, and prevention is decidedly easier than cure. Spot the finished print with a pencil or, better, water colour which exactly matches the tone of the print. For glossy prints mix in a drop of gum.

Soft Effect Methods.

Soft effects are well achieved by the use of bolting-silk; focus first and then place the bolting silk, spread on glass, in front of the bromide-paper, distant the thickness of the glass. This, by experience, is found the best position for it. Another good method is to give three-quarters the necessary exposure, shut off the light and breathe on the lens; then give the remaining quarter of exposure. The mist that formed on the lens scattered the light, producing an agreeable quality of diffusion. This reminds the reader that all lenses must be kept clean if sharp work is desired, the lens on the enlarger being no exception.

Shading is done by means of cardboard, with or without special means for local shading made possible by holes in the carboard or having it cut to shape. For lightening central values mount a mask on a handle of good-quality flat glass. Whatever system is used, the masks must be kept in continuous motion to prevent any harsh outlines in the print. Double printing is rarely required these days of panchromatic plates and colour-filters and is seldom satisfactory; but when it has to be done the system is the same as for shading but use a mask cut to shape. A much better plan is to make two enlargements on the same scale, cut them out where they are wanted to join, and re-photograph the whole affair and enlarge from the negative. Of course the joins must be worked up and the slight signs in the negative retouched out. But it is not difficult. This is the system used for manufacturing photographs of fairies, etc: for fake spiritualistic photography. Astounding results are easily obtained.

Vignetting is extremely simple, being done by a jagged-edge cardboard mask cut oval or the desired shape, kept continually on the move. Reverse-vignetting (black fade-out instead of white) is done just the same except the mask is solid inside and jagged outside and is mounted on a flat-glass handle. But it is simpler to vignette direct at the time of making the negative by a regular vignetter attached to the camera; this is the way it is usually done.

A shutter on the enlarging-lens is a very great convenience, as is working in a red light all the time instead of a cap to the lens. Many workers simply use their camera-lens in its shutter on their enlarger and this is fine always provided they don't forget to put it back and sally forth on a photographic expetition with a lensless camera. A point worth mentioning is that the rule of apertures does not apply when using a condenser as the light is already focussed to a spot on the lens.

Fine enlarging is a study in itself and cannot be taught by books, nor learnt in a month or even a year. But good enlargements can be made with the boxtype and auto-focus type just as easily as can contact prints and the amateur can learn to make them in an hour if he is at all acquainted with bromide-printing. An enlargement is always better than a small contact print and brings out many beauties in the negative that otherwise pass unnoticed, consequently enlarging is a process that is to be very strongly recommended and is one that no amateur photographer should neglect once he has reached higher levels than promiscuous snap-shooting.

NOTES AND NEWS

It seems that Mr. Baring-Gould, the well-know novelist and parson, left instructions that one volume of reminiscences which he wrote, is not to be published until 10 years after his death. His "Early Reminiscences" came up to the year 1864, and have been published by the Bodley Head. His "Further Reminiscences," coming down to 1894, will shortly appear. Finally, there will be a third volume which, being full of references to living people, we shall not get for 10 years.

No English publishing house has sent forth more original poetry during the past quarter of a century than the Bodley Head. It is both a happy thought and a natural thought that a selection of it should be made into an anthology. This anthology we are to get in the early autumn under the title, "The Book of Bodley Head Verse." Its contents have been selected by Mr. J. B. Priestley, the essayist, and Mr. J. C. Squire, who must write more prefaces than anybody else nowadays, is contributing one.

One of the prisoners taken by the Turks at Kut was Mr. E. H. Keeling, M.C. Being of a bold and resourceful disposition, he determined to escape, and he managed to do it. He crossed the Black Sea in a small boat, only to find, when he got to the other side, a Bolshevik revolution raging in Russia. There he had many surprising adventures, and eventually he reached home after the Armistice, and was sent back to Asia Minor to arrange for the evacuation of prisoners. He has written a book, "Adventures in Russia and Turkey," and it will be published by the Murrays.

An American novel is being issued in London which has a certain bearing upon the prolonged National Democratic Convention in New York. The last Democratic Convention to be held there was in the year 1868, and much political capital was made of "Seward's Folly," by which derisive phrase Alaska, purchased the year before by Secretary of State Seward from the Russian Government for $7.000,000, was characterized. The novel is called "Seward's Folly," it has been written by Edison Marshall, and in it Alaska is handled in a big way.

Mr. Walter Jerrold, a member of an old London family, has now become almost the recognized historian of London. To the books he has already written about it he is shortly adding another, through John Lane, "The Great London Plague." Mr. Jerrold is never content to write a London book from the obvious documents and sources of information. He always sets out to find new material, and he has found it in surprising abundance for this book on the Plague. We shall probably discover, for one thing, that practically all the doctors left London at its height.

We like Mr. H. C. Railey best as an historical romancer, though he has tried his hand successfully on other roads, as most authors like to do. "Knight at Arms" is the title of a new historical novel by him which is coming along with Methuen. Its hero is a young man who rides through the wars and intrigues of Renaissanse France and Italy, resolved to make his fortune. He has a shrewd wit and a quick head, but in the moment of success he is apt to forget his ambition and, in spite of himself, become a Don Quixote, all of which leads to odd doings.

We are still without any clue to the authorship of those "'Uncensored Recollections" which everyone recently read. The book has been much asked for also in Paris, and its vogue in America is notable. Naturally we are to get a second series of "Uncensored Recollections" and it will be ready in the early autumn. The other afternoon Mr. Eveleigh Nash might have been found at his desk armed with a blue pencil, which he was vigorously applying to a manuscript. "The new" 'Uncensored Recollections,'" said he, and of course he received the answer: "So they are not quite 'uncensored'?"

THE GROTESQUE

"Taffy." By Caradoc Evans. Melrose. 6s.

The very title of Mr. Evans's play is a challenge. It will suggest to most readers that the play is offered as a picture of Welsh life rather than as a picture of human life in Welsh surroundings. We mean by this that the men and women that are shown to us here seem to interest the author by their specific national characteristics rather than by the characteristics that they share with men and women of other races. At the same time, most readers who are not Welshmen will prefer to read the play with as little concern for the nationality of the characters as though they were reading "Tartuffe"—to read it simply as a comedy of the petty greeds and impostures and lies of human beings.

The play is an extremely amusing piece of work. There have been few funnier rascals than the heroes in the drama of our time. The life portrayed in "Taffy" we suspect is as different from the normal life of Wales as the life portrayed in Synge's "Playboy" is from the normal life in Ireland. It is a fantastic description which will offend many susceptibilities but will be thoroughly enjoyed by those who are too much interested in its bitter comedy and caricature to have time to take offence.

A STIRRING TALE OF THE SEA

"The Blood Ship." By Norman Stringer. T. Fisher Unwin, Ld.

A novel full of realism, and with the true tang of the sea when five-masters were the greyhounds of the ocean. Sir Arthur Conan Doyle wrote of the book as "one of the best sea tales I ever read," and the praise was justified. The tragedies that happen on the Golden Bough, where the apex of brutality is reached, are thrilling enough for anyone; and the story of the plotting to capture the "hell ship" as exciting as only such a story of the sea could be. The character of the smooth-tongued, gentlemanly Captain Swope makes those of all other cruel skippers of the sailing days seem saintly by comparison. Even the notorious "Bully" Hayes is not an exception. Swope is the quintessence of meditated savagery, a fiend indeed. The way the "old man" manœuvred the passions of his tortured crew, and subtly encouraged the outbreak of a mutiny which was to be his excuse for wholesale slaughter, is cleverly described and without any lapses into the too sensational style. After reading Norman Stringer's narrative one appreciates more the terrific hardships, brutalities, privations and injustices that sometimes fell to the lot of a foc'sle hand "shanghaied" on a vessel like the Golden Bough, notorious as a "horror" ship. There is a strong touch of cold reality about the narrative, the thrill of which is well sustained,—S. J. T.

PERSONALITY

"Personality in the Making." By Joseph Herschel Coffin. Hutchinson. 15s.

This is an American book. It discusses what is, after all, the decisive factor in human life. All the recent tendencies and performances in educational science and practical psychology leave personality out of account and treat man as a human machine whose results can be exactly measured and tabulated. The intelligence quotient of Helen of Troy and St. Francis of Assisi was quite low, we may be sure; Joan of Arc hadn't even intelligence enough to prevent herself from being burnt alive; nevertheless they stamped themselves for ever upon human memory by force of personality.

Dr. Coffin discusses personality scientifically and philosophically, and he writes both lucidly and attractively. On one page he lays down a general view or philosophy of practical life in nine propositions which we feel inclined to call the most sensible thing of the kind we have read.

BOOKS IN BLACK AND RED

The Joys of the Collector

There is much curious entertainment in Mr. Edmund Lester Pearson's "Books in Black and Red." The title is taken from a well-known passage in Chaucer, and the book is published by the Macmillan Company of New York (12s. net), and by Messrs. Macmillan in London. Although these American chapters appeared in American journals, their interest for English readers is not diminished. Mr. Pearson writes about book-collecting from his own angle. He discusses all sorts of books that are rare, yet quite inexpensive, books that are worth collecting because their contents are curious or, in some odd old way, characteristic. "Follow your fancy" is his advice to himself and to others. The sort of hunting he loves is well indicated by the copy he gives of one of the signs hung out by a New York book-shop of the type he has haunted. Here it is. I can still read such a list with awe and unholy curiosity:—

"books on all subjects

All the poets from
'Homer' & 'Virgil' to 'Kipling.'

Dream Books Sexology

It is like a breath of one's lost youth and its unformed affinities. Mr. Pearson's search has been for "those odd and unusual books" which either deal with a strange subject, or which by their manner fall into a peculiar class of their own. "Follow your fancy," he repeats.

The Dime Novel.

There is a delightful defence of the old anathematized American "dime novel" which gave us Deadwood Dick and Jack Harkaway—delightful because it shows so clearly that no defence is needed. I am interested to learn that dime novels are now laboriously collected and publicly exhibited. What splendid titles! Here are three:—

"The Gambler Pirate; or Bessie, the Lady of the Lagoon," A Companion Story to "The Skeleton Schooner." By Col. Prentiss Ingraham, Author of "Merle the Mutineer."

"The Frontier Angel: A Romance of Kentucky Rangers' Life." By Edward S. Ellis.

"Double Dan, The Dastard; or The Pirates of the Pecos." By Major Sam S. Hall ("Buskin Sam"), Author of "Diamond Dick," "The Lone Star Gambler," "The Terrible Tonkaway," "Big Foot Wallace," etc.

What an alluring "etc."!

Mr. Pearson tells a story—I hope it is a story and not the mere "parable" he calls it—of the boy who was sent home for moral correction with two evidences of his guilt upon him. One was "Stevenson's Treasure Island," the other was a New York dime novel. The boy's aunt and another lady of equal discretion sat in judgment.

"Sampling the two books, in order to separate the dove from the serpent, they dip first into 'Treasure Island' and naturally come upon a gory fight. Bloodshed and violence! Can there be any doubt that this is the well of poison? They instantly seize Stevenson's novel with the fire-tongs and carry it off to be consumed in the kitchen stove. Thus, having ridden the house of contamination, they come back to 'Luck and Pluck, or Working for the Government,' the very book for which Horace was at that moment whimpering in bed, supperless. They read the opening pages of it, and find a tale so extremely chaste, ethical, and overflowing with rectitude, that they salute it as on a par with those in their own favourite magazine, the Congregationalist Observer."

Mr. Pearson admits, almost tearfully, that the dime novel degenerated into a sort of senility of violence and horrors.—"John o'London's Weekly."

HAS CIVILISATION GONE BACK?

Furniture and the Imagination

"The Decorative Arts in England, 1660-1780." By H. H. Mulliner. Batsford. £3 3s.

Mr. Mulliner's fine book, with its resplendent plates illustrating the beauties of English furniture, embroidery, glass, metal-work, book-binding, enamel and carving in the 17th and 18th centuries, makes one more than a little crestfallen for modern civilization. The workman of those days was as badly paid in money as he is now; but his work was in itself a payment. He received, artist as he was, wages not only for his pains, but for his pleasure.

Pleasure and pride, one cannot doubt, went to the making of the treasures Mr. Mulliner reveals to us here. Imagine a marquetry chest, "the design of the shaped centre panel of the top composed of a parrot and a vase of flowers, flanked by an acanthus scroil from which develop further scrolls of balanced design and sprigs of flowers, the panel framed in a wide margin of walnut veneer, the spandrils ornamented with cornucopiæ containing branches of roses, lilies, tulips and carnations, the white flowers rendered in polished bone, the leaves of the same materials stained in different shades of green . . . ." Surely supreme delight went to its making. When the human imagination breaks into cornucopias and sprays of flowers, especially when it breaks into roses and lilies, tulips and carnations and jasmine—for I seem to detect jasmine amid these other floral delicacies—it is safe to surmise that the human heart is happy.

Weeping willow trees and tombstones of braided hair were the products of a gloomier age. In the 17th, and 18th centuries clearly cheerfulness kept breaking in, yet, indeed, it was not man's stabilised natural condition. Technical skill, which was achieved in England at this time as a direct result of the increase of communications with Holland and France, the influx of Dutch and French emigrés and the trade with the Far East, seems to have affected the English imagination as spring affects the earth. The craftsmen of those days seem to have been ever on the look-out for some new object to decorate. A case of knives and forks must have small flowers enamelled on every handle, and the lid and front painted with landscapes, garlands of roses, sprays of flowers and birds.

What a god-send the invention of the tea-caddy must have been to them, and the snuff-box, whereon to bed out some of the flowering plants that crowded their fancies! No labour seems to have daunted them. They were as generous as Nature herself in lavishing scarcely observable ornament. They were as ready as pastrycooks to see their masterpieces perish. Mr. Mulliner gives us a photograph of a settee covered entirely in needle work, with medallions in petit point representing the four elements: Pomona, seated beneath a tree surrounded by dancing cherubs, typifying earth; Juno with peacocks and a rainbow, and Eolus releasing the winds at her request to wreck the Trojan fleet in the righthand corner, typifying air; Vulcan forging the armour of Æneas, typifying fire; Neptune "with marine deities," typifying water—so much skill, patience and erudition to be the one half leant against, the other sat on.

Clocks and sconces, locks and loving cups, fire-screens and mirrors, tables and bedsteads—over them and eagles, pheasants and peacocks, lions and serpents, grapes and convolvulus, with a reiteration of roses and lilies, tulips and carnations like the burden of one of those old country songs the craftsmen, it is conceivable, sang on their way to work. Mr. Mulliner's book is a delectable history, a history in which there is nothing to regret.—"Daily News."

"A TALL, STRAIGHT MAN"

This is an agreeable, skippable book of 600 pages of varied, and varying, interest—military, historical, political, personal, perhaps personal most of all. It covers the period between July, 1919, and February, 1923, when Major-General Allen was in command of the American Forces in occupied Germany, having won high distinction by his activities under General Pershing during the war.

The author is not bashful. "Pershing said of my 90th Division" he tells us: "'It is one of the best, if not the best, division I ever inspected.' The A. F. in G., 'Allen's Family in Germany,' is far ahead of the 90th as a whole, though I tenderly cherish the high soldierly qualities of my old division, and its marvellous exploits. It never failed to secure its objective; it always held what it got; and it had no straggler." There are a great many other such passages. "A tall, straight man," Colonel Repington described Major-General Allen in "After the War"; "with straight views and a strong face, a very worthy representative of the United States." The allusion which the Major-General cites (apparently with mingled feelings) ends thus: "It is certainly in the interest of France to 'ménager' Allen, as he is a good friend, and might become a bad enemy if any hanky-panky were played."

The estimate is a little tantalizing. One feels that one would like to draw out Colonel Repington on the subject, and that it might not be difficult to do so! The "tall, straight man," as portrayed in the photographic illustrations, does certainly look as though he might prove himself a formidable and uncompromising opponent, but there is not much in the volume to throw light upon this side of his character. Good judgment, one imagines, is one of the qualities which Major-General Allen would like to claim for himself. He is not unduly dogmatic, but he has strong opinions, and he expresses them, as a rule, strongly.

While admiring the British troops above all others for "set-up and personal appearance," he places the French first "in the theory of soldiery and military art." In manners he unhesitatingly places the British last, and he quotes several foreign criticisms also on the British tendency to offhand behaviour. Even Field-Marshal Sir Henry Wilson was at fault, it seems, upon one occasion. On his hurrying off unceremoniously from a big official lunch Foch exclaimed, jestingly, but not approvingly, "A l'Anglaise!"

NEW NOVEL

"Mr. Rowl." By D. K. Broster. (Heinemann. 7s. 6d.)

This is a good, exciting story of a young French prisoner in England in Napoleonic days. Raoul des Sablières, called "Mr. Rowl" by the unlettered who could not compass such strange syllables, is about as charming a personality as any recent novelist has given us. His Juliana is a heroine quite worthy of him in her pluck and character, but she does not get over the footlights in precisely the same way. The author has evidently concentrated on Raoul—and with the best results. Incidentally there is an all too accurate picture of the time, and the ghastly conditions at the "hulks" where recalcitrant prisoners were sent. Mr. Broster has very carefully read up all his facts and has an admirable sense of justice. He shows the pleasant surroundings and the English kindness that were the lot of many a prisoner; he also shows the other side. The best thing in his drawing of Raoul is his essential and convincing Frenchness. When an English writer attempts to draw a Frenchman he is apt to make either a caricature or a stage chevalier. Raoul is a French boy, down to his ejaculations—a really brilliant portrait.

THE WOMAN'S PAGE

DR. DOLITTLE'S POST OFFICE

The Delectable Whimsey of the Swallow Mail

Mr. Hugh Lofting has made us all his debtors by his creation of Mrs. Tubbs and Dr. Dolittle with their animal friends. Annie Carroll Moore, who supervises the children's department of the New York Public Library, says of "Dr. Dolittle" that "any father with a sense of nonsense and love of animal and human-kind will enjoy reading it aloud." To try out the fathers we are re-printing the story of the Royal Mails of Fantippo, from "Dr. Dolittle's Post Office," which describes the fastest mail service in the world, called the Swallow Mail, though thrushes, gulls and and penguins assist with the deliveries in the colder climates.

A few years before this voyage of the Doctor's there had been a great deal of talk in most civilized parts of the world about mails and how much it should cost for a letter to go from one country to another. And in England a man called Rowland Hill had started what was called "The Penny Postage," and it had been agreed that a penny a letter should be the regular rate charged for mails from one part of the British Isles to another. Of course, for specially heavy letters you had to pay more. Then stamps were made, penny stamps, two penny stamps, twopence-halfpenny stamps, sixpenny stamps and shilling stamps. And each was a different colour and they were beautifully engraved and most of them had a picture of the Queen on them—some with her crown on her head and some without.

And France and the United States and all the other countries started doing the same thing—only their stamps were counted in their own money, of course, and had different kings or queens or presidents on them.

Very well, then. Now, it happened one day that a ship called at the coast of West Africa, and delivered a letter for Koko, the King of Fantippo. King Koko had never seen a stamp before and, sending for a white merchant who lived in his town, he asked him what queen's face was this on the stamp which the letter bore.

Then the white merchant explained to him the whole idea of penny postage and government mails. And he told him that in England all you had to do when you wanted to send a letter to any part of the world was to put a stamp on the envelope with the queen's head on it and place it in a letter box on the street corner, and it would be carried to the place to which you addressed it.

"Ah, hah!" said the King. "A new kind of magic. I understand. Very good. The High Kingdom of Fantippo shall have a post office of its own. And my serene and beautiful face shall be on all the stamps and my letters shall travel by faster magic than any of them."

Then King Koko of Fantippo, being a very vain man, had a fine lot of stamps made with his pictures on them, some with his crown on and some without; some smiling, some frowning; some with himself on a bicycle. But the stamp which he was most proud of was the tenpenny stamp which bore a picture of himself playing golf—a game which he had just recently learned from some Scotchmen who were mining for gold in his kingdom.

PLAIDS AND PLEATS PREVAIL

And he had letter-boxes made, just the way the white trader had told him they had in England, and he set them up at the corners of the streets and told his people that all they had to do was to put one of his stamps on their letters, poke them into these boxes and they would travel to any corner of the earth they wished.

But presently the people began complaining that they had been robbed. They had paid good money for the stamps, they said, trusting in their magic power, and they had put their letters in the boxes at the corners of the streets as they had been told. But one day a cow had rubbed her neck against one of the letter boxes and burst it open, and inside there were all the people's letters, which had not travelled one inch from where they put them!

Then the king was very angry and, calling for the white trader, he said:

"You have been fooling My Majesty. These stamps you speak of have no magic power at all. Explain!"

Then the trader told him that it was not through magic in the stamps or boxes that letters traveled by mail. But proper post offices had mail-men, or postmen, who collected the letters out of these boxes. And he went on to explain to the King all the other duties of a post office and the things that made letters go.

So then the King, who was a persevering man, said that Fantippo should have its post office, anyway. And he sent to England for hundreds of postmen's uniforms and caps. And when these arrived he dressed a lot of black men up in them and set them to work as postmen.

But the black men found the heavy uniforms dreadfully hot for Fantippo weather, where they wear only a string of beads. And they left off the uniforms and wore only the caps. That is how the Fantippo postman's uniform came to be a smart cap, a string of beads and a mail bag.

Then when King Koko had got his mail-men, the Royal Fantippo post office began really working. Letters were collected from the boxes at street corners and sent off when ships called; and incoming mail was delivered at the doors of the houses in Fantippo three times a day. The post office became the busiest place in town.

Now, the peoples of West Africa have curious tastes in dress. They love bright things. And some Fantippo dandy started the idea of using up old stamps off letters by making suits of clothes out of them. They looked very showy and smart and a suit of this kind made of stamps became a valuable possession among the natives.

About this time, too, in the civilized parts of the world one of the things that arose out of all this penny-postage business was the craze or hobby for collecting stamps. In England and America and other countries people began buying stamp albums and pasting stamps in them. A rare stamp became quite valuable.

And it happened that one day two men, whose hobby was collecting stamps, came to Fantippo in a ship. The one stamp they were both most anxious to get for their collections was the "twopenny-half-penny Fantippo red," a stamp which the King had given up printing—for the reason that the picture of himself on it wasn't handsome enough. And because he had given up printing it, it became very rare.

As soon as these two men stepped ashore at Fantippo a porter came up to them to carry their bags. And right in the middle of the porter's chest the collectors spied the twopenny-halfpenny Fantippo red! Then both of the stamp collectors offered to buy the stamp. And as each was anxious to have it for his collection, before long they were offering high prices for it, bidding against one another.

King Koko got to hear of this and he called up one of these stamp collectors and asked him why men should offer high prices for one old used stamp. And the white man explained to him this new craze for stamp collecting that was sweeping over the civilized world.

So King Koko, although he thought that the civilized world must be crazy, decided it would be a good idea if he sold stamps for collections—much better business than selling them at his post office for letters. And after that whenever a ship came into the harbour of Fantippo he sent his Postmaster-General—a very grand man, who wore two strings of beads, a postman's cap and no mail bag—out to the ship with stamps to sell for collections.

Such a roaring trade was done in this way that the King set the stamp printing presses to work more busily than ever, so that a whole new set of Fantippo stamps should be ready for sale by the time the same ship called again on her way home to England.

But with this new trade in selling stamps for stamps collections, and not for proper mailing purposes, the Fantippo mail service was neglected and became very bad.

THIS VERY MINUTE'S HAPPINESS

By Elizabeth Pepys.

Once upon a time there was a little girl who, upon being interrogated by her geography teacher, said with a wisdom beyond her years: "The Torrid Zone is where it is too hot; the Arctic Zone is where it is too cold; and the Temperate Zone is where it's either too hot or too cold." As dwellers in the Temperate Zone, how may we account for the untoward condition of affairs so accurately summed up by the bright child. We suspect the answer is: "It isn't the heat; it's the stupidity."

On Wednesday-week the residents of the Settlement and Concession mopped their brows, turned on their electric fans, ordered cool drinks, sighed for rain, and cursed the weather.

On Saturday those same residents shivered, turned off their electric fans, ordered hot drinks, sighed for sunny weather for the afternoon sports, and cursed the weather.

Hence we are forced to conclude that we are discontented animals, always wanting to be there when we are here and back again once we have traveled thither. If some efficiency expert would only anchor our floating wishes or focus our wandering desires upon the present, how happy we all might be. After all Mr. Bump has the right philosophy.

If, like the busy little bee we could store away some of the surplus sweets of summer, or again, like the ice-man, garner the excess cold of winter, what storehouses of pleasure we might have! What a convenience on a bleak January day to send the coolie round for some of July's sunbeams, or to have the cold storage companies deliver to one's back door in August the requisite sized icy blasts of February.

Gather Ye Roses.

But again, even with all the modern improvements the innate stupidity of humanity asserts itself. Sunshine canned hasn't the same flavour as when picked off the vine, and tornadoes when caged lose much of their kick. Clearly, then, the only thing to do is to enjoy our pleasures as they come along. Now is the only time in our possession. The past dribbles through our fingers. The future eludes our grasp. This very minute alone is ours. Therefore let us revel in its flavour to the full. Now, Now, NOW!

Fortunately it will not be necessary to give most people lessons in enjoying the golden autumn which is Shanghai's prize season. Instruction in the art of appreciation of rainy week-ends, chill, damp winter days and humid, torrid spells will be welcomed. Boy, page Pollyanna!

TWO RECENT VISITORS TO SHANGHAI

DR. BRIGHAM IN CANTON

Another Western Artist Seeking China's Secret

An interesting visitor who passed through Shanghai last week on her way to Canton was Dr. Gertrude R. Brigham who will teach English in Canton Christian College next year. Besides her work in this department Miss Brigham expects to study Chinese art and to instruct native students in Western art. She is herself an artist and art critic, writing for the Washington Herald and Washington Post. Her pupils in Washington are extremely interested in her visit to China and sent her $100 as the beginning of a Chinese art collection. Dr. Brigham has conducted a number of tours through Europe and nothern Africa. Her latest trip visited England, Holland, Belgium and France, with especial attention to the Empire Exhibition at Wembley.

Dr. Brigham brought news of Dr. James McClure Henry, the new President of Canton Christian College, an appropriate choice inasmuch as his father, Dr. B. C. Henry served as second president of Canton and Dr. Henry himself has acted as President for some five years while Dr. Edmunds was detained in America. Now that health and family reasons necessitate Dr. Edmunds resigning from office he gladly welcomes Dr. Henry, saying: "Mr. Henry knows China from within. To him China is not a foreign country, nor Canton a foreign city, as he was born and spent his boyhood there. His mastery of the language has given him ready access to the inner thought of the Chinese. Through his education and several years of service as educator and religious leader in the United States, he is also in close touch with American thought. He thus feels the pulse should be the best possible foundation of both nations, and as President of the College will interpret each to the other."

The new associate President, Wing Kwong Chung, has been associated with him in the work for the college and their friendship should be the best possible foundation for the college to build upon. Mr. Chung is a Scholar of the First and Second Chinese Degrees. He became head of the Chinese Department of Canton College in 1900 and was made Chinese Dean in 1909. From 1911 to 1913 he served as Commissioner of Education for Kwangtung Province. He has been Chinese Vice-President since 1917. Mr. Chung has several times traveled extensively in America.

MRS. K. A. BEHENNA

Artist-Poet-Novelist.

To have acquired technical mastery of the art of painting so that one's proficiency is acknowledged not alone in the specialized field of miniature painting but in oils and water colours as well would be enough to content the average woman. Not so, however, in the case of Mrs. Kathleen Arthur Behenna, who is also a poet and novelist. Mrs. Behenna has come to China to visit her daughter, Miss Vivian Behenna, who is on the staff of the American Commercial Attaché in Peking, and during her stay here of a year or two intends to study Eastern art and to paint portraits and landscapes.

In talking with this many-sided artist we discovered that she was cosmopolitan as well as versatile, for although she is of Scottish parentage, her grandmother, Margaret Macaulay, being a cousin of Thomas Babington (Lord Macaulay), she has lived much of the time in America, and now holds London as her legal residence. Mrs. Behenna is probably best known in the art world by her miniatures, although the exhibitions which she has held in the leading galleries of London, Paris and New York have shown her skill in oils, water colours and chalk studies as well.

The inquisitive interviewer asked for a look at the scrap-books which are filled with letters of appreciation from Mrs. Behenna's sitters, many of them from members of the Royal family, including Her Majesty, Queen Mary, H. R. Princess Louise, Lady Henry M. Stanley, Lady Evelyn Grey, and Lady Mary Carbery. In commenting upon her work the "Ladies' Field" says Mrs. Behenna's miniatures have been assigned honourable positions at the Royal Academy. ~~Her work is both~~ broad and strong. She paints landscapes also, and they are as notable as her portraits."

In the field of poetry Mrs. Behenna's love sonnets, published under the title "Love Victorious," have won the generous admiration of such critics as W. T. Stead, Ella Wheeler Wilcox and Sir Robert S. Ball. Her novels, "Letters of a Mother to Her Son," "Sidartha" and "Light" are examples of different moods, each with its special interest. Mrs. Behenna admits that her greatest interest at the present time lies in the field of symbolic art and in philosophic poetry.

THE MILITARY TIGER IS ABROAD

FIGHTING HELD UP BY MUD: EXPECTED BATTLE AT TAIHU

Kiangsu Troops Attacking Persistently but with No Change in Front

CHANG TSO-LIN TAKING PROTECTIVE MEASURES

Effect of the War on Chinese Bonds

8,000 troops from Wu Pei-fu have arrived at Nanking to help Kiangsu.

Marshal Chang Tso-lin has declared war on President Tsao Kun and Wu Pei-fu.

Large reinforcements of excellent troops from Chêkiang have passed through Shanghai to Liuho and Woosung.

Engagements are reported at Ihing, west of the Taihu.

SATURDAY.

THE RECAPTURE OF LIUHO

Troops Rushed up by General Ho During Night: A Chekiang Success

The Chêkiang troops regained Liuho on Friday after a battlle in which many were wounded. The number of killed on either side is not accurately known.

After the Kiangsu troops had captured Liuho on the night before, General Ho Feng-lin rushed 4,000 men to the front and personally commanded the troops at Liuho. It is said that he delivered an address to his men, spurring them to victory. The fighting continued through the night, both sides moving backwards and forwards over the field. The Kiangsu division facing Liuho is said to consist principally of Bei Bao-san's troops who are known for their fierceness in battle. These men are constantly engaged in fights against bandits in the Haichow districts and are in effect veterans of many wars.

The Chêkiang forces regained Liuho on Friday morning and continued fighting for it, until the Kiangsu forces slightly retreated. There was almost no fighting on this front yesterday afternoon.

The number of casualties on the Kiangsu side is naturally not known, no figures being available. It is claimed that the Chêkiang forces have taken a number of prisoners, among them being officers of high rank. The wounded brought into Shanghai hospitals up to 8 p.m. last night totalled more than 200. On the Liuho road large numbers of wounded soldiers were being rushed to hospitals in motor-cars and on lorries. The total number of wounded on the Chêkiang side will probably reach close to 400. Chêkiang claims that Kiangsu has also suffered large casualties in this engagement.

Kiangsu's Tactics.

Liuho at first was not considered a principal engagement of the war. It is now recognized that if Chêkiang should lose this base, Marshal Chi's position will be seriously strengthened. It is for this reason that so much emphasis is being laid upon the defence of this particular point. Kiangsu is apparently adopting the tactics of hitting Chêkiang at any point where at a given moment Chêkiang is weak, in the hope of breaking through before reinforcements can be brought up. The Liuho Road is largely responsible for the success of General Ho Feng-lin's counter-attack yesterday. The fact that large numbers of troops could quickly be rushed to the scene of action in motor vehicles gave the Chêkiang forces a great advantage.

A VISIT TO THE LINES

Among the Combatants of Liuho

A representative of the "North China Daily News" on Friday visited Liuho, at which point fighting which might well have proved critical in the fortunes of the two sides had taken place during the preceding 12 hours. A fairly good road—as roads outside the Settlement go—links the place with Shanghai, but it is difficult to persuade a Shanghai chauffeur that at the moment the Liuho Road is a nice one to travel upon. He simply does'nt like it. One had to be circumspect and suggest that Markham Road, or perhaps a little beyond, was the destination, but the "littee more far" suggestion upset him, and he insisted on a safety first device—appropriation of a Red Cross flag, "Flagga blong velly strong" said he, knowing nothing of the Geneva Convention but having a shrewd idea of its beneficence towards inoffensive chauffeurs, and the like. Great was his satisfaction when a Chinese doctor, in the uniform of the Red Cross, joined the party. The "coat master" appeared to give him a decisive sense of security, and so he drove on. A flag, but not the Red Cross flag, appeared later. Its bearer was a humble postman whom we picked up on the edge of Chapei, a man faithful to duty and anxious to deliver his mail at Lohtien, the village next to Liuho. Though his flag had no cross upon it, it was decorated with some fowl of the air symbolizing the speed of the service he so admirably served, and this pleased the chauffeur. It was a "flagga," and that was sufficient. We drove on.

Chapei seemed not to be unduly disturbed with a little war at its doorstep, and as one went farther along the road it became evident, judging by actual signs and portents, there was little reason why it should be. There were many refugees, most of them, people of the well-to-do class who could afford the use of a motor car for transporting themselves and their more valuable family possessions into the safety of the Settlement; and there were many more cars and one or two lorries bringing in wounded from the scene of action, the majority apparently only slightly wounded and others huddled up or stretched at full length upon the heavy, jolting lorry—an agonizing ride.

A Scene of Contradictions.

As most of us know from experience, the dominant note of scenes "behind the line" is anything but truly rural. Camps dotted about everywhere, great depôts with vast quantities of stores, ammunition dumps, parks of artillery, aerodromes, troops everywhere on the move, fill the landscape and impress the beholder with the fact that war is a mighty business But apparently not war in China, where distinctly they have a way of their own. In all the thirty odd miles between Shanghai and Liuho there was not a sign of military activity beyond the sight of the unfortunate wounded who might, from all other signs of battle one observed, have come merely from an encounter with a few desperadoes of the Lincheng type. There were no patrols on the road, no reserves of troops, no preparation for a second line of defence should the troops holding Liuho be driven in. In appearance the country was as peaceful as it has been these many years since the Taipings rudely disturbed the neighbourhood. The country people were going on with their work as usual, though perhaps in somewhat depleted number; and a fine crop there will be to gather unless the Liuho braves trample it down, which is not likely.

The Peasant's Neutrality.

Incidentally, the peasant seems to have developed an extraordinarily complete determination not to have anything to do with the military. He is a neutral in the most absolute sense, and, if one may judge by his demeanour, would be extremely pleased if the soldiers would take their quarrel away to some other neighbourhood. It was useless to try and get into conversation with any of these quiet tillers of the soil. The sight of a military uniform meant possible conscription, or some other form of military exaction; and thus it is that military uniforms on the Liuho Road do not engage much of the simple rustic's admiring attention. We had occasion to speak to one, and our friend the Doctor thought it advisable to remove his military cap and coat, but even this expedient failed in its intended effect: the countryman kept on the move while answering a question or two—looking back over his shoulder as he did so—and was not to be drawn into anything approaching an intimate conversation. This simple incident, which may indicate the native's fear or caution or both, does serve to illustrate that, so far as the inhabitants of the district are concerned, neither their heart nor their interest is in "the war". They are a peaceful people, and the present trouble will but draw slightly upon their inexhaustible patience, one imagines.

So it was that, in the course of a journey of some seventy li, the sign of the plough shire was more in evidence than that of the sword. The rumour of a retreat from Liuho was proved not to be correct both from information gathered by the way and by the fact that not a single straggler was found on the road. The place was still held by Chekiang troops, though whether they held their ground firmly or otherwise was not certain. A Chinese "N.C.O." in charge of a group of men at a wayside station volunteered the information that the position was well held, but another man in the group interposed with a word about the quality of the Kiangsu fighters and what they had done which was perhaps more truthful than politic at the moment, and a diplomatic nudge with his companion's elbow put an end to further disclosures. But obviously, Liuho had not fallen: otherwise, Kiangsu troops must have been well along the road to Shanghai, for there was absolutely nothing to stop them.

No Time for Joy Rides.

A night ride from Liuho to Shanghai is not recommended at the moment. Apart from the native vicissitudes of the road itself, further adventures offer themselves in the form of collision with heavily loaded ammunition vans, without lights, or with ambulance and troop cars rumbling their way towards the front, their occupants more concerned with the fortunes of war than with traffic amenities. Chapei, alive with people during the afternoon, seemed comparatively deserted, but at the Markham Road boundary there was a great throng—on the safe side of the bridge. Evidently, the press gang continues to be a very active organization.

FIGHTING FROM HUANGTU TO KIATING

Kiangsu Striving for Nanziang

Severe fighting took place on Friday on the front from Huangtu to Kiating, the Kiangsu troops gradually forcing the Chêkiang armies back in an effort to break through to Nanziang. Chêkiang is tenaciously holding on to this position, the advance of the Kiangsu forces being fiercely contested throughout the day.

General Yang Hau-chao, the defeated Fukien officer, whose brigades have been incorporated in the Chêkiang army has been sent up to Nanziang with 3,000 men to hold this position. It was originally intended that these troops should hold the Ihing-Huchowfu front and they were kept in Hangchow. It is now, howver, found necessary to use every possible reinforcement to keep the larger numbers from Nanking from breaking through either at Nanziang or Liuho to Shanghai. Numbers of wounded have been reported from this front although the exact quantity is not available. The Kiating Red Cross has established a base hospital.

Rumours of fighting at Woosung have not been confirmed.

Latest.

The actual distance lost by the Chêkiang troops from Huangtu to Kiating is 10 miles. Reports from Nanziang are to the effect that the Fukien troops have already begun to attack the Kiangsu forces which are holding the line, in the hope of regaining the original position at Huangtu.

FOREIGNER'S VISIT TO QUINSAN

Streets Deserted, Houses Pillaged by Soldiers and Money Extracted by Threats

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

In the city nearly all shops are closed, the streets are deserted and only people with passes issued by the Commercial Club, the Red Cross and the Church dare to be seen. Silence reigns everywhere: here and there a broken window, a smashed door, an empty ricsha thrown into a ditch' give the feeling of the sinister atmosphere of a battlefield.

I was accompanied by two Chinese and we had come to visit the house left by the owner who had been scared away by the war a few days ago. The entrance door we found broken, inside great disorder, clothing scattered about, drawers open and valuables stolen. The neighbours complained that the soldiers—the defenders of the people—made searches every day and extorted money by threats.

After managing to get passes for my two Chinese companions we returned to the said house and again found evidence of another robbery during our absence. However, after the soldiers' roll-call, we felt safe and stayed there for the night.

By Sapajou.

A BIVOUAC BEHIND THE LIUHO LINES

Next morning at day break, we got up and proposed to go to a certain village about 20 miles out in the country of Quinsan to escort the family of one of these men to Shanghai.

For about two hours we passed through camps of soldiers on the banks of the canals, some living in tents, others in junks. They appeared quite peaceful and did not trouble us, except that an officer once or twice inquired where we were going. Further down we did not meet any more camps.

As a foreigner, and having no luggage, I had not much to fear, but to return to Quinsan in a junk with property and women aboard would have been risky, as we had been warned of the ill fate of others.

Arriving at the said village we were told by the people that the water-way to Lukiapang was not guarded by soldiers, so we accordingly went and arrived safely at that station and from there back to Shanghai.

FIGHTING FORBIDDEN ON HUANGPU

The Powers have made it perfectly clear to both parties in the Chêkiang-Kiangsu conflict, that fighting will not be tolerated anywhere on the waters of the Huangpu, from and including Woosung to the Arsenal. The harbour of Shanghai and approaches to it must remain absolutely neutral.

MARSHAL CHANG TSO-LIN AND CHIHLI

Information was received last Friday from an unimpeachable source in Mukden, to the effect that although Marshal Chang Tso-lin has not definitely decided on hostilities, there is no doubt that active preparations are going on. Troops are being concentrated southwards. Marshal Chang has lately made very large purchases of certain stores.

The small coin notes (Marshal Chang's own currency) have receded in the past 10 days from 160 to 207 and are expected to go lower.

Peking, Sept. 5.

A Consular telegram from Mukden, in reply to an official inquiry, states that the letter of Marshal Chang Tso-lin to President Tsao Kun did not contain threats such as were published by the Kuo Wen News Agency.

Reports from Mukden say that while the Army of Marshal Chang Tso-lin is probably prepared to march at short notice, there has been nothing to indicate his intention to take the field in the near future.

MARSHAL LU YUNG-HSIANG DECLARES WAR ON PRESIDENT TSAO KUN

The Gage Thrown Down to Peking: Public Manifesto from Chekiang Tuchun Denouncing Tsao Kun and Calling for His Expulsion: A War to Win Peace

In a manifesto issued on September 3, Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang denounced Tsao Kun in no measured terms and called upon the people to pay the necessary price for a true and lasting peace. The substance of the manifesto (as taken from the Chinese Press) is given below:—

Tsao Kun, having stolen the Presidency by a bribed election, has been violating our laws and disturbing our country. When at Paoting, he expelled Hsu Shih-chang and welcomed Li Yuan-hung, pretending that he was upholding the Constitutional principles. Seeing through his duplicity, we were the first to repudiate his action against which public opinion in Hangchow and Shanghai strongly protested. This was the first occasion on which the people of Kiangsu and Chêkiang opposed Tsao Kun.

When he forced Li Yuan-hung to flee and instituted a régime of bribery and corruption, the M.P.'s representing Kiangsu and Chêkiang again preceded those of other provinces in coming down to the south and exposing the proofs of bribes, to the scandalous indignation of our whole country. This was the second occasion when our people of Kiangsu and Chêkiang manifested their opposition to Tsao Kun.

When Tsao Kun usurped the Presidential Palace, in spite of universal disapprobabion, the Kiangsu Educational Association passed a resolution fixing October 5 as another National Humiliation Day to commemorate this dishonourable usurpation, while patriotic M. P.'s requested us to despatch a punitive expedition against our national traitor to set an example to our whole country. This was the third time when the Kiangsu and Chêkiang people voiced their opposition to Tsao Kun.

The Arch Robber

After making some complimentary remarks as regards the enlightenment and progressiveness of the two provinces and the high intellect and pure character of their people, as well as about these two provinces being the centre of culture and the necessity of preserving them from molestation until the situation has cleared up, the manifesto says that unfortunately the higher the knowledge, the more intensely the traitor desires to crush them; the richer the prize, the more covetous the arch robber becomes, aiming to secure it.

Reference is here made to the incorporation of Tsang and Yang in the Chêkiang Army, which is now used as a pretext to make war upon Chêkiang. As Tsang and Yang hold principles diametrically opposed to the illegal President Tsao Kun, of course they could not be tolerated for a moment, just as for a long time Chêiang has not been tolerated. However, without Tsang and Yang's coming some pretext or another would doubtless be found to satiate the traitor's greediness with regard to Chêkiang.

If such an arch traitor is not removed, our people can never sleep in peace; our people should exert their utmost strength to punish him. As this is chiefly for the purpose of self-defence, they need feel no hesitation, especially their army have all the right on their side and are sure to achieve victory over their common traitor.

Peacemongers Denounced.

It is natural for people in Kiangsu and Chêkiang who are well known to be well-off and who have been accustomed to live in comfortable conditions for many years, to wish to be left alone, without caring for the right or wrong of the case which might well be left to posterity to decide; but will they always be left in peace? Can they really expect to enjoy a true and lasting peace without paying any price? If the future generations should suffer because of their forefathers' procrastination, would they not be held equally blameable for their neglect of duty to their homesteads as well as for their lack of patriotism to their country?

Those who are still advocating peace at this late stage are not different from those householders who, when robbers have entered their premises, blame those who try to capture the robbers, and praise those who let the robbers go as peacemakers. The enlightened classes, I hope, will guide the masses of the two provinces to the path of duty. We must endure some momentary pain before we can hope to enjoy a permanent peace.

Signed:—LU YUNG-HSIANG.

The Supreme Commanders.

Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan, according to a report from Soochow, arrived there at 4.50 p.m. on September 2.

Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang, in deference to a joint request from his subordinate officers, headed by General Ho Feng-lin, assumed the new title of Commander-in-Chief of the United Army of Chêkiang and Shanghai at 7 a.m. on September 4 at Hangchow.

WHAT CAUSED THE WAR?

Allegations Against Lu Yung-hsiang

Peking, Sept. 5.

Interviewed on Tuesday by a representative of the Chung Mei News Agency, Marshal Wu Pei-fu's Chief of Staff said that not a single Loyang soldier had joined the mobilization by hostile provinces against Chêkiang. He went on to assert that Gen. Lu Yung-hsiang's appointment of Gen. Tsang Chi-ping as his Chief of Staff and of Gen. Yang Hua-chao as his commandant of troops for a military expedition against neighbouring provinces made it necessary for these provinces to take precautionary measures.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

INFURIATED MOB ON SETTLEMENT BOUNDARY

Looking for the "Press Gangs"

A large number of loafers assembled in the neighbourhood of west Hongkew police-station on Thursday night. Evidently infuriated at the depredations of the "press gang," the mob procceded to throw stones at a number of soldiers stationed on the railway.

A squad of police were immediately sent to the scene and the streets were cleared of the mob.

No further trouble has as yet occurred, but as a precautionary measure police patrols have been placed in the vicinity.

One soldier received a cut on the forehead, but there were no other casualties.

CHAPEI UNDER THE SOLDIERS

Press Gang at Work: Supplies Short: Depredations by the Lawless

Chapei and Paoshan continue to be dominated by the military press gang and are most wretched places to live in, either for foreigner or Chinese. Foreign residents in the Chinese suburb complain principally of the difficulty they have in procuring food. The district being closed until 6 o'clock every morning has the result of keeping the country people out of the town till a late hour, with consequent inconvenience to householders Servants in the employ of foreigners are scared to leave the houses more than necesary, for fear they will become the victims of the press gangs. Foreigners themselves, if they are not back by 8 o'clock at night, are not allowed to enter.

One case that was brought to our notice concerned two Japanese, living in the Chinese city. They arrived at the boundary line, coming from the International Settlement at about 10 o'clack at night and were refused admittance. When they attempted to argue, one of the soldiers grasped his gun by the barrel, and poked the butt forcibly into the stomach of one of the men sending him flying several yards.

In addition to the reign of terror set up by the press gangs, the soldiers are commandeering food, and it is reported that the more lawless among them are behaving themselves after a fashion not conspicuous for honesty. A favourite trick is reported to be the intimidation of pawnbrokers. A soldier will go into a pawnshop taking with him some old clothes worth about 50 cents. He will then demand $10 for the goods. At first the pawnbrokers were inclined to smile, but the soldier then proved his business head by producing an automatic pistol at sight of which the pawnbroker is wont to think again.

The press gangs are reported to be carrying off women as well as men now.

Drastic Measures by Gen. Ho

Various Chinese organizations have entered strong protests against the forced conscription of Chinese labour, and judging from the reports which were published in the Chinese press last Friday their protests have been listened to. General Ho Feng-lin is said to have issued an order that no less severe penalty than capital punishment will be meted out to persons who extort money under the cloak of conscripting labour, who attempt to conscript women, and who fail to pay wages to conscripted coolies. The authorities are to pay 50 cents per day to each coolie, who will be treated as an ordinary labourer.

With regard to the coolies rounded up in the Chapei district on Thursday, the authorities state that a day's wages was paid, and that those who were unwilling to work were allowed to go after they had been taken to police headquarters.

MONDAY.

SCENES OF FIGHTING ON RAILWAY

Intermittent Action Around Huangtu

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

Huangtu, Sunday.

Since Friday evening there has been a considerable amount of fighting along the whole front from Huangtu to Liuho. At its commencement, the Chêkiang front seems to have taken a line two or three li west of Huangtu railway station to Kading and Liuho, Kading then being held by the Kiangsu men. Early on Saturday morning the whole of this sector was active, and fighting continued with more or less intensity throughout the day. The Chêkiang forces claim to have made an advance of some five li, principally in a line on Kading, creating such a dangerous salient that the defence of this city had to be abandoned. The place was taken late on Saturday afternoon, and the Chêkiang advance seems to have been carried as far as Liutuchiao, from which point their line bends inwards again to Liuho. There were fairly heavy casualties on both sides, about 80 wounded being sent back to Shanghai, and Chêkiang claims some 300 prisoners. Several officers were captured late in the evening, among them Col. Kyi Juidong, who, with his A.D.C., was promptly brought to Shanghai and lodged at Lunghua. Two machine guns and a number of rifles were captured.

Machine Guns Most Disliked.

Yesterday there was intermittent fighting along the front from within a short distance of Anting to Kading, and the intensity of fire increased during the afternoon, when shells fell within a few hundred yards of Huangtu railway station and the coolie workers there were scattered by rifle fire. Troops returning for ammunition reported that there had been heavy fighting on the right of the line towards Kading and that the Chêkiang forces had made some little advance. These men were in cheerful mood, and one of them volunteered the information that he, so to speak, did'nt care a straw for shrapnel but had a very sincere dislike of machine-gun fire.

Property Respected.

Incidentally, while all the farmhouses and cottages in this area are deserted, and have been occupied by troops and used as billets or temporary hospitals, it is noticeable that no property has been molested and that houses remain as they were left by their late occupants, with no more harm than a certain amount of inevitable disorder.

In view of the progress made on the right of the line, there was some ground for the report that a strong movement on the left of the Kiangsu forces between Kading and Liuho was to be made last night. It was said that General Yang Hotsau was taking 1,500 troops for a rapid forward movement at a certain point in the line, with the object of taking the enemy in the rear. The most favourable point for such a movement would be Liutuchiao, and any success gained would precipitate a retirement upon Quinsan.

Liuho is the point of most importance, and any pronounced success by either side on that section should be decisive. It is improbable that there will be any serious attempt to advance in the centre. The Henli river constitues a formidable barrier to the approach on Quinsan, and the bridge at Henli, still undamaged, is covered by two or three heavy guns on the Quinsan hill, while searchlights play upon it at night.

Some 500 well equipped troops went upto the front line from Nanziang at dusk, while earlier in the day a similar force of troops from Sungkiang went by motor bus from Shanghai to strengthen the line at Liuho.

Another front line report listened to with some respect by those concerned, but for which absolutely no support is obtainable at the moment, is that Wu Pei-fu had despatched 8,000 men to Nanking, 4,000 of them intended for the Liuho front and the others for the Tahu section of the line.

Not One Bridge Guarded.

The attempt made early on Saturday morning to wreck the Hangchow Railway line between Siccawei and Hsinlunghua, gives occasion for noting the astonishing fact that yesterday not a single bridge between Shanghai and Huangtu had a guard. In such open fighting, it would be perfectly easy for Kiangsu men to come through during the night and effectively use the necessary amount of explosive. What is described as an accident happened about 4 a.m. yesterday between Nanziang and Huangtu, an ammunition train colliding with another train and causing the death of two officers attached to the medical service, and wounds to three men. That was the report, but as there was no wreckage on the line beyond the bogie wheels of a single wagon and the "cowcatcher" of the colliding engine, it appears more probable that the ambulance truck was standing by itself when the ammunition train ran into it and, that being so, one wonders how it got into that position midway between the two stations. The obvious solution is that it was an attempt to block the line to cause delay in the event of a possible retreat. The line certainly needs to be more carefully guarded.

AN AFTERNOON IN ACTION AT LIUHO

Exciting Motor-Car Expedition Under Fire

Chekiang wounded, the results of the day's fighting, poured into the environs of the Settlement on Sunday afternoon, being brought in motor-cars of all descriptions from the scene of the fighting at Liuho, where the rival armies of Kiangsu and Chêkiang blazed away with shot and shell at each other for the better part of the day. Red Cross ambulances carried the worst of the injured, while Ford cars and big two-ton trucks assisted, the rocking and jolting which the soldiers received in the latter being as severe as the wounds themselves.

Unofficial sources in the vicinity placed the number of combatants at 25,000, Kiangsu having the larger number with 16,000 and the defenders but 9,000, of whom 6,000 formed one section of the defence and 3,000, still another group. Desultory firing seemed to keep both lines at a distance during the hotter portions of the day, but toward the latter part of the afternoon, renewed efforts by both armies prevented any further succour to the stricken. Though it was impossible to get to the scene of action, a flanking movement preventing any further progress along the motor road to Liuho, telephonic communications to the Red Cross Station at Lotien, some 30 li from the battle front, indicated that but 30 or 40 wounded lay in the fire of the armies—this goes to show that the accuracy of the Chinese soldier is none too good. When the order was given at night to cease firing, these would undoubtably be brought in by the large staff of relief men appointed to that purpose.

Short of Ammunition.

A "North-China Daily News" correspondent went to the scene on Sunday afternoon with a large party and got within a quarter of a mile of the village itself, but further progress was out of the question by reason of the flanking movement inaugurated by the Kiangsu troops. At 4 p.m. the report came along the road towards Lotien that Chêkiang was running short of ammunition, which was further substantiated by a few stragglers slowly strolling toward the south, though their cartridge clips appeared to be fairly filled, and the men idled with shells carried in their hands. Three motor lorries of ammunition, and a few baskets of food, scurried along to the front with what seemed most welcome stores—a broken-down passenger car, pressed into service, contained six large cases of ammunition, the driver of the car making haste to repair his machine. At the village of Lotien the chief of the town had a group of about 20 recruits, most of them youths, assembled near the Red Cross station, and, exhorting them in fervid tones, urged that they should not fear death, it was an honour to die for their country; they should not turn their backs to the enemy, but should face them with no thoughts but of victory, mindless of the flying bullets and exploding shrapnel. The grey-coated youths, with yellow caps, looked at him pathetically, as though the whole exhortation were of matters not at all concerning them.

A Burst of Shrapnel.

Chêkiang soldiers held the northwestern to north part of Liuho and Chi Hsieh-yuan's men attacked in mass directly to the northwest. The firing, steady though it was, appeared to have but little effect for the moment, but a flanking movement to the west and then to the south semed to have its effect in the movement of small numbers to the rear. Two foreign gentlemen were able to get to the village during the earlier part of the afternoon, and by using the brick houses as a shield got quite close to the fighting itself, where rifle fire, machine guns and bigger cannon were in action. Four motor-cars full of passengers, foreigners who had a nose for powder, came out later, but by reason of the flanking movement could not get within a quarter of a mile. Two of the cars, more daring than the other, slipped up another hundred yards, only to have bullets whizzing past them into the earth beyond, not getting close to their objective. The leading car, a big seven-passenger Paige, stopped short and the driver made the shortest and quickest turn in the history of motoring on the Liuho Road, and headed for Shanghai again. Bullets whizzed between the two machines. The first had not gone 50 yards, when a large shrapnel shell burst immediately overhead, but more "treading on the gas" soon had the machine out of range.

Another party stopped their cars and went on afoot, to what seemed still to be a safe spot, but the rifle bullets, which buried themselves at their feet, one passing but four feet from a member of the group, sent them scampering back. The ditches alongside the road, still muddy, which the retreating soldiers, during the five days' battle, had used as a connecting trench, were just the best objectives in sight and a lady and a well known Shanghai professional man jumped in and getting near the ground, hurried to the zone of no-fire. Along the road for several hundreds of yards, spent bullets and fresh shells, clips and accoutrements, were to be found, the former, used by the Northern men, were of a larger size and weight, than the latter, unused, which had been thrown away by the men from Chekiang.

An appeal was made by Dr. Pu Yung-chang, for the use of the car of one of the parties, which appeal was met by an order from Mr. M. Moody, of Messrs. Moody, Inc., that two trucks would be donated for relief work at once.

The Postman Goes Through

Characteristic of the Chinese, the postman with his country unbrella, was making his way round the region, his bag in one hand and a large flag with "Postes" written on it, in the other, he continued to go forward to his destination through the firing.

A word of warning to foreigners. It is dangerous to proceed on the road to Liuho. There is firing, which crosses the way and for one to indulge in the mere pleasantry of trying to witness a Chinese war, is, in the opinion of all, who came in the five cars yesterday, sheer folly, nothing to be gained by the manoeuvre. Shrapnel and rifle bullets make it dangerous. It was sheer good fortune that several foreigners were not killed yesterday.

Night Attack by Kiangsu

1 a.m.

A correspondent who was out close to Liuho at nearly midnight reports a heavy cannonade, then a series of Verey lights; then rounding a corner he came upon a number of soldiers with machine-guns, who opened on his car. Presumably they were Kiangsu men as all the road is held by Chêkiang. Our informant got his car round and out of danger, luckily unhurt.

REINFORCEMENTS TO NANKING FROM WU PEI-FU

A report was received on Sunday, through foreign channels, from Nanking, that Marshal Wu Pei-fu had landed there 8,000 Honanese soldiers to reinforce Marshal Chi.

Four thousand of these are said to be destined for Quinsan, 4,000 for the Taihu front.

This report, must be received with circumspection, but it may be recalled that, some few days ago, Marshal Wu was reported to have despatched troops to help Marshal Chi.

REPORTED FIGHTING ON TAIHU

Fighting is reported on a new front at Tsingpu, east of the Taihu Lake. The Kiangsu objective is the city of Sungkiang where they hope to cut the Hangchow railway, if successful.

Preparations are being made by both sides for what is believed to be the most serious engagement of the war, at Ihing (Nyihsing). Each side is believed to have from 30,000 to 35,000 troops on this front.

tung. At present they have no homes. Driven from Fukien, they crossed through Kiangsi to Chêkiang. Nowhere really wanted, they entered this war, to wage their way through Kiangsu to their native provinces or to give it up. There can be no question as to their spirit. They held their front against varying odds. They have been the advance guard of Chêkiang. Their fighting is desperate. When one sees them lying on the motor-lorries or on the stretchers one realizes how close they came to the enemies' bullets. The groans of suffering men, the blood-stained uniforms, the presence of imminent death, raises the eternal question, "What are they fighting for?"

Foreign Doctors Volunteer.

Dr. New Vay-sun, Field Director of the Chinese Red Cross announced on Sunday night that several foreign surgeons had volunteered to assist the Red Cross at base hospitals and that their services had been gratefully accepted. The foreign surgeons will not wear the Red Cross uniform and will not attend at the front. The names of the foreigners assisting the Red Cross are to be announced later.

AN INTERVIEW WITH WU PEI-FU

Disclaimer of Any Desire to Fight: Responsibility Put on Chekiang Leader

From Rodney Gilbert.

Loyang, Sept. 6.

I interviewed Marshal Wu Pei-fu to-day on the situation between Kiangsu and Chêkiang.

Marshal Wu Pei-fu said he had done everything possible to mediate in order to prevent war, but that the situation was now out of his hands, while responsibility for a possible war rested with Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang, who had received arms (arms from Mukden or the refugee armies from Fukien?) and was preparing to use the Anfu troops of Wang Yung-chuan and General Chang Chih-ping against Kiangsu. Marshal Wu said that Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan of Nanking did not want war and will not attack Chêkiang, so, if anyone started a fight, it would be Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang.

Marshal Wu said that Kiangsi and Fukien had no war with Chêkiang but were fighting the Anfu leaders. Therefore if Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang disarmed these troops for the Government there would be no ground for a fight.

The impression I gathered from the interview is that Wang Shih-chen's present efforts to mediate do not alter the situation and that Loyang expects Chêkiang to attack shortly.

Peking and Protection of Foreign Interests.

Peking, Sept. 6.

In response to an Anglo-American Franco-Japanese communication requesting the protection of foreign lives and property in the war zone and Shanghai, and stating that the Huangpu from the approaches of Woosung to Shanghai constituted a harbour where there should not be any fighting, the Waichiaopu merely replied that the Central Government had received assurance from the Kiangsu military authorities, that they would do their best for the protection of foreign lives and property.

Another Note on this subject will probably be sent to the Waichiaopu, —Reuter's Pacific Service.

MARSHAL CHANG DECLARES WAR

Mukden Throws Down the Gage to President Tsao and Wu Pei-fu

Our people have been suffering from military oppression for a long time. In recent years, nine homes out of every ten in Szechuan, Hunan, Kuangsi and Kuangtung have been picked bare; and, in addition, drought and flood have affected more than 10 provinces in which starving persons in a very pitiful plight are found everywhere. Whoever is least humanly inclined will do all he can to show them compassion and give them relief.

Yet Tsao Kun and Wu Pei-fu with their minds perverted, are more than ever bent upon showing their ferocious fangs. Not only have they shown no sympathy towards the provinces so affected but they are even afflicting the unaffected regions with military calamities. They are deaf to appeals from the scholars and the gentry and indifferent to the warnings and protests of the Diplomatic Corps. What sort of a heart do they possess, it is painful to ask?

When the storm was brewing, I, Tso-lin, repeatedly tendered to them my loyal advice, persuading them to regard the people's welfare as of paramount importance. Their reply was replete with peaceful sentiments. I was led to believe the sincerity of their utterance; but hardly has the ink dried than fighting broke out.

I have just received a circular telegram from the Commander-in-Chief Lu of Hangchow dated the 3rd instant, in which the man who fired the first shot was clearly indicated. Hence, the inadvisability of delaying our punitive expedition.

The wicked deeds done by Tsao and Wu have accumulated mountain-high, too numerous to count. To mention a few of their principal crimes, I shall point out the bribing of the M. P.'s in order to steal the highest position; the keeping of the "paws and teeth" in order to crush the neighbouring provinces; Peking destroys what the people hope to set up, namely, the self-government system; Peking tramples upon what the whole nation is praying to secure, viz: peace. Further, while they blamed others for settling the Austrian Loan, they themselves have felt no scruple in recognizing the German bonds. While even foreigners are expecting us to develop our education, they are trying to appropriate the remitted Boxer Indemnity for their own ends. They have sold our country and sacrificed our rights and indulged in military conquests. For all such crimes, they have long been men regarded as intolerable by the whole world. They have been allowed some respite only because of the intensity of the people's distress which made us refrain from causing further devastation to our territory.

Since public opinion is unanimously opposed to the continuation of such a wicked régime, I, Tso-lin, for the sake of our nation and our people, feel it my bounden duty to lead my army and swear to rid the country of the people's traitors, thereby removing the obstacle to our national peace, and revive the vitality of our people. Not only will those of our own party approve of my action, but also those who have been turned down by them will wake up and join us. Nobody will be disturbed when and where my Army happen to be. My only object is to kill the chief offenders, absolutely leaving all the others unmolested. Let the Sun in Heaven witness this utterance of mine.

Chang Tso-lin, (Seal).

Peking Takes up the Gage

Peking, Sept. 7.

A punitive mandate against Lu Yung-hsiang was issued to-day.

The punitive mandate enumerating General Lu Yung-hsiang's crimes, and ordering armed force to be used to bring General Lu to submission to the authority of the Central Government, was promulgated after having been discussed at a special Cabinet Meeting this afternoon. The mandate has in view the hastening of the end of the civil war.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

DR. SUN YAT-SEN ENTERS THE FRAY

Expedition Northward Announced to Attack Kiangsi in Aid of Chekiang Leader

Shameen, Sept. 5.

In the course of an interview, Dr. Sun Yat-sen said: "I will personally lead my army to the north and effect a juncture with General Lu Yung-hsiang to co-operate against Wu Pei-fu. I intend leaving Canton on Tuesday (September 9) for the Kiangsi border viâ Shiukwan."

The interview was of one hour's duration and included also Mrs. Sun Yat-sen. In the course of the interview Sun Yat-sen said:—"If Wu Pei-fu is permitted to subjugate and unify China by force, then we will have the Yellow Peril. Wu Pei-fu would militarize China, England and America helping him. I could have unified China. I still control the arms unloaded from the Hav. They are in the Whampoa godowns. They have not yet been parcelled out to the different generals, but I refuse to release them to the volunteers, unless Chan Lim-pak pledges allegiance. My expedition northward is really defensive, because if Wu Pei-fu is victorious now, he would next march on Canton in order to crush me."

Dr. Sun's gunboat, the Wingfung, sailed yesterday but her destination is not announced.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

In connexion with the above news, the Eastern News Agency issues reports to the same purport, and the following contains the main details.

Canton, Sept. 5.

At to-day's military conference at General Headquarters here, the following resolutions were passed:—

(1) A combined expeditionary army shall be organized with all the Southern troops and the Kuangtung troops shall undertake to maintain peace and order in the district of the East River.

(2) Dr. Sun Yat-sen shall proceed to Shiukwan, leaving here on the 8th instant.

(3) In the absence of Dr. Sun, the Headquarters of the Generalissimo shall be stationed in Canton and Mr. Hu Han-min shall temporarily take charge of the administration for Dr. Sun.

(4) Simultaneously with Dr. Sun's departure for Shiukwan, a subjugation declaration and manifesto shall be issued.

(5) General Tan Yen-kai shall be appointed Commander-in-Chief of the expeditionary forces against the North.

Mr. Cheng Hung-nien, Under Secretary of Finance of the Canton Government, left here for Shanghai last night in order, it is reported, to confer with General Lu Yung-hsiang on the question of military funds for the expedition against the North.—Eastern News Agency.

MARTIAL LAW IN KIANGSU

Nanking Cut Off: Continued Exodus of Chinese: Kidnapped Coolies

From our Own Correspondent.

Nanking, Sept. 4.

So far we have no definite news about the fighting. Mails now take two days to come from Shanghai, and telegrams are sent via Tientsin or Chefoo. The American gunboats in the harbour are in wireless communication with Shanghai. An Intelligence Committee is being organized by the foreign community to secure and publish as much authentic information as possible. Although the exodus of Chinese continues, no immediate danger is anticipated. Careful plans are being made for the housing of women and children refugees, if necessary, in schools, churches and other institutions.

Since Marshal Chi's departure on Monday night, Wang Chien-fei has been Commandant and General Lu Defence Commissioner.

The report that Honan troops are on the way to Nanking though not verified, is probably true.

Thousands of coolies, recruited for 40 cents a day, have been sent down the line in the past few days. On Tuesday, I saw 1,200 lined up in front of the station ready to entrain, a motley crowd of the lowest class. They carried no baggage and were under strict control.

Sept. 5.

Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan has declared martial law throughout Kiangsu.

TUESDAY.

NIGHT ACTION AT HUANGTU

Kiangsu Troops Attack on Left Flank of Chekiang Position: Heavy Firing

Late on Monday night reports were received of a heavy attack by the Kiangsu forces on the left flank of the Chêkiang position in the region of Huangtu on the railway, with considerable artillery. This was doubtless the firing which was heard in Shanghai in the evening, the wind favouring carriage of sound. It was even reported that the Kiangsu troops were breaking through at one time, but a later report made this uncertain. It seems clear, however, that Kiangsu were in great force.

It may be conjectured that this attack is due to the arrival of Wu Pei-fu's Honanese troops, who were reported in yesterday's paper to have been seen at Nanking at the close of last week.

Shortly after 11 o'clock last night all naval men on leave were ordered back to their ships by midnight.

At 4 a.m. to-day the British, Japanese, American and Italian ships in harbour are landing men to take up their position on the borders of the Settlement in accordance with the pre-arranged scheme and in order to keep out possible stragglers.

This landing is being effected at the request of the Senior Consul-General, Cav. G. de' Rossi, acting on behalf of the Consular Body.

The numbers of men to be landed are approximately: British, 360; Japanese, 400; American, 250; Italians, 100. Total 1110.

RED CROSS ENLARGED

Sixty wounded soldiers were brought into Shanghai on Monday from the Liuho and Nanziang fronts, ten of whom were suffering from serious wounds and had to be operated upon immediately. Altogether 400 wounded soldiers are now in various hospitals under the care of the Chinese Red Cross.

The large number of wounded coming from the fronts has called for a wider organization of the Chinese Red Cross. In addition to the Red Cross General Hospital in Avenue Haig and the base hospital in Tientsin Road, Dr. New Way-sun, Field Director, yesterday enlarged the accommodation of his organization. The Cholera Hospital in Tibet Road, which can take in 160 patients, has been handed over to the Red Cross.

The new house of the Commercial Press has been turned into a hospital. The Shanghai Hospital at Nantao can accommodate 40 wounded men; the Industrial School at West Gate with a capacity of 200 is being made into a Red Cross hospital and St. Luke's Hospital with its entire staff and a ward for 50 men will be at the disposal of the Red Cross.

Hitherto, the staff of the Red Cross Hospital in Avenue Haig, under the direction of Dr. New Way-ling, has been looking after all the surgical cases. Under the new arrangements made yesterday, operations will be performed on alternate days at the Red Cross General Hospital and at St. Luke's Hospital. Dr. J. C. McCracken is in charge of the Red Cross activities at St. Luke's Hospital.

To assist Dr. New Way-ling at the Red Cross General Hospital, two groups of foreign surgeons have volunteered their services. Dr. James L. Maxwell and Dr. W. W. Peter will form one group Dr. W. G. Hiltner and Dr. A. H. Swan, the other.

To facilitate transportation of the wounded, five motor buses have been hired from the Kung Woo Motor Transportation Company of Chapei and the Commercial Press has lent the Red Cross one motor lorry.

Dr. New Way-sun, Field Director of the Chinese Red Cross, announced last night that his organization was prepared to take care of as many wounded soldiers as were brought into the city. Base hospitals are stationed at Liuho, Woosung, Kiangwan and Nanziang. A similar arrangement is operating on the other side of the line.

Chekiang Advance in West.

Not much news comes from the important western front, i.e., between Soochow and Sungkiang. The Chêkiang troops claim to have advanced to within 20 li of Ihing (Nyishin) and to have captured two boatloads of ammunition belonging to the Kiangsu army near the north gate at Kading, and amounting to 10,000 rounds of ammunition and a small number of Mauser rifles.

ON THE LIUHO FRONT

Day of Desultory Firing

Firing throughout Sunday night on the Liuho front by both sides, resulted in no particular gain for either the northern or the Chêkiang forces, though during the latter stages of the bombardment, it is thought, according to information received at Liuho, that Kiangsu was for the moment successful, but the morning showed that neither force had any particular advantage and a condition similar to the preceding 24 hours prevailed. There is not the slightest doubt, however, that the flanking movement inaugurated by the Nanking Tuchun's men, which involved the foreign spectators and idle curiosity-seekers of Sunday afternoon, did in no small way disturb the use of the Liuho road for at least a mile for the next few hours. Yesterday afternoon steel-capped bullets, which had been fired during the night, could be found in an area of more than a mile square on approaching Liuho from Shanghai, while the roadway from the bridge one mile distant from the village was subjected to such a severe fusilade that even the Red Cross vans could not make use of it to remove the wounded men to Lotien for further transport to Shanghai.

It has been definitely ascertained that the number of wounded men in the Liuho hospital has now increased to 100 though it is not to be assumed that these are all the result of the firing of Sunday night; many who came in for attention from this battle were suffering from a mild form of shell shock or nervousness, the actual damage sustained being very mild in many cases.

During all Monday, desultory firing characterized the entire front along the eastern sector, of which Liuho is the main objective. Vague rumours filtered into Shanghai throughout the day of a heavy bombardment, but the fact that but six wounded men came through to Lotien on their way to Shanghai during the morning hours and not more than that number in the afternoon seems proof that nothing was happening. Red Cross stations along the 28 miles to Shanghai, instead of the busy appearance they bore the day previous, seemed sleepy and neglected.

Shells Refilled.

The Chêkiang forces met the drive of the Kiangsu forces with a plentiful return of all kinds of ammunition, chiefly 3-inch shells, it would seem, for truckloads of empty cases of these came to the Arsenal to be recharged. Within 25 li of Liuho a motor, heavily laden with boxes of these brass casings, had broken down, while in the immediate vicinity of the point of approach no less than six cars of various descriptions, Paiges, Fords and Overlands, could be seen in the ditches, where they had been run by their frightened drivers and abandoned.

A military observer is responsible for the statement that there are no guns of a calibre larger than 3-inch in either of the camps, with the possible exception of the mortars, nor have aeroplanes put in an appearance. Two flying machines were seen over the western district on Sunday morning, though they have not got to the scene of action.

At one post behind the Chêkiang lines, cases of munitions from the Krupp works were piled high and with soldiers sleeping all over them. Mannlicher bullets, fired by the northern forces, were found in the vicinity and shrapnel, wicked-looking stuff in shells a foot long, was scattered about.

Food supplies on motor trucks and vans came into the village

SAPAJOU'S OBSERVATIONS ON THE LIUHO FRONT

throughout the early evening and at least four big trucks with from 25 to 40 cases of various calibres of ammunition scurried over the rough road and weakened bridges. Reinforcements have now increased the numbers of the defenders at Liuho to 5,000 Chêkiang soldiers.

A number of troop trains from Chêkiang passed through Shanghai, some 1,300 men going up the S.N.R. and 1,000 to Woosung. These troops, according to a competent foreign adviser, are by far the best yet seen about here.

CHANG TSO-LIN'S ARMY MANOEUVRE

Near Shanhaikuan, the Great Wall, Where All Troops Are Concentrated

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Peking, Sept. 7.

Foreign observers who have just returned from Mukden say that they saw no signs of military activity throughout the Peking-Mukden zone.

The autumn army manœuvres took place this year, for the first time, at Chinchoufu, north of Shanhaikuan, on the Peking-Mukden line. Troops were concentrated at Chinchow from all parts of Manchuria.

It has been reported that Marshal Chang Tso-lin has retained his forces at Chinchow in preparation for a general movement towards the south.

A letter alleged to have been written by him to the President containing a threat of armed intervention in the event of a conflict in the southeast of China has recently been circulated by a Chinese news agency and given publicity in several newspapers printed in the English language.

The editor of the news agency was arrested and imprisoned and denials of the report were issued quickly but unofficially.

It is now stated in circles hitherto regarded as responsible that the letter was quite innocuous, containing merely an expression of the hope that the President would be able to save the people unnecessary and useless suffering.

*The letter in question was referred to in a Reuter message from Peking of September 5, published by us last Saturday and giving the same repudiation as above. This letter must have been written several days before the declaration of war—Ed.

Sept. 8.

The Government denies knowledge of Marshal Chang Tso-lin having declared war on the Peking Government in a circular telegram. None of the Northern papers, foreign or Chinese, have hitherto mentioned the matter.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Peking, Sept. 8.

Since my previous telegram the situation is changing. Movements to the north may precipitate matters. It is reported authoritatively to-day that Marshal Chang Tso-lin has declared his determination not to rely only on words in meeting any danger just across the border.

An Asquith Policy.

Peking, Sept. 4.

The Peking Chinese press is daily giving more space to the attitude of Marshal Chang Tso-lin. The general opinion seems to be that Marshal Chang will prepare for war with the Chihli faction and probably make some demonstration, meanwhile waiting to see whether or not General Lu Yung-hsiang can hold out against Marshal Chi. Some of the papers believe that Marshal Tuan will at once go to the Southeast, in the event of General Lu's forces occupying Nanking, and establish an independent Chêkiang-Kiangsu Government, but all are agreed that neither Marshal Tuan nor Marshal Chang will precipitate a trial of strength in the event of General Lu being defeated. Notwithstanding the generally accepted fact that Marshal Wu is fully identified with the attack on General Lu Yung-hsiang, the Chinese papers still doubt whether Marshal Chi and his northern reinforcements can subdue the Chêkiang armies.

Declaration of War Announced to Foreign Consuls.

Mukden, Sept 7.

This morning at 11 o'clock, Marshal Chang Tso-lin invited to the Peace Preservation Headquarters the Consuls-General for Japan, Great Britain, Germany and the United States and announced to them, in effect, that Fengtien was compelled to take counter-measures in self-defence, inasmuch as the Chihli faction had already taken the offensive against Fengtien by mobilizing two divisions and six mixed-brigades in the direction of Shanhaikuan, Hsifengkow, and Jehol. Marshal Chang has thus officially manifested his resolution to open hostilities with Chihli again. —Easter News Agency.

Chihli Troops' Movements.

Sept. 5.

Further than the transfer of some of Gen. Feng Yu-hsiang's machine guns and men to Machang on Sunday last no important movements of troops in North China are reported. Some of Gen. Feng's men are said to have started for Tungchow, whence they will proceed to Hsifengkow.

The 15th Division, under the command of Gen. Peng Shou-hsin, is still in the north. One brigade is at Lanchow, where Gen. Peng has his headquarters, the remainder of the division being at Liushouying. In accordance with the neutral zone agreement, there are no Chinese troops at Shanhaikuan.

Gen. Sun Chuan-fang is clamouring for funds, and it is reported that, at a meeting of the Cabinet yesterday, it was resolved to send money both to General Sun and Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Neutrality of the Huangpu.

The British, American, French, Japanese and Italian Ministers on Saturday afternoon sent a further note to the Waichiaopu, repeating the representations made by the first four Ministers regarding the necessity to establish a neutral zone on the Huangpu River.

The former communication from the Ministers and the Government's reply, which merely said that the Kiangsu military authorities had given assurances that they would do their best for the protection of foreign lives and property, were made verbally.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHI HSIEH-YUAN TO HIS SOLDIERS

Why He Declared War on Chekiang

A lengthy document has been addressed by Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan to his soldiers, explaining his reasons for declaring war upon Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang. This was circularized on a leaflet in Shanghai yesterday. After stating that he has for years endured a position of humiliation and that he signed the peace pact in order to relieve the people in his jurisdiction from anxiety, alarm and misery attendant on a civil war, and that he is peacefully inclined as a scholar but bound in duty as a military student, Marshal Chi declares that he has been compelled to declare war upon Lu Yung-hsiang, not for his own sake, but for the honour of Kiangsu.

He then makes eight indictments against Lu which may be summarized as follows:—

1. Violation of the geographical division of Kiangsu and Chêkiang, which has been in force from 600 to 700 years. Lu appointed Ho Feng-lin as Governor of the 12 districts, Sungkiang, etc., of Kiangsu without obtaining the authority of the Government and the consent of Kiangsu, as had always been done before since Yuan Shih-kai created this post, when Lu became Tuchun of Chêkiang.

2. Instigating the murder of Hsu Kuo-liang, Chief of the Chinese Constabulary at Shanghai, and shielding the assasin in Ho's yamên, who remains unpunished; and allowing Ho Feng-lin to appoint Lu Yung-chien as Hsu's successor and to reject the officer appointed by the Central Government.

3. Employing Wang Ya-chiao, a notorious bandit chief with thousands of followers, to invade Anhui from Huchow; and setting the bandits of Kiangpei to cut the telegraph poles and destroy railway tracks at Pengpu, as well as instigating the Big Sword Society of South Anhui to attack and occupy Liuan and Hofei in Anhui more than once, thus aiming an indirect blow on Kiangsu.

4. Bribing the National Navy to turn rebellious and ordering it to intercept and try to compel the squadron, when returning from the south to the north, to surrender to him.

5. As all plots require money to execute, Lu Yung-hsiang and Ho Feng-lin have set themselves up as master criminals, doing a roaring business in allowing opium smuggling on a large scale at so much per chest. They have netted over $20,000,000 in two years.

6. Setting Tsang Chih-ping to create trouble in Fukien, which resulted in Penping declaring independence, Hsu Tsung-chi invading South Fukien, Sun Yat-sen infesting Kuangtung and Tan Yen-kai devastating Hunan. He is striking at Kiangsu at last.

7. Under the cloak of showing respect to Marshal Tuan Chi-jui, he set up a government in Chêkiang, severed his connexion with the Central Government, and allowed the drafting of a provincial constitution. In 1920, Lu invited certain M.P.'s to Hangchow, promising to uphold their principles and find them their salary. He soon ate his own words and the M.P.'s found themselves penniless and stranded at Shanghai.

I Have Borne Enough.

8. I, Hsieh-yuan, have submitted to his insults for months and months, because Lu Yung-hsiang is a senior in our army and Ho Feng-lin was almost as a brother to me when we were both civilians. If they would but repent of their ways and show sincerity in their dealings with me, everything could still be satisfactorily settled without recourse to any act of violence. It was with this hope that I signed the Peace Pact last year at the request of the fathers and elders of Kiangsu and Chêkiang. Unexpectedly, he admitted in June this year the defeated troops under Tsang and Yang from Fukien, for whose arrest the Government has issued warrants. His calling Tsang and Yang's troops as units of the national army surprises me, since Lu has separated himself from our nation. Does he regard Chêkiang as a nation? It is a clear case of violating the Peace Pact.

In conclusion, Marshal Chi expresses extreme regret at his inability to save the people from a reign of terror and to save his soldiers from exposure during this hot season, as he must now fight the issue out with all his strength and ability.

PEKING'S PUNITIVE MANDATE

Gen. Lu Yung-hsiang Charged with Disturbing the Peace: Deprived of Rank

Peking, Sept. 8.

The text of the Government's punitive mandate issued against Gen. Lu Yung-hsiang is as follows:

"A telegraphic report dated September 4 from Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan, Inspector-General of Kiangsu, Anhui and Kiangsi, reported that Lu Yung-hsiang, the rebellious Tupan of Chêkiang, had revolted against the Central Government and had rallied outlawed elements to his aid. The report further stated that the province of Kiangsu, owing to its geographical proximity, had been obliged to make defensive plans in order to keep the provincial frontiers intact and to maintain peace among the people, but that Lu with the assistance of Ho Feng-lin had ordered their rebellious troops to make an attack on the Kiangsu defensive forces.

"Marshal Chi also reported that the rebels issued a circular telegram on September 3, openly revolting against the Central Government, adding that early on the morning of September 4 the rebellious troops commenced firing in he vicinity of Quinsan in the hope of inflicting an unexpected blow on the Kiangsu forces. Marshal Chi stressed the point that Kiangsu aimed at defending its own frontiers and had always stood for peace, but that he would do his utmost to ward off any attack in order to reach the goal of maintaining peace among the people. Marshal Chi pointed out that the rebels had committed very great crimes which could not be tolerated by the laws of the nation, and he also petitioned for a decisive policy and a mandate to attack the rebels for the purpose of upholding the laws.

"Similar petitions have been received from Marshals Wu Pei-fu, Wang Chen-ping, Hsiao Yao-nan, Wang Huai-ching and Feng Yu-hsiang.

All Industries Hampered.

"There have been signs of unrest everywhere in the past few years and all industries have been hampered. On top of this situation a large part of the nation is affected at present by flood and calamities and starving people are awaiting help.

"Since my assumption of office, my sole desire has been that the people may have a rest after passing through all these miseries. Although there were differences of views among provinces it was my hope that they would gradually be brought to sincere co-operation. In spite of the fact that the rebellious Tupan and his adherents had on more than one occasion disclosed that intention to revolt I ordered my commanders to hold their defensive frontiers and not to start war. This generous policy I pursued in the hope of inducing the rebels to feel regret at their faults. To my surprise they have dared to break the peace of the nation openly against the popular desire for peace. In order to suppress the outlaws and pacify the people I no longer can allow them to continue their disturbing intentions and bring pain and suffering to the people. Lu Yung-hsiang and Ho Feng-lin are hereby relieved of their official posts and honours. Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan is instructed to direct his forces to suppress these rebels at his discretion.

Protection of Property.

"Local authorities should spare no efforts to protect the property and lives of natives and of foreigners. Not a single case of disturbance should be permitted.

"There was originally no line of demarcation between Shanghai and Chêkiang and the way should be open to rebels who surrender.—Reuter.

"Tickles One's Humour"—"Sinwanpao's" Comment

Commenting on the above Mandate, the "Sinwanpao" says that its wording "must tickle one's humour very much." General Lu's tuchunship has long been discarded, and the title of Tupan has been assumed. Although there is no difference in power and function between the Tuchun and the Tupan, it is nevertheless a fact that he has not been the military governor appointed by Peking for several years. What necessity is there for Peking to feign ignorance of this fact, in order to cashier him of his post?

To appoint Gen. Chang Tsai-yang, the civil governor and Commander of the 2nd Division of Chêkiang troops, to succeed Marshal Lu; and General Chen Yao-shan, Commander of the 4th Division of Northern troops, formerly under the late Admiral Yang Shan-teh, to succeed Ho Feng-lin, is still more laughable, if the Chung-mei News Agency's report is true.

"Yuan Shih-k'ai, posing himself as Emperor Hung Hsien, cashiered Tang Chi-yao and Jen Ko-chen and appointed Chang Tse-chen and Liu Tsu-wu as their successors, which made the whole country roar with laughter. Yet there seems to be still someone copying Yuan's trick."

Dr. Wellington Koo also comes in for severe criticism for having assured his countrymen of his determination not to countersign any punitive mandate, but such a mandate has been issued and Koo has not resigned his Acting Premiership.

CHEKIANG TROOPS WELL SEASONED FOR WAR

Good Training, Well Paid but Lacking Numerical Strength

A correspondent at Kashing, in constant touch with informants as to the operations of the Chêkiang troops, writes on September 6: The Chêkiang soldiers are promptly paid, well drilled and well behaved, man for man probably superior to the Kiangsu men, but the number of seasoned Chêkiang troops is exaggerated, if the best men are used up in and around Shanghai. The reserves are not numerous or over dependable for later hard fighting. If stalemate occurs at Liuho in the Yangtze, Huangtu on the Shanghai and Nanking Railway, the obvious line of advance of Kiangsu is south viâ Grand Canal to Kashing to cut the railway. (They did make a half-hearted effort to do this, but were checked at Wangkangchin.) The other is even more obvious, viz., from Changchow west of the Great Lake through I-hsin, then Dzang-hsin, then Huchow on to Hangchow.

The rice crops are just being gathered in these districts and the soldiers of either side will be able to feed in part on the farmers as they march. Supposing Chêkiang to win at Liuho, Huangtu and Wangkangchin, General Lu seems to have hardly enough troops to press his advantage on towards Soochow. It will be harder still for Chêkiang to fight towards Nanking west of the Great Lake on account of mountains along the way. It is feared by most in our section, that Chêkiang connot fight outwards to win for lack of troops. That Kiangsu will outnumber and finally overpower Chêkiang. Kashing is a danger point, as it offers the best line of advance for Kiangsu to cut the railway and divide the forces of Gen. Lu possibly the attempt will be made nearer Shanghai in Kiangsu territory. However, we may wait and see the unexpected.

HOUSING CHINESE REFUGEES

Council Buildings Put at Their Disposal: Barbed Wire on Chapei Boundary

Considerable difficulty has been found in adequately housing the large number of people who have flowed into the Chinese city from up country, and at the request of certain Chinese charitable societies the S.M.C. has agreed to allow the homeless people to use the newly completed market at Fokien Road as a shelter. This is only a temporary measure, we are told, and should not be regarded in the light of shelter given to refugees, for the Council would think twice, it is stated, before officially adopting such a policy.

In view of the serious positions in which the Settlement would be placed in the event of belligerents falling back this way in large numbers, as would naturally happen if the Chêkiang army were defeated, the Municipal Council have barred off the Settlement from Chapei with barbed wire, all along the boundaries. Strong cordons of police are guarding the barrier. This measure should greatly assist in the maintenance of adequate control.

MARSHAL LU'S TROOPS ARRIVING HOURLY

Rush of Reinforcements on the Railway: Kashing Centre for Conscripts

From Our Own Correspondent

Kashing, Sept. 8.

The late arrival of trains on Saturday caused some further uneasiness but it was known that a damaged bridge caused delay.

The city is now quiet, except for the chase after coolies. Boat loads of these conscripts are now coming in from the country districts.

Troop trains almost monopolize the railway, reinforcements being rushed towards Shanghai. A few field guns are in position near the railway station, ready to move to the front if necessary.

Deserted houses and shops are stripped of anything worth while near the border line. A few mail and hong boats are allowed to come in from towns near by, the Postal Service flag protecting them.

A push in this direction from Kiangsu is not expected until the fighting front extends more westwards. Chêkiang seems determined to keep the fighting on Kiangsu territory as long as possible.

We get only rumours filtering through the country behind the Kiangsu fighting lines and all that comes from the Chêkiang front is, of course, favourable to Marshal Lu.

Both fronts seem to be getting reinforcements as fast as possible.

It is now reported that during Sunday night more troops came here later to await orders. Early trains started from Kashing with passengers to Hangchow and Shanghai, respectively. this morning. The railway reported clear.

WEDNESDAY.

A CLOSE THING AT HUANGTU

Kiangsu Troops Nearly Through With Aid of Wu Pei-fu's Honanese

Details have at last been received of the heavy fighting which took place on Monday night between Huangtu and Nanziang along the railway line, the Kiangsu forces having brought up reinforcements of 8,000 men, believed to be Wu Pei-fu's contingent. The Kiangsu army made a breach in the Chêkiang line at about 10 p.m., but they could not widen the break sufficiently to make it possible for them to advance to Nanziang. The fighting came closer toward Nanziang than it had ever been before in this war. The firing heard in various parts of Shanghai during Monday night were on this battlefield.

At this juncture Marshal Lu rushed 2,000 men up to Nanziang, stopped the breach and prevented the Kiangsu forces from widening it. The result was that during yesterday morning the Kiangsu armies returned to their original position, no advantage being taken of the heavy fighting and the apparent victory of the night before.

It is reported tht on Tuesday afternoon, a telegraph crew was sent to Anting to repair the wires.

The Chinese Red Cross reports that 65 wounded were brought, mostly from the Nanziang front yesterday. Nineteen of these were transferred to St. Luke's Hospital for immediate operations. Three died shortly after admission. Very few wounded soldiers were brought from the Liuho front during the day. Last night, after the heavy rains, almost no wounded were brought in from either front.

Tuesday's Fight at Liuho.

Late reports from Liuho are to the effect that the Kiangsu troops have again made a flank attack and are now within a quarter of a mile or so of the town on the western sector, where there was sharp fighting for the greater portion of the day. The road to Shanghai and the ditches alongside are, as eyewitnesses state, littered with wounded and dead soldiers, both defenders and attackers, who appear to have met in combat at close range. The brushy country in the vicinity of Liuho afforded ample cover for the skirmishing parties which approached from the landward side and an enfilading fire kept the defenders busy, as they were, with rifle and machine-gun. Quite a group of men had slipped into a position under the trees and had the road way so covered that no one could approach on the Shanghai road for some distance, while those who had gone to that section on Sunday or Monday and will recall the Paige motor-car backed in the ditch will know that this machine and the bridge near is now being subjected to a considerable fire, the road having been itself the scene of carnage during the morning hours. Large quantities of shot and empty shells are scattered over the surrounding country and a motor driven by curio-seekers, who luckily escaped, brought back a few souvenirs. Rifle bullets greeted them on their approach and they turned back to shelter.

Chekiang Men Well Entrenched.

Entrenchments have been dug all round the village and the heavily reinforced troops of the Chêkiang forces are well set in their position. Their numbers are now nearly 6,000, the figure given out at official sources, and they have been plentifully supplied with quantities of ammunition from the Arsenal and the Woosung forts. Reinforcements on the sector held by the Kiangsu troops have, however, increased this army to a figure considerably larger than it has ever been before, and serious engagements are looked for.

A statement made late on Tuesday afternoon by Mr. S. K. Loh, secretary to Gen. Ho Feng-lin, at headquarters at Lunghua, is to the effect that the Liuho sector is fairly normal and that though there has been an engagement, the Chêkiang forces are well in control of the situation. There seems to be no cause for anxiety for the moment at least, according to the official statement, and the telephonic communications throughout the day spoke most favourably of the situation existing along the Yangtze.

Chekiang Success at Huangtu.

The battle continued fiercely throughout yesterday on the Huangtu front and thousands of soldiers were engaged. The Kiangsu men advanced in great waves, accompanied by heavy machine-gun fire, but the Chêkiang men are stated to have repulsed them and with a counter attack actually regained ground that had been lost in the days before. Reinforcements from the Nanking side countered, but were met effectively and forced back again by the defenders of Shanghai. A mass attack then was launched by the latter on the right flank, according to the telephonic reports received by Gen. Ho late last evening, and portions of three regiments hammered at the Nanking left flank. Pushed back whence they came, the northern soldiers (according to the Lunghua reports) fell back in broken order and the Chêkiang men pressed forward to at least a mile from the original position. Not less than 5,000 Chêkiang men are now watching this portion of the line and have been sent enough supplies of ammunition to hold the position under normal conditions with a special reserve in the rear for emergencies.

It was rumoured in the Settlement during the afternoon that Gen. Ho's brother had been killed in the battle, but a representative of the "North-China Daily News" was told that there was absolutely no truth in the report, this was the first time that Lunghua had even heard of it.

A further rumour that Gen. Chan Chen-ping had been killed was being circulated in Chinese circles and this was also denied at the yamên. The General had left that station at 2 p.m. and had telephoned in to headquarters as late as five in the afternoon as to the progress of the battle.

Reports of Marshal Chang.

Chêking authorities on Tuesday stated that Marshal Chang Tso-lin will lead an expedition into China proper and that he is mobilizing at the present moment. His objective will not be, it is thought, actually to come to the assistance of Chêkiang, but his counter-attack in the North will prevent further soldiers being sent to the aid of the Nanking Tuchun.

SHANGHAI'S STATE OF EMERGENCY

Mobilization of Volunteers and Landing of International Naval Force: Barricading All Entrances to Hongkew

The Council has authorized the following communiqué to the Press:—

Conflict Between the Armed Forces of the Provinces of Chekiang and Kiangsu.

For some time recently, the state of tension existing between the Provincial Chiefs of Chêkiang and Kiangsu has been a cause of concern to the Council, owing to the proximity to the Foreign Settlement of the armed forces of both Provinces, and, following upon the outbreak of war on September 3, preparations were duly undertaken to place the Settlement in an adequate condition of defence, and to secure the assistance, in case of need, of naval landing parties from the men-of-war in harbour.

In the meantime the forces of the belligerents became actively engaged in hostilities, and, as a result of information received late on Monday evening, September 8, a Proclamation was issued early on Tuesday morning declaring a State of Emergency, and Mobilization was ordered of the Defence Forces of the Settlement. At the same time, at the request of the Council, Naval Detachments were landed to assist in the Defence Measures of the Settlement, and all troops immediately occupied the positions allotted to them.

That for a time the situation looked very ugly for Chêkiang on Monday night there is no question. A Kiangsu attack on Chêkiang's left wing very nearly succeeded in breaking through. That this was largely due to Marshal Wu Pei-fu's 22nd Division of 8,000 men—their arrival at Nanking at the close of last week has been absolutely established—and how the attack failed, is told elsewhere.

The Alarm in Shanghai.

About midnight on Monday the authorities of Shanghai were suddenly confronted with the possibility, for the next morning, of an inrush of defeated troops. Major-Hilton Johnson at once turned out all available police to bar all entrances from Chinese territory on the north and northeastern side; Colonel Gordon, the Commandant, ordered a general mobilization of the S.V.C. for 6 a.m. yesterday; and Rear-Admiral Murray Anderson, the senior naval officer in Shanghai, at the request of the Senior Consul, ordered the landing of some 1,100 British, American, Japanese and Italian bluejackets, which was duly effected at 4 a.m.

It is to be emphasized that the danger of the Settlement being attacked is simply non-existent. Shanghai is the prize for which Kiangsu and Chêkiang are contending and the leaders on both sides have given plentiful proof that they desire to study her interests and integrity. But if Chêkiang were defeated there would very likely be a rush of some thousands of leaderless men to refuge in the Settlement and that is what cannot be permitted.

Barricades in Hongkew.

On Tuesday afternoon a representative of this paper made a tour of the boundary and considering what a prodigious task it is to keep it, the arrangements made are excellent. The boundary to be guarded includes Yangtszepoo and Wayside, Hongkew and West Hongkew, beyond which the Soochow Creek forms the boundary to Jessfield railway bridge, whence it runs by the railway, the Fahwah Creek to Nanyang College, Avenue Foch, Siccawei Creek and so to the river south of French Concession.

Throughout Hongkew barricades of heavy timber and barbed wired were being prepared on Tuesday All these should be in position today, ready to be swung across the openings into Chinese territory at a moment's notice. In such streets as North Thibet and North Chêkiang Roads, it is a comparatively simple matter to close the openings between the houses. But in the Urga and Chaoufoong Roads, where timber yards, etc., abound, the matter, is more difficult. However, residents may rest assured that Shanghai is well protected from any sudden inrush of fugitive soldiers, although day by day a steady influx of civilian refugees continues. On Monday some 6,000 of them came in, many by boat from up river.

The Volunteer Mobilization.

The Shanghai Volunteer Corps, who had been expecting a call for several days, were mobilized for 6 a.m. on Tuesday, and never has there been a more creditable muster of all arms. All units paraded at full strength, making for their mobilization points in a quiet and orderly fashion and standing by for further orders. The Recreation Ground and Race Club paddock presented a particularly animated appearance as the mounted units and other detachments paraded there and the club boys had a busy time serving bacon and eggs, hot coffee, etc. Some of the units remained at their mobilization points, but others were drafted into the Northern District to reinforce the naval guards who had taken up duties there. During the morning, when all preparations had been completed and it was found that there was no immediate necessity for the retention of all the Volunteers, the mobilization duties were taken over by half units, those released being allowed to go to their offices, but remaining in full service kit, so that they could relieve their comrades or be ready for an emergency call.

In the Western District.

Despite the fact that exciting tales have been told of the pyrotechnic displays that can be seen every every evening over the Hungjao flats, accompanied by the roar of guns, those entrusted with the defence of the Settlement—who have the most reliable information—do not appear to anticipate any particular trouble out that way and the defensive measures in the Western District are not very elaborate. It is obvious, any way, that it would be easy to rush out reinforcements in plenty of time after an alarm had been given. The district is in the charge of the British bluejackets and Marines, who were taken out in motor lorries between 5 and 7 a.m. Preparations had been made several days before for their accommodation..

The new Great Western Road stables belonging to the Race Club form a convenient distributing base, with the additional advantage that they afford very comfortable quarters. A visit there early in the morning showed the porter's lodge at the gate to have been converted into officers' mess, sleeping quarters and orderly room. Opposite this on the exercise ground was a cosy bivouac tent in which reclined four Boy Scouts, for the troops also have been mobilized and are doing very useful work as orderlies and guides. The stables had been thoroughly cleaned and fitted with camp beds, one along each of the three sides of the stalls, and most of the Marines—there are only a few bluejackets at this base—were making up the sleep they lost during the night. There is a second and larger encampment just inside and to the left of the main entrance to Jessfield Park. A canvas marquee and lines of mat huts have been erected and these are occupied principally by bluejackets, the camp being fenced off from outsiders by bamboo lattice.

Patrolling.

The men are fully equipped for fighting, but up to the present no defences have been erected, duties being confined to patrolling the roads. There is a guard at each of the cross-roads in the area between the two camps and pickets along Brenan Road as far as the railway line, whilst Avenue Haig up to the French and Chinese border is being patrolled by squads of Marines. In their territory, the French sailors and Marines, who landed several days ago, have followed the plan of defence usually adopted in that area. They have made more elaborate defensive arrangements than the British, but so far all the roads appear to have been left open. The outlying portions of both the Settlement and the Concession and the farther roads controlled by them in addition are constantly patrolled by armed cyclist Chinese and Annamite policemen and the men on ordinary duty also are carrying rifles or carbines.

In French Concession

The French authorities in their Concession have erected barbed wire barricades along the southern side of the Native City, which it is hoped will, as effectively as the barricade at the Chapei side of the Settlement, prevent additions to the 100,000 refugees now in the two foreign districts.

CHANG TSO-LIN ADOPTING PROTECTIVE MEASURES

Mobilization of Chihli Forces

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Mukden, Sept. 8.

Marshal Chang Tso-lin invited the British, American, Japanese and German consuls to an interview at 11 a.m. on Sunday, at which he stated that owing to the Chihli Party having moved four divisions and six battalions to Shanhaikuan. Hsifengkow and Tsitsihar, the Mukden Party would be compelled to adopt protective measures.

He hoped that all would understand his attitude in the circumstances.

Tientsin, Sept. 8.

It is reported that orders for the subjugation of the Fengtien troops were suddenly issued last night and that the Chihli forces have been ordered to mobilize as follows:—"The main force of the 15th Division under the command of Gen. Peng Shou-shin stationed in Luanchow is to advance as far as Shanhaikwan to be followed by part of the 26th and 23rd Divisions stationed in the districts of Tientsin and Machang. The line between Chienchang and Chaoyang is to be guarded by the main force of the 3rd Division, three mixed-brigades, and some 2,000 policemen."

The main force of the 9th Division, under the command of Gen. Chung Cheng-kuo, and part of the 7th Mixed Brigade stationed in Tungchow have of late been transported to Hsifengkow. The 13th Mixed Brigade is stationed at Laotieh, between Peking and Tientsin, the main force of the 23rd Division at Longfang, and the 11th, 8th and 15th Division at Nanyuan. Though there are at present three divisions in Shantung, they are not in a position to be transported outside the province owing to some circumstances. It is observed here that there are six mixed-brigades of the Fengtien troops in the districts of Chinchow and Suichung.

THURSDAY.

DING-DONG FIGHT AT HUANGTU

Kiangsu Troops Attacking Persistently But with No Change in Front

The Chêkiang and Kiangsu armies met outside Huangtu during Tuesday night and yesterday morning, the rain, apparently, not making any difference in the action of the conflicting forces, as so often happens in Chinese wars. Fighting was brisk and the natural condition of the country made surprise actions possible, more so than on the Liuho sector. Though outnumbered by at least two to one the defenders more than held their own and accounted for a number of prisoners and guns, the action of the day making it impossible to form an accurate estimate. Further troops brought down by the Nanking Tuchun were thrown into the attack and tried to force the matter to a finish, but a condition of status quo prevailed when a halt was called.

A Dangerous Moment

An incident occurred during the night which nearly brought about the most disatrous state of affairs for the Chêkiang troops and the defence. Had the mistake not been noted in time, heavy slaughter would have been unavoidable. Manœuvring for position, the commander of a Chêkiang regiment ordered a portion of his troops to take up a position with reference to a hill held by Kiangsu troops, the remainder to assist in a movement on the flank, and both to come together with a squeezing movement. The advance of one section was too rapid for the other and brought them into the line of fire, so that friend fired upon friend. Before the engagement became general, however, the error was noted and fire withheld. The captain who had made the mistake has fled and an order of arrest has been issued.

Official information is to the effect that one of the crack Chêkiang regiments, which has been in the midst of the fray all the time, now has been depleted in numbers to less than 1,000 men, the remainder being either captive, killed or wounded. General reports from this front state that the Chêkiang soldiers are fighting far beyond expectations and that they are much better than the Northern troops in the matter of their moral and fighting spirit.

At Nanziang, the rear post of the railhead at Huangtu, the troops have been provided with army tents of a modern type. The remainder have built themselves bamboo shelters and, provided with umbrellas and rolls of canvas, are making the best of the bad weather.

A few who had been brought into the base, suffering from severe wounds inflicted during the night, died during the day and were taken to the burial ground not far from the station. The hospital just to the rear of the railway station did not have the usual appearance of a base after a severe battle, which leads one to believe that the engagement was not so severe as earlier had been reported.

Gen. Ho Feng-lin at Front

One particularly strong attack was made on Tuesday night by Kiangsu against a village which, if lost, would have seriously endangered the Chêkiang position at Huangtu. The Chêkiang army was forced to retreat, but the lines closed up as they retired in good formation. Pressing on, the soldiers of Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan drove the southerners to the very boundaries of the village, but could go no further, for they lost connexion with their supplies and ran out of ammunition. Chêkiang later made up the lost ground and the village remains in the hands of the original holders.

General Ho Feng-lin personally visited the lines and exhorted the troops and officers to continue their good work. He had a conference with his staff and, it is thought, personally will direct operations, for the time being at least.

Inquiries were made at the railway station yesterday morning to ascertain which side had the best rolling stock and who controlled the majority of the motive power, but a representative of the "North-China Daily News" was informed that such information could not be divulged, for the policy of neutrality was strictly kept and officials could not talk. It has been ascertained, however, that Gen. Lu has the most of the local cars and engines though Gen. Chi seized all on the northern part of the railway before the actual fighting began. In the section outside Quinsan, it has been stated that Nanking has two locomotives and 40 cars. Further reports have it that the locomotives and coaches seized on the Tientsin-Pukou line and ferried over the river have been put into operation.

Red Cross Needs.

The Chinese Red Cross received 70 wounded soldiers yesterday from both the Huangtu and Liuho fronts.

Dr. New Way-sun, Field Director, announced last night that the British-American Tobacco Co. (China), Ld., had contributed $1,000 to the war work of the Red Cross General Hospital. In this connexion, Dr. New said that the war work of the Red Cross had grown so rapidly that they were forced to erect a temporary shed at the General Hospital in Avenue Haig. This shed now is ready, but the Chinese Red Cross had no funds for the purchase of additional cots. The men were to be placed on blankets on the floor until they could be removed elsewhere. The B.-A.T. contribution came in just at the right time and cots now will be available for the wounded men from the front. The Chinese Red Cross is unable at the present time to organize a campaign for funds to cope with the additional work they were forced to undertake, but cots and blankets urgently are needed.

Chihli Propaganda?

Peking, Sept. 10.

According to Chinese reports, the Second and Third Chêkiang Divisions have declared their independence under the Civil Governor of Chêkiang, General Chang Tsai-yang.

The War Office believes the report and predicts that it will cause complete alteration of General Lu Yung-hsiang's plans.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Note: Dr. T. S. K. Loh, Chief Secretary to General Ho Feng-lin, to whom the above message was referred, characterized the report as absolutely untrue.—Reuter.

FUKIEN TUCHUN DECLARES WAR

The revolt by Tsang and Yang in southern Fukien was suppressed in less than a month, thanks to the united effort of my officers and men. The rebel troops fled to the Chêkiang frontier. But instead of returning home, or being disarmed and dispersed by the Chêkiang military governor, they were received with open arms to the great consternation of the people. Rather than permit them to foment trouble in that region that may prejudice the whole situation, I hereby lead my troops in person to extirpate these rebels for our people. If for the sake of public welfare any friendly force will disperse the troops of Tsang and Yang and capture and send the chief culprits to Peking to be dealt with, my army will not proceed further. If my request is disregarded, fighting will break out to the devastation of the country for which certain persons will be held responsible and punished. My army will attack only the chief offenders. All others who surrender will be treated leniently. Patriotic troops who will kill the barbarous rebels will earn the gratitude of our brethren in Chêkiang and Fukien. As I am a soldier, it is my foremost duty to love my country; but the people of Chêkiang and Fukien must love still more their provinces in which their houses and tombs are situated. Let all join me in this righteous movement in ridding your countryside of the disturbers of peace.

SUNG CHUAN-FANG (Seal).

UP-RIVER TROOPS FOR NANKING

A reader who came in by steamer on Wednesday from up river reports on the evidence of foreign observation that the C.M.S. Kiang shun had landed some 3,000 troops at Nanking which she had been picking up at various points along the river from Hankow. He says that all the ship's decks were crowded with troops.

A rumour was circulated on Wednesday to the effect that General Yang Hua-chao, the leader of the Fukien troops and one of the ablest men on the Chêkiang side, had been killed by a bomb from a Kiangsu aeroplane. Another report was that he was in a hospital in Shanghai. Both these rumours proved to be untrue. A costly coffin was brought into a house next to that in which General Yang lives in Shanghai. The General's neighbour died a natural death; but rumours immediately spread throughout the city that the $1,300 coffin was not for the neighbour but for the military man.

BIG CLAIMS OF GAIN BY NANKING

Later Admission that Fighting So Far Is Only Sparring for Position

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Nanking, Sept. 8.

Official communiqués have been published daily by the General Staff since the 5th. According to these, the fighting began on the 3rd with a sudden raid by the Chêkiang forces. Liuho was captured on the morning of the 5th. An air attack was made on Nanziang on Saturday morning, and bombs were dropped, driving the soldiers to shelter. Kiangsu aeroplanes claim to have flown out well across the enemy lines without resistance, and it is believed that Chêkiang without sufficient aviators will be no match in the air. According to the Sunday communiqué, Kiangsu troops are pressing toward Huangtu, and now occupy the left bank of the stream near the town.

The Christian General

It is admitted at the yamên that fighting to date has been little but sparring for position. Chi's troops will probably launch an offensive for Nanziang and also atack below Ihsing where Lu has massed forces. Kiangsu has been expecting a Chêkiang offensive at this point. Another possibility is a movement toward Shanghai down the river from Liuho.

Military officials say that counsels are divided at Fengtien. Part of Chang Tso-lin's staff is for immediate participation in the war and part for waiting to see how the tide of battle turns. The Kiangsu General Staff are confident that Kiangsu has superiority in fighting forces and reserves and will win the war.

It is authoritatively reported that two of Feng Yu-hsiang's brigades are on the way from Peking to the front, probably passing Pukou today. A reliable report also comes from Wuhu that several Anhui regiments, loyal to Chi, are moving to the Anhui-Chêkiang border at Kwangtehchow.

Wild rumours are continually being circulated,—that Chi is falling back on Soochow and his army routed, that Chi captured Shanghai this morning, that General Ho has fled. At four o'clock this afternoon, the railroad authorities here reported the line still open only to Quinsan, and knew of no special news.

SOME TYPES OF CHEKIANG COMBATANTS

EFFECT OF THE WAR ON CHINESE BONDS

Marked Decline on the London Market

The effect of the Kiangsu-Chêkiang war upon the market for Chinese bonds in London has been unfavourable to the investor. Since the war started various Chinese issues have steadily decreased, the effect on the market being the result of a loss of faith in the ability of the Chinese Government to maintain peace in the land and to offer security to property. The Shanghai-Nanking and Shanghai-Hangchow-Ningpo Railway have suffered more than other issues but this cannot be explained alone by a possible loss of profits during the war periods. The fear of the investor is that valuable railway property will be destroyed, lines torn up and cars misused and that the Chinese Government will not reimburse the railway for the losses suffered.

Both these railways are making new financial arrangements with a view to increasing their rolling stock and to a possible development of the line. Chinese railway officials had been hoping that the increased business arising out of improved facilities would increase the profits and lead to eventual amortization. One of the very serious results of the war, from the Chinese standpoint, is the possibility that these railways will not have an easy market for future financing.

Issue	Sept. 1	Sept. 10
Chinese 5 p.c. Reorganization Loan (1913)	71.50	69.00

CHIHLI'S PLAN OF CAMPAIGN

Interview with Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan's Chief of Staff on War Outlook

FROM RODNEY GILBERT.

Nanking, Sept. 8.

According to General Liu Yu-k'o, Chief of Staff to Marshal Ch'i Hsieh-yuan, General Lu Yung-hsiang has less than 20,000 men on the front upon which fighting has now broken out with virtually no reserves which he can spare from other quarters; while the Chihli armies already have 50,000 men on the front extending from Liuho to the Taihu and have supporting units on the way from Hupeh, Honan and Peking, all of whom will be thrown into the line upon which General Lu chose to open the fight. In addition to these the Chief of Staff, in a statement to the writer last night, said that armies are moving upon the Anhui, Kiangsi and Fukien fronts which will completely encircle General Lu, divert his attention, unless he is completely victorious in the Shanghai district, and eventually cut off his retreat.

Expected Reinforcements.

The picture of the field at large, as painted by General Liu, makes it look very gloomy indeed for General Lu. "The most important bit of news, since you ask for news," said he to the writer, "is the information which we have on what we think is good authority that the 1st and 2nd Chêkiang Divisions (native troops) have not only failed to support General Lu Yung-hsiang, but have formally declared their independence. It may also be of interest to Shanghai to know that General Feng Yu-hsiang is coming down from Peking and will be here in a few days with approximately 10,000 men in two Mixed Brigades. The Hupeh troops which are coming to support us, one Brigade and one Regiment, commanded by General Yang, should arrive here tomorrow night. General Chang Fu-lai has sent the 3rd Honan Mixed Brigade under a General Ma and they should arrive soon.

"All of these reinforcements come to us unsolicited. The other Chihli leaders were as eager to avert this fight as we were and are now as eager as we are to see that it is over quickly and that General Lu is thoroughly defeated. The Kiangsi army, made up of three Brigades, has already entered Chêkiang, was at Chüchow when we last heard, and should soon be well into the province. The Anhui 2nd Mixed Brigade is at Kuangteh on the Chêkiang border and is about to advance. Sun Ch'uan-fang's troops in Fukien are too far away to be very useful, but they are known to be advancing upon the border in force. It will, however, take them something less than two weeks to get into Chêkiang because of the difficult roads and we hope that it will be all over by then."

Hoping for Swift End

This last remark prompted the writer to ask if he really thought it could be fought out so quickly and he replied: "We really hope to see the end of it in a week and we feel confident that it will be over in two weeks. That is why we are concentrating so much more force than we need. We may not seem to have made much progress so far, but the difficulty of the country must be taken into account. Even with an enemy retreating, no army can move quickly over a country that is a mesh of canals and swamps. In the advances that we have made, when the men charged they found themselves more often swimming than charging, but we feel sure that we have them retreating already. Lu Yung-hsiang has only his 10th Division, the 6th Mixed Brigade, a regiment of guards, a regiment of reserves, and his 3,000 Anfu troops from Fukien, to rely upon. We already have in line 40,000 of our own troops, a Brigade of Ch'en T'iao-yuan's troops from Hsuchow and other units from the North—about 50,000 in all. It cannot last long."

Marshal Ch'i Hsieh-yuan has his headquarters at K'unshan (Quinsan) and is in general command. At the Shanghai end of the line is the Right 1st Army, with Generals Chu and Kung in command. On the western half of the line is the right 1st Army, commanded by Generals Yang and Ch'en. The first three are all Division Commanders, the last is the Hsuchow defence commissioner who brought a brigade south with him. On the Chêkiang side, General Lu has one Brigade of the 10th Division and the 6th Mixed Brigade in the vicinity of Shanghai, and another brigade of the 10th Division divided between Kiahsing and Changhsing. It is believed that the majority of the reserves, guards and Fukienese are also at the Shanghai end of the line. The various positions of these units are probably well known in Shanghai, so the writer did not attempt to learn more of them.

No Fear of Chang Tso-lin.

The writer asked the Chief of Staff what he thought of the possibility of another Manchurian descent upon Chihli at this juncture and was told that it was very unlikely. "Chang Tso-lin will of course be fully prepared for anything and will watch developments closely, but if the Chêkiang armies give signs of breaking in a short time he will not think of coming inside the Great Wall. Of course if Lu Yung-hsiang were to hold his ground over a long period and we were to suffer severe defeats, Chang Tso-lin would be very likely to come in. Others would also take advantage of such a state of things. This is naturally one reason why we want to bring it quickly to an end."

Of recent events the Chief of Staff had very little detailed news. He claimed that the Kiangsu forces had taken and passed Liuho on Saturday and that they were on the point of taking Kiating. On Saturday also the Northern armies had had marked successes at Huangtu, their right flank having turned and enveloped the Chêkiang left. There have been no detailed reports of casualties, with the exception of the deaths of several captains which had been earlier reported and are now confirmed.

Blame Laid on Chekiang.

General Liu, like Marshal Wu Pei-fu, puts the whole responsibility for starting the war upon General Lu Yung-hsiang. Asked for some account of the beginnings of the fray he retold the story of the wandering and marauding Anfuites from Fukien and their adoption by General Lu. He told how they had perpetrated all manner of outrages in Fukien and had been defeated and driven out by Generals Sun Ch'uan-fang and Chou Yin-jen; how they had then fled into Kiangsi, committing outrages as they went, how they had attempted to invade Anhui on the same errand and how, after a defeat in Anhui, they had crossed the Chêkiang border and been received and armed by General Lu who proceeded to lead them against Kiangsu. He said that in receiving these marauders and in not disarming them General Lu had broken Clause III in the peace pact signed with his various neighbours and that then, having himself given due provocation for war, he refused to listen to Marshal Wu Pei-fu's appeals, but proceeded to make war. The Chief of Staff said that Kiangsu had long planned out this campaign, and had therefore been able to place its armies strategically at the very outbreak, because they knew it had to come sometime since, in spite of every effort at placation, General Lu was determined upon it.

Asked why he thought General Lu should risk his position by taking the initiative in a fight against heavy odds, General Liu said he could not imagine unless it was because Chêkiang was a small field and Kiangsu a big one, and because he wanted a bigger field.

MARSHAL CHANG TSO-LIN AND CHIHLI

Mobilization of Troops

Peking, Sept. 9.

The mobilization of Marshal Chang Tso-lin's troops is expected to take place within two or three days. According to those in very close touch with the course of affairs, the Mukden war-lord has decided to "throw his hat into the ring." On the other hand, the mobilization may be intended as a movement to divert the Chihli troops from the scene of the present conflict.—Eastern News Agency.

FRIDAY.

THE WAR AS YET FOUGHT

No Continuous Line But a Series of Posts Among Paddy and Creeks

There was little or no fighting on the entire front from Liuho to Huangtu during all Thursday, though troops on both sides lay in their position ready for the other if they came. Occasional shots were fired, now and then a 3-inch piece getting into action, but the ground was too boggy for fighting. The land round Huangtu is low-lying, all under cultivation and the rain has made a morass of the greater portion, while the rice fields are full and overflowing.

During Wednesday night the artillery from the north opened an intensive fire upon the batteries in the locality immediately adjacent to the railway station at Huangtu and kept them pretty well subdued.

A shell from one actually struck the station itself and tore off a corner of the building. The station master, who was inside on the floor, was injured, it is said either by a ricochet from a bit of the shell or by piece of the flying glass.

The firing stopped at midnight. There were no further activities until the morning when a few more shots were aimed at Chêkiang. Desultory firing continued for the greater part of yesterday, but no damage was inflicted.

Both Sides Reinforcing

According to the best information available Nanking troops are pouring into the railway sector—these are reputed to be in part from Wu Pei-fu and the remainder from the brigade sent by the Christian General, Gen. Feng Yu-hsiang. The rainy weather thus favours the operations of the Nanking forces in this reinforcing process. When these have been aligned and intermingled with the veterans of the present line, Marshal Chi will, it is expected by military observers, launch the drive on Huangtu.

TAKING TIME BY THE FORELOCK.

Chêkiang in the meanwhile has not been at all idle. Troop trains from Woosung Forts and Hangchow are carrying fresh defenders to this important sector. Car upon car left Shanghai on Thursday loaded with the grey-clad soldiers of Lu Yung-hsiang for Nanziang, the rear post of Chêkiang This little village is now rapidly being turned into a military camp and the number of soldiers found there yesterday was three times that of Wednesday.

More and more tents have been erected and the khaki colour, blending into the green, affords a harmony not unlike the bases of another nation, though the military roadways are lacking. The available houses have been supplemented by matsheds to house the troops.

Reports from local sources indicate that the number of wounded on the entire front is in the neighbourhood of 850, and from an inspection of those brought to hospital, one may assume that the number of casualties is nominal. For the most part wounds are not serious and it was stated in Nanziang, where a relief hospital is situated, that but a very few had died there—no actual figures available.

On the special train from the front last evening, one car load of wounded came into Shanghai North Station, in which but 23 men were carried.

Though the road bed of the S.N.R. is one of the best in China and in a splendid state of repair, Marshal Lu is taking every precaution that it should so remain, and a large squad of repairers are walking the tracks daily to keep watch for the slightest indication of trouble. The bridges are inspected and rails and sleepers thoroughly gone over.

The Scheme of Warfare

The general type of warfare on the Shanghai battle front is not according to the conception of those who fought in the Great War, where heavily entrenched forces, kept in communication with the rear by connecting trenches, could remain concealed and protected from enemy fire, though the aeroplane was a disaster to be feared. In China, at least on the Huangtu sector, trenches are avoided, the natural condition of the ground affording concealment as long as needed by the soldiers.

Guerilla warfare, as outlined by Wellington in the Spanish wars, is the general type of combat, though the three-inch guns and mountain batteries add a modern touch. Skirmishing parties are avoided and infantry charges are made for certain objectives, when determined action is decided upon—at other times the men are idle.

People might suppose that these armies are facing each other, as the Allies faced the Hindenburg line, with continuous protection over the whole front. Were such the case, neither of the armies would have enough men to cover their front, and food for such an army could not be supplied by a single-track railroad or by the population near by or from supplies at the bases. The field action, at Huangtu and Liuho, is certainly heavily manned and soldiers are ready in reserve but over the whole line, even from the railway to the river, such a mass could not be maintained. Outposts and communications with the rear are kept to prevent surprises and attempts to break through; and roving parties keep well out to forestall any such move, which with the slow movement of the armies, where there are no roads and no motors for quick transit, can be easily met. So regiment meets regiment and flanking movements are difficult to execute because cavalry is lacking—frontal attacks at the direct objective are the usual programme.

It was rumoured on Thursday that the Chêkiang troops defending Shanghai were running short of ammunition. Extra precautions have been taken by the naval and Volunteer authorities to cope with any emergency in the event of a falling back of the Chêkiang forces.

TROOPS COMING DOWN THE YANGTZE

Reinforcements for Nanking Also Mean More Claimants for Share in Possible Spoils

Movement of large bodies of Hupeh troops from several up-river ports into Nanking for transfer to the fighting front is reported by a correspondent just arrived from there. The arrival 3,000 well-trained and fully equipped infantry on board the C.M.S. Kiangshun was published on Thursday and further units are reported to be loading at Hwangchow and other points. This contributor also quotes the report insisted upon in Nanking that Feng Yu-hsiang is on his way from Peking with his famous "Ironsides" 8,000 strong and that he has instructions to make short work of the Chêkiang resistance.

The fact that the reinforcements are said to be sent unsolicited, however, injects another element into the political background of the struggle. It not only means that Wu Pei-fu is himself taking command of the Kiangsu action, but it means that in the event of victory there will be new rewards to be dispensed. It is clear that some of the local leaders are uncertain whether to welcome the prospective immediate victory or to regret the equally certain prospect of new contenders for the honours and the spoils.

From Hankow to Chinkiang, the river, which has been quiet since the first great movement of troops, now presents a lively scene. Hwangchow, Wusueh, Pukow, Yangchow are again disgorging troops, this time from the northern provinces. Local residents in Chinkiang and Yangchow have taken fresh alarm and many prominent families have fled to Shanghai. The river steamers are crowded to their unmost. First class passengers are glad to obtain deck bed accommodation.

A Levy on Yangchow

Practically all the native banks in Chinkiang and Yangchow are now closed and business is at a standstill. Both cities are heavily garrisoned and under strict martial law. At Yangchow, the commander of the garrison has demanded of the Chamber of Commerce the payment of $150,000 before the 15th for the support of the local soldiery. Business men declare that they cannot possibly raise so large a sum after the levies already made upon them. Theatres and places of amusement have closed and even the tea houses, for which both cities are famous are almost deserted.

The motor launch which plies between the two cities has been commandeered, but a tramp launch has taken its place and the motor line to Yangchow is still operating. Attempts to seize the motor buses, according to Mr. J. C. Taylor, the manager in charge, have repeatedly been made during the last two weeks but have been frustrated. Mr. Taylor, who is a British subject, threatens to place every car in the service under lock and key and himself to stand guard if any further attempt to molest the line is made.

The railway is still open to Soochow, and with the new influx of troops is likely to be kept open without difficulty.

MARSHAL LU AT THE FRONT

Rumoured Departure from Hangchow: British Consul's Visit

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Hangchow, Sept. 9.

It is rumoured to-night that Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang has left the city, his destination presumably being the front.

Hangchow is quieter than in times of peace, while the Chinese press gets little or nothing from the front. The news it does get, however, is always optimistic and comes chiefly from Shanghai.

The C.M.S. Hospital has two Red Cross units, each numbering 17, now ready to take the field. Up to the present owing to the state of the Red Cross treasury, only one has been properly financed. Dr. S. B. Chang is leading the first unit.

The various Chinese Associations of the City are much in consulation these days arranging for this form of help and for that, making many plans and drawing up endless rules and regulations which in all probability will never be adhered to. Christian leaders are making very good arrangements for the care and protection of the women and children should the worst come to the worst.

The British Consul is here on a visit and has asked the officials to give his nationals due protection. This has of course been promised, but some of us would like to see a shallow draught gunboat in the Tsien Tang opposite the City.

Two indispensable adjuncts of war as of peace

MUD HOLDS UP FIGHTING

Action Impossible Under Present Conditions According to Foreign Officer

FROM RODNEY GILBERT.

Nanking, Sept. 10.

In official circles here all news has to do with Chihli advances and victories. Foreign observers returning from the front do not discredit the local reports but say that advances are trifling and that victories are not spectacular. An American army officer said this morning that no army could possibly register either a pronounced victory or a pronounced defeat in such country as is now being fought over. If there were no enemy at all, the Kiangsu troops would simply be wading dismally through rice paddies at their present speed. Heavy fighting is, however, reported from the Anting district (next station west of Huangtu on S. N. Ry.—Ed.) where the Kiangsu troops are said to be forging steadily ahead in spite of water and mosquitos.

At the Governor's office it was claimed last night that General Ch'en T'iao-yuan, the Hsuchow commander, had advanced southward from Ihing, west of the Taihu with one Division and three Mixed Brigades, and had defeated the Chêkiang troops at an unmapped town known as Hsiangshan. There was also a report from this district of an attempt made by the Chêkiang army to send a large force across the Taihu in junks and the Kiangsu commanders claimed to have sunk a great number of boats and to have turned back the rest to the south shore. It is asserted in headquarters here that the Kiangsu troops are now well past Liuho, are beyond Huangtu, where the nature of the country makes rapid progress impossible, but have not yet taken Kiating. (These claims were untrue at the time of going to press—Ed.)

It is confidentially stated here that as soon as Chen Tiao-yuan and the Anhui troops have control of the situation west of the Taihu, a concentrated movement will be made across country from Soochow to Sungkiang where General Lu's line of communications will be cut. Kiangsu officers at the front assert that Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang has given orders that, if defeated, his troops are to fire on the foreign settlements as they retreat with the idea of discrediting Chi Hsieh-yuan. For this reason no determined drive towards the Shanghai-Hangchow railway has yet been undertaken, for fear the Chêkiang troops, finding themselves cut off, will pour into the Settlements. The Lunghua arsenal is still the chief objective in the back of all Kiangsu officers' minds.

Wounded soldiers are now coming in here by the truckload. About 30 cars are known to have arrived to date loaded with seriously wounded men who could not be cared for by the overtaxed Mission and military hospitals in the fighting area. A large percentage, lacking attention, die en route..

Big Battle Imminent on the Lake Front

Nanking, Sept. 10.

Reports arriving here indicate that a heavy attack by Kiangsu is expected on the Taihu Lake front at Ihing and a big battle there is anticipated.

THE WAR AS SEEN FROM NANKING

Official Claims: Fresh Troops from North: Fighting on Chekiang Border

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Nanking, Sept. 9.

The following are the Kiangsu official communiqués for to-day and yesterday:—

Sept.8. Our centre has made several small attacks and has captured 4 machine guns and 100 rifles. Our left wing captured two lines of trenches and advanced slightly. Our right wing is on the offensive. On the Ihing front, enemy troops have been sighted at Hsiangshan (on the provincial border) They were driven back somewhat by our fire.

Sept. 9. The Liuho-Kiating-Huangtu front is unchanged. South of Ihing we hold the important passes in the mountains. Several boats which attempted to land troops from the Taihu at Wusih were sunk by our fire. The Tupan of Fukien has sent troops against Lu at the Hsieh-hsia Pass and has driven back some Chêkiang troops.

The yamên does not admit the recapture of Liuho reported in Shanghai papers of the 6th. More wounded were brought to Nanking yesterday. At the yamên it is said that the wounded so far are only between one and two hundred. No severe fighting has yet been reported; both sides are waiting for a good opening. A hot battle would certainly take place if Kiangsu tries a flank movement, as is now expected, via Ihing, Huchow and Kashing.

The present line, according to the Kiangsu authorities, runs from Liuho, west of Kiating and Huangtu, north of Wukiang, across Taihu to the Chêkiang-Kiangsu border. From here to Kwangtehchow the border is mountainous, below Ihing and near Kwangtehchow are important passes.

Reinforcements from North.

For the past three days, Honan troops have been arriving at Pukou by rail and have left by the Shanghai-Nanking Railway for the front. This morning a brigade of Hupeh troops arrived on the C.M.S. Kiangshun. Tientsin recruits for the local police force arrived in Nanking on Monday.

A foreign observer who returned to-day from Quinsan says that there has certainly been "real" fighting, though localized.

A high Nanking official has been to Shanghai and has returned and is now in Soochow, presumably a bearer of negotiations regarding terms of peace.

CHARCOAL, which is used as a fuel in every Chinese household, has gone up in price as a result of the local war. The Chinese press states that the Defence Commander at Nanking has placed an embargo upon all shipments of the commodity to Shanghai from centres where it is manufactured in Kiangsu province.

KASHING GROWS USED TO WARFARE

Always the Flow of Troops But Business Timidly Reviving: Clouds on Lake Front

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Kashing, Sept. 10, 10 a.m.

The city is quiet, business slightly improved on the streets. The so called "Fast Mail Boats" are resuming trips to neighbouring towns. Country produce is coming in for local market. Railway trains from Shanghai and Hangchow get through on delayed schedules. Reinforcements have gone on to the Shanghai front. The effect of foregin warships landing parties for protection seems to add a factor of confidence in the news filtered from Shanghai. The Red Cross Organization commands respect from all sides. Telegram get through after two days delay, unless official. Chess board strategists have talked themselves tired, audiences get listless. The impressing of labourers is easing up a little. People now waiting for something to happen.

11.30 a.m.

One British and American Tobacco Co. motor-boat has been allowed to travel by the local water-ways. Reports of looting near the boundary of Chêkiang and Kiangsu persist. Our best Kashing troops have gone to Shanghai and have been replaced by others from Hangchow. Missionaries connected with the Red Cross are trying to get through from Kashing to Huchow. Steam launches are resuming trips Hangchow to Shanghai viâ Kashing.

Local banks refuse Shanghai cheques; the Bank of China give silver for notes. The Custom House reports very little cargo coming or going.

Huchow Half Empty: Evidences of Battle at Changhing.

Later

A Red Cross motor-boat came through from Huchow (south of the Taihu) to-day viâ Songlin and Wuchen through Sinchen, bringing or rather confirming the following items of information.

(1.) At least one third of the population of Huchow have fled elsewhere.

(2.) Wounded soldiers brought in prove that a battle has been fought near Changhing (Dzanghsin).

(3.) The normally strong garrison at Szean southwest of Huchow has been strongly reinforced from Hangchow with troops moving in force towards Changhing and Ihing on the west of the Great Lake.

(4.) Scattered groups of soldiers from both sides assembled and marched or transported to fighting fronts, leaving practically all the larger market towns and smaller walled cities in the care of local police.

(5.) Telegraphic communication partly restored, mails not assured or prompt.

(7.) Military passes necessary to get through with any degree of courtesy or safety.

(8.) Apparently, neither side equipped with the sort of boats to make the Great Lake useful, or a water-fight probable as a deciding factor.

To-day, steam launches from Hangchow to Shanghai and Shanghai to Hangchow have resumed tentative schedules, all in territory controlled by the Chêkiang forces. A few chairs and ricshas appeared on the streets of Kashing. Local activity in dried fish, salt meat, rice and essential foods begins at the larger hongs. Work is going on to some extent behind closed doors to avoid conscription. A number of serviceable boats tied to the banks have been sunk with stones to escape seizure. A foreign flag flies over a lot of newly imported machinery at a mill not quite finished. One of our "fighting colonels" has gone to the Ihing front, the other to Shanghai. A younger commandant is now in charge. Railway service improving in schedules. It is rumoured that Marshal Lu has gone to Shanghai to press the fighting. Question 1:—Can Chêkiang hold out until Chang Tso-lin and Sun Yat-sen cause a diversion of forces on the way to aid Kiangsu? Question 2. Will the firmness of the foreigners at Shanghai shift the decisive battle to the west?

NO CAUSE FOR FEAR IN SHANGHAI

The Council for the Foreign Settle has issued the following further communiqué:—

Contrary to various alarmist rumours, there is nothing in the existing situation to give cause for apprehension or alarm so far as the Foreign Settlement is concerned. At the same time measures have been taken to place the Foreign Settlement in an adequate state of defence and to safe-guard the lives and property of its residents, and numerous warship of various Foreign Powers are assembled in the harbour for further protection should the necessity arise.

CHEKIANG REPORTS OF THE BATTLEFIELD

Successes Claimed on Taihu Front Where Big Action Is Anticipated

According to reports from headquarters of the Chêkiang army from Lunghua no attack has been made by either side since Tuesday morning owing to the heavy rains. As the result of the last attack Chêkiang troops have now driven the Kiangsu troops from the country this side of Anting. The left wing has advanced far beyond Anting.

The second army of the Allied Forces (Chêkiang) made a severe attack and captured the Kiangsu stronghold of Susan which is on the border of the two provinces some 30 li south of Ihing. The attack took place late on Tuesday afternoon. On Wednesday Chêkiang made another attack and Captured Wuchikwan where the Kiangsu troops retreated on Tuesday evening.

Wuchikwan is considered by the Lunghua authorities as important in virtue of its position as a centre through which supplies from the Taihu lake pass. The fall of Ihing is expected at any moment by the Chêkiang army.

An unofficial report from external sources has been received at Lunghua stating that troops beyond Liuho and Quinsan are being shifted towards Ihing for the defence of that city.

Chang Tso-lin is also stated to be mobilizing his whole army, and has stationed troops at Jehol, Shanhaikuan and Chifengkow. A clash between Chang and Wu is anticipated by the Chêkiang Authorities.

THE POLICE RESERVES STAND BY

Big Muster at Posts They Would Hold in Hongkew

The Police Reserves on Thursday night received instructions to stand by, but they have not actually been mobilized.

For the first time since emergency conditions have prevailed the "Specials" were called out on Thursday night, a large force mustering in the Northern district under Mr. W. Beatty, Assistant Commissioner of Police in charge of the Reserves. The men were sent out to the Settlement boundaries in West Hongkew to take over for a short while the patrols and posts in that area with a view to becoming familiar with the locality.

It is understood that in the event of a threatened inrush of large bodies of retreating troops, the Police Reserves will be employed in a similar capacity to the infantry units of the Volunteers guarding the outskirts of Shanghai.

SAVE at Tientsin and in Shanghai and Peking, foreign newspapers in China are not devoting much space to the fight for Shanghai, while in Hongkong the situation in Canton naturally overshadows the war in our midst. The "South China Morning Post" is perhaps the most apathetic, its modest heading for the Shanghai news being "China's Wars." In Japan the "Advertiser" and "Chronicle" provide an interesting contrast, the former "featuring" the news in its usual American style, while the Kobe journal, which always delights in interspersing comment in news stories, published the other day a discourse by Gordius Nielsen on the situation. The far-away London dailies can be scarcely less interested in the struggle than the Press in Japan and Hongkong

THE SPECULATING IN CHINESE BONDS

How the Present Situation Has Come About: Mushroom Banks with Bad Influence: The Sooner Weeded out the Better

The origin of the recent fall of Domestic Bonds in the present situation of the Market reveals some unusual features and a paradox peculiar to the Celestial Republic. The situation just now cannot be thoroughly understood without looking back to the state of affairs dating from the period just before the Great War. Up to 1914 banking developments were very behind-hand in China, and the Chinese banking system which had broken down at the time of the Boxer Trouble with the collapse of the Shansi Banks had scarcely commenced its modern development.

Indeed up to 1914 there were only eight foreign banks. With the boom during the latter period of the war and the "post bellum" era business took such an expansion that there followed an enormous extension of foreign and foreign-style-Chinese banks. Many of the latter were established by Chinese officials and their friends for the manipulation and employment of official funds and for the development of business schemes of their merchant friends.

Money Diverted to Bonds.

When the slump began in 1921 the amount of legitimate business fell to such an extent that there was insufficient employment for a large number of "mushroom" banks which had sprung up. The resulting easiness of money and the lack of employment for capital naturally diverted the utilization of funds into the Domestic Bond market which had hitherto languished and had been unpopular with Chinese.

The formation of a Chinese banking consortium at this time, for loaning money to the Government, had much to do with the interest taken in these bonds. The outbreak of the Chihli-Fengtien War in the Spring of 1922 sent these bonds to about their lowest level. At this time the bonds became an extremely attractive speculation, as the loan services were being carried on up to schedule. Interest and redemption gave an exceedingly handsome yield on the investment.

During the last two years the stagnant business conditions have resulted generally in easy money with the exception of periods round China New Year. Easy money always means depression of industrial stock and the rise of gilt edge securities. The result was a natural tendency for the Domestic Bonds to go up seeing that the service was continued quite regularly and the security was in foreign hands.

The Celestial Paradox.

Here enters the "Celestial" paradox. In other countries when the credit of the government is good, bonds go up and vice versa. In China where most things are done in the opposite way according to the Western point of view the process is reversed. When the credit of the Government is good it can borrow money and the floating of new loans satisfies the investment market and keeps the prices down. When the Government is discredited and financially bankrupt it is unable to borrow on a large scale. The investor buys up the well secured loans and the domestic bonds start to go up. Thereafter the large interest payments and redemption under the sinking funds of the well managed domestic loans under foreign management come into the market for investment. The supply of the bonds is smaller by the amount redeemed, and the demand is greater by the amount redeemed plus the interest. The effect is accumulative and the good bonds of a bad government go up sharply.

By this time the mushroom growth of banks has created a large class of speculators who seeing the firmness of these bonds begin buying and increase the accumulative effect. Both in Peking and Shanghai, banks and brokers have created a large speculative market in marginal transactions. As long as the easy money and bad credit of the government continued and China was at peace the bonds had to remain at a pretty high level. But the speculators had carried these bonds up to the point where they only began to yield very little more than the best class of external loans. (e.g. Reorganizations, S.N.R., etc.), a situation which was anomalous and scarcely justifiable. This was forseen by a number of investors and speculators who even before the recent crisis sold out and invested in other securities giving the same yield at a lower price level.

Eliminating the Speculator.

Now the final stage is that the purchasers on margin, scenting trouble, which means dearer money, were driven into a panic, and forseeing the fall in the price of bonds which would wipe out their margin and even result in further loss, started a rush of selling orders which broke the market, while would-be buyers held off for lower prices. This has resulted in heavy loss to the speculators who are deprived of their margins and more if they have it. It also involves loss to banks who hold insufficient margins for their sales to the speculators, or who were over-bought themselves, at higher levels. The effort of speculators and banks to obtain accommodation, and the finance liquidation of their accounts brings about the tight money, the fear of which was the cause of the panic. This forms the vicious circle through which several of the banks have fallen.

It is to be hoped that this will be an expedient means to eliminate the worst offenders among the speculators and the "mushroom" banks, and will clear the atmosphere when the crisis is over. After all, the bonds are well secured and are an excellent investment provided the prices are not forced excessively high. The bona fide investor who desires a good and safe investment at a reasonable price will be glad to see a healthy market more free from manipulation and less under the influence of violent fluctuations. The money market will be well rid of the parasite "mushroom" organization which does nothing for the development of healthy trade and panders for its own rapid enrichment, a feature far too noticable since the war.

THE POWERS AND CHINA'S WAR

Belgium's Prudent Request: Can the Powers Combine to Restore Unity?

London, Sept. 5.

The "Daily Telegraph" declaims against the Foreign Office's apparent indifference towards the events in China. It declares that official news received in London is not only belated as compared with press reports, but is much more incomplete.

The journal understands that Washington is likely to take the lead in revising last year's interventionist suggestions, and express as the opinion that Britain should be the first to support any proposals for protecting the interests of foreigners in China and safeguarding railway communications. It points out that obvious limits are at present set to intervention, but says that much can be done to improve the situation in the regions where foreign influence can readily be exercised.—Reuter.

Brussels, Sept. 8.

The British Government to-day promptly agreed to the Belgian Government's request that, if necessary, the Belgian colony in Shanghai should be allowed to take refuge on board British warships.—Reuter.

London, Sept. 8.

The "Daily Telegraph's" diplomatic correspondent says that the movement in favour of the Powers pacifically intervening in China is rapidly gaining ground both in America and in Great Britain.

The "Daily News" says it is our duty to take a share with the other European Powers in defence of the foreign colony of Shanghai.

The "Times" states that there has been a demand on the London market for special insurance on property in China against risk of damage by war and civil commotion. The property covered is mostly in warehouses of the leading cities, notably Shanghai. A good deal of business was done a few days ago on a basis of a three per cent. premium, but five per cent. was quoted in some quarters towards the end of the week. The rate for the month remained at thirty shillings per cent.—Reuter.

London, Sept. 9.

The "Daily Telegraph's" diplomatic correspondent understands that a preliminary exchange of views is proceeding between London and Washington on the subject of some concerted action of the Powers with a view to restoring peace and order in China. It is expected that the situation will receive the immediate attention of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald.

Concert or Discord?

A leader in the "Manchester Guardian" on the situation in China says the problem is whether the great nations can trust one another sufficiently to step in. Their previous attempts at concerted action in China are to say the least discouraging precedents, and it would be better to leave the Chinese to fight it out than for foreigners with selfish ambitions to join.

Already some foreigners, the article goes on to say, must watch the development of the war with shame, for they participated in the smuggling of munitions into China. While such things can still be done, perhaps it would be wiser if the Powers confined themselves to keeping order in the Treaty Ports.—Reuter.

Another Suggestion for a Round-Table Conference: Insurance Risks

London, Sept. 10.

The "Daily Telegraph," referring to the tentative discussions relative to the possibilities of useful intervention by the Powers in China, says that one possibility mooted is that the Powers, acting in concert, might propose to Peking the calling of a Round Table Conference of those in China who really exercise power and who can, if they will, effect a settlement of their differences for saving the country and establish some form of Federal organization corresponding to the realities of the case.

Questions of the methods by which the new Central Authority could be set going financially are subordinate to the prime need of peace and security.

The "Times" states that 10 shillings per cent. for one month was quoted yesterday to cover goods in Shanghai against risk of aircraft damage only.

The "Daily Chronicle" discusses the possibility of the Powers concertedly negotiating for the peaceful control of the Chinese railways, and absolutely refusing them for the carriage of Chinese troops, thus making peace almost automatic. The journal says that this would require a very complete concordat of the Powers. On the Chinese side, it seems likely that a large body of opinion might eventually rally to the idea as affording the sole hope of a respite from the present evils.

The "Westminster Gazette" states that China has long been ripe for some sort of Federal Government, and that in the conversations proceeding between London and Washington it is to be hoped that something more than ending the present dispute will be considered. The Powers should attempt intervention, which would remove the cause of periodic outbreaks. It may be difficult, but it is the only objective which would justify external interference.—Reuter.

GOLD FRANC QUESTION

Peking, Sept. 6.

The local papers have lately on several occasions stated that the gold franc question had been settled or was likely to be settled on the basis of a two-year suspension, but no such suggestion has been made to the French Legation.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

DR. YEN ELECTED PREMIER AT LAST

Peking, Sept. 12.

Parliament this afternoon elected Dr. W. W. Yen Premier. There were 435 members present, 393 voted and 291 votes were cast in favour of Dr. Yen.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

DEMANDS for funds with which to pay for the reception to the Panshan Lama continue to come to the Peking Government. The Governor of Kansu, Lu Hung-tao, now asks for $200,000 from the salt collections to reimburse the merchants who have already advanced large sums to entertain the visitor from Tibet.

MR. Chen Chi-woon, who was appointed one of the two receivers for the Chinese Merchants Bank at Canton, has sent in his resignation to the Mayor from the post of receiver. The reason given is that he is too busy raising funds for the need of the military. It is not yet known whether his resignation has been accepted or not.

SEPTEMBER 7, another day of "National Humiliation," was commemorated on Sunday afternoon by members of the Treaty Abolition Agitation Society, the National Federation of Students' Association, the Anti-Imperialism Movement Union and other bodies. Several speeches of the usual fiery charcter were delivered.

SOME one in Tientsin has ventured to suggest in an anonymous letter to the Press that Germans might now be admitted to the local club, or at least that some friendly approach should be made to them. Another correspondent condemns the proposal. The "P. & T. Times" dealing with the matter editorially suggests somewhat apologetically that a little mild forgetfulness of wartime hatred would not be out of order at this time.

A report from Kalimpong, Bengal, states Mme. Neel, the woman traveller, who recently visited Lhasa in disguise, had as her only companion on the journey a Tibetan youth whom she has adopted as her son. Instead of money she carried small gold bars hidden in a waist belt. Once when stopped by Chinese brigands, who began to search her, Mme. Neel burst into tears when they found a few coins and not only convinced the brigands that they were taking her all, but also prevailed on them to return what they had already taken. She travelled as a beggar-pilgrim. Mme. Neel is a tiny, frail-looking woman of 60, who speaks Tibetan like a native.

RUSSIAN LEGATION IN PEKING

Text of M. Karakhan's Note to British Minister: Claim of Ownership

Peking, Sept. 5.

The following is the text of the Note which was sent on August 25 by the Soviet Ambassador (Mr. Karakhan) to the British Minister (Sir Ronald Macleay) in connexion with the transfer of the former Russian Legation premises and which the British Minister agreed with Mr. Karakhan to withhold from publication for the time being:—

"Monsieur le Ministre,

"In a Note under date of August 18 of this year, His Excellency the Japanese Minister informed me that the Diplomatic Representatives of Eight Powers co-signatory to the Protocol of 1901 have decided to hand over to the Ambassador of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics the former Russian Legation and the keys thereof, and that they have appointed the Netherlands Chargé d'Affaires, the Jonkheer W. F. Roall, to represent them in this matter. At the same time His Excellency Mr. Yoshizawa requested me to name the person I would delegate to take over the Soviet Embassy and the keys.

"By these presents I have the honour to communicate to Your Excellency that I have appointed Mr. Klishko, Counsellor of this Embassy, to take over the buildings and the keys thereof, belonging to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. I should, therefore, very much appreciate it, Monsieur le Ministre, if you would be good enough to inform thereof the Netherlands Chargé d'Affaires, that he might take immediate steps to effect the act of handing over of the Embassy.

"At the same time, I beg to inform Your Excellency that I consider that this handing over is being effected in view of the fact that the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is the owner of the buildings of the former Russian Legation.

"As regards the other considerations laid down in the Note of His Excellency the Japanese Minister under date of the 18th instant, I feel it is my duty to state that I cannot fully endorse all the said considerations, but that inasmuch as a coordination of points of view preliminary to the handing over of the Embassy would be in contradiction with the position of the Soviet Government, which I had the opportunity to expound exhaustively in my conversation with the American Minister, Mr. Schurman, on July 24 of this year, I may, however, express my firm belief that the existing differences will not prevent to establish a modus vivendi between the Soviet Embassy and the Legations situated in the Diplomatic Quarter.

"I avail myself of this opportunity, etc.,

(Signed) L. KARAKHAN."

From Russian sources it is learned that, after a meeting between the Netherlands Chargé d'Affaires and Mr. Klishko had taken place, Sir Ronald Macleay informed Mr. Klishko that the buildings and keys of the Russian Legation could not actually be handed over until formal consent had been given by all the other Protocol Powers.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, Sept. 10, 1924.

The question of M. Karakhan, the Soviet Envoy, taking over the Russian Legation has now been settled in a satisfactory manner.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE German Minister having made a request that mixed cases in which Germans are involved be tried at the Shanghai Mixed Court in the presence of assessors of non-Allied countries the Waichaiopu recently referred the matter to the Ministry of Justice for consideration (says the "Far Eastern Times"). The Waichiaopu has now received a reply from the Ministry of Justice with the suggestion that the matter be left in abeyance for the time being, as China is taking up with the Powers the rendition of the Shanghai Mixed Court. In the opinion of the Ministry of Justice the rendition of the Mixed Court will settle the German question automatically.

THE WAR POSITION REVIEWED

AT the close of the first week of the war—in respect of fighting actually five days, it may be useful to review the situation and to sum up the probabilities dealing with the question. Is it to be a very big affair or merely local? A serious conflict to decide who shall dominate all China, or merely what Mr. Tong Shao-yi called a boundary dispute to settle who shall keep Woosung, the Kiangnan Arsenal and the Shanghai district? Until yesterday fighting had not greatly impressed the onlooker as serious. But the casualties now arriving, many of them a grave kind, show that the struggle for Liuho has become fierce. The Chêkiang troops have certainly more than held their own and even claim to have made a fair advance. If some of them are very indifferent, there are among them undoubtedly good troops, better, according to those who should know, than Marshal Chi's best. On the other hand, numbers probably favour the Nanking Tuchun. There is a report of fighting yesterday on the western, that is the Taihu, side. By all considerations this should be the really decisive field of action as a victory here by either commander would enable him to cut all his enemy's communications.

To-day we receive a rather extraordinary account of an interview between Mr. Rodney Gilbert and Marshal Wu Pei-fu. Considering that Mr. Gilbert has known Marshal Wu intimately for some years and has no need of an interpreter in talking to him, what strikes one most is the very doubtful sincerity of Marshal Wu's remarks. At the time of the conversation, fighting had already been going on for four days. Marshal Wu must have known this, although Mr. Gilbert might not, as he had been travelling. Yet the Marshal speaks as if hostilities were still awaited. He also rakes up the old story about the flight of the Fukienese generals into Chêkiang being the cause of the conflict. Now we have very strong reasons to believe that not only was Kiangsu preparing for a war before the Fukienese entered Chêkiang, but that Marshal Chang Tso-lin was warned at least five weeks ago that war might take place. Furthermore, there is practically unassailable evidence that Marshal Chi of Nanking, whose delay in attacking for several days after he had his troops in position puzzled everybody, was waiting for definite instructions from President Tsao Kun, who certainly would not have given such instructions without the approval of Marshal Wu.

The bombastic announcement from Canton that Dr. Sun Yat-sen is preparing a northern expedition to assist Chêkiang will not impress anyone very seriously. It furnishes an excuse for the Military Government of Canton to stick to the arms and munitions from the Hav which really belong to the Merchant Volunteers. But we have heard of these northern expeditions before and seen very little come of them. Still, taken in conjunction with the Chêkiang Tuchun's declaration of war on President Tsao Kun and the reports of Marshal Chang Tso-lin's preparations in Manchuria, Dr. Sun's announcement helps to broaden the issue.

Undoubtedly the greatest event of the week-end is Marshal Chang Tso-lin's declaration of war upon President Tsao Kun and Marshal Wu Pei-fu. That this would follow upon Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang's similar declaration on the President seemed inevitable. So long as the conflict appeared to be localized between Chêkiang and Kiangsu, it was not, perhaps, easy for Mukden to make a move. But directly Marshal Lu made his direct appeal to the nation, by denouncing "the illegal" President and declaring war on him, Marshal Chang comes in at once to support his ally and echo his war cry. Whether the floods in Chihli will enable him to get far beyond the Great Wall, whether his actions may not be hampered by fear of a Russian attack on the Chinese Eastern Railway, these are questions which only time can answer. But the gage has been thrown down, and, by the latest from Peking, the President has swiftly taken it up.

Thus all the great forces in China are now involved. And be it remembered that it is now excellent fighting weather right up to the end of November. But we have seen other wars in which the same issue appeared to be involved, only to end in compromise and disappointment. We certainly may incline to the belief that the unification of China can only be won by war; that is in accordance with Chinese history; but whether this is the war that is to achieve unification, is another question. We have seen in Europe a war that was to end all wars, without there being the slightest indication now that it will have done so. In China we may be at least as sceptical.

SHANGHAI AND THE WAR

Sept. 8.

THE action of the Powers in informing all combatants alike that no fighting will be permitted on the waters of the Huangpu has met with general approval certainly among foreigners, most probably among Chinese. It has also revived in some, stimulated in others, the hope that they will go farther and take action to secure the removal of the Woosung Forts and Kiangnan Arsenal away from the vicinity of the greatest commercial emporium in eastern Asia. There was a widespread feeling in favour of such action in 1913, among Chinese no less than among foreigners. Unfortunately it was not pressed home. Neither the forts nor the arsenal is of any military value, but they are none the less a source of perpetual disturbance to Shanghai. According to the curious rules of Chinese warfare, however, their possession counts for so many points in the game and their continued existence is thus a magnet for every bayonet in eastern China. Despite the asseverations of both sides, there is no valid reason to suppose that the present conflict is anything more than the usual "Tuchuns' war" on a rather larger scale than normal, or that unification of China is more to be looked for as its result than in the case of any previous war. However and whenever it may end, we may be morally certain that the losers will renew the struggle at the first available opportunity. The whole history of China's so-called republic, since with the death of Yuan Shih-kai the last vestiges of organic government began rapidly to crumble towards the existing dissolution, fully justifies the Powers in taking the necessary steps to have Shanghai surrounded with a neutral zone of sufficient depth to prevent the repeated interference with its normal life which is as intolerable and ruinous to Chinese as to foreigners.

Another point which should be rubbed in now by every organization which can exercise any influence with Home Governments is that this conflict has utterly put out of court all talk of the abolition of extraterritoriality. Nothing has been done in this region indeed, which could not be paralleled from every other war in China, and on a much worse scale. But never before has it been brought so prominently and forcibly to Western notice that wars waged theoretically for the liberties of the Chinese people are conducted with the most callous disregard for their rights, their possessions and their persons. The brutal kidnapping by the military pressgangs during the past four or five days, the roping together and sending off to the front of hundreds of innocent and inoffensive men, has aroused the greatest indignation in foreign circles. Yet the Chinese press is all but dumb. The Street Unions and student associations for ever chanting the song of China's sovereign rights, and denunciation of the foreigner's supposed oppression, have not a word to say at this trampling on the rights of their own people by the military. In 1919 the student associations throughout China proved that they have power, when they banded themselves together to prevent the Treaty of Versailles from being signed. Why have they never used that power to stop the endless civil wars of the past ten years? Until they do so, the foreigner can scarcely be called upon to surrender his extraterritorial rights. If there were no other excuse for keeping them, it might be found in the fact that there are at least a few cities of refuge where Chinese may be safe from kidnapping and extortion—the cities of foreign concessions.

THE Consular Body, the Council and those in whose hands the defence of the Settlement would directly rest are agreed that there is as yet no need to land any sailors or marines. And, as yet, there certainly appears no reason for taking any other view. The Settlement is not in the slightest danger of being attacked; nor even, while the fighting remains where it is, of being hit by shells, as in 1913. The duty of a landing party could hardly be other than to keep out stragglers.

But we believe there is a very general feeling that the authorities should take a much stronger line than they have yet in respect of the said stragglers and refugees generally. To-day we are informed that a cordon with barbed wire has been formed along the northern boundary. So much the better. But against this has to be set the fact that the Council has lent certain buildings to house refugees. This, we are told, is a temporary measure. But what about other refugees? Are we to understand that the barrier referred to is to keep out all Chinese fugitives or only a defeated army? If civilian refugees are admitted, how soon will it be before the Council has to find housing for them? And as regards soldiers we understand that it is considered sufficient to deprive them of arms and uniforms and admit them. This appears to us a distinct breach of neutrality. Possibly that does not greatly matter. What does matter is that the population of the Settlement will be further swelled by unemployed. And although food stuffs are still fairly plentiful, the article we print elsewhere shows that this condition cannot be relied on to continue indefinitely.

There is but too much reason to fear that this war may go on for several weeks, and it will certainly be best to take up a decided line at once. The waters of the Huangpu have already been neutralized; why not also the whole of Shanghai? The refugees who are here must remain. But every possible precaution should be taken to keep out any more. We cannot, perhaps, exclude all, but we certainly can exclude a large number. In 1864 Shanghai fought the Battle of Muddy Flats to demonstrate that she was a reservation for foreigners. To-day we are responsible also for the welfare of a vast number of Chinese. At the end of last week we are informed that kidnappers were actually carrying off Chinese from Council roads. This trouble tends to decline as stricter orders against it come from Chinese headquarters. But the responsibility of the Council remains the same as ever to keep the Settlement from being overflowed with unemployed, whose presence increases the danger of an epidemic and sends up prices all round.

DR. SUN AND THE VOLUNTEERS

APART from the war, there is no issue more interesting in China at present than the struggle between Dr. Sun Yat-sen and the Merchants Volunteers of Canton. On the surface this dispute would appear to have been ended by the agreement reported a week ago. But in reality, knowing the proud and stubborn nature of the Cantonese and in view of the bad faith with which they have apparently been treated after the agreement had been signed, we doubt whether the last has been heard of the quarrel. It will be remembered that these Volunteers formed their organization about eighteen months ago, with a view to protecting their homes against looting and bullying by Dr. Sun's mercenaries. Being short of weapons, they imported from Hamburg a very large stock of rifles, automatic pistols and ammunition, obtaining the usual permit from the Canton Government. When the weapons arrived on board the str. Hav, Dr. Sun caused the whole shipload to be seized and he still refuses to give them up. The question is further complicated by that of the notes of the Central Bank, Dr. Sun's latest expedient for getting something for nothing, he endeavouring to force the bank's paper money upon the merchants and shopkeepers and they as steadily refusing them.

The Cantonese resorted to the time-honoured Chinese device of shutting up all shops and suspending all business; and neither cajolery nor intimidation on Dr. Sun's part availed to make them reopen. One incident in this connexion has been misrepresented. It appears that Dr. Sun actually meditated bombarding Saikuan (a wealthy suburb of Canton) at one time and a warning was sent to him by the British Consul-General that, if shots came over the Shameen to the danger of foreign life and property, the Shameen authorities would take steps to protect themselves. According to Dr. Sun's own published statement, the note told him that the Shameen authorities would not allow the bombardment in any event. They never did anything of the kind; and, in fact, there is good reason to believe that it was Dr. Sun's own generals who held him back from so wanton an act as the bombardment. That the merchants and volunteers could have won a complete victory if they had persisted in the strike seems to be agreed by competent observers on the spot. It was, therefore, a great surprise when it was learnt that they had accepted a compromise under which they were to get their arms and ammunition on payment of $500,000; their commandant, Mr. Chan Lim-pak, was to make a declaration of loyalty; and they themselves were to be enrolled under the Civil Governor. It is to be hoped, for their sakes, that at least they have not paid over the five lakhs; they would be far wiser, from their own point of view in spending the money on more ammunition, which they would probably have little difficulty in importing privately without a Government permit. For Dr. Sun continues to refuse to hand over the weapons. He now puts forward a new condition, that the Volunteers must pledge themselves never to turn their arms against his mercenaries, which would of course stultify the purpose of their organization. Furthermore, there is very natural feeling over the execution of a Major Chau King-shin, of the 9th regiment of the Volunteers, after the agreement had been signed.

The mistake which obviously the Volunteers made was in ever coming to any agreement at all. They would have had good ground for expecting that Dr. Sun's Government would break its word; for had it not already done so in issuing a permit for the importation of the arms and then seizing them on arrival? Apart from this, directly the Volunteers consented to be enrolled under the Government, they tacitly gave to that Government the right to say whether they should be armed or not. That of course implies casuistry in reading the agreement, but one hardly imagines there would be any hesitation on Dr. Sun's part in taking advantage of the point. Under the agreement the Central Bank notes are not to be forced on the people: but it is more than likely they will reappear under another name. For Dr. Sun's military schemes have exhausted all ordinary means of revenue and he cannot live except by forced credit, especially now when he is announcing a new northern expedition, which, incidentally, will make him more determined than ever to stick to the Volunteers' arms. For he dares not leave a well equipped popular force in his rear. Besides, he will want the weapons himself.

The fact of the matter is that neither the Cantonese nor any other body of Chinese will be free from their military taskmasters until they have resolutely fought and vanquished them. The situation of the Cantonese is a particularly delicate one in that they not only have to endure Dr. Sun's high-flown ambitions, which have already cost Canton an incredible amount in exorbitant taxation, but they have to reckon with the far more dangerous element of the Bolshevized wing of the Kuomintang, before which it is becoming apparent that even Dr. Sun himself is no longer a free agent. It appears a very great pity for the well being of Canton and all the South, that the merchants and Volunteers did not hold out in their strike until victory was won.

THE enagement is announced between Miss Else Paulsen, formerly of Viborg, Denmark and at present at Vladivostok, and Mr. N. P. Petersen, of Amoy.

HISTORY REPEATS ITSELF

Sept. 10.

THAT history repeats itself is a very trite saying but it is not often that so exact a parallel can be found between ancient and modern times as in the old tale of the wars of Wu (Kiangsu) and Yueh (Chêkiang) and the present war at our doors between the same antagonists.

Two thousand, five hundred years ago Wu and Yueh, the modern Kiangsu and Chêkiang, were regarded as barbarian states by the Chinese who inhabited north and central China. In 495 B. C. Yun-chang, King of Yueh died and Hoh-lu, the King of Wu seized the opportunity to attack Yueh. He was defeated in a great battle fought near Kashing and died as a result of a wound received in the mêlée. Having delivered an unprovoked attack on his neighbour and been disastrously routed, he, naturally, felt aggrieved and with his dying breath bequeathed the quarrel to his son, Fu-ch'a. The new king was a worthy son of such a progenitor. Lest he should forget, he stationed a guard in his hall whose duty it was to say each time his master passed him, "Fu-ch'a, have you forgotten that the king of Yueh killed your father?" To which he replied, "No, how dare I forget?" In three years he was ready for war and in a naval engagement on the great lake near Soochow he totally defeated the troops of Yueh and carried its king, Kou-tsien, a captive to his capital (Soochow) where he made him a scullion in his stable. By subserviency and even loathsome sycophancy the king of Yueh at last won the confidence of his enemy and was allowed to return to his own kingdom to hold it henceforth as the vassal of his over-lord. He returned surfeited with the bitter bread he had eaten in bondage and consumed with a passion for revenge. He slept on a pallet of brushwood and hung a gall bladder near his seat at table. He practised rigid economy in state affairs and unweariedly trained his troops for war. He was ably seconded by his prime minister, Fan-li, a type of the shameless, unscrupulous but ever-successful Chinese statesman. This man found a peasant girl of dazzling beauty washing silk floss in a stream near the capital (Hangchow). He had her trained in all seductive arts and sent her with other rich gifts as tribute to the king of Wu. She was successful in beguiling her new master from the cares of state and he passed his days in dalliance with this favourite, who is known to history as Si-shih, perhaps, the most famous beauty in Chinese story.

But Wu had its statesmen as well as Yueh. The Counsellor, Wu Tze-hsu, was incorruptible and far-seeing, but Cassandra's gifts only brought him Cassandra's sorrows. The King's reply to his reiterated expostulations and warnings was to send him the royal sword as the signature of his death warrant. The patriot smiled grimly and said to the messenger "Tell your master that it was by my aid that his father became King. He himself was appointed heir to the throne by my advice and he then offered to halve the kingdom with me, but now he sends me to my death." To his own servants he said "Plant my grave with Kia trees; that wood is good for coffins and they will be needed soon in Wu." He also asked that his eyes should be taken out after his death and placed over the east gate of the city that he might see the fulfilment of his predictions—the troops of Yueh advancing to breach the walls. That gate is still called by his name and there is a tradition in Hangchow that when the bore rushes up the river the spirit of Wu Tze-hsu rides on its angry waters menacing his old enemies with his vengeance.

Twenty-three years had passed since Wu humiliated Yueh and now the wheel had come full circle and it was the turn of Wu to taste the bitterness of defeat. In the annals we have the laconic record "In the 22nd year of King Ai Yueh destroyed Wu." Other and later books add that the King of Yueh, moved with compassion for his fallen foe, offered him an island on which he might live, as Napoleon did on Elba, in the state of a petty king. But the unhappy monarch replied, "I have been a king and I am old; I cannot learn to serve a master." And so he died by his own hand.

These and many accretions are to be found in, what are called, the "uncanonical" books, but search through all the authorities and there is one point on which all are silent. That is the not unimportant question of what it was all about. No one gives even a hint that there was any other reason for fighting than that the king of one state coveted the land and wealth of the other. For this, and no other reason, two states fought for twenty-three years, thousands of men died and untold misery was endured by the suffering people. But that was 2500 years ago. It is usually assumed that the world has progressed since then. Yet in this present year of grace Wu (Kiangsu) and Yueh (Chêkiang) are once more at war and if there is any more intelligible reason for the conflict than there was in 490 B. C. we have yet to learn what it is. The land is distressed with flood and famine. The money that will be wasted in destroying the lives of innocent men would more than suffice to relieve the want of those threatened with starvation. Yet the war will go on and the hungry must perish. It is a mad world, my masters.

THE POWERS AND CHINA

NOBODY, we are sure, was more amused than the Belgian colony of Shanghai, on learning that their Government had asked that they might take refuge on British men-of-war in case of necessity. But telegrams of this kind are rather tragic than comic, for they reveal how abyssmal is the ignorance even of governments in the West of the true state of affairs in China. On the other hand, it is possible that we foreigners in China, if not ignorant about her, are not perhaps always quite judicious towards her. For example, at the present time all sorts of proposals are in the air as to what the Powers should do in respect of the civil war now raging in China. These are born of excitement, of business anxiety, and of the well-founded feeling of the foreigner in China that he has suffered much injustice at Chinese hands in recent years without redress, or even the slightest symptom of regret on China's side. The obvious fact that, for once in a way, both peoples and governments in the West have their attention now fairly directed towards China, naturally stimulates the desire, in the common phrase, "to get something done at last." The only practical result is confusion of counsel, and nothing done but to make the Chinese generally think that the foreigner means to make their misfortune his opportunity. It will, we think, be agreed by Chinese not less than by foreigners that what the Powers need most of all, what they have needed for many years past, is a clear-cut and consistent policy towards China. They tried sloppy sentiment at the Washington Conference; they tried bluster and threats in the case of Lincheng; both have conspicuously failed, because neither was inspired either by knowledge of facts or sincerity of purpose. There are certain requests and suggestions which the Powers have long been justified in advancing, and the present conflict undoubtedly gives them an opportunity to do so, which should not be let slip. But if this opportunity is taken, it should be made very clear that there is no question of profiting by the misfortunes of the Chinese, but only that those misfortunes have brought home to Chinese of all classes the eminent advantage of proposals by which they themselves would benefit to an immeasurable extent more than the foreigners. Thus, for example, the urgent importance of removing the Woosung Forts and Kiangnan Arsenal from Shanghai. Millions, literally, of Chinese, would breathe a sigh of content if that were done, and Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan himself suggested a year ago that it should be done. Again, the Powers cannot justifiably intervene by force to stop the Tuchuns from fighting each other. If the latter insist on fighting, it is their business and the Chinese people's and nobody's else. But the Powers might very well combine to invite the Tuchuns to join them in a round-table conference with a view to ascertaining whether their differences cannot be adjusted, and unification of China secured by peaceable means, as assuredly there are no signs of their being achieved by force. But such a suggestion should clearly be advanced as an offer of friendly assistance, primarily in the interests of China, not as a matter of forcible intervention.

We hold, and are not in the least afraid to say, that foreign Powers are not only justified in standing firmly on their treaty rights, while China continues in her present state of chaos, but that this chaos is very largely due to the fact that they have failed to do so. The Chinese people are essentially reasonable and while they are in no way offended at one who sticks up for his proved rights, they feel nothing but contempt for him when he allows them to be filched away. It is perfectly possible for the foreign Powers in combination to uphold their rights in China—which fundamentally mean nothing more than freedom to live in China and do business peaceably as in other countries—and at the same time to offer such suggestions and assistance to the rival political parties of this distracted country as will bring her relief and reform—which, indeed, multitudes of her people are convinced that she will never attain without such assistance from outside. But this combination of firmness and friendship demand that the Powers shall resolutely face facts in China as they really are, not as adroit propagandists or their own prejudice would have them be, shall say what they mean, and mean what they say.

THE GOVERNMENT OF CHINA

Sept. 12.

IN the very interesting communication made to our correspondent by Mr. Tong Shao-yi, former Premier of China, it is frankly admitted that China has been on the wrong track ever since the revolution which overthrew the Manchu dynasty. He thinks the parliamentary system is unsuited to the Chinese people and that the whole present method of government is fundamentally wrong. The constant civil wars and general lawlessness amply justify his opinion. The political system he advocates himself seems to be that every province should be practically self-governing, and that it should select, or choose by lot, a representative or representatives to combine with the representatives of other provinces to form a central administrative government. These representatives, or administrators as he calls them, should be responsible only to their own provinces for their conduct, not to any central authority, nor to the country at large. There should be a President, also chosen by lot. There should also be a permanent Cabinet consisting of capable men, practically under the control of the administrators as the latter are to lay down general rules for the guidance of these permanent officials. He claims that this method of government is based upon history, tradition, the psychology of the Chinese people and common sense.

With all respect it may be said that the political system outlined is fundamentally weak: it provides for no real federation of the provinces and gives no unifying, dominant authority. A President and legislative assembly elected by lot would certainly be a lottery of a government, even if the lots were drawn with the utmost fairness and the candidates few. With no public opinion or power of any kind behind it, such a government could never bring the turbulent military governors to order, and a house divided against itself cannot stand. As Confucius said:—

"There can be no properly constituted community without government; no government without subordination; no subordination without a dominant authority. The recognition of a dominant authority has to precede the establishment of other (desirable) social conditions."

All history, whether foreign or Chinese, indicates this necessity of a strong central government. It may be pointed out to our Chinese readers that the Wars of the Roses in England (1455-1485) furnish an instructive parallel to China's present condition. The English barons had so increased in power as to be able to defy the government of the king. Constantly intriguing and fighting amongst themselves they eventually formed two opposing parties, Lancastrians and Yorkists, and a long war ensued.

"The consequent impotence of the government provoked a bastard feudal anarchy maintained by hirelings instead of liegemen. Local factions fought with no respect for the law which was administered, if at all, in the interests of one other of the great factions. No political, constitutional, or religious principle was at stake; and the more peaceable and organized parties of the community took little share in the struggle."

Weakened by this warfare and with the social system disorganized by a frightful epidemic known as the "Black Death," the barons were finally subdued and the authority of the king was in time firmly established to the great and lasting benefit of the country. Similarly in France, Richelieu (1585-1642) broke the power of the French nobles, being firmly convinced that the only safe government for France in its then condition was a monarchy uncontrolled either by the selfish ambition of the nobles or by the constitutional legalisms of the existing parliament. Granted that France, the United States, and many other countries are now Republican, yet the stability of government in each country depends entirely on how far the people have acquired by experience, perhaps long and painful, the wisdom necessary for successful self-government. It is futile for China to try and establish a republic with the vast mass of the people illiterate, and ignorant of the bare meaning of such terms as republicanism and democracy. The first step towards unification and peace must be the subordination of the military governors to the central authority; the civil government and civil law must be made supreme.

In China the problems of government are the more complicated because down to the Revolution in 1911 religion and government were inseparably connected: the emperor was the political as well as the religious head of the people. In his sacred character it was he alone who was held capable of acting as mediator between the nation and the mysterious powers of the invisible world which bring prosperity and adversity, and he alone could offer propitiatory sacrifices for the whole country. Until the people find some other religious anchorage it seems almost necessary in their present condition that religion should be again supported by the government. In the scheme proposed nothing is said on this most important point. Yet for ages the propitiation of these supernatural powers was deemed essential to the welfare of the people. During the long periods in Chinese history when turbulent princes and chieftains weakened the power and unity of the State by their insubordination, even then the emperor's nominal authority served as a bond of unity, because he was acknowledged as the supreme fount of honour and as the sole regulator of the ceremonial and religious rites. The Chinese are in their present deplorable state because cut adrift from their religious and political moorings. It is no part of our purpose, however, to advocate any particular form of government. The country must be left to work out its own salvation. But it may be regarded as a hopeful sign, amidst so much that is discouraging, that a statesman with the knowledge and experience of Mr. Tong Shao-yi gives expression to the general conviction that China made a grievous mistake in adopting a republican form of government for which it was totally unprepared.

GUILDS AND TUCHUNS

Sept. 13.

IT seems that we must apologize both to Mr. Tong Shao-yi and his interviewer for misunderstanding what they, respectively, said and wrote. It is almost a capital offence nowadays in China to hint that anyone holds monarchical ideas, although here, again, there is much confused thinking and hypnotism by mere words. Great Britain, for example, is certainly a monarchy, because it has a "king who never dies." Yet in fact it is far more nearly a republic than was ancient Rome, certainly than ancient Athens—which was an aristocracy based on slave labour—and to some extent more so even than the United States, whose constitution confers on the President emergency powers of absolutism such as the British King cannot exercise in any circumstances whatever.

The notion of a Federated States of China, more on the lines of Canada than America, was very much discussed in the year following the war, Dr. C. T. Wang in particular being an exponent of it. Recently we have not heard it talked about so much, although it is undoubtedly favoured by many thinkers. It certainly responds to many ideas fundamental in Chinese life, the very large measure of village autonomy that has always prevailed and the dominating idea of family individuality. It appears to solve the difficulty of welding together the wide provincial differences of character and language in a working organism. And in view of the total breakdown of the central government and all its machinery, federation appears to offer the only way in which rulers of provinces, now independent of everything except a transient combination of their neighbours, might be persuaded to run together in harness.

The fallacy of federation lies, we think, in this, that it presupposes that the whole of every province demands it, the people as well as the ruling classes. But we have no evidence that the people of any province have so much objection to each other that they feel the need of any such new system to enable them to get on together amicably. The ordinary Kiangsu and Chêkiang merchant and shopkeeper have no feeling of enmity for one another. If, by a miracle, China were suddenly unified under a Central Government acting for all of them and to which they were expected to send tribute rice as heretofore, they would accept the situation thankfully. A Kiangsu magistrate could be sent to govern Chêkiang and vice versâ; and so long as they did their work decently, the business classes and farmers would not care a jot. In contrast with this the ruling classes in China can hardly be supposed to care much about a federation. It must to some extent limit their freedom to batten on the provincial revenues which they have acquired under the republic and which makes them all such ardent republicans; and it puts an end to the exhilarating pastime of perpetual intrigue of endless groupings and regroupings which is the breath of Chinese political nostrils. In fact, China is internally much where she was in the days of the petty kingdoms of two thousand odd years ago, with this added disadvantage that the open tyranny of kings is preferable to the hidden tyranny of bureaucracies. A king is usually amenable to the principle of noblesse oblige. A bureaucracy is like a company, with neither body to be kicked nor soul to be damned.

This is the situation that makes the friends of China so grave as they regard her future. For where is the process of demolition going to end? The politicians have amongst them smashed up so much that they will certainly not hesitate to smash more in pursuit of independence and the spoils of office. Warned by the results of their folly in allowing divers provincial rulers to tamper with the salt revenue, the Diplomatic Body took, for once, a strong line last December when Dr. Sun Yat-sen tried to seize the Kuangtung Customs, and they succeeded. But the attempt might be renewed on a wider scale and in regions where the methods employed at Canton would not avail. It is merely shutting one's eyes to facts to say that such an attempt would never be made. The story of the cigarette tax in Chêkiang and Kiangsu is as the writing on the wall. And it is to be remembered that the Customs are the security for a very large volume of domestic loans in which Chinese banks and business men are deeply interested. The decline in Chinese securities on the London market, as recently detailed in these columns, is a symptom to which the Chinese guilds cannot be blind.

Can the Chinese people stop the rot? For if they do not, it is difficult to see how anyone else can. We believe they can do so, provided that the really responsible elements in the country will reassert themselves. In bygone years it was the guilds, representing all the most sober and thoughtful classes of the nation, who voiced public opinion in any clash with the mandarins. These appear to have abdicated in favour of student organizations and banded agitators, with disastrous results. Between the ostensible head of the province and the people, there has grown up a sinister force, posing as educationalists, defenders of the constitution, defenders of sovereign rights and what not, which tyrannizes over rulers and ruled. The apparently omnipotent Tuchun is, to a far greater extent than is commonly understood, in the grip of his entourage; the fact that Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan would not make the final move against Chêkiang until he was sure of Wu Pei-fu's support and had the President's order to go forward, is deeply significant. The position indeed is not dissimilar to that before the French Revolution, which only became a revolution against the throne when the latter failed to take the people's part against the nobles. In China to-day the latter are represented by the educational and student associations and the first step to orderly government is to break their hidden power. The appeal of the people is not to their so-called representatives but above their heads to the Tuchuns themselves: and if the guilds could be brought to assert their ancient rights, we believe that the Tuchuns would heartily welcome

TOO RAPID A PACE

(After an old, old Song)

I

In days of old, when knights were bold
And barons held their sway,
A warrior bold, with spurs of gold,
Was overheard to say:
Lo, I am in despair!
My love hath bobbed her hair.
Behold! Her skirts
Resemble shirts
A tiny child might wear!
Then what care I if death be nigh,
When I her garb descry.
Yea, what care I if death be nigh—
Such goings on! O, fie!

II

In Renaissance, men looked askance
At change in woman's wear.
Thought such abuse must swift conduce
To ruin. Tore their hair.
And, almost ev'ry day,
Some prude was apt to say:
If these things be, pray excuse me
From wedlock. Marry? Nay!
O, hopeful I that death be nigh.
Take such for wife? Not I!
Yea, what care I if death be nigh—
Than marry such, I'd die!

III

With passing years the self-same fears
Of woman's degradation,
Set by the ears and cause the tears
Of men of ev'ry nation.
Say they: We're certain, now,
To demnition bow-wow
The girls must go unless they show
More modesty, we vow.
While these things be, we'll carefully
Eschew matrimony.
Far better we might buried be
Than wed with such as she!

IV.

Since dim B. C., decadency
Of woman's been decried.
Five Thou. A. D., will doubtless see
Her still by critics tried.
Some correspondent, then,
With vitriolic pen,
Will shout anew,: Pray what think you,
O, ye unmarried men?
Best take your life than for a wife
Choose such. Aye, kiss the knife!
Yea, trouble's rife, if ye, for wife,
Choose such. Best kiss the knife!

R. R. L. F.

RATHER than being definitely settled, as some had supposed at the time President Coolidge signed the immigration bill, Japanese exclusion promises to be a lively issue in the next session of Congress, writes Mr. Leo A. McClatchy from Washington. Already there is one, and possibly two amendments that will be proposed to the law when the national legislators convene in December.

THE American Legation after conducting an investigation of the death of the Rev. Mr. Byes, a member of the American Presbyterian Mission who was murdered on the island of Hainan, has communicated with the Waichiaopu, asking it what the Chinese Government is going to do to punish the guilty ones. Mr. Chamberlain, Vice-Consul, from Canton, made a special trip to Hainan to inquire into the circumstances of the death of the American missionary, and according to the report, a military officer, Ho Chia-yu, was the ringleader of the murder gang.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

Scotland Aye!

The legions in Shanghai who come from north of the Tweed will be interested to learn that a very determined attempt now is being made both by the hills and the lowlands to secure for Scotland her undoubted rights. This movement has no connexion with the "wild men of the Clyde," it is not concerned with separation or Home Rule for Scotland, and, so far as is known, it is not even backing the claim that Scotland's coronation stone should be returned to the place from whence it was scrounged. The agitators are that dour type of whom "Punch" pictured one subediting the German "Gott Strafe England" on the wall of a ruined house in Belgium. Letters have been sent to the President of France and the French nation at large, reminding them of the grand memorial erected jointly to the dead of the mighty Highland Division and the French regiments associated with them, recalling that this is but the latest chapter in an age-long friendship between France and Scotland, and appealing to all Frenchmen never again to say "England" when they mean England, Scotland and Wales, or "English" when they mean the men of all three countries, "Britain" and "British" being the correct words. And to other countries there has been sent a similar appeal. Nor is this all. Scotland claims to be the senior partner in the union, by reason of the fact that a monarch who first of all was the reigning King of Scotland also inherited the English throne, and by common usage since those days the marshalling of the Royal Standard in Scotland has been with the lion in the first and fourth quarters, the three leopards in the second and the Irish harp in the third. England marshals the leopards in the first and fourth, allowing Scotland only one lion and it is complained that this English fashion is insinuating its way into Scotland. Therefore it is asked that the use of any other than the Scottish marshalling be forbidden in Scotland, or, alternatively, that Wales be given a fourth share in the Royal Standard, so that all may be equal. The Scots unquestionably have historical facts on their side and they have many members in Parliament, but will they ever cure an American of using "England" as an all-embracing term?

The Volunteer Firemen

One can congratulate Capt. Chapeaux, the Chief of the French Fire Brigade, on the recruits he is to have for his force and the ex-volunteer firemen who in so sporting and public-spirited a way have gone to his assistance Perhaps our old amateur brigade had a few shortcomings, but it is not to be expected that amateurs at such work would come up to the standard of whole-time professionals, and everyone was proud of the volunteer firemen and ever ready to acknowledge the sterling work they performed. The Settlement has had very few better citizens than those firemen, for a great many of them belonged to the S.V.C. at the same time and during disturbed periods it was not uncommon for a man to be changing from khaki and puttees to blue and knee boots and back again during a spell of duty. The French Concession has not the size or the wealth of the International Settlement and it cannot afford a big professional brigade, whilst the French community scarcely is large enough to support a volunteer brigade on its own. Capt. Chapeaux has had a difficult time owing to the shortage of competent men on the many occasions when he has had to cope with a serious fire. The preliminary meeting called to discuss the possibility of forming a foreign volunteer unit in connexion with the French brigade must have been very comforting to Capt. Chapeaux, for he met 30 men, none of them too old and none too young, all with fire brigade experience, and all enthusiastic. It is hoped the French Municipal Council will sanction the recruiting of rather more than 30 men and therefore it is asked that any former volunteer firemen still with a liking for the work will send in their names, but emphasis is laid on the fact that it is to be a real working unit, quite different from an annual display organization, and only men who will pledge themselves to regular attendance will be accepted.

Selling Meat

Australian shipping circles appear to be a little perturbed as regards getting more into the markets of the Far East, and especially so as concerns the supply of Australian meat to Japan. It seems that the possibilities of Japan as a remunerative market for Australian meat have long been realized, but though there was much discussion, in which it was pointed out that the only way successfully to sell dead meat to Japan was to arrange for adequate cold storage in that country, nothing definite was done; and while the Australians were discussing and discussing, the Canadians, backed by their Government, stepped into the breach, and before, apparently, the Australians knew what was happening, had come to terms in regard to the supply of live meat to Japan and had arranged with a big steamship company for its transportation. One Australian journal of repute, evidently feeling a little hurt over the whole business, remarks that "when the Canadians see a good thing they go after it; when the Australians see one they talk about it." The Canadians certainly appear to have done the thing thoroughly, for the first shipment under the new scheme was accompanied by the Minister of Agriculture of Alberta and was met on arrival by Viscount Goto. How good a thing the Australian shipping and meat interests have apparently let go may be gathered from the statement that the selling price of this beef, imported "on the hoof" from Canada, is substantially less than that of Japan born, bred, fed and killed beef. That being the case, there is no doubt that in letting the Canadians, with their live meat and its comparatively higher charges as to keep and transportation get into the Japanese market first, the Australians have lost a great opportunity of selling their dead meat, which costs nothing to keep and which can be transported much more cheaply than meat which still rejoices in life. An interesting fact about beef is that very many people believe that beef-eating conduces to greater height, on the theory that attainment of height in the human being is merely the functioning of certain glands to which beef provides the greatest stimulus. Bearing in mind some hefty vegetarian children we have known, we cannot accord unqualified endorsement to the theory, however excellent it may appear to those who care to believe in it.

The Soldier's "Trade"

A consideration of the position of the common soldier taking part in the internecine struggle that is now raging in this part of China recalls a statement made by Ruskin at least 65 years ago—that "the soldier's trade, verily and essentially, is not slaying, but being slain," the logic being that the soldier, while trained to kill and while killing is expected to play an important part in his military career, is employed and kept, primarily and unalterably, to hold his life at the service of the State, or, in the case of China, of his tuchun. If that state of affairs were, to a great extent, true in the Crimean days, how much more so is it to-day, when the modern soldier has to contend not only against his kind, but in addition against the comprehensive, death-dealing products of the combined efforts of science and engineering? Modern warfare, even in China (one of the most conservative lands on earth) is much less of a man-to-man business than was the case half-a-century ago; and while it is as true to-day as in the time of Napoleon that the infantry is the mainstay of any fighting force, engines and weapons whose mission is human extermination have reached such a diabolical degree of effectiveness that the infantryman's chief danger in these days lies not so much from his own kind or from his traditional enemy the cavalry as from such modern products of perfection as the machine gun, the scientifically exact long range field gun with its variety of missiles, the aeroplane, and the greatest horror of 20th-century warfare—poison gas. Truly, the soldier's trade is in being killed and if, in the Chinese armies that are fighting for control of the Shanghai district, all of the latest scientific engines of warfare are not available in profusion, sufficient there are to render the Chinese infantryman more of fodder for the products of the war-scientist than of a direct foe to his vis-a-vis in the opposing army. And the pity of it all is that probably not one soldier in a hundred in either army knows the real reason for his fighting. It may be contended, possibly truly, that it is not the soldier's right or duty to know why he is fighting; but even so, the immortal phrase "Their's not to reason why" never was more poignantly tragic than in the struggle between Chi of Nanking and Lu of Hangchow.

Omnibuses and—

In should interest the directors of the Shanghai motor omnibus service to know that the London General Omnibus Company's research department has been experimenting with an aluminium alloy road wheel, which, although only half the weight of the standard steel wheel, has given satisfactory results. A number of these wheels have performed over 30,000 miles in service, and tests are being continued on upwards of 20 routes. The scrap value of the wheel is about two-thirds of its original value. The wheels make a large reduction in the unsprung weight and minimize road destruction. But before going into details about wheels it may be asked when are we to see our motor omnibuses on the streets. They are as ethereal as peace treaties in China. It is a fact that the general public really are very interested in the concern and look to it to solve a great many of our traffic problems, especially that in connexion with another form of road transport with which the Settlement is burdened. At least it was burdened, but there is cause for speculation as to whether it is gradually disappearing. Recently the Municipal Council made an order that a certain practice on these vehicles absolutely must be discontinued and that all the conveyances were to be fitted with a special apparatus to aid in the enforcement of the regulation, whilst a particular branch of the Municipal service was to insist on the observance thereof. Some of all this has been done, but not all of it. The proportions are about equivalent to the number of people who pay for pony licences and those who do not. Since the abolition of the practice referred to, the vehicles to which it applies have become singularly rare. One used to encounter them in close formation carrying vast loads of wretched humanity to their doom, but nowadays they seem to have a habit of running out to the confines of the Western District and remaining there. So there is one more reason why we should be glad to see the motor omnibuses on the streets. The motto of the new company is said to be, "Seats for all," and it is hoped they will add to it, "and a regular timetable."

A Chinese Fallacy

The letter that we publish to-day by "B," headed "Chinese Patriots," contains a fallacy which it is important to answer because we believe it to be shared by a great many Chinese. "B" writes as if the only difference between the state of Europe in and subsequent to the Great War and the state of China were that Europe is rather the worse of the two. His mistake lies in a total misapprehension of the cause of the war and the results thereof. The war began because one Power, or a group of men controlling that Power, resolved to appropriate other people's property and to dominate the world, regardless of ruth or morality. That Power was for the time being a public brigand and malefactor, and when after long years of preparation its rulers proceeded to put their plans into execution at the moment which they thought most favourable for chances of success, the other Powers were compelled to fight in self-defence. Thus it was that all Europe became a battlefield and that men were killed, cities devastated and treasure poured out because there was no other way of compelling the group of men who had planned the general spoliation to desist. Europe since has been labouring to build up again all that the war had ruined. Naturally that work is not yet ac- their overtures for combination and support.

complished; but, comparing the state of the different countries today with what it was five years ago, we are justified in saying that there has been a steady upward tendency. Compare this state of affairs with that of China. Can our correspondent "B" say that there is any real parallel or that the condition of this country shows the faintest signs of any improvement? Rather it appears to grow worse than ever. One little further point. When "B" speaks of the soldiers having "levied money from the populace of England," we would remind him that every penny raised by Great Britain for the prosecution of the war was voted by Parliament, the duly elected representatives of the people, and with their fullest approval.

Protection of Pootung

A few days ago, at a joint meeting of representatives of the Shanghai General Chamber of Commerce and the foreign Chambers of Commerce of Shanghai a resolution was passed and a copy forwarded to the Consular Body requesting that measures be taken with regard to the protection of foreign property in Pootung, and more particularly that steps be taken to prevent the dynamite magazine at Ma-lu-chiao from falling into the hands of the combatant Chinese forces. We understand that a reply has been received from the Consular Body expressing the opinion that the foreign naval authorities in port have, at a conference held on the 8th instant, presided over by Rear-Admiral D. M. Anderson, Senior Naval Officer on the Yangtze River, taken all the necessary steps possible for the protection of foreign property on the Pootung side of the river by making suitable arrangements for placing foreign men-of-war near the various foreign wharves, provided that the shipping companies can give them accommodation. The following vessels have already been allocated to positions:—Robert Dollar Wharf, one U. S. destroyer; Holt's Wharf, one British gunboat; Standard Oil Co.'s Wharf, two U. S. destroyers. Later, if arrangements can be made, there will be a Japanese gunboat at the N. K. K. Wharf, a U. S. destroyer at the Shanghai & Hongkew Wharf Co.'s Pootung Wharf, and a U. S. destroyer at the China Navigation Company's Watung Wharf. With regard to the subject of precautions necessary for prevention of explosion at the dynamite magazine, the Consular Body's reply contains no reference. Is it therefore to be presumed that measures have been taken which it has been considered inadvisable to make public, or has the Consular Body "burked" the whole question? One suggested solution of the problem of the dynamite danger is that it should be conveyed from the magazine into lighters, and towed out by a Customs revenue cruiser to a position in the Yangtze River where it would be comparatively harmless if exploded.

Foreigners in the War

It was only to be expected that a protest would be raised over the alleged action of a foreigner who made a motor car trip from Shanghai to the nearest point on the battle front and for a time worked a maxim-gun. The incident may or may not be true, but it forms the basis for pointing a moral. There is in Shanghai an ex-army aviator who is currently reported to have received an offer from one side of $1,000 a month to work an aeroplane for them, and a bonus of $10,000 if they prove successful. A foreigner was said to be piloting the machine that flew over Shanghai last week and there have been many reports of foreign aviators and artillerymen engaged on either side. It is not to be denied that foreign armies when engaged in warfare have employed men of other nationalities. For instance, Lord Kitchener fought with the French against the Prussians and a famous American scout worked with Lord Roberts's column against the Boers. The conditions in such cases, however, are more equal, and an outsider more or less on either side would not greatly affect the general result. In China it might. An experienced foreign gunner would bear no comparison with Chinese artillerymen, whilst the difference between a foreign aviator trained on the Western front and a Chinese novice is as wide as could be imagined. Is there one amongst us who can say beyond the possibility of contradiction that the balance of right is in favour of any one army, whether it be from Peking, Mukden, Kiangsu, Chêkiang, or Canton? This is not a war of nations, but a civil war in which no two of five armies are in absolute agreement and it may come to the state when all five are fighting against each other. If the question cannot be answered, would it be to the credit of any foreigners that by their moral effect and actual work they prevented a victory for the side that possibly may have been right in its convictions and genuine in its efforts? The condemnation would be even greater in the case of a man who simply selected a point on the front haphazard and, without caring which side he aided, played a machine-gun on to the forces in opposition, for that would be downright murder and we prefer to believe that no foreigner would do it.

Sharks

The days have gone, apparently not to return, when card experts, whose skill with the pasteboards was equalled in its thoroughness only by their ostensible gentility, plausibility and unscrupulousness, made a profession of relieving—usually at poker—two or three innocent, unsuspecting and wealthy tourists of dollars on a single trip across the Atlantic. Instead, a new order of things has arisen, engendered and encouraged by the modern tendency to efficiency which has become evident in other circles besides commercial. The old-fashioned habit of murdering their victims has, of course, long been obsolete in the best circles of marine gamblers. The modern system is that, instead of seeking only one victim, or possibly two or three, the liner sharks have emulated to some extent the estimable Mr. Ford and have gone in for mass methods, with a small profit on the individual transaction but with the aggregate profit equally large; and with the cardinal advantage that the victims (if by any chance they realize that they have been cheated) being the more numerous and losing less individually, seldom, if ever, "squeal." To quote one of the fraternity: "We force nobody into our games; couldn't if we wanted to. We don't lure them much. We have 'conversation' men on the ships who make approaches and study prospects. Its like selling life-insurance, only we don't urge our man; we just give him a chance to invest in entertainment, and if he isn't interested we leave him alone. There are always plenty who will be interested. All our customers are treated with kindness and given their money's worth. Our time and expenses are worth every cent we make them pay for it, and this policy actually pays better dividends than the old methods. If we get 200 men for an average of $500 each, which is a reasonable business for two round trips during the busy season, we have made $100,000 and a good time had by all. But if we 'trimmed' ten men for $10,000 each, somebody would be sure to complain of being stung." The "conversation men" as well as the technical workers, whose main employment is to make the cards behave, are constantly being shifted from ship to ship and never travel two trips in succession on the same ship. Each is a perfectly proper passenger who seems to enjoy a quiet game of cards, and that is all the ship's authorities know about it. The obvious moral is a very old one—never play cards for money on shipboard with a perfect stranger; it always is disregarded and probably always will be—hence the success of the sharks, who appear to go in much less fear of the authorities than did their predecessors who went in for big fry. Even so, accidents will happen, even at poker, and one can easily imagine the strained feeling that would arise in a perfectly straight game of poker between gentlemen, on the occasion of some such trifling technical imperfection as the simultaneous exposure of five aces or two jokers.

A pathetic side light on the present war is published in the Hankow papers, which recount how a poor Chinese refugee from Nanking embarked with his wife and two children on board the Kiangyung for up river. The man, having no funds with him, became hopeless and when the steamer was at Kiukiang he jumped overboard. The widow and two children are now stranded in Hankow and are begging on the streets.

NEWS FROM THE OUTPORTS

WU PEI-FU'S CHARGES AGAINST GEN. LU YUNG-HSIANG

Chekiang Tuchun's Alleged Premeditated Initiative and Consequent Responsibility: Hope for a Speedy End to Hostilities: Offer of Peace Terms Rejected

FROM RODNEY GILBERT.

Loyang, Ho., Sept. 4.

There is nothing being discussed here but the Chêkiang-Kiangsu situation, but the information that was being gossiped back and forth through the Wu Pei-fu headquarters yesterday was almost as vague and unsatisfying as the fruits of a Peking official interview. To-day it would appear that the uncertainty in the air was largely due to the uncertainty in the minds of the high authorities here. No one had made up his mind until today whether there was going to be a war or not and what the Loyang position and policy was. Now there can be no doubt that Marshal Wu Pei-fu thinks a war inevitable and he is prepared to make it "short and snappy" when it starts by seeing that Tuchun Lu Yung-hsiang of Chêkiang is kept busy on every front. It is said here now that Lu Yung-hsiang will launch an attack upon Kiangsu within a week and that there will be a prompt retaliation from the Fukien, Kiangsi, and Kiangsu frontiers with all of Anhui's strength behind Kiangsu.

Marshal Wu Pei-fu asserted today in a brief but pointed talk with the writer that he has been opposed to this feud, that he has done his best to prevent it, and that if anyone opens the game it will still be Lu Yung-hsiang who will take the initiative and eventually bear the responsibility for the results. "If he wants to fight now," said the General, with much heat, "he can fight. I won't have anything more to do with it." He then proceeded to recount how Lu Yung-hsiang had received, equipped and armed the retainers of Chang Chih-ping and Wang Yung-ch'uan after they had made life miserable for the Fukienese and had fled defeated from that province, and how he had made open preparations to use these unsavoury reinforcements against Kiangsu.

The writer at this juncture remarked that Tuchun Chi Hsieh-yuan would not have made any movements towards a war if he had not, in the first place, seen in this Fukienese fighting between the Anfu and Chihli elements an opportunity to enlist the Chihli troops in Fukien and Kiangsi as allies against Chêkiang, and even this situation would not have prompted him to such elaborate preparations if he had not wanted to take Shanghai under his control. The situation favours Chi Tuchun's ambitions at the moment and it appears more likely that he would be eager to fight out an old feud now than Lu Yung-hsiang, who is isolated.

Lu's Anfu Allies.

Marshal Wu replied that Chi had not started the hostile movements, that he did not want to fight and repeated that Lu Yung-hsiang had opened the campaign by arming and moving his Anfu allies against Kiangsu and had then rejected all offers of peace. He had made every effort to persuade the Chêkiang Tuchun to abandon his campaign, to disarm the Anfu refugees and to acknowlege the authority of the Peking Government by accepting an appointment from Peking as Tuchun. To all this Lu Yung-hsiang had turned a deaf ear. The Kiangsi and Fukien troops had contemplated no war upon Chêkiang, but were at war with these same troops of Chang Chih-ping and Wang Yung-ch'uan whom Lu Yung-hsiang had adopted and if he were not now preparing to use these forces to invade Kiangsu there would be no question of the Fukien and Kiangsi forces, which are under Loyang's control, participating in a war upon Chêkiang.

There can be little doubt now that Marshal Wu thinks that it will be his duty to throw the Kiangsi and Fukien forces into the mêlée if Lu Yung-hsiang persists in rejecting his terms and attacks Kiangsu and it was evident to-day that he was fully persuaded that the efforts of such of China's elders as Wang Shih-chen to check Lu Yung-hsiang and bring him to terms would be futile. When reminded that Marshal Wang had yesterday sent him a long telegram exhorting him to help prevent fighting, Marshal Wu threw up his hands in despair and asked what further he could do.

Gen. Lu's Cause of Action.

The Wu Pei-fu position is clear enough and it is altogether unlikely that it will be materially changed. To appreciate the whole situation it must also be understood, however, that Tuchun Lu Yung-hsiang of Chêkiang has his own good reasons for making panicky preparations for war and for resting too nervous a finger on the trigger. He will not recognize Peking for various reasons in which he would have the sympathy of most neutral observers; yet he sees Peking's cohorts closing in upon him and casting jealous eyes upon his territories. Sun Ch'uan-fang wants to be Tuchun of Chêkiang if he can and Chi Hsieh-yuan wants Shanghai. Sun Ch'uan-fang and his allies in Fukien have removed the last buffer between themselves and Chêkiang in defeating and putting to flight the remaining Anfu leaders and provided an excuse for invading Chêkiang when they drove these troops across the border, while Chi Hsieh-yuan has added the military strength of Anhuei to his own and has been very busy trying to push his way into Kiangsi also. Lu Yung-hsiang therefore sees himself completely surrounded by potential enemies, sees his access to the sea coveted by the Kiangsu Tuchun and therefore naturally welcomes allies from Fukien of his own political persuasion and affords them asylum. It may not have been on Wu Pei-fu's schedule to have Chêkiang attacked this year. It may even interfere with his plans in Kuangtung, but Lu Yung-hsiang knows that Wu Pei-fu, in his crusades for reunification, is only taking the obstacles to his schemes one at a time and that Chêkiang's turn would come sooner or later. The offer that Wu Pei-fu made him to stave off immediate strife was conversion to the cause or elimination; and he prefers to take a chance on elimination now as against a certainty of it later.

In this Chêkiang situation there has been little hope of permanent peace for several years past. It is now more nearly hopeless than ever and if the outbreak really comes it may be best if it is, as Loyang believes it will be, short and comparatively painless. A protracted fight would mean another Chang Tso-lin invasion of Chihli, fresh outbreaks in Szechuan and Hunan and more of Dr. Sun's great expeditions from Kuangtung. It is believed here that the Chêkiang Tuchun's collapse will be a matter of such a brief period of fighting that no sympathetic demonstrations will be attempted in other quarters. Asked whether he thought Chang Tso-lin would take advantage of this disturbance in Chêkiang to attempt another invasion of Chihli, Marshal Wu to-day said:

"If he feels like coming in, he can come; but the next time I shall not follow him back to Shanhaikuan but to Mukden." There is every evidence here that the Loyang strategists have the possibility of another Fengtien invasion in mind and the Peking reports of Feng Yu-hsiang's and Wang Chong-ping's troop movements on the Peking-Mukden railway are here confirmed. These are described, however, as purely precautionary movements.

MR. Cheng Hung-nien has left Canton for Shanghai on leave. It is understood that he is commissioned by Dr. Sun Yat-sen to carry on important negotiations with certain parties in Shanghai, expecting to return to Canton after a stay of a few days in Shanghai.

BANDITS REPLACE TROOPS

North Kiangsu Seriously Menaced by Brigands on Troops' Departure

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Tsingkiangpu, Ku., Sept. 3.

Since the middle of last week it has been very difficult to obtain any news from the south and the wildest rumours have been rife. The departure of Gen. Ma and his troops and the passing through here of Gen. Pei's men, all hastening south, caused considerable uneasiness.

Conscripting of soldiers has been forced into use. Strange to say, the local people do not seem to feel any especial uneasiness for the immediate future. Their only fear is that there may be looting, should the local troops be defeated and then return here.

The withdrawal of soldiers from the various towns in the north country has caused great unrest in that area. Bandits have increased by the hundreds overnight and conditions out there are really serious. Several days ago, the large market town of Tangkeo, well fortified, was attacked, but the bandits were beaten off. This is the first time they have ever attempted such a bold manoeuvre thereabouts.

While this withdrawal of troops has necessarily caused much unrest for the time, one cannot but wonder why the local people do not handle the bandit situation themselves in the course of a few months, organizing their own militia, which would be responsible to them, and paid by them.

The local Chamber of Commerce has been actively organizing a local force to protect this city. I have been amazed at the general quiet prevailing among the wealthy classes here. Two days ago I was talking with the head of one of the local banks and he showed no uneasiness. This seems like a good sign.

Coming up the canal a little over a week ago, just before arriving at Yangchow, I noticed the bodies of several men in the canal. Later I heard that they had committed suicide rather than be conscripted for service in the south. Who can blame these people for not wishing to fight without a real reason, and against their own people, against whom they have no grudge.

LOYANG PREPARING

Foodstuffs Commandeered by the Marshal: Recruiting Activity in Kaifeng

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Kaifeng, Ho., Sept. 3.

While there seems to be no concentration of rolling stock for moving troops either at Chengchow or at Loyang, signs are not wanting that Honan and the great Marshal are interesting themselves in the Chêkiang-Kiangsu affair.

Without disturbing the ordinary timetable on the Lung-Hai Railway, soldiers are being quietly moved towards Suchow on the Tsin-Pu line. Reports are that one full brigade is being transported thither, apparently under command of Colonel Kuoh, formerly stationed at Kueitehfu.

The people are much exercised over the present impossibility of obtaining flour. This misfortune arises from the fact that Marshal Wu is reported to have commandeered from 40,000 to 70,000 bags from the local mills.

For the past several days all the steamed bread on the streets has been bought up by the military. This it is understood was to provision the new recruits who are being marched across country towards Chengchow.

It is said that Sun Chuan-fang is recruiting here through his local agents. These new recruits march out of the city in the night so as to give rise to as few rumours as possible, and it would seem that several thousands at least have already been mobilized within the past few days.

SLACK DIPLOMACY ROOT OF EVIL

Sir J. Jordan's Censure of Western Policy in China As Mainspring of All Ills

London, Sept. 6.

An article in the "Observer" by Sir John Jordan declares that foreign prestige has never sunk to a lower level in China, nor has there ever been such widespread and wilful disregard of foreign rights. Immunity from concerted action by the foreign Powers had encouraged the belief that outside interference was no longer to be feared. That a Tuchun of three years' standing should openly proclaim his intention of attacking Shanghai, and use as his communication line a railway constructed with British capital and by British engineers, shows to what lengths the arrogance of the military caste has gone.

Sir John Jordan particularly criticizes the several Powers for the deliberate disregard of the embargo on the import of arms and ammunition, immense quantities of which have been smuggled into China. He is of the opinion that the Provinces instead of reuniting under rigid central control, ultimately will become a loose federation.

Sir John finally suggests that the Powers should invite the Governors of Chekiang and Kiangsu to a conference at Shanghai, which might lead to a wider movement, and he also suggests that the Powers should contribute to the solution of the difficulties by agreeing to a liberal increase of Customs duties, accompanied by the abolition of the likin. —Reuter.

Go and Fight Elsewhere.

London, Sept. 6.

Counselling firmness of joint action in China, the "Times" says that the Powers should extend the precedent of the British Consul in Canton to Shanghai and tell both sides that they must do their fighting elsewhere.—Reuter.

KIANGSU'S ATTACK ON CHEKIANG

A Carefully Considered Plan: War Council at Nanking: Wu Pei-fu's Share

A correspondent in Kiangsu, writing under date of August 30, states that the secrecy in which big war operations have been carried out is a portent of the efficiency of the men behind the movement. About August 12 or 13 Gen. Chi ordered a mobilization against Chêkiang, and the first important event—was a grand war council at Nanking, at which all important officers under Gen. Chi's command were present. The well known Gen. Bei Pao-san (known as the brigand hunter) was there, having come from the most distant and isolated post. In the plan of campaign arranged, the commanders drew lots for positions and the lot of front attack fell to Gen. Bei.

Gen. Chi"s troops were already on the march when he issued statements to the contrary which appeared in the "North-China Daily News" of August 22. Prior to that occasion he had issued instructions as to the non-opening of all schools supported by provincial funds, as he needed the money for the present campaign. Owing to the impressment of boats and launches, and also the danger of molestation by "roughneck" troops, foreign children were sent to Shanghai schools by sea, viâ Tsingtao.

One of my friends in the leading families here tells me (I do not know how authoritatively) that it is the plan of this province to put 88,000 men into the field. It is not expected that they will win out against Chêkiang, on the contrary they may be licked, furnishing a sort of try out line for Wu Pei-fu, who is to come and give Chêkiang the coup de grace at the psychological moment. This informant said also that Gen. Chi was not particularly anxious to fight, but was doing so at Wu Pei-fu's bidding.

Whether accurate or not, this is in line with Wu's former plans of letting a lot of nondescripts wander forward, while he waits with his picked men for the time and place that suits him.

One of the humours of the situation is the wholesale enlistment of bandits against whom our military force have been pitted for a year with sanguinary results. A force of over a hundred came in and camped a few hundred steps from my front door. They molested nobody. The inference, is very plain that they expect to have a perfectly lovely time in some of those southern towns that have never been looted. It sounds very heroic to say that they are being thrown forward into the front line—true enough—but that same front line will offer wonderful opportunities to men of of their assimilative genius.

ANHUI TROOPS' ADVANCE TOWARDS CHEKIANG

Country Towns Caught up Into the Coil of War

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Kienping, An., Sept. 2.

Doubtless many of your readers will be glad to have an idea of the military trend of events in this district.

Less than a week ago, we were imagining that this was one of the few "peaceful spots" in China; and so it came as more or less of a surprise to learn that we are well within the radius of impending warfare between Chêkiang and Anhui.

We had barely time to question the reliability of the persistent rumours reaching us, before they began to materialize into facts, and since last Friday, 29th ultimo, 3,000 soldiers have passed through this city, having halted for two days en route for the "front" which is reported as being "somewhere" near Kuangtchow—a city 90 li south east from here. Rumour fixes the date for the opening of hostilities on or about the 10th of the present Chinese month.

Ten thousand troops from Anhui are said to be massed or massing in that locality and so little faith have the people of this city, that they will be able to withstand the superior forces of Chêkiang that already in imagination they see this city devastated by retreating soldiers.

A City in a Panic.

This has caused a great panic in the city. Hundreds of women and girls have already left, while others are planning to go. Government schools had all opened, but have closed, and it is not at all likely at present, that normal conditions will be resumed till the threatened war clouds roll away, of which there is not much hope at the moment. The arrival and departure of these troops, with others reported to be following, is too tangible an evidence that something unusual is on foot and tends rather to the belief that their fears will become facts.

There is no military camp in this city and so these soldiers were billeted in and out of the city in temples, ancestral halls, schools and private dwellings, and their presence everywhere did not prove reassuring to the inhabitants, rather the reverse. Business is not as usual, and fuel and other necessaries of life are not being brought in from the country.

Added to the war clouds looming on the horizon, the clouds overhead are a menace too. After a very dry spell at a critical time for the rice, rain came in sufficient quantities to dispel the fears of absolute failure of the crops, but now the fears are all the other way. Since then too much rain has come for the low-lying land and still the sky does not clear. The wind has not yet set in the right direction—so it is easy to see how in such circumstances fear overrides every other consideration. Kienping is minus telegraphic communication but it is reported that a telephone is being installed to communicate with Kuangteh. This innovation, welcome at another time, is to the people only another sign of impending trouble.

The immediate occasion for the expected rupture has not transpired, though it has for months, it seems, been regarded as inevitable, and these 8th and 9th months have been feared.

*Kienping lies near the border of southeastern Anhui where it projects in a sharp salient between Kiangsu and Chêkiang. It is not far from the western border of the Taihu and perhaps 40 miles from the important Chêkiang town of Huchow, through which a big creek leads direct to Hangchow. —Ed.

CHEKIANG TROOPS WELL BEHAVED

Taichow's Exemplary Garrison Departure for the Front: Countryfolk War Weary

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Taichow, Chê., Sept. 3.

For several months numerous troops have been stationed here. The majority of them are young men. As far as I have been able to ascertain they have behaved excellently. I have often met them about the town, both in groups and singly, and never on any occasion have I seen anything of an objectionable character in their behaviour either towards their fellow-countrymen or towards foreigners. On the contrary they have shown themselves very friendly towards us. Five-hundred of them were marched off to Hangchow at the end of last week. Their departure caused no little excitement in the town, and people were sorry to see them go.

Regret but No Enthusiasm

The general feeling down here amongst the people is one of keen regret that there should be an outbreak of hostilities between their own and the neighbouring province. They feel that in the present state of Chinese affairs such a catastrophe will only make "confusion worse confounded." There is no sign of enthusiasm on behalf of war, but rather a feeling that nothing but harm can come from fighting each other.

Business with outsiders is very quiet. Educational work is being seriously interfered with. The 6th Middle School and the normal school ought to have opened this week. I am told they are remaining closed for a fortnight. The educational authorities know that if hostilities break out there will be no money left to spend on education, for a time at all events. They are, therefore, marking time to see what will happen.

The more enlightened and progressive Chinese feel that their leaders instead of planning to kill their neighbours, and sowing seeds of hatred and suspicion, ought to be using their influence to open up better means of communication, not only throughout the province but with neighbouring provinces. Instead of using money for the destruction of numberless valuable young lives, they ought to be devoting it to the furtherance of educational schemes. They feel, too, that the best interests of China are being sacrificed to the gratification of the mere personal ambitions of their leaders.

The most experienced amongst us say that if we have no big flood before the middle of September there is very little likelihood of one coming later. So far we have been fortunate in this respect. During August 9.03 inches of rain fell in Taichow city, quite a moderate downfall. September opened in a way that made us a little anxious. During September 1 and 2, no less than 6.58 inches fell. Of this 4 inches fell in four hours on the afternoon of the second. On the third however, only 13 points were registered. The river rose, rapidly, but most of the surplus water has been carried away. With this heavy rain the hot weather broke, and we have been enjoying much cooler weather during the last three days.

MARTIAL LAW IN NANKING

The Care of Refugees: Tientsin Police on Duty: The Problem of Schools

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Nanking, Sept. 5.

Martial law was proclaimed in Nanking and throughout the province, beginning yesterday. Persons found on the streets after nine in the evening are liable to be stopped and searched by the police. Foreigners generally are falling in with the regulations, as the avowed purpose is the preservation of order.

The joint committee of missionaries and Chinese Christian leaders elected to deal with questions of refugees and so forth has decided upon certain refugee centres in case of serious danger or looting. Only women and children and no baggage will be admitted. The Chinese Citizens' Defence Association is also preparing about ten refugee centers. At Southeastern University and one of the government middle schools, students are organized into a Red Cross unit and voluntary defence corps, while dormitories are being prepared to receive wounded. The abnormal sale, however, of Red Cross flags and their indiscriminate use is lowering sadly the prestige of this organization. Among the Chinese the clamour for foreign protection and the search for names or badges which will ensure some degree of safety is more in evidence than any determined or united effort to organize the citizens for self defense or protection of women, children and property.

The consuls and others close to the situation are calm and are not fearful of any immediate trouble in Nanking. No one expects any repetition of the looting of 1913, when Chang Hsun's soldiers were turned loose for four days upon the city.

One thousand Tientsin trained police are said to be coming to Nanking to reinforce the police force here.

The Chinese official report here to-day says that Chi's troops have occupied Tai-cheng and Chia-ting and are advancing on Nansiang. Communication is open to Quisan to-day, and trains are running through to that point.

BEHIND THE LINES AT WUSIH

All Calm But Everyone Prepared for Worst

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Wusih, Ku., Sept. 6.

After a few days of panic Wusih has settled into a condition of most unwonted calm. Extremely little business is being done, and most of the factories have closed because the workers are unwilling to leave home. There has been very little conscription though all boats have been commandeered as transports. News comes through slowly so rumours of all sorts get about, but few that are exciting. St. Andrew's Hospital nurses' compound presents the appearance of preparation for a fair, the ground, where unoccupied by buildings, being almost entirely covered with booth-like mat sheds erected by prospective refugees. Few refugees have actually moved in but all are prepared to do so at a moment's notice. There is absolutely nothing of interest to report.

JAPANESE DESTROYER AGROUND

Tokyo, Sept. 7.

The Japanese destroyer Yakaze, with 400 high naval and military officers, including Field-Marshal Uehara on board, stranded this morning off the harbour of Yokosuka on her way back from Tateyama, where the officers in question inspected the blowing up of the battleship Aki.—Eastern News Agency.

SOCONY STEAMER ASHORE NEAR HONGKONG

Hongkong, Sept. 11.

The Standard Oil Company's vessel Tecumseh ran on Cust Rocks this morning in a fog. The ship, which on its way from San Francisco to Singapore with a cargo of bulk-oil, had come in to re-fuel. The Tecumseh is letting in water forward, but her cargo is being lightered and it is hoped to refloat her at high tide.

THE educational representatives who went from Hupeh to Peking and there received a drubbing at the hands of the bodyguards of the Ministry of Communications have now sent a telegram to Wuchang asking the people of Hupeh to send a whole regiment of representatives to the Capital to support them in their continued fight to make their demands heard.

HUCHOW BUT LITTLE DISTURBED

South of Taihu Where Great Things Should Happen Still Tranquil

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Huchow, Chê., Sept. 9.

On arriving in Huchow the day before yesterday I found the city quieter than anticipated. In Hangchow I was told not to row at night, but our little mission boat was able peacefully to go on all night disturbed only by the frequent passing of single launches and three boat trains of troops.

Some distance from the South Gate we could see, bravely fluttering from the roof of the new Union Hospital dedicated last June, the American and Red Cross flags. Most of the patients have been removed to the previously rented quarters to make ready for casualties from the war front.

Before we reached the city small boats told us that we could not enter; yet on arrival at the city gate, not a single guard appeared to question our rowing in.

They tell me that the city has quieted down after its first panic. Some say that half the populace has gone. The timid ones still crowd the two barges of the Hangchow launch. The Kashing launch runs. The streets are certainly less crowded and business at a standstill.

We are told that fighting has already begun near Changhing and that an advance has been made by the Chêkiang troops with very light casualties.

Conscription of labourers has been stirring the city. At one foreigner's home the other morning the little milk boy came in crying with the news that his father had just been nabbed. Official proclamations assure the people that good wages will be paid and remind citizens that in time of military crisis it is no more than their duty to cheerfully help out.

THE "HANDS OFF CHINA" ASSOCIATION

China's Thanks for Soviet Sympathy

Moscow, Sept. 9.

Mr. Li Ty-ao, the Chinese diplomatic representative in Moscow, today visited the Commissariat for Foreign Affairs in connexion with the situation in China, according to the Rosta News Agency. He expressed the warm appreciation of the Chinese for the attitude of the Russian public with regard to fears of foreign intervention in China, which had been so widely expressed in the Russian press.

The "Hands Off China" Association now claims a membership of tens of thousands.—Reuter.

CIVILIAN RELIEF IN HANGCHOW

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Hangchow, Sept. 5.

All quiet here and business as usual, some of which is very good and some very bad. The civilian authorities are busy devising ways and means for local protection, feeding of the unemployed, sheltering women and children, etc.; and the chief doctors in the City in consultation with Dr. Duncan Main have spent a lot of time the last two days organizing the Red Cross Work. The Chamber of Commerce is working hard to get funds to meet emergencies.

THE JAPANESE FREIGHT CONFERENCE

Kobe, Sept. 10.

The freight conference, formed by representatives of 47 Japanese shipping companies in May with the object of stabilizing the freight markets, has decided to dissolve immediately. The chairman of the conference declares that it has been very successful.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHEKIANG FLUSHED WITH SUCCESS

Fukien Reinforcements Rushed to Shanghai and Soochow Area: Others now Involved

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kashing, Sept. 4.

Rumours flare up like straw flames and die down without fresh fuel. We have had battles reported all along the lines, with variations. With a perversity pardonable in Chinese, the first success of the Chêkiang soldiers beyond Nanziang, between Shanghai and Soochow, is taken as a real defeat, because it will bring other provinces to help Kiangsu and the war will be prolonged until worse happens. Strangely enough, some seem to wish that Chêkiang could be driven back in one skirmish, peace be declared and the war ended. However, those in charge on the Chêkiang side seem to be rushing reinforcements from Fukien to Kashing, part to go on by railway to Shanghai and part along the Grand Canal towards Soochow.

All men under 40, unless in long gowns, are impressed into the labour corps. Boats that did not escape at the first fright have all been seized. Refugees crowd the trains to Shanghai and others prefer Hangchow. Many go to the country for a day of two, get curious or anxious, and come back. There is no panic as yet, but the people are as afraid of victory as of defeat, for either means loss to them. The rich and poor are begging for space in the mission compounds. The Red Cross flag flying from the hospitals is a symbol of safety. It is pitiful to see young and old shivering with fear and their teeth chattering to tell the latest rumour of looting at other places.

So far, nothing has happened in or near the city of Kashing. The streets are quiet and silence hangs over us as if doom were impending. Conversations with scholars, merchants, workmen and labourers, show that all are more or less dazed with uncertainty. The local chambers of commerce are enlisting 100 extra police for home protection. A solitary pony, with saddle and rider, waits at the railway to take messages to anxious ones. The telegraph line is open only to Hangchow and the trains are all late, but still running and over-crowded. Bank of China notes are exchanged for silver quite freely. The Chêkiang soldiers are paid up and are behaving well.

A Trap Suspected.

Sept. 5.

The reported preliminary success of Chêkiang forces near Shanghai does not fully reassure the people. Some are suspicious of a trap with jaws open for the advancing Chêkiang army. News is meagre from the long border line south and west of the Great Lake. The movements of troops, obvious from this point on the railways, show that a directing mind and a steady hand control the situation. Local excitement continues as labourers are impressed daily, but as they are paid for service terror diminishes.

Rice or other commodities can no longer be delivered except by one going with servants or coolies having badges. Mission hospitals and schools are full or filling rapidly. Chêkiang has been well governed, or at least the people have suffered very little from soldiers under the command of General Lu. Rice hongs are not eager to buy newly harvested grain. Silver dollars are current but small coins are scarce. Mental tension seems somewhat relaxed. Fruit and vegetables are obtainable, but there is no excess. Trains run as usual, with some delays.

The Grand Canal, with parallel waterways, gives the Chêkiang troops free communication with Hangchow and control of the railway from Shanghai also aids in the rapid movement of reinforcements. Unless a decisive battle quickly is fought, many feel that the war will be tedious and prolonged, involving other provinces. Business is at a standstill in almost every line. At Wangkanchin, a town on the Grand Canal at the border line of Chêkiang and Kiangsu, the people nearly all have abandoned their houses, fearing a battle at their very doors. The opposing troops face each other at this point and advance or retreat to await results elsewhere.

Pressed Labour the Worst Trouble.

Sept. 6.

Rumours abound, but less exciting than usual. All coolies in sight have been impressed into service for labour corps. Local "tipaos" with lists of able-bodied workmen, farm-hands, etc., are searching for the men who are in hiding.

Three flags are in use on boats not occupied by soldiers, viz., the Red Cross, the Postal Service and the Swaztika, the latter a red symbol on white ground, similar in purpose to the Red Cross. No doubt some are not properly authorized, but, in times of danger, there are people who will use anything to gain safety, or what they think will aid in escaping to a safer place than where they happen to be. There is less rush to the railway trains, now very irregular in running. Troop trains are moving with more or less precision and purpose.

The writer has gone freely among Chêkiang and Fukien soldiers, they seem good-natured and polite when not occupied. No rush or hurry, but obedience to orders is the rule. One of the boundary police was brought in to hospital, shot by mistake by the Chêkiang men. Reports of skirmishes all along the line from Sungkiang, Binmang, Huchow and Dzanghsin. beyond the Great Lake. The Chêkiang soldiers won a skirmish beyond the boundary at Wangkangchin. They moved forward into Kiangsu Province to Dzangzah, a large market town noted for silk. This is the only item confirmed by eye-witness.

Enforced labour is causing more anxiety than anything else at this writing.

REINFORCEMENTS FROM KASHING

A Situation of Great Strategic Importance

From Our Own Correspondent

Kashing, Sept. 8.

At noon to-day about 1,000 soldiers with ammunition took train ostensibly for Shanghai. They did not appear to be quite as well disciplined as the regular troops.

The canal near the railway station is full of steam launches, barges and smaller boats, showing that these men came from elsewhere. The local military commandant assembled the officers and made an address before they started. Though civilians could not hear, the men seemed to be encouraged. Bystanders said the ammunition was German, but the looks of the boxes did not confirm it.

In former wars in this section, sea-junks brought troops to Chapu, thence by canal to Bing-wu and Kashing for a move north against Soochow or south and west against Hangchow.

There was a fort and a garrison at Chapu on the Hangchow bay, but of late years not much used. Just now, this line of approach is guarded by Chêkiang forces.

The Taipings used Kashing as a base, sending soldiers by canal through Kashan, then by river to Shanghai, or by Grand Canal to Soochow. It is still one of the main outer defences of the capital at Hangchow. One of the Sung Emperors was saved from the Kin Tartars by an army reaching Kashing first. Local strategists insist that Kashing is of great military importance. Formerly a great rice market also, but now Hazeh, or Yehzah (railway spelling) has attracted this commodity, until it compares with Wusih (north of Soochow) as a source of supply.

Wonderful Rumours.

It is reported here (take a pinch of salt) that the officers on both sides of opposing forces along the border had a feast and mutually agreed not to fight in this section. Another report is that one of the recruits got scared, tried to run away, was shot dead by the guard, at officers' headquarters. Still another, that Chang Tso-lin and Wu Pei-fu have agreed to hands off, and let Kiangsu and Chêkiang settle their own row.

Mr. Algar E. Carleton has been detailed temporarily by United States Government to take charge of the American Consulate-General at Hongkong. Mr. Carleton is well known in the Colony.

CANTON THREATENED WITH BOLSHEVISM

Parents' Fear of Influence in Schools: Dr. Sun and the Seizure of Arms

Canton, Sept. 5.

Many parents are considering the advisability of withdrawing their children from the city's public schools in other, it is stated, to prevent them from coming under the influence of the "Bolshevists." By a recent order of the mayor of Canton, Mr. Sun Fo, son of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, Canton public school teachers had to join the Kuomintang Political Party. Fully 500 of the teachers have been obliged to join or incur the risk of dismissal for non-compliance of instructions. An effort is now being made to assure the parents that neither the Mayor nor Mr. Wang Yen-hong. Commissioner of Education in the city, are "Bolshevists," and that their orders to the teachers to join have been forced by the higher authorities.

A report states that the arms seized by Dr. Sun are still in the custody of his following at Whampoa, and that, to prevent further stealing by the mercenaries, Dr. Sun has ordered that what has been left unstolen should be returned to the Norwegian steamer Hav, on which the consignment arrived on August 11. Another report is to the effect that Dr. Sun has given orders to the Customs to issue clearance papers to the steamer as soon as she is ready to sail.

The refusal of Dr. Sun to order the withdrawal of the special mercenaries despatched to Canton city from the districts since the general strike, although the merchants declared their strike off as agreed upon in the preliminary terms for the return of the arms, has excited no little suspicion on the part of the citizens of Canton.

Native bankers in Canton, though they re-opened their offices on September 1, still refrain from holding meetings in their exchange, and for the present Canton is a dead city financially, as no financial transactions are possible on account of the closing of the exchange.

According to the native bankers, there is no reliance to be placed on the story to the effect that Dr. Sun had received $1,000,000 from Marshal Chang Tso-lin for the purpose of making war against the North.

The failure of the Kuangsi-ite mercenaries further to dominate the civil and military affairs of the Tungkan District along the East River of Kuangtung, as seen by their being ousted from its chief city on September 1, is believed to have more significance than the ordinary guerilla warfare that has often occurred in the past between local inhabitants and the hired troops of Dr. Sun.

The street cleaning section of the Canton Municipal Department of Public Health may go out on strike in a few days, as they are now nearly two months in arrear with their wages; and it is stated that there is little prospect of their receiving the arreas.

A Sop to the Unsatisfied.

The Municipal employees generally are stated to be much dissatisfied with the present treatment they are receiving from the Canton authorities and some of them are giving up their point in order to join the Labour and Farmer Corps of Dr. Sun's "Red Army." They are promised a uniform, a strap, a dagger, and a rifle, besides 35 cents a day; and all they have to do is to drill about an hour daily in the courtyard of the Governor's yamen. Since the organization of the "Red Army" 70 ricksha pullers have joined the force.

"Mercenary Militarism"

The Cantonese merchants, it is stated, are not blind to the power that the mercenaries have obtained in Canton, and it would appear that the merchants prefer "mercenary militarism" to "foreign Bolshevism" in the hands of unemployed coolies controlled by unscrupulous politicians.

Governor Liao Chung-hai and Police Chief Wu Te-chen, the officials alleged to have been directed by Dr. Sun to bombard the business section of Canton in the event of the strike not ending by the morning of August 27, whose orders failed owing to the unwillingness of their subordinates to comply, have submitted their resignations. Among those mentioned for the governorship is Dr. C. C. Wu, Secretary of Foreign Affairs to Dr. Sun, who held the post on one occasion for several weeks. General Lee Fok-lum, Garrison Commissioner of Honan, is mentioned for the post of Chief of Police.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

DR. SUN AND MERCHANT VOLUNTEERS

An Alleged Breach of Faith: Arms Not Yet Returned: Arbitrary Methods

Canton, Sept. 2.

The leaders of the Canton merchant volunteer movement in Canton are in a very embarrassing position as a result of an alleged breach of faith on the part of Dr. Sun Yat-sen. Dr. Sun agreed to release in return for a $500,000 special war contribution the consignment of arms seized on the steamer Hav by the authorities, but there is no sign of the merchant volunteers getting back one single rifle.

The merchants signed the preliminary agreements and called off the general strike, but now the authorities have put forward new conditions, including a pledge by the merchants that the arms to be released would never be used to oppose Dr. Sun's mercenary forces. The merchants, however, want to be free to act in self-defence, for example, in the event of the looting of shops by troops or of interference with the rights of the people.

The officers of the volunteers are having a difficult time with the younger members of the corps, who are much excited over the execution without trial by the Civil Governor and the Chief of Police of Major Chau King-shin of the 9th Regiment of the Volunteers, on August 29, after the signatures to the preliminary peace agreement between the volunteers and the authorities had been attached. The parties came to an agreement at 6 o'clock in the evening and Major Chau was executed at 7 o'clock the same day.

The elder members feel that they must forbear oppression a little longer, as at present they have everything to lose and nothing to gain by permitting the younger element to engage in a conflict with the so-called Red Army.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Probable Resumption of Strike

Canton, Sept. 9.

The arms question and the strike, which were apparently settled through the arbitration of Fang Shih-sheng and Liao Hsing-chao, leaders of the Yunnan troops, have once again come to assume a grave aspect, owing to the fact that the Government still refuses to return the seized arms and ammunition to the Merchants' Volunteer Corps. Mr. Chen Lien-pei, Commander, and other leaders of the Corps, assisted by Chinese commercial organizations in Hongkong, have demanded from the Government the delivery of the said arms and ammunition by the 10th instant. They appear to have come to the conclusion that in case the Government fails to comply with their demand, they will again take some drastic steps.—Eastern News Agency.

THE RUSSIAN CONSULATE AT SHAMEEN

Canton, Sept. 9.

The Russian Consulate at Shameen has been confiscated and disposed of in accordance with the land and building regulations of the Settlement, but following upon the conclusion of the Soviet-Chinese Treaty, the Soviet Consul, who arrived here recently, is negotiating with the Consular Body and the Chinese authorities for the return of the building to the Russian Government. As the Canton Government has not yet recognized the Soviet-Chinese Treaty or the appointment of the Soviet Consul, the matter has been referred to the authorities of the British Concession.—Eastern News Agency.

THE RED ARMY IN CANTON

Yunnanese Object to Giving up Any of Their Perquisites to Find Pay for It

From a Correspondent.

Canton, Sept. 4.

Dr. Sun Yat-sen's Yunnanese mercenaries in Canton are strongly opposed to the proposed stationing of a Red Army in Canton, to carry out the schemes of the Communistic faction of the Kuomintang, which is led by Governor Liao Chung-hoi and Chief of Wu Te-chen. The gambling monopoly fees collected by the Yunnanese daily run from $8,500 to $12,000, and a general strike in Canton will greatly affect the mercenaries' income. Canton City is now garrisoned by Yunanese under General Liao Heng-chao of the 2nd Division with General Fan Shek-shang as his immediate corps commander. As far as General Liao is concerned, his income, apart from the gambling monopoly, includes the proceeds of the brothel tax, sometimes amounting to $40,000 a month in the western section of the city alone.

The income of the whole Cantonese Army under General Hsu Chung-chi for a month in the 19 districts where Dr. Sun Yat-sen claims only nominal jurisdiction, amounts to less than $600,000. The Cantonese Army, now commandeering the income of the districts along the West River of Kuangtung, expects to receive daily from gambling protection from 12 districts, $41,664; tobacco monopoly, from 12 districts, $7,346; and wine monopoly, $9,516.

Governor Liao Chung-hoi in Canton has but very little income, and his commissioner of finance, having other obligations to meet under greater pressure, has been unable to raise any funds for the newly organized Red Army. The expenses of the Governor's Office in Canton are being met by monthly contributions of the Namhoi and Punyu Magistracies. So far the Red Army in Canton number but a little over 300 unemployed coolies.

DR. SUN ALSO BOGGED BY WANT OF FUNDS

Canton, Sept. 10.

With the Kiangsu-Chêkiang issue arisen, Dr. Sun Yat-sen was offered a golden opportunity for carrying out his long cherished scheme to despatch expeditionary forces against the North but is still unable to do so owing to lack of funds and lack of unity in the South. To make matters worse, the feeling of Chinese merchants at large towards the Canton Government has of late remarkably changed for the worse. In fact, they are disgusted with the attitude of Dr. Sun towards the Bolshevik movement. Dr. Sun has considerably modified his obstinate attitude towards the merchants, and is beginning to try conciliation. It is now reported in reliable quarters that Dr. Sun has a mind to issue a communiqué in the name of the Generalissimo to the following effect:—

(1) The despatch of an expeditionary force shall be put into effect as soon as possible, Dr. Sun in person leading it.

(2) The administration of Canton City shall be conducted by the citizens, the Municipality of Canton shall be opened to the public, and the Mayor be elected by the citizens.

(3) Taxes of all descriptions shall be abolished and new tax regulations be formulated by those officials who are to be elected by the citizens.—Eastern News Agency.

PAST AND PRESENT HISTORY OF THE C. E. RAILWAY

A Railway that Has Achieved an Agricultural and Industrial Revolution in Manchuria: Policy of Helping the Farmer

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Harbin.

The original promoters of the Chinese Eastern Railway, were content that the great iron way should merely prove to be a section of another system. They did not in the slightest, endeavour to assist in the development of the country. But with the advent of the recent administration five years ago those in charge of the destinies of the railway soon realized, perhaps not unselfishly, that it was necessary to develop the country through which it runs.

It was with this object in view that a complete survey was made of the territory contiguous to the railway and the rivers. This work was done by a corps of economic specialists, who determined the exact number of acres of agricultural land, what the forests consisted of and what minerals could be extracted from the earth.

Through financial reverses experienced immediately after shipment of cargo from America to Russia during the war, the main line running from a small point near Vladivostok to Manchuli Station (the connecting link between the Trans-Siberian and the Ussuri Railway) became a dead loss to the promoters. Considerable enterprise was needed to restore the dying giant. The survey, made by the Economical Bureau under Mr. Michaloff in charge, was the first step in a policy of functioning not only as an agent of transportation, but as an animating factor in the industrial and commercial growth of the country. The achievement of the present general manager, M. Ostromouff, in building up the line has been likened to those of the expansionists and leaders of conquest in American railway history, such men as James J. Hill and H. Harriman, who were engaged respectively for 40 years in the northern and middle sections of the United States.

Just as during the early history of the C.E.R. its sole purpose had been to form but a link with another system, the administration now busies themselves with local needs and industries. It was found by the survey made that in a large area of 400,000 square miles transport facilities could be handled by the railways or rivers which flowed close to or past the C.E.R., and that at least one-half of this was first-class agricultural land. Of the 14,000,000 tons of produce harvested, mined or cut, at least 4,000,000 tons could be exported, all of which could in time be directed and sent by the railway. Probably three-eighths of that amount was shipped by the natives over the modern system, but the remainder was desired also by the administration and a policy of education as to the adventages of the faster and surer transportation was adopted.

Model Farms

To stimulate production the C.E.R. has established model farms in different sections of the district to teach the peasants how to farm more intensively, and how to harvest the crop in the most economical manner. This policy had resulted in the building of a model dairy. This is a marveleous cow country and of milk and butter none better are got.

What is probably the greatest industry and which has developed the most rapidly in the past few years, due in the main to increasing American and European demand, is the soya bean, the oil of which is shipped in immence quantities to the marts of the world. Experts of the Economic Bureau have shown the farmers just where they have failed, where they may improve and in general demonstrated a better method of growth and harvest of these beans. The result has been most satisfactory and the country as a whole has increased its production very much of these beans.

Cattle Breeding

The Manchurian plains and lower valleys, as in America and Australia, are the natural habitat of thousands of cattle and the grass grows during the summer to the height of a man's waist. Formerly no attempts were made at breeding cattle which provided the best meat. This is now being remedied rapidly and thoroughbred stock for breeding purposes now may be found. A special sub-division of the Company has this service in charge and teaches the peasants, Russian, Chinese and Mongol, the value of better and bigger cattle. Another branch of this division is the veterinary department, whose experts fight the plague, tuberculosis, rinderpest and diseases to which cattle are subject.

Owners of timber lands are clearly shown the most economical ways of cutting timber to permit the minumum of stumpage; men, experienced in the profession bring to their attention that neglect and underbrush are dangerous to valuable trees. In the forestry concession the Railway has built a factory where the by products of timber, those of the pines and firs in particular, may be utilized, and chemical oils, wood oils, turpentine, resin and tar are prepared for market.

Refrigerating cars are supplied to producers of milk and butter and shippers of meat to market.

Largerly Agricultural.

The country of course is in the main agricultural and what the farmer needs is being supplied to him as rapidly as possible, not as a matter of charity, but on the basis of buyer and seller on a strictly commercial manner. There is a great need on these vast plains for a method of quick and sure means of transport of the harvested grain and with the country yet in the primary stages of progress from a financial point of view, the C.E.R. has brought forward a scheme of elevators. They are, however, elevators in name only. Passengers travelling on the line may have heard of the storage system, but on inspection of the miles of tracks in the grain sections could not find a structure similar to the massive buildings on the American plains of Jowa and Nebraska. Why? Because the system is on the Mixed Storage plan. Under these proposals the C.E.R. sends out its experts who inspect the grain of the farmers along the line and then, having determined the quality, rate it in accordance with the standards of the North, which standards the mills are cognizant of and recognize. The certification is handed the peasant and the grain taken to points of destination such as Mukden, Vladivostok, Dairen or Tientsin and the payments are then made to the proper recipient according to the quality determined by the experts on the field. Capital, which is such a vital factor in the development of these plains is not bound up by any unnecessary delays and the farmer may obtain credits on the certificate issued by the railway, while the circulation of the monetary medium goes on apace.

Wool Washing Plant.

Another innovation of a pioneering nature is in connexion with the sheep and goats of the plains. At Hailar, 100 miles from Manchuli Station, the eastern terminus of the Trans-Siberian Railway, the C.E.R. has built a wool washing plant and samples of the various kinds of wool sheared on the various portions of the vast empire are washed, cleaned, sterilized and, then shipped, properly labelled, to the various wool centres of the world—ports of England, Germany, France and the United States, which are to bring to the buyers a guaranteed knowledge of the quality and length of the clip from Manchuria.

What have been the results of this unstinted effort to increase the production and the quality of the produce of the northern plains? Has it been worthwhile? Does the future seem to imply greater successes for these ventures?

One could answer all these questions in the affirmative without hesitation, for the amount of cargo handled by the railway can serve for an honest and true index of the development of the regions. The answer may be summed up in short by the statement that the tonnage which will be carried in 1924, which year is three-quarters over, on the C.E.R. will equal and probably be greater than the amount transported in the largest year in the history of the railway, 1916, when America fed the Russian armies through the port of Vladivostok and shipped munitions of war by the shipload over this line as a section of the bigger system.

Steady Growth.

From the low figure in 1913 of 1,300,000 tons, beginning in 1920, when the effects of intensification first made themselves felt, a steady and continuous growth has been experienced—1920, 1,700,000 tons; 1921, 2,250,000 tons; 1922, 2,750,000 tons; 1923, 3,100,000 tons.

The surprising and most beneficial part of the while scheme so far, has been the attitude of the company with reference to profits. Not a cent has been paid to shareholders. After a portion of the returns has been set aside for the reserve, the remainder of the surplus is placed back in the business.

Profits have gone both to the railway and its development schemes, hence the prosperous appearance of the railway territory to-day.

Increased Population.

Thus in the quarter of a century that the railway has been building or has been functioning as an agent of transportation, the population of the country has increased five-fold, where but a million and a half inhabitants peopled the plains, now no less than 12,000,000 get their daily bread and butter from the land, the streams and the mountains.

SOVIET INTRIGUE IN CHINA

Washington, Sept. 5.

It is reported from Moscow that M. Rothstein of the Russian Foreign Office to-day stated that Russia takes a serious view of affairs in China and is not going to remain indifferent. "We have full ground to suspect that an arrangement was reached between the Great Powers as regards China during Secretary Hughes's stay in London. This action was contemplated long ago but America hesitated to make up her mind until the Russo-Chinese Agreement. We believe that the United States has abandoned the policy of the open door and has decided to divide China into zones of interest. It seems that England will receive the south, France the province of Yunnan and Japan Manchuria. The participation of Japan is so far not clear, but certain actions in Manchuria indicate that Japan has been given permission to occupy it."

M. Rothstein added that Russia is going to protest against the Powers' scheme. He denied that the Russo-Chinese Treaty contained any secret clause.

Secretary of State Hughes, shown the foregoing, termed it "not only false but ridiculous." Other American officials pointed out that any such agreement among Powers would be contrary to the Nine Power Treaty.—Reuter's American Service.

Bolsheviks Ruining China

London, Sept. 6.

A diplomat discussing the situation in China with a representative of the "Sunday Times," accuses the Soviet of plotting for the bolshevization of China by lending support, overt or covert, to the various fomenters of anarchy. He declares that if things are allowed to drift any longer, the extension of the civil war in China will kill foreign and British trade for years. Japan and America's reciprocal distress of each other's motives have possibly tended to prevent either assuming the lead in facilitating Chinese reunion, and, if so, Great Britain should boldly assume the lead.—Reuter.

JAPAN'S PROTECTION OF AMOY FORMOSANS

Tokyo, Sept. 6.

Four destroyers have been ordered to Amoy for the protection of Formosan residents there, according to a naval announcement.

Press despatches from Amoy say that the Formosans are being ill-treated by the Chinese soldiers, whose discipline, it is asserted, is very lax.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SNAKE EATING IN JAPAN

5,000,000 Reptiles Annually Consumed

BY ALFRED E.PIERES

Tokyo, Aug. 24.

A snake dinner! Choice titbits made from the flesh of cold, clammy serpents, grilled, fried or roasted as the snake epicure may wish! Yes, one can have this in various parts of the country, and especially in the Asakusa district of Tokyo. One can also have the fresh blood of snakes to sip during the meal if one is inclined that way.

Snake-eating virtuosos of Japan declare that snake flesh is not only extremely tasty, but is also as full of strength and energy as an egg is full of meat, and in the Asakusa district where there is a regular "Snake House"—run like any Gyunabe (Meat) House or O-Sashimi (Raw Fish) House—I had pointed out to me several well-preserved old men and women whose age and appearance were attributed to the benefits derived from snake-eating.

The proprietor of this "Snake House" also enjoys the reputation of being the most famous snake-catcher in the Empire of the Mikado, and estimates that between 4,000,000 and 5,000,000 wiggly reptiles are annually eaten by the Japanese people. Tokyo alone consuming about half a million. The people are awakening to the value of snake flesh, according to him, and its appeal to the palate is on the increase. When Asakusa is properly reconstructed, he added, there will be several "Hebi Shokudos" (Snake Dining Halls) in this section of the capital.

Medical Value Therein

The Japanese believe that there is much medical value in the flesh of snakes, but that this medical value of the serpent is an unknown quantity largely because of prejudice. Those who eat snakes are loud in their praises of the benefits thereby derived.

At first, men and women bordering on a state of desperation, because of the failure of drugs and cures to restore them to health, betook themselves to snake-eating. These declare that they have since won back their health and attribute any benefits gained to the medicinal value of this food. To-day, many who are quite strong and healthy, eat snakes regularly in the belief that they thereby become stronger and healthier, to the proprietor of the "Snake House," is the fresh blood of snakes which is said to be a sovereign cure for many of the maladies peculiar to women.

Mr. Tashiro, one of Japan's athletes to the recent Olympics at Colombes, who gave a commendable display of his prowess at the games, is said to be a great eater of serpents, while it is also said that, when he went to France, there also went with him, as an important part of his baggage, a sack full of dried snakes, serpents being an indispensable part of his diet. He attributes his prowess on the athletic field to the flesh of snakes and several other athletes here are now confirmed snake-eaters.

Snake Farms Next

Both the poisonous and the non-poisonous variety of snakes take their place in the Japanese human system in one form or another. The majority of the ophidian reptiles are dried, charred, powdered, made into pills or capsules and then used for all variety of diseases from complications of the stomach to the twistings of the heart as the result of unrequited love.

In the neighbourhood of Mount Ibuki, which is said to be the favourite haunt of snakes in Japan, there is quite a small army of men who make a living capturing snakes for medicinal and culinary purposes. Before long, according to fanciers of snake meat, it will become necessary to have snake farms. It is believed here that snakes give great muscular strength, just as it is believed that the eating of venison gives fleetness of foot.

The Usual Legend

Snake stories, like fox stories and hobgoblin tales, are plentiful in Japan. The latest of these records the return of a pair of reptiles to a home they had been in 20 years ago. They returned to the scene of their childhood, longer, older, and trailing at their tails two smaller specimens of their tribe, a son and a daughter.

Twenty years ago, so runs the tale, a pair of snakes scientifically known as claphe climacophora took up their dwellings in the home of one Mr. Ochiai. The snakes became very tame and soon were regarded as pets of the family. Evil days, however, fell on the Ochiai household who found it difficult to spare the snakes any food, and the old lady of the household thus spoke to the reptiles:

"I am sorry that evil times do not permit you to continue to be with us. We can't afford it, and you must look out for yourselves. Let us hope we meet again."

That night, so runs the village story, the two snakes disappeared and were soon forgotten. Years later, Fortune smiled on the Ochiais and the old lady expressed a wish that the serpents would return. A postman, passing the Ochiai home one morning, was horrified to see two long snakes trailing their way into the Ochiai household and close behind them two shorter ones. He raised an alarm, but the old lady, hurrying out, requested that the reptiles should not be harmed. The two long and healthy-looking crawlers, she explained, were the old snakes returning to the home of their childhood and the other two their issue.

The four serpents now live in the Ochiai domicile and come at regular hours from a hole in the ground for their meals. People have flocked from all parts to see them, and so numerous have been the callers that the Ochiais have put up a notice to the effect that the newcomers can be viewed only between the hours of 8 and 12 in the morning.

CHINA AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Parliamentary Opposition Not Yet Satisfied: Demand for Better Recognition

Peking, Sept. 10.

The Parliamentary opposition is not satisfied with the election of a Chinese as a Vice-President of the League of Nations and with the vauge promise of the reduction of her contribution, which can only be decided by the Financial Committee. The Opposition still wants withdrawal failing the re-election of a Chinese member to the Council, which is urged on the pringiple of geographical distribution, with a view to closer co-operation.

With regard to the contribution, it is pointed out that permanent members contribute on a 61 units basis, whereas China is paying on a 65, which is out of proportion. China has so far paid 2,228,504 francs, equalling 431,907 gold dollars, which surpasses those of States which are permanent members. Moreover, China has established and maintains a special office in Europe to atend to matters connected with the League. It is finally pointed out that while the staff of the League Secretariat numbers 300 from all the States, only one unimportant position in the Information Bureau has been given to a Chinese.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

London, Sept. 9.

Addressing a meeting of the International Federation of Universities at Geneva on September 7, Mr. Chao Hsin-chu dwelt on China's claim to re-election of a non-permanent member of the Council of the League of Nations. He said that if the result of the election of the non-permanent members would be unsatisfactory to Chinese public opinion, he did not know what the consequences would be. It would, in the face of the resolution of the Peking Parliament, and the views of the country, be very difficult for the Chinese Delegation when making its report to meet all objections to continued membership, which would be urged with increasing force. Though the Chinese were disappointed, and though they considered they had not received the consideration to which they were entitled, the speaker assured his hearers that the Chinese were still warm supporters of the League of Nations, and hoped they would not be disappointed again in the coming election.—Reuter.

TROUBLE ON THE FAUSANG

Brawl Between Passengers and Crew Develops into Serious Affair

Important developments have followed an affair which occurred on board the Indo-China S. N. Co.'s str. Fausang on August 7, while the vessel was on a voyage from Shanghai to Tientsin.

Although official action in the matter has not yet been concluded, the affair is so important that we feel justified in publishing the main facts of the case, which have reached us from an unimpeachable source.

It appears that the Fausang, one of the best-known vessels on the China Coast, left Shanghai on August 5 for Weihaiwei, Chefoo and Tientsin. Shortly after 7 a.m. on August 7, the chief officer of the ship, Mr. Firth, who was on duty on the bridge, was informed of trouble between some Chinese passengers and members of the crew. He went to the scene of the disturbance, and seeing that the trouble appeared to be serious, he attempted to apprehend a Chinese passenger who appeared to be one of the ringleaders of the affair. The man showed fight and at the same time made an attempt to relieve the officer of a leather baton he was carrying, while at the same time two other passengers made to attack the chief officer. Realizing that matters were becoming ugly, he drew his revolver in an attempt to quieten the more threatening of the passengers. At this, one of them, a Shantung man whose name we understand to be Wong Shi-tsing, is stated to have jumped overboard. The alarm was raised immediately and the vessel turned round, but despite a search lasting for more than 40 minutes no trace of the man could be found, and the ship continued on her voyage.

Kidnappers' Assertion.

It seems that the trouble originated owing to some members of the crew of the ship, among whom the carpenter appears to have been prominent, discovering, or suspecting that they had discovered, that some of the passengers were kidnappers and that they had with them a young girl whom they were taking to Chefoo. The alleged kidnappers who had taken a prominent part in the disturbance were handed over to the police immediately on the arrival of the vessel at Chefoo, and a report of the affair was made to the British Consul at that port.

It has been ascertained that the man who is alleged to have jumped overboard and who presumably was drowned was a member of the crew of the Chinese gunboat Hai Chi and that he was returning from leave. His brother, who was at Chefoo, took up the case, and submitted to the Chinese newspapers a report of the affair, in which it was stated very definitely that the chief officer of the Fausang threw the man overboard. The statement was backed by the three alleged kidnappers.

British Court of Inquiry.

On August 16 a Court of Inquiry, convened by the British Consul, was held on board the Fausang at Chefoo, and lasted from 12.30 p.m. till 7.30 p.m. At that inquiry the three men who had made the statement to the press that they had seen the chief officer throw the man overboard retracted the statement, admitting that although they signed their names to it they saw no such thing. Apparently it was brought out at the inquiry that the ship's carpenter started the trouble by interfering with three of the passengers, saying that three of them were kidnappers and would have to be arrested. The deceased man is alleged to have interfered and eventually passengers and crew came to blows, the carpenter, it is stated, receiving a nasty blow over the eye. When the ship returned to Shanghai he asked permission to remain ashore in order to have his injuries attended to, and did not go with the vessel when she left on her next trip north.

Warrant for Chief Officer.

When the Fausang was in Chefoo again on August 20 the inquiry was continued, lasting from 9.30 a.m. till 6 p.m. Witnesses from the vessel were called, consisting of the compradore, boatswain, a seaman and the chief engineer's boy, and all swore that they saw the man jump overboard, the chief officer being about eight feet from him at the time. The inquiry was further adjourned owing to the absence of the carpenter, who is considered one of the most material witnesses in the case. He is required also by the Chinese authorities at Chefoo, who claim that a statement has been made to them that he was implicated in the kidnapping affair. When the Fausang returned to Shanghai the carpenter failed to rejoin the ship, and in view of his importance as a witness a warrant, which we understand has not yet been executed, was taken out for his arrest.

When the Fausang once more returned to Chefoo, on August 26, the chief officer was arrested on a Consular warrant, in which he was charged with "assaulting one Wong Shi-tsing by hitting him with a leather baton and threatening him with a revolver whereby he was put in bodily fear of his life and by some means fell into the sea thereby coming to his death." Mr. Firth was taken ashore under arrest, but was granted bail.

Chinese Demand for Boatswain.

The Court of Inquiry was continued on the Fausang on August 31, on the return of the vessel from Tientsin, among those present being the British Consul, three Chinese officials, and Mr. V. R. Eckford, representing Cornabe, Eckford & Co., the Chefoo agents of the Indo-China S. N. Co., Ld. The inquiry was continued from 12 noon on that day till 6.15 p.m. and from 10 a.m. the following day till 5.15 p.m. Major Bush represented Mr. Firth at the inquiry on both days. Various witnesses were examined at great length, among them being the compradore, the engineer's boy, the boatswain, the seaman who already has been referred to, and the master of the vessel. At the conclusion of the hearing the Chinese authorities wanted the British Consul to issue a warrant for the arrest of the boatswain, on the evidence of one of the witnesses for the prosecution, who stated that the boatswain also was implicated in the death of the man Wong. The Consul declined to comply with the request of the Chinese authorities, but put the boatswain on bail of $500, which was provided by Mr. Eckford.

Case Against Chief Officer Dismissed

The charge against Mr. Firth, chief officer of the str. Fausang, has been dismissed.

JAPAN'S EMIGRATION PROBLEM

Conference in Tokyo to Find New Means of Exit

Tokyo, Sept. 9.

The Imperial Emigration Conference with Baron Shidehara, Minister of Foreign Affairs, as President, was convened for the first time this afternoon.

The scope of the inquiry includes to what countries emigrants should be sent, the nature of the control and assistance to be extended to emigrants and emigration societies.

Baron Shidehara in a speech declared that Japan's emigration policy should not only attempt to solve the surplus population problem, but should promote self-sufficiency in the home country regarding supplies of food and raw material.

He urged, in conclusion, that the emigration policy should be so arranged that emigrants would be acceptable wherever sent.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

MR. K. Halla, the new Czech-Slovakian Delegate, arrived in Peking last week, and has taken up his duties. He was for three years in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs at Prague. Mr. R. Weinzeti, the former Delegate, will leave for home at the end of the month.

SLEEPING SICKNESS IN JAPAN

Alarming Spread of Mysterious Illness Which Doctors Cannot Diagnose

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Tokyo, Aug. 30.

Sleeping sickness has affected Middle and West Japan to such an extent that the country is really alarmed. During the past three weeks the death toll taken by this disease has mounted to over 900 while about 2,000 are sleeping, their lives hanging in the balance.

What the real nature of this mysterious disease is has not been definitely ascertained as yet; nor its cause. Victims fall into a comatose condition, evince no interest at all in what is going on around them, lose all appetite, fall into a doze that is a half-sleep and generally pass away in a state of coma.

Elderly people and children form the bulk of the victims of this malady. Once affected, they doze away into eternity. The more virile make a gallant fight against death, but the number who have succumbed is far greater than those who have survived.

The medical world of Japan thinks the disease is an acute form of spinal meningitis or of brain apathy. Such a thing as sleeping sickness—the name the affected locality gives to the mysterious malady — according to Japanese doctors, is not known to medical lore.

Influenza in Another Form.

The provinces most affected are Kagawa Prefecture, Okayama, Tokushima and Toyama. In the last mentioned place the disease has affected military quarters and several men belonging to the First Artillery Regiment stationed there have succumbed to it. Health officials and physicians in the affected regions are making every attempt to stamp it out, but so far the malady has defied even diagnosis.

The first victims in Kagawa Prefecture, where the disease has gained greatest headway, were smitten towards the beginning of this month and for the first three weeks of August over 700 persons were taken ill, for 321 of whom the disease proved to be their last sleep.

Some doctors here are inclined to believe that the disease is another form of the Spanish influenza that ravaged the world in 1917-1918. The symptoms generally are slight fever, followed by insomnia; then a feeling of exhilaration followed by weakness of sight; then exhaustion, loss of appetite and a species of coma bringing about a stiffening of the limbs and difficulty in breathing.

Only 33 persons are known to have recovered, while the disease is spreading with a rapidity that is alarming the people of the affected localities and is causing an exodus to other districts. The Home Department has sent several brain specialists to the affected areas to study the malady and to devise means for checking its spread.

Typhoid Ranging Tokyo.

The typhoid epidemic in Tokyo and the surrounding areas, which was expected, largely due to the insanitary conditions resulting from the earthquake disaster, continues to spread, and, at the present pace set by the fever, it is believed that the mortality will exceed 10,000 by the end of the year.

That insanitary conditions are responsible for the spread off typhoid is shown by the fact that where disinfectants have been liberally employed, marked success has been achieved in arresting the progress of the disease.

A Cause of Spreading.

One obstacle in the way of checking the spread of typhoid has been the laxity on the part of the people and many physicians in reporting cases to the sanitary authorities, this being due largely to the disinclination of the patient or the patient's relatives to have the sick person taken to an isolation hospital. Some physicians have concurred in not reporting the cases, because otherwise such would affect the medical man's remuneration. Drastic punishment will hitherto be meted out to doctors not immediately reporting any case of typhoid, according to new emergency regulation issued by the Health Authorities yesterday.

WILL HSIONG KEH-WU RETURN?

Said to Have Money and Dr. Sun's Support: Yang Sen Not Worrying

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Chêngtu, Aug. 18.

General Ho, a divisional General of Yang Tu-li, has had three days' rather severe fighting about Suining against troops of Teng Chi-heo about spheres of influence. It remains to be seen whether the trouble can remain localized.

The difficulty with these desultory encounters is that someone loses face whereupon a great deal more unnecessary and useless warfare is carried on, the principal sufferers being the wretched common people.

It is still a fact patent to all that Yang Sen's authority does not exist very far from Chêngtu. There are so many spheres of influence required for "57 varieties" of generals that there is constant shuffling and reshuffling among the divisions and it is very difficult to keep track of the various alliances.

Liu I-chiu and Lan Chin-chi have evidently been successful in pushing Chen Hsia-lin out of the Border country around Tatchienlu, for the doughty Chen Hsia-lin is reported to have gone off on his own to see Wu Pei-fu and put forward his grievances. It will be too bad to lose General Chen because he is a very efficient officer and administrator who has done yeoman service with a small force on the Border for over 10 years. He is too young and progressive to be shelved, so all hope he will soon provide a dramatic "come back" under the ægis of the Loyang chieftain.

Strong rumours are afloat that the redoubtable Hsiung Keh-wu has plans already made to attempt his promised returns. He has been established on the borders of Yunnan some time, collecting men and ammunition. It is well-known that he is well supplied financially and that Sun Yat-sen is backing him in the interests of the South. His personal lieutenants Tan Mou-hsin, Shih Chih-yang and Chang Tsong, are remaining loyal to their old chief, so the report runs, and they are expecting support from some of the Chungking forces against Yang Sen.

Yang Sen Wide Awake.

It is well known that both Liu Hsiong and Liu Sun-ho are not at all happy over their Border appointments and in fact have never seriously taken them on. Yuan Tsu-min also seems to have no inclination to return to Kueichow. Rumour has it that he is bold to say that Szechuan is much better picking than his own Province and that evidently there is pasturage here and to spare for all the military adventurers. However, Yang Sen seems to be unperturbed. He is quite conscious of the jealous feelings entertained against him and can be relied upon to have his secret service department in good running order. He will not be caught napping. He has the mint and arsenal running full time with full staffs.

His Numerous Activities.

The Tuchun is continuing his policy of reform. The horse and motor road to Kuanhsien has been completed as far as Shih-chang and is a splendid piece of serviceable road. Now the main city streets are being widened to permit of the projected car lines. The South Gate main artery is being pushed with all speed. This will connect up with the Union University and the roads that have been built there for some time. It will also connect with the horse road that Liu I-chiu built to the Fair Grounds during his régime.

Most of the foreigners are away at mountain resorts, but some dozen or more have been enjoying the beautiful moderate summer weather in the city and on the University campus. During the past week two visitors have been here. Lieut. Umsted of U.S.S. Palos has been visiting the Arsenal and other public buildings. Mr. Harry A. Frank, author of "Wandering in North China" is spending some time visiting points of interest in and out of the city. He has visited the Kuanhsien Irrigation system and will visit Mount Omei.

KANSU MISSIONARIES IN CONFERENCE

Striking Results of Six Years Labour Among an Apathetic People

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Lanchow, Kan., Aug. 22.

In this distant province of Kansu with its far off flung line of widely scattered mission stations it was not easy in the earlier years for the missionaries to meet together in conference. Six years ago, however, the first conference was held at Lanchow the capital of the Province, when 42 delegates representing the China Inland Mission, Christian Missionary Alliance and Scandinavian Alliance met together in the spacious hall of the Borden Memorial Hospital, which had just been opened by the Governor of the Province.

The Conference was so helpful that it was decided that a United Conference should be held every four years. Owing to the absence of so many of the oldest workers that year, it was postponed till the present year, when it was held at Titao, the headquarters of the Christian Missionary Alliance, from July 27 to August 3. Fifty-three missionaries were present, representing 17 stations. In order to attend this conference missionaries were 416 day travelling to and from their stations and covered distance of 29,110 li, equal to 9,713 English miles in carts, mule-litters, and on horses mules and donkeys. No wonder there is not a conference every year.

The native Church was represented by 40 delegates. Mr. Gibb the Deputy Director of the China Inland Mission, was the special guest of the Conference, which appreciated greatly all the helpful advice he was able to give from his many years of experience in other provinces. The papers read and discussed were of great moment.

Kansu has missionary problems not found in other provinces. Not only is the spiritual need of the Chinese to be met, but also that of the Tibetans, Mongolians, aborigines, and the 2,000,000 Moslems in our midst. They all call for special workers, if their needs are to be met fully, and the call isurgent.

The report for the last six years shows increased activities all round.

Missionaries have increased by 33 per cent., out-stations by 73 per cent., helpers paid and unpaid by 100 per cent., church members by 64 per cent., schools by 94 per cent., and scholars by 97 per cent.,

Kansu has been a difficult province for missionary labour, not owing to hostility, but the sheer indifference, of the people. At last the barren ground is beginning to bear fruit, and we trust the days of an abundant harvest are near at hand.

RUSSO-JAPANESE FISHERIES SETTLED

Tokyo, Sept. 9.

It is officially announced that the fisheries problem in Russo-Japanese northern waters has been settled by compromise. No further details are available.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SUBMARINE K 26 (2,140 tons), the largest submarine in commission, has returned to Portsmouth on the conclusion of her record 20,000-miles experimental voyage. She left Portsmouth on January 2, in the course of which she has visited Bombay, Colombo and Singapore, at each of which ports she carried out a series of experiments. She slipped into Fort Blockhouse, the home of the submarines at Portsmouth, just as though she had been out only for an afternoon cruise.

GOVERNOR Kao En-hung of Tsingtao has a reputation for being a capable administrator. Since his appointment some six months ago we have heard of nothing but the marvels of the new government in Tsingtao. The "Chefoo Daily News," however, publishes a report that a local magistrate who has just been reprimanded by the Governor for non-payment of rent, complained that he had received no salary for several months. Swear words passed between them, and finally, according to the Chefoo journal, Governor Kao apologized to the magistrate and assured him that his salary would soon be forthcoming.

ADMIRAL TOGO'S FLAGSHIP SAVED

Various Schemes Afoot as to How Best to Use It as a Memorial: Popular Resentment over American Loans

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Tokyo, Aug. 31.

The Mikasa, flagship of Admiral Togo, one of the heroes of the Russo-Japanese war, is saved from the scrap heap. The news has been hailed with unfeigned delight by the Japanese, to whom the Mikasa awakens sentiments not unlike those that thrill the breast of an Englishman when he sees Nelson's Victory.

At the Washington Conference for the limitation of naval armaments, every effort was made to have the Mikasa put into a special category. This, however, could not be done, but there was a feeling amongst the representatives of other nations at the conference that the sentiment attaching to the old battleship should be respected, and that, so long as the Mikasa was not employed for possible fighting purposes, an exception be made in her case and she be not consigned to the scrap heap and oblivion. The consent of Great Britain was the first to be obtained and then came that of Italy and of the United States. The consent of the French Government alone was lacking and this was received yesterday, putting the final sanction to the request that the Mikasa be preserved.

The question now is what use to make of this obsolete battleship. Many plans have been suggested, among which the most popular are that the vessel be preserved as a marine museum; that it be made the club-house of the Japan-America Association, turning a fighting vessel into an instrument whereby Japanese and Americans of the better class can meet and discuss means whereby the harmonious relations that have existed between the two nations for close on three-quarters of a century can be better strengthened; while it was also suggested that a relic of the vessel be distributed to every school in the Empire and the hulk be put to some other use.

The Mikasa was built in Great Britain by Messrs. Vickers in 1900, has a displacement of 15,200 tons, used to carry a complement of 750 men and steamed at 19.6 knots an hour. Everybody in the country will be called on to contribute to the best of his or her ability towards preserving the vessel. What purpose it is to serve is yet to be finally decided.

The American Loan

Considerable resentment prevails amongst a section of the Japanese public that further loans have been negotiated in America, and the negotiators of these loans were escorted to Tokyo under a strong guard of plain clothes police when the Empress of Canada, on which they returned to Japan, tied up at Yokohama. Those whom the police were particularly told to take care of were Mr. Junnosuké Inouyé, formerly Governor of the Bank of Japan and Minister of Finance in the short-lived Yamamoto Ministry, during whose tenure of office the earthquake smote Japan; and Mr. Momosuké Fukuzawa, a director of the Daido Electric Company, who has just concluded a loan with American capitalists through Messrs. Dillon, Read & Co. The action of the police was taken as the result of threats on the lives of these two gentlemen by the Kokusuikai (National Spirit Pre-reactionary associations which make out that Japan is slowly but surely "being handed over to the tender mercies of American money harpies."

Mr. Inouyé, besides going to America for the purpose of raising loans to be used in connexion with the reconstruction of the devastated regions, also went to Europe, and is of the opinion that the conditions in Europe are far from promising a roseate solution in the near future, despite the success attained through the Dawes report Britain, according to him, is the one bright spot in the whole picture, while he declares that the immediate aftermath of the successful London conference will be to resuscitate German industry by the employment of American capital for that purpose.

"Factories are springing up like mushrooms in Germany," he states, "but these lack working capital. When American financiers co-operate with German industrialists, the resuscitation of Germany will be brought about with astonishing rapidity. In the meantime, Britain has lost considerable ground in her foreign trade. Despite this, she continues to pay her dues to America, more than one-third of servation Society) and other the proceeds of the high taxation that country is burdened with being devoted to pay off obligations to the United States."

France's financial condition is painted in very gloomy colours by this former Minister of Finance, who says that the country is bowed underneath heavy taxation, and that any attempt to impose further taxes will bring about a revolution. "Competent financial observers," Mr. Inouyé declared, "have gone the length of stating that, during their lives, it will not be possible to see French credit restored to its pre-war level."

An Alleged Subterfuge.

A flutter has been caused in local financial circles by an editorial in the "Kokmin" (nation), one of the most powerful and widely-read dailies in Japan, which flatly characterized the recent loan for $22,000,000, contracted in the United States on behalf of the semi-official Industrial Bank of Japan, "a direct betrayal of international faith." The last session of the Imperial Diet authorized the National Treasury to undertake the burden of guaranteeing certain industrial loans in the following terms:—

"The Government is authorized to guarantee both principal and interest of a loan which shall have for its purposes the conversion of the National Bonds of December 12, 1918; transferring to the Industrial Bank of Japan the burden now shouldered by others."

The recent loan granted to the Industrial Bank of Japan, according to a public statement made on August 13, 1924, was "to be devoted to general current bank purposes, which include the promotion of industry in Japan," while it was also stated that "particularly at this time, when the recently enacted luxuries tariff gives protection to the manufacture of certain lines of goods in Japan, ready money with which to enlarge and improve industrial plants is needed." Such purposes are in perfect harmony with the terms whereby the United States Government extends approvals to loans.

The authority granted to the Government by the Imperial Diet, however, strictly mentions the National Bonds of December, 1918, namely, the Nishihara loans made to China, so that it is reasonable to infer that a portion of the $22,000,000 loan raised in the United States on behalf of the Industrial Bank of Japan will be devoted to the bonds issued for the Nishihara loans. On the other hand, it is a fixed and inviolable condition of the American Government that no loan in the United States can be used for the purpose of controlling Chinese resources in any way. It is this clash in the statements made that has caused the Kokumin to tax the Japanese Government with bad faith, and to question the legality of the Government's guarantee if the loan is used in connexion with the Nishihara loans. The paper further states that it would have been impossible to secure this money in America if it had been known that the proceeds, or part of the proceeds, would be devoted towards the conversion of the Nishihara loans to China.

The Minister of Finance, considerably flurried by the charge that the Industrial Bank and the Treasury had stooped to a subterfuge, declares that such is not the case at all. According to him, the terms of the contract signed in the United States stipulate that the money be used "for general current bank purposes which include the promotion of industry in Japan." The redemption of the Nishihara loans, he maintains, is part of the bank's business and that, thus, there is no violation of faith at all. That this loan will be used towards the redemtion of the Nishihara loan bonds, Y.50,000,000 of which fall due on November 15 this year, seems to be clear from a statement made to press reporters by the Minister of Finance. "The extraordinary session of the Imperial Diet approved the Government guaranteeing a loan to be used for redeeming this amount," he declared. "It was clearly stated that the Industrial Bank should obtain money for this purpose and to use it in any other manner would be a violation of the law."

Nevertheless, the feeling is prevalent in financial circles here that not a single dollar could have been raised in the United States if it had been properly understood there that the funds would have been used in connexion with redeeming the Nishihara bonds which have been widely criticized both in Japan and abroad.

CANTON'S PAPER MONEY

Dr. Sun's Concessions: Not Legal Tender but Usable for Tax Payments

Canton, Aug 29.

To ease popular opposition, the Central Bank of Dr. Sun Yat-sen in Canton has announced that all payment of public dues and taxes through it shall be made in the notes of the bank, but persons possessing these notes may have them redeemed at the bank. Shops are not required to give change in silver when these notes are tendered; that is, persons need not accept the notes as legal tender.

The Canton Government Mint, which has been turning out many subsidiary coins during the last few weeks, has stopped coinage since August 28. By order of the authorities these coins are now only good for circulation among the people, but not for the payment of taxes, which must be made in the bank-notes of the Central Bank.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

HALF CHUNGKING IN FLAMES

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

Chungking, Aug. 29.

Further details are received from a correspondent in Chungking of the disastrous fire which broke out in that city on August 28.

It is estimated that damage has been done to the extent of $1,000,000 by the disastrous fire which broke out here last evening.

The outbreak started at 7.30 in a house of flimsy board and mat construction, situated on the foreshore below the city wall between the Taiping and Tung Sui Gates. Owing to very hot weather during the past fortnight all buildings both inside and outside the City were especially combustible, and on account of a high wind—the first to occur for more than three weeks—the fire progressed with great rapidity. By 8.30 p.m. it had leapt the wall and obtained a very strong hold of Barry's buildings. Very little water was available as quite a number of the City wells had become dry.

As the wind steadily continued from the east a very large area, including some of the most substantial modern buildings in the City, was engulfed by 10 p.m.

At 1 a.m. to-day the wind swung round suddenly to the northwest, bringing with it steady rain which had the effect of checking the course of the fire in that direction but caused it to spread somewhat towards the east. However, by 4 a.m., it was seen the fire had spent itself.

The total losses are said to be between one and two million dollars, of which probably one-tenth is covered by insurance.

A SECOND ATTACK UPON GENERAL FUKUDA

Attempted Assassination by Dynamite

Tokyo, Sept. 6.

General Fukuda again narrowly escaped being dynamited this afternoon. An innocent looking parcel, which had been delivered by parcel post, exploded while it was being unpacked by Mrs. Fukuda. The parlour and furniture were badly smashed, but fortunately nobody was hurt.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE NATIONAL FLOOD RELIEF DRIVE

Formally Inaugurated in Peking by Chinese and Foreigners: Sympathetic Interest

Peking, Sept. 1.

The National flood relief drive, which is being organized under the joint auspices of the China International Famine Relief Commission and the Chinese National Red Cross Society, was formally inaugurated at a function, attended by a representative gathering of foreigners and Chinese, held at the Red Cross Society's headquarters in Kan Mien-hutung this afternoon.

Opening the proceedings with a brief speech, Dr. W. W. Yen, who presided, thanked the visitors for their attendance—an act, he said, which proved in itself that they took a sympathetic interest in the work on hand. Some half-a-dozen provinces, he pointed out, were involved in the floods and perhaps 30 million people were rendered homeless and otherwise left without means of existing. On the part of the Government efforts were being made to render organized relief and, following precedents, it was expected to levy surtaxes of various sorts to raise the necessary funds. The Red Cross Society of China and the International Famine Relief Commission had combined to make a "drive" with the object of raising two million dollars. It was not proposed, Mr. Yen explained, to secure the entire sum in Peking but various sums would be allotted to the larger cities and their compatriots abroad were expected to contribute liberally. They all knew, he said, that times were hard and this was not the first time that help of this kind had been asked for Some effort, however, must be made to save the starving and homeless millions and to undertake measures which would at least partly prevent the recurrence of similar disasters. "I wish to assure all who are present," concluded Dr. Yen, "that the money obtained will be spent in the wisest and most economical manner, and that every cent of it will be used for relief work, present and future."

At the end of the proceedings, during which it was announced that the President had contributed $10,000 and the Pope 100,000 lira for flood relief purposes, the gathering adjourned to another part of the Red Cross premises for tea.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Kiangsi Relief Fund

The Kiangsi International Famine Relief Committee has asked for $500,000, in addition to over $100,000 which it already has on hand, for flood relief in the province, which as one of the three hardest hit by the floods of the summer. Mr. O. J. Todd, engineer of the Commission, has gone to Nanchang to make a thorough investigation of the conditions in Kiangsi and draw up a programme of relief. He will spend about a week going over the flooded area with members of the local committee and then will return to Peking to make his report. It is expected that the relief there largely will take the form of the rebuilding of dykes which have been destroyed.

In Hunan conditions are so difficult that no less than 10 trained investigators have been sent out to make reports on the flooded areas by the Hunan Committee of the Commission. It is expected that these reports soon will be completed, after which recommendations will be made and a programme of relief measures drawn up. It will not be possible till then to estimate the amount of money needed in this province, which has also suffered heavily. Owing to the different nature of the country, the flood came there with a great deal more violence than in Chihli. It is a hilly country with many streams which became raging terrents carrying destruction to all in their paths. The water did not remain over so wide an area as in Chihli, but was level with the eaves of the houses where it did rise.

The Commission is arranging for rebuilding dykes in Hunan, and it is also proposed to make advances of seed rice on a loan basis.

THE next Peking Minister to depart on furlough is M. J. A. Barnet, the Cuban Plenipotentiary. Soon there will be five ministers absent on leave, the French, Portuguese. Belgian and American representatives having already left.

GERMAN PRISONER OF MUKDEN

Mr. Scherer's Appeal in Hearing: Sentence Likely to Be Reduced

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Mukden, Sept. 8.

The appeal case of Mr. E. Scherer was heard at noon to-day and it is probable that his sentence will be reduced considerably, though the hearing is not yet concluded.

In court Mr. Scherer was declamatory and excited, but confident.

Mr. E. Scherer, a German citizen, was sentenced to seven years' hard labour for allegedly killing a Chinese child, and has since been confined in a Chinese prison in conditions indecribably insanitary.—Ed.

CHEFOO IN A WHIRL

The Climax of the Summer Season: Warm Reception for Shanghai Artistes

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Chefoo, Sept. 1.

We are now into the second half of our summer season in Chefoo and visitors are gradually leaving. The hotels are nevertheless still quite full and the town as gay as ever.

In addition to the usual amusements we have recently been fortunate enough to have the pleasure of hearing one or two first-class artists. Miss Nora Moon spent a short holiday here and during that time gave a really excellent concert at the Broadway Hotel. Miss Moon is possessed of a supberb soprano voice which, in the various items she rendered, was exhibited to great advantage. Her talent can be undisputed. Her songs cover a big range and those we ere lucky enough to hear were beautifully executed. She sings with both confidence and feeling combined with unblemished technique. Her most popular items were "One Fine Day" from "Madame Butterfly" and "How's My Boy" by Homer.

Miss Moon was admirably accompanied by Mrs. Sykes at the piano. A wonderful voice necessarily needs an excellent accompanist and Mrs. Sykes undoubtedly filled that rôle to the last degree. Apart from this she gave us a delightful solo effort in her rendering of Brahms' Rhapsodie in G minor.

We have also been favoured with a visit from Miss Kitty Barlow and her company. Several entertainments were given by this company here and were enjoyed to the fullest extent. Miss Barlow is extremely versatile and clever. She has of course had a long and varied career on the stage and among other things she has taken part in over 1,100 performance of "A Little Bit of Fluff" at the Criterion Theatre, London. Miss Norton, another member of the company, gave us some pretty little songs and a variety of costume, whilst Mr. Jack Thomas as an eccentric dancer was very well received.

Although mentioned last, by no means the least popular of our entertainments has been the Minstrel Show given by the Fleet to the Chefoo residents in appreciation of the manner in which they have been received here. Words to that effect were printed upon the programme so we have no hesitation in saying so. The show was a great success and one would estimate that there were at least 3,000 people present. To select individual items would be impossible as the whole affair was so thoroughly successful. The residents certainly appreciate the spirit in which it was given and the time and trouble which it must have entailed to produce.

Having mentioned these entertainments there is little left to report upon. As a pleasure and health resort Chefoo is in a whirl, as a business centre it is very quiet. Practically nothing is moving. We expect the Fleet to depart rather earlier than was originally anticipated. Several vessels have already left for Shanghai to stand by there in consequence of rather disquieting rumours regarding conditions and possible warfare. It is hardly likely that these vessels will return to Chefoo again this summer.

JAPAN EARTHQUAKE ANNIVERSARY

Reverence for the Dead and Tributes of Affectionate Remembrance

BY ALFRED E. PIERES.

Tokyo, Sept. 2.

No prayers were said, no lesson read, When Death came o'er that fiery lea,
And yet for them, through all the land,
A million thoughts that night shall be.

A fierce sun, slightly veiled by some clouds which, however, failed to mitigate the sultriness of the morning, streamed down throughout the day yesterday on a mighty concourse of people of all classes, who had assembled in the compound of the Military Clothing Depot, Honjo, where tens of thousands of refugees, after undergoing tortures that the most sanguine of fiction writers could not have imagined, had died towards evening on September 1 last year.

From early Sunday evening they poured in, bringing with them offerings of fruit and flower's, of incense and perfume, to deposit by the temporary altars erected to the spirits of those who went through the most fearful holocaust of modern times. Men and women, young and old, thronged and surged to pay respect to those who had gone before, after such a terrible struggle with Death, rich and poor, master and apprentice, peer and peasant, all surged through the same doors, towards the same common altar, living again in memory the days that united them to their friends and relatives before the terrible visitation, living again the awful memories of that fateful day and spot.

From a distance a thin smoke, curling upwards from the now sacred spot where formerly was the Army Clothing Depot, could be seen. It was the smoke of incense burnt before the shrine where repose the ashes of the 33,000-odd persons burnt to death here last September. The multitude were all out to pay reverence to the unfortunate dead, a reverence that was all the more intense because the Japanese believe that the dead are not dead, but that their spirits pierce the veil separating the seen from unseen and are taking note of the gallant efforts made to remember them and their dire sufferings before the Last Post sounded.

It was the most appropriate place in all Japan to be when the hands of the clock pointed to 11.58 a.m., this spot where these thousands perished on that evening a year ago.

Psychology of the Crowd.

Everyone seemed to be in an acute state of nervousness. The crowd numbered tens of thousands, and anything like a panic would have been accompanied with fearful consequences. This state of nervousness increased as it grew nearer and nearer to 11.58, and a glance at the sea of faces around showed that the margin between mad, hopeless, helpless terror—as the result of the psychology of the crowd—and the outward calm composure, that was hardly kept on with an effort, was small. Your correspondent and an American teacher were the only two foreigners here and a species of indescribable nervousness seized us too.

Occasionally there were sobs, broken tributes of affectionate remembrance combined with the awful consciousness of the Unseen Power that had swept thousands across the border in one sudden blow. These came mostly from women, and willing and ready hands gently led them away to improvised first aid hospitals where a number of Red Cross nurses took charge of them.

"One Touch of Nature. . . ."

There were people in rich silk kimonos, coolies in their work-a-day clothes, artisans in the dark-hued garments of their trade, school girls in the conventional hakama (skirt worn over the kimono) and women in the deep mourning of foreign clothes. It told of the different strata of society that met death together there—bankers, professors of universities, cultured women educationists, people of independent means, brawny workmen, lisping school girls, mothers with babies they were nursing, when the air grew so sultry that tongues clove to the roofs of mouths.

On the altar where reposed the ashes of the victims were little mounds of flowers, fruits and other offerings. Earlier in the morning the representatives of the Highest in the Land, the pick of officialdom and the representatives of foreign lands had paid a solemn tribute to those who perished here.

The Psychological Moment.

The crowd still surged. As 11.58 approached they moved towards the altar. The air was thick with incense smoke, incense smoke that had been rising heavenwards ever since the fateful disaster. An order was megaphoned and taken up by various others. "Five Minutes More." The crowd grew rather restless. As the dread minute approached, one wondered what would be the result on this field of death if another dark hour should cast its evil shadow over the land.

In came a band of Buddhist priests of the Nichiren sect, the drummers banging out the Nichiren chant. Prayer sticks clacked fervidly, orisons rang on the air.

Another order: "Take Off Your Hats for This Ground is Holy," and, with almost methodic preciseness, the entire crowd unbared. Suddenly a whistle sounded, most probably from one of the boats moored along the banks of the Sumida. A deep gong in the grounds of the field of death boomed; other syrens, bells and whistles announced that the anniversary of the quake, to the minute, had arrived. A hush descended on all, followed almost immediately by audible prayers, stifled groans, sobs. More incense was piled on the altar, and through the cloud of smoke it was difficult to see well ahead. The drums of Nichiren continued to beat the Buddhistic chant, prayer sticks were plied with redoubled fervour.

Sighs of Relief.

The fateful moments passed. The crowd lightened up. The weight of uncertainty that something terrible might again happen this year had been lifted from the minds of the thousands gathered, a weight that had been very heavy because of psychological associations and because of the steady stream of new horrors that have been predicted by calamity howlers for months past. Something akin to a faint cheer unconsciously burst out. Till the fateful period was over, the crowd was uncertain. The anniversary of the quake being safely tided over, all plucked up new courage. A deep sigh of relief was discernible.

Money was thrown with liberal prodigality. The coins hit those in front. The crowd was exhorted not to throw the money, but to deposit it in the offertory boxes as they came along. Still the rain of coins came down. The altar floor for several hundred square yards was one mass of money, a veritable fortune.

To the Sumida.

The crowd proceeded from behind the sacred place—and if sand and gravel ever have the right to be called sacred, this spot has—towards the Sumida, where services were being held in boats for the thousands who closed their eyes to this world in the swirl of the waters of the river that winds its way through the heart of Tokyo. To the edge of the banks they proceeded and there made profound obeisance to the flag-bedecked boats, whence came the chants for divine intercession, the clack-clack of prayer and the beat of the drums of Nichiren, the main notes heard all over Tokyo yesterday.

NOTICING an itinerant mat-maker, obviously suffering from shell-shock, a Kirkconnel woman gave him hospitality, and as he bore a strong resemblance to a friend in Mauchline, she sent a wire to James Macdonald at that place. Macdonald, on arriving at Kirkconnel, identified the stranger as his brother, a gunner in the Royal Field Artillery, reported "killed in France" in January, 1917. The name of W. Macdonald is tattooed on one of his arms. His mind for the most part is blank, but during brief periods of mental clarity he recollects having been buried by a shell-explosion and taken as a prisoner of war and confined in hospitals. He also vaguely recalls incidents and persons associated with his boyhood.

HUPEH TEACHERS' ASSOCIATION

$1,600,000 Wanted to Pay Staff and for Maintenance

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wuchang, Sept. 1.

On Saturday the members of the Hupeh Educational Association met in Wuchang, to hear in detail the report of their representatives who have returned from Peking and to decide upon what course of action they shall take. The situation of the teachers in all the Government Schools is certainly a serious one. The Government funds, from which they expect to draw their support, are in arrears to the extent of nearly $1,600,000. This means that the salaries of many of the teachers have not been paid for many months. Their representatives, who have been to Peking to lay their case before the Government, have been ignored. They have been treated with contumely by both the Board of Finance and the Board of Communications. Finally, they have been beaten with violence from the doors of the latter, three of their number being seriously injured. They have had to return to Wuchang, unsuccessful, empty-handed and ill-treated.

More than 100 teachers were present at this meeting. They decided that the best thing to do was to send a long telegram to Peking in the name of the Hupeh Teachers' Association, Hupeh Educational Association, Hupeh Students' Union and Hupeh Private Schools' Union. If the telegram fails to elicit a favourable reply, they decided that the next step would be declare a strike, close down all the schools, and proceed to Peking in a body to get their case heard.

Preparations are already being made for the annual worship of Confucius, which is to take place on the 5th day of the 9th month (October 3 according to the foreign calendar). The great Temple of Confucius is being swept and cleaned and painted. Th veessels for sacrifice, the musical instruments of ancient China, and the official robes of those who are to perform the ceremony, are all being got ready. The ceremony will commence at 4.30 a.m. on the day appointed, and the chief worshipper will of course be Hsiao Yao-nan, the Tuchun of Hupeh. He will be assisted by most of the principal officials of the city.

The paine due to the war between Chêkiang and Kiangsu is causing some strange fluctuations in the value of copper cash. Last Friday morning, 100 ten-cash copper pieces were valued at .304 of a tael; but by the evening they had sunk to .280. This means that the tael-cash exchange rose from 3,289 in the morning to 3,570 in the evening. The dollar is also mounting up. Last week it was at 2,280, and to-day it has reached 2,380. Paper notes are slightly more valuable than copper cash just at present.

DEATH OF WELL-KNOWN RESIDENT OF TOKYO

Community's Tribute to Popular Member of Staff of the British Embassy

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Tokyo Sept. 4.

One of the most impressive funerals that have been held in Japan took place this morning when all that was mortal of Captain N. M. Toft, honorary attaché and language officer attached to the British Embassy, were accorded the last rites.

Captain Toft was bitten in May last by his dog which he had brought with him from England. To all appearances, the wound had healed and further attention seemed to be unnecessary. Toward the end of August, however, when summering at Ikao, a spa about 60 miles from Tokyo, he fell ill and symptoms of hydrophobia developed. He then also had an attack of cerebral meningitis—the so-called sleeping sickness that is alarming people here—and succumbed, despite the best of medical attendance.

The remains were brought down to Tokyo by train and reposed in state in front of the altar of St. Andrew's Cathedral all the previous night, fellow-officers of the deceased taking turns in keeping watch over the remains. The coffin was draped with a huge Union Jack, and the dead officer's helmet and sword were placed on the bier.

On either side of the small catafalque were mounds of flowers and floral wreaths, two of the latter being sent by the Japanese War Office and one by the Japanese General Staff.

The last requiem services were of a semi-military nature, Tokyo garrison furnishing a guard of honour.

The Rev. Mr. W. Gemmil officiated and, after the singing of "Fight the Good Fight With All Thy Might," the reading of the services for the dead followed. The singing of "Now the Labourer's Task Is O'er" and the pronouncement of the Benediction brought the services to a close.

A procession was then formed and the priest-in-charge, bearing aloft a cross made of flowers and greenery, led, followed by the coffin borne on the shoulders of British military and naval men, representatives of Japan's defence forces and of all the Embassies and Legations in Tokyo followed. As the small churchyard was reached, three Japanese buglers sounded the Japanese Last Post. This was followed by the firing of an irregular volley, and while the coffin was being placed on the hearse, the Last Post was again sounded. The remains will be cremated and the ashes sent to England.

It was expected that the band and buglers of the Hawkins, which reached Yokohama yesterday from China, would be present, but, for some unknown reason, this part of the programme in honour of the deceased officer failed to materialize.

Amongst those present at the funeral service were the Japanese War Minister; Sir Charles Eliot, K.C.M.G., British Ambassador to Tokyo; the commander-in-chief of the Hawkins; and Captain and Miss Inouyé, son and daughter of Marquis Inouye, former Ambassador to the Court of St. James.

TOKYO MAYOR RESIGNING

Loggerheads with His Council

Tokyo, Sept. 5.

Mr. Nagata, the Mayor of Tokyo, has tendered his resignation as the result of the Municipal Assembly this evening rejecting a candidate recommended by him for the post of Director of the Electricity Bureau. It is feared that this will hamper the work of reconstruction.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

As the supply of application forms for the bonus granted by Congress to American ex-soldiers who served in the war is now exhausted the China Central Committee of the American Red Cross announce that they have kept a list of those entitled to the bonus in Shanghai who could not be supplied with forms. When the latter arrive from Washington they will be sent on to the men concerned.

GIFTS totalling Y11,041.50 for the establishment of earthquake forecasting stations have been announced by Dr. Akitsune Imamura, the Japanese authority on seismology. The money was sent to the research department of Tokyo Imperial University in commemoration of the first anniversary of the September 1 disaster. The largest contribution was from by Mr. Kasuyata Kimura, of the Mitsubishi Company, who gave Y.5,000. The Ryojunkai, an organization formed by the Amemiya family, contributed Y.3,000. An official of the Tokyo Municipality gave Y.3,000 in memory of his son, who was killed in the catastrophe. Inhabitants of Haraikatamachi, Ushigome, donated Y.41.50 in 10-sen gifts. Dr. Imamura said he proposed to instal two instruments when the fund reaches Y.30,000. He has a plan which he wishes the Diet to sanction which would establish a number of research stations in various parts of Japan to forecast the coming of earthquakes.

RUSSIAN REFUGEES IN THE PHILIPPINES

Manila, Aug. 28.

The Ilia Morometz, one of the Russian vessels which arrived in Manila Bay a year and a half ago under Admiral Stark, has been sold to a local transportation company, leaving only two out of the 11 vessels in the original fleet which came from Vladivostok with more than 800 Russian refugees. The others have been sold to concerns here or in China. The company will use the Ilia Morometz, which is a high-powered tug, in towing work in Philippine waters, the vessel, built in Shanghai in 1916, is 154 feet long, has a draft of 17 feet and a tonnage of 580.

Only 40 of the original 800 refugees who came with the fleet remain in the Philippines, the others, including Admiral Stark, having departed for various countries. Some 600 were taken to the United States on the army transport Merritt more than a year ago and others have gone to Shanghai from time to time. Admiral Stark left only a few days ago for France, where he expects to make his home and possibly enter business. He and his followers belong to the old monarchical régime and at present are not welcome in their native land. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE soldier Li Yi-yuan, whose name is now well-known to foreigners in China as the man who attacked three Peking residents, is hunger-striking in prison. Li has stated that he will refuse food and drink until he has been taken to see the President. Fearing he might die, says the Chinese press, the other day the prison authorities persuaded him to drink a cup of milk by intimating that a carriage was outside the gaol waiting to take him to see the President.

A Wuchow correspondent who is at present in Shanghai states that he has received information from that city that fighting has broken out afresh in Kueilin, but the parties concerned are not mentioned. A Chinese letter received from Kueilin, written on July 25, says that Gen. Lu Yung-ting has received large quantities of ammunition from Gen. Ma Chi, of Hunan, and that Hunanese troops have arrived at Hsingngan, which is about 30 li east of Kueilin. The writer does not give details.

THE fact that Mr. Albert Bruce-Joy made the death mask of King Edward VII is recalled in the "Morning Post" obituary notice of the famous sculptor. After he had performed that melancholy duty, he said he had been struck by the beauty of the dead King's hands. They were, he said, of extraordinary symmetry and grace of outline, not associated, except in very rare instances, with a man of King Edward's habit of body. The sculptor was so much impressed that he sought permission to take a cast of them, but his wish was not conceded.

Silver.

The price came yesterday at 34 1/16d. ready and forward, against 34⅜d. ready and forward a week ago, the highest point touched during the week being 35d. ready and forward. Reuter has reported the market daily as steady, with India, China and the Continent as buyers.

Bars in stock, 2,652, including Silver Yen 10 lakhs. Stock of sycee and dollars amount to Tls. 401½ lakhs and $445 lakh against Tls. 400 lakhs and $450¼ lakhs last week, and Tls. 240 lakhs and $317½ lakhs on September 11, 1923.

Exchange.

Exchange left off last week with the official quotation for T.T. at 3/3½d. It was raised daily by a ¼d. until Wednesday, when it stood at 3/4¼d., where it still remains. The market opened quiet yesterday morning with sellers T.T. 3/4 1/16d. September/October, 3/4⅜d. November/December; Gold $ T.T. 75⅝ September/October, 75¼ November/December, but eased off gradually and we closed off at the tiffin interval with no sellers better than T.T. 3/4⅝d. and G.$75½ September/December.

THE SILVER MARKET

Reporting from London on August 6, Messrs. Samuel Montague & Co. state:—

Some fresh sales made on China account on the 31st ultimo had the effect of depressing the price 1/16d. for cash and ⅛d. for forward delivery to 34⅛d. and 34 1/16d., respectively, from which next day a partial recovery took place. This would seem to indicate that the undertone continues fairly good. Support has been given from the Continent and by bear covering.

The favourable movement of the sterling exchange with the United States of America did not appreciably affect the price of silver during the earlier part of the period under review, but the pronounced change yesterday was reflected to some extent in receding prices.

The silver quotations to-day for cash and two months' delivery are respectively ⅛d. 1/16d. below those fixed a week ago.

Reporting from London on August 7, Messrs. Mocatta & Goldsmid state:—

The price of silver, for the second week in succession, has only varied between 34⅜d. and 34⅝d., the latter being to-day's quotation. The Continent has continued to buy quietly and America has also bought in this market, but China has been a rather persistent seller and the demand has been easily satisfied. Except for a few bears covering their sales, India has taken little interest in this market, although they have been buying in New York. The premium on the forward quotation has narrowed to 1/16d., owing to most of the selling lately having been for forward delivery. The tendency of the market at the moment is a little uncertain, but the undertone remains good and we think about the present level of prices will be maintained.

THE GOLD MARKET

Reporting from London on August 6, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

The Bank of England gold reserve against its note issue on the 30th ultimo amounted to £126,487,985, as compared with £126,449,540 on the previous Wednesday. The larger proportion of the small supplies available this week has been taken for India.

The Finance Minister of the Union of South Africa has stated in the South African Parliament that there is a possibility of the Union taking steps to restore the effective working of the gold standard in South Africa, even before normal currency conditions are attained by the United Kingdom. The loss of the gold premium would, of course, affect the gold industry of South Africa, touching its capacity for paying dividends and possibly the ability to meet the miners' wishes as to wages.

The Southern Rhodesian gold output for June amounted to 52,130 ounces, as compared with 53,816 ounces for May and 58,323 ounces for June, 1923.

It was announced under date of the 31st ultimo, from Bombay, that the Imperial Bank of India had reduced its official rate of discount from 5 to 4 per cent.

SHANGHAI MARKET REPORT

A Promising Export Business Completely Held up by War: Stagnation General

Sept. 13

Business conditions during the past week of course have been no better than for the last three weeks and no one would expect a more optimistic report. The Chêkiang-Kiangsu quarrel and the other issues arising from it are particularly regrettable because of the fact that lately a very healthy demand has risen for China produce and were we living in normal times exporters now would be doing a trade that would largely compensate them for the prolonged depression they have experienced. It has been stated that the Chinese, when the struggle commenced, still were prepared to discuss business in produce, for many amongst the better informed held to the opinion that the conflict would not go beyond words, but there since has been cause for them to change their minds and now they are unwilling to make contracts for fear of non-delivery. This has been coincident with numerous inquiries from Home for groundnuts, tobacco and egg products. With fresh eggs, too, the Chinese are unlikely to do anything until they can see the way clear for getting supplies down from the war areas. There is the further difficulty that it is absolutely impossible now to send sycee into the interior for the purchase of general produce.

Cotton, Yarn, etc.

These markets also continue dead locally, but in what little has transpired there has been noticeable a decline in cotton and a slight fall in yarn. In any case the week counts as a holiday period and the markets will be closed altogether to-day.

China Cotton.—Yesterday's spot quotations were:—Tungchow, Tls. 43; Ningpo, Tls. 45. On the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange the following quotations were recorded:—September, 42.60; October, 40.35; November, 39.25; December, 38.35; January, 38; February, 37.95.

Yarn.—Yesterday's quotations on the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange were:—September, 163.90; October, 162.70; November, 160.10; December, 158.50; January, 158.10; February 158.

Indian Cotton.—The Bombay market on Thursday closed weak after first having declined on lower New York advices and then advanced on profit-taking, the quotations being:—Fully good broach, April/May, Rs. 466; fully good Bengal, December/January, Rs. 401; fine Oomra, December/January, Rs. 443.

Local Reports.

In their weekly report, issued yesterday, Messrs. A. B. Rosenfeld & Son state:—

China Cotton.—The market during the past week again has been nervous and erratic, but the tendency on the whole has been downward, in sympathy with declines in Mid-Americans, and the net change in prices for the week shows a moderate decline. At the close, however, in sympathy with the unfavourable climatics conditions, a gradual stiffening of some half a tael from the last level had been attained. Regarding the outlook in the broadest way, as already referred to in our previous reports, a conservative policy appears to be desirable for the immediate future. The situation continues to hinge on the progress of the world crops from now on until maturity and also the peace outlook in China.

Yarn.—The yarn market has been keeping steady during the past week, with a slight weakness showing at the close. Prices declined one tael as compared with last week's level. In all, some 1,000 to 1,100 bales of local spinnings have been booked for export to Tientsin, Canton, Szechuan, Swatow, Yunnan and Ningpo.

Messrs. J. Spunt & Co., in weekly report, state:—

China Cotton.—Due to the general depression in the yarn trade, which has become very much accentuated by the internal warfare now in progress in the vicinity of Shanghai, and the apprehension felt that such will develop in a general conflict in China, a major portion of the mills, both foreign and Chinese, have further considerably curtailed their spindleage. Consequently, spinners in general during the past week, have shown but very scanty interest in the local staple either for near or distant deliveries and notwithstanding the heavy declines registered in Mid-Americans and Indians, prices in the local Cotton Exchange indicated on the whole only a very slight recession in the rates, with a tendency at the close toward higher levels, apparently engendered by the likelihood of the torrential rains now being experienced damaging the near harvesting crop to a serious extent. Tone of the market, firm.

DUTCH CANADIAN TRADE AGREEMENT

RUSSIAN OIL FOR GERMANY

Berlin, Sept. 5.

A German consortium has concluded an agreement with the Russo-Naphtha Syndicate for deliveries of petrol and oil-products on the pre-war scale. The agreement involves an annual turnover of £2,500,000.—Reuter.

AUGUST WHOLESALE PRICE INDEX

The Bureau of Markets' index number for Shanghai for August as compiled by the Ministry of Finance, which stands as 148.8, shows a decline of 1.8 per cent. from the previous month and 2.9 per cent. as compared with the corresponding month of last year. This month had the lowest index figure since the spring of last year, due to the war preparations in Kiangsu and Chêkiang and the panic in the money market. Native interest rose to the maximum point and the dollar rate ascended as high as 75. Wholesale business has practically ceased and those who kept spot goods were anxious to dispose them off in view of the financial stringency. Consequently, all these groups, namely, other food products, textiles, metals and miscellaneous goods, had falls, while cereals, on account of the suspension of supply from the producing regions, met violent rises. Only industrial materials in the group of miscellaneous goods showed a slight increase, but this was due to some other reasons.

The monthly figures since August, 1923, are given below:—

MANCHURIA'S CROPS

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Mukden, Aug. 30.

The question of the agricultural crops is a factor of extreme importance to Manchuria in general, and to the S.M.R. in particular. In fact it is upon the volume of produce carried that the traffic returns mostly depend. Although the south has suffered from the effects of drought, in the north there has been the proper amount of rainfall, which, with the succeeding hot weather, has quickened the growth of the crops. At present, the harvests are expected to be above the average. The crop outlook this year, as prepared by the Freight Traffic Department, compared with that for the end of September last year, is as under, the unit being 1,000 tons.

	1924	1924
Beans	2,890	2,380
Kaoliang	3,950	3,040
Maize	1,170	1,150
Millet	2,180	1,620
Barley	170	230
Wheat	600	350
Red Beans	180	130
	11,140	8,900

It will be seen that barley is the only item that shows a decline. These figures, however, taken from the crop status at the end of July, may be liable to variation when the more accurate returns at the end of September are consulted.

5.62 IN. OF RAIN IN 5½ HOURS

Shanghai Visited by Unequalled Rain Storm with Vivid Thunder and Lightning

To add to the thrills of mobilization and "being in a State of Emergency" Shanghai was on Tuesday swept by the worst storm it has experienced for many years.

A sweltering, perspiring morning gave promise of a heat storm, but it did not quite presage the terrific thunder and sheets of rain that were to follow. Shortly after people had resumed office labour in the afternoon the heat became more oppressive. At three the sky darkened in the southwest and the rain, at first unaccompanied by thunder, commenced.

It began and it continued for three hours—a hissing, whirling downpour, and before 6 o'clock 3.90 inches of rain had fallen. In half-an-hour it had submerged all the thoroughfares behind the Bund with the exception of Nanking Road to a depth of six inches. The usual commotion started. More people appeared to have business out of doors, and there was in addition to the normal heavy motor traffic, the hurrying to and fro of cars carrying Volunteers and other Service people. Traffic became seriously disorganized.

At five when those in the central district were hoping to start the journey home, the storm was just as intense, and there was more confusion and flooded streets. Many owners of cars and people who use ricshas and the humble tramcars discovered that they could not get home. The former were constantly having carburettor trouble. Motor-car engines refused to budge as soon as the driver went too fast knowing his axles to be under water, for by this time every thoroughfare was flooded to depths varying from one foot or more to six inches. In parts of Hongkew—in the Woosung Road area for example—only ricsha traffic was possible, there being more than two feet of water on the roads. On the Recreation Ground the ponies were standing in water up to their girths.

Terrific Thunder and Lighting.

It was useless to call for ricshas. All that were in evidence at five o'clock had been pressed into service by those who left office early. Then the thunder really began. In the grey, early dusk came flash after flash of dazzling purple, followed instantaneously by such pealls of thunder as had not been heard in the Settlement for several years.

Damp, despondent crowds stood in the doorways of the big buildings along the Bund, watching the lightning and waiting for an empty ricsha or a friend's car. After an hour's wait, at 6 o'clock the wind which had reached its greatest intensity at about 5.30 dropped, and the rain settled down to a drizzle. People at last began to move, but not till 7 o'clock did the exodus of business people finish.

Many bluejackets and Volunteers were seen to be barefooted, carrying their boots. The rain could not have fallen on a day more calculcated to inconvenience the foreign population of the Settlement, for many of the mobilized Volunteers were on duty out doors, while the Field Artillery Battery had the misfortune to be under canvas through it all.

From 7 till 9 p.m. the rain came down again furiously and another 1.72 inches were recorded making altogether 5.62 inches of rain in about five and a half hours.

MANY failings and misdemeanours have been attributed to the press in the past, but we really must contradict an impression which would appear to exist in the minds of some Chinese. An office boy, employed by one of the big local firms, on Saturday morning went to the head of his department, very perturbed by the problem as to where he was going to sleep that night. On being asked the reason for his anxiety, the boy stated that he lived in Chapei, and dare not go home as he was afraid of "the news-gang." Thus does the English language contribute to martyrdom.

A VOLUNTEER FIRE BRIGADE AGAIN

Enthusiastic Response to an Appeal to Assist the French Concession Firemen

The result of several weeks' hard work by Mr. G.E.O. Mayne, one of the most popular and energetic members of the old volunteer Fire Brigade, was the formation on Monday evening of a foreign volunteer unit to give assistance to the Fire Brigade of the French Concession. When the suggestion first was put forward, Mr. Mayne, without a great deal of pressing, undertook to canvass amongst members of the old companies in the International Settlement and find out what measure of support could be expected. The result was most encouraging, for he secured over 30 definite promises of enlistment, practically all from men who could be considered as very active members, and all with a great deal of past experience at the work.

A meeting of prosective members of the unit was held at the Cercle Sportif Francais on Monday evening, when most of those who already had promised their support put in an appearance and there were also present a number of younger members of the old vounteer brigade, all anxious to get back to fire-fighting again.

Mr. Mayne having given a resumè of his work, Capt. M. Chapeaux, commanding the French Fire Brigade, said he had been told that the old spirit of the volunteer firemen was dead, but the attendance that evening of so many former firemen was proof that it was not. The French brigade consisted of active and reserve units, there being in the former 18 foreigners and 110 Chinese and in the latter 15 foreigners, the force being divided between four stations. The reserve could be relied upon in times of trouble such as the present, but not as a whole in a general way, and he could not be sure of a turnout on ordinary occasions of more than 10 or 12 of the active men on an average. It was apparent therefore that the brigade could do with some additional help. As people of other nationalities living in the French Concession very considerably outnumbered the French, it seemed quite reasonable that the French should ask for some outside help and he was sure that such an appeal would be met in the true sporting spirit. Indeed, there was proof of that at the meeting.

Conditions of Service.

Capt. Chapeaux then mentioned some of the difficultties experienced by the brigade as at present constituted and which would be considerably lessened if they had the assistance of a volunteer unit. They were expecting some new gear shortly and the French Municipal Council also had on order some underground telephone material, which would be used particularly for the police and firemen. The Council had decided that only residents in the French Concession could be members of the volunteer unit. The reserve would be attached to Le Torrent and would be under its own elected officers, but responsible to him as chief of the brigade.

Answering questions, Capt. Chapeaux said that at present the French Municipal Council were not disposed to admit to the reserve any non-residents of the Concession, but if it was desired he would again put it before the Council, in view of the fact that the Council of the International Settlement did not seem to want volunteers and so many keen ex-firemen were living in the latter area.

Veterans Take the Lead.

Capt. Chapeaux then left those present to discuss the matter amongst themselves, under the chairmanship of Mr. G.S.V. Bidwell, and without any question they decided to accept the French Municipal Council's terms as a general proposition. Half those present residing in the Concession and half in the Settlement, it was agreed to ask the Council to reconsider the condition as to the residence qualification. Various minor details were debated with a view to assisting in drafting the rules when the unit is formed and the following were appointed a committee to put the scheme into working order:—

Mr. G.S.V. Bidwell (formerly chief of the vounteer brigade and ex-foreman of the Mih-ho-loongs); Mr. H.W.P. McMeekin, Mr. L.M.ff. Beytagh, Mr. J. Kearton, Mr. G.E.O. Mayne (all ex-foremen of the Min-ho-loongs); Mr. A.W. Macphail (ex-foreman of the Deluge); and Mr. A. G. Mossop (ex-foreman of the Victoria).

All those present undertook to do their utmost to recruit the new unit up to the full strength allowed by the French Municipal Council, introducing only such men as could be guaranteed to work well over whatever might be considered the official effiiciency standard.

THE NEW JEWISH CLUB

Ambitious Plans for the Future: Tls. 15,000 Required

At an extraodinary general meeting of the Jewish Club "Ahduth" held recently it was decided that the premises of the Club now in use are getting inadequate for its increasing membership and for the many demands made upon the Club rooms, and, therefore, new and larger premises should be obtained. The Committee in charge have taken advantage of the proposed change to secure not only much larger and attractive quarters, but quarters more centrally located, and the new Club bids well to be one of the handiest and coziest in Shanghai.

In addition to spacious lobbies, lounge and reception rooms, the club is making provision for a dance and concert hall, with a stage for theatrical performances, buffet, two dining rooms with private rooms for parties, library, reading room, banquet and lecture hall, card and mahjongg rooms and conference hall for meetings. On their roomy attic-floor will be space for the proposed gymnasium, with showers, bath rooms, etc., as well as five living rooms.

Altogether no pains are being spared to make the new Club fully equipped in very respect, as a fitting centre for all Jewish activities. Charitable and cultural organizations will be given the opportunity of using the Club as their headquarters for the carrying out of business, etc., The club membership itself will be divided up into various "circles" for the purpose of developing the artistic, social and educational side of life, each in charge of a committee that will conduct all activities and arrange interesting programmes all through the year.

The Club's tennis courts will be kept up as before, and the fine ballroom that is to be put in will leave little to be desired in that direction.

To finance the above project it is proposed to raise the sum of Tls. 15,000, to be added to the funds now in the hands of the Club. This sum will be raised by means of debentures, of Tls. 50.00 each, bearing interest at 6 per cent. per annum. These bonds are redeemable within five years, commencing from January 1926, twice yearly. The regular income of the Club affords full provision for the semi-annual payment of the debentures. By reason of the demand that has existed for so many years for a well-equipped and conveniently located centre for Jewish activities, it is believed that the full amount will be raised. in a short while. Many new members are expected to come in as a result of the expansion. It may be mentioned that about 20 per cent of its membership is non-Jewish, in the form of associate members. With the central location that the new premises will enjoy and its increased conveniences and advantages, it is reasonable to expect that the list of associates will be very much increased.

WE are given some further "Memories of M'Quigg" in the August "Blackwood" by Mr. J. O. P. Bland, wherein he tells us of Little Ministers and Dai Nippon. The ways of Staff officers and how they amass information round and about the world are recorded in the writer's own special style. Another article of interest to Eastern readers is the continuation of "Youth and the East."

AT A CONSULATE KEYHOLE

How the Real War News gets into Circulation

The following is a translation from Wednesday "Mingkuopao":—

"The local Consular Body held an urgent meeting at 2 p.m. yesterday at the United States Consulate. There were present 17 persons. Mr. Cunningham, who presided, stated that the fighting between Chêkiang and Kiangsu had become very serious and was now in progress in the neighbourhood of Liuho. The man-of-war Ying Zen, belonging to the Fukien fleet, last night shelled Liuho, the Woosung Forts returning the fire. This shows that the navy also has joined in the fighting. As Liuho is not far away from Woosung, foreign residents and their property were endangered. He then asked those present to express their views. Opinions were expressed by the British and French Consuls and the following resolutions were passed:—

"That no fighting be allowed to take place within 30 li of the Settlements.

"That Shanghai be observed as a neutral district in order to avert trouble in Nantao which would affect the Settlements.

"That land fighting units number-5,000, from the various Powers, be detailed to various important localities for the purpose of maintaining peace.

"That the S.V.C. be called out to assist the Settlement authorities in the maintainance of peace.

"That sand and stones be stored on the boundaries of the Settlements and that police and detectives be detailed for patrol duties on the boundaries.

"That strict measures be adopted by the Settlement police against the activities of robbers, thus enabling merchants to carry on their business in peace. (Apropos of the foregoing it would be interesting to know what the "Minkuopao" thinks the police do ordinarily.)

"That the foreign men-o'war in the the Huangpu be instructed to be on the alert every night. (Again it would be interesting to know what the "Mingkuopao" thinks the foreign men-of-war do every night.)

"We learn that another meeting of the local Consular Body will be held to-morrow."

CHEAP SALE OF RICE

Chinese Guilds Helping to Check Profiteering

The Cantonese Merchants Association has opened a rice depot at 129 Range Road for the sale of rice at cost. Similar measures are being taken by other Chinese guilds with a view toward avoiding any rice disturbances should the staple become scarce and prohibitively costly because of profiteering. Although the cost of rice has not yet risen to a point at which disturbances are likely, the local Chinese organizations are taking these measures in the hope that their precautions will discourage speculators from attempting to take advantage of the present situation.

OBITUARY

The Late Dr. A. P. Parker

News has been received in Shanghai that Dr. A. P. Parker, D.D., the senior member of the Methodist Episcopal Church (South) in Shanghai, passed away in Oakland, California, on Wednesday whilst on leave. The late Dr. Parker was very well known to Americans in Shanghai and China generally, and his loss will be deeply regretted. He came out to China in 1875 as a missionary, and was here for 15 years before he took home leave. Dr. Parker last went home to America in July of this year, and fully expected to return. He was for 20 years president of the Bussington institute and College at Soochow, first coming to Shanghai in 1895, where he took over the Anglo-Chinese College. Much of his work during his missionary life was educational and translation work.

POOTUNG DYNAMITE TO BE REMOVED

Reassurance As to Security of Property on Other Bank of Huangpu

Shanghai, Sept. 11.

Reuter understands that the most satisfactory assurances have been given by Admiral Anderson regarding the protection of Pootung. Several warcraft are now anchored close in on the Pootung side, and at a moment's notice men could be landed for the defence of the place—if that ever should become necessary.

The authorities have also made arrangements whereby the dynamite dump will be removed, or all but removed, to-morrow. The dump consists of 50 tons of dynamite over 45 tons of which are the property of the Kailan Mining Administration. These 45 tons are being removed to the Kailan mines to-morrow.

The foregoing measures, it is felt, should finally calm all fears regarding Pootung. It is hoped that they will remove any justification that seemed to exist for an abnormally high war risk for Pootung.—Reuter.

FRIENDS of Miss Lucille Douglass, formerly of Shanghai, have received word from England that she has travelled through India, Egypt, Palestine, and Southern France, and visited Paris, which she left by plane to England. In London she was entertained by Mrs. Ronald Macleod, "with much talk of Shanghai." Miss Douglass will visit Quebec and spend a week-end with Mrs. Francis Ayscough at St. Andrews before going on to New York and Louisville.

CHINA'S SOVEREIGN RIGHTS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—It seems to me that this is psychologically, chronologically, and geographically the proper and fitting occasion to bring up the question of Extraterritoriality. It is a question of great importance—one which has been before the public for many years and which ought to be settled Now. Questions of this kind should not be put off indefinitely, and as we are in a Republic where the democratic spirit runs high, it seems to me that we should have a plebiscite vote including coolies, servants, high class, low class, all Chinese who have suffered the oppressions of Extraterritoriality, and refugees. Those wearing uniforms might be excluded from voting.

I trust that this meets with your approval.

Anxiously awaiting your reply.

Shanghai, Sept. 5, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Now that there are so many influential Chinese enjoying the hospitality of the foreign settlements, it occurs to me that the present would be in every way an unusually suitable time for you to open your columns to a fresh discussion of

The abolition of extrality,
The rendition of the Mixed Court, and
The reabsorption of the Foreign Settlements in China.

Do you not think that, at a time like this, there might appear in the discussion a sincerity and a reality distressingly absent from most previous expressions of Chinese opinion on these subjects?

I am, etc.,
PASSANT REGARANT.

Shanghai, Sept. 7, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—I appeal to the gentlemanly feelings and human instincts of the foreign community in Shanghai whether this is the time to gibe at us for taking advantage of the very privileges the existence of which have seemed to be such a constant cause of irritation to us. Some of you have probably lived through a much harder time than what we are passing through, and you at least will understand how we must feel about it when we see letters as those appearing in to-day's issue of this paper under the above heading.

FOREIGN SETTLEMENTS AND THE WAR.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In your paper dated to-day I have noted several persons referring to the present time as being opportune to settle the question of the abolition of extraterritoriality in China, obviously with the hope that the fact that large numbers of Chinese people have come to the International and French Settlements to seek safety, would demonstrate that the extraterritorial institution granted to foreigners is highly desirable even from the point of view of some Chinese who do not seem to mind living under foreign protection.

This suggestion is both misleading and puerile. The present war situation has little or nothing to do with the question of extraterritoriality which will have to be settled on its own merits. The fact that some Chinese, may be one hundred thousandth of the nation, have come to Shanghai to seek safety at present, no more proves the utility or justification of extraterritoriality than the eventuality of China being engaged in a war with foreign nations when the Chinese, living in Settlements, would flee to the interior for safety would prove its futility and harm to China.

Further, there is something morally wrong in taking advantage of people who are in distress. Here is a man who is in trouble and he goes to one of his friends for hospitality and help. The latter, knowing his difficulties, takes advantage of the situation and plans to get control of his household and property or to infringe his personal rights. Such a friend is a treacherous and knavish friend upon whom men of honour look with contempt.

During the Great War thousands of Belgians and other refugees sought safety in Great Britain, Holland and other countries, but this situation did not entitle these latter countries to establish concessions or the practice of extraterritorial rights in Belgium. Why should foreigners in China expect to do here what they would not do in Belgium or other European countries?

There has been of late too much talk among foreigners of the supposed anti-foreign feeling in China which did no one good. It is now time to show sincerity and good will. As a friend, I would suggest to these foreign guests that they stop all anti-Chinese propaganda in China or abroad and work for the common good of all.

Thanking you for your space.

I am, etc.,
A CHINESE who LIVES OUTSIDE the SETTLEMENTS.

Shanghai, Sept. 8, 1924.

FOREIGNERS AND THE WAR

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—It is reported that there were several automobile loads of foreign sightseers at the Kiangsu-Chêkiang battle at Liuho on Sunday. Their adventures are being discussed with more or less garnish and it is fortunate that they have returned to the Settlement unscathed. The Chinese Government would have undoubtedly found itself involved in further international complications had a bullet struck one of the foreign sightseers, who would actually only have himself to blame.

From all reports, the Chinese troops of both sides have treated foreigners who ventured within their lines, not only with respect, but with the greatest courtesy, in spite of the fact that their presence meant serious encroachment upon the time of the Chinese officers.

I consider it the limit, however, for a certain foreigner, said to have served in France, taking charge of one of the Chêkiang machine-guns and emptying a belt of cartridges into the Kiangsu line. While the foreigner was at the gun, the Chêkiang gunner, standing at his side, was shot down. This action on the part of the foreigner cannot be called courageous, but is a piece of despicable savagery, a mere thirst for blood—as he was not concerned in the war in any shape or form. It is a breach of international law for a foreigner to concern himself in an internecine war such as is at present being waged, and also a violation of the criminal codes of all nations to have committed such an act, which is murder (or attempted murder) in the first degree.

It is a Chinese war: let them fight it out among themselves.

I am, etc.,
WM. YINSON LEE.

Shanghai, Sept. 8, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—Condemnatory as every sane individual must be of joy-rides into the fighting area engineered by garage proprietors, one must sympathize with Mr. Yinson Lee in his attitude towards such people. But his definite statement that a foreigner versed in the arts of war, while on a joy-ride of this description, deliberately sat down to a machine-gun and emptied a belt of ammunition into the Kiangsu troops while the Chêkiang gunner was shot down beside him demands substantiation.

Mr. Lee presumably writes from within the foreign settlement and he should therefore be called upon by the Authorities, Consular (Court of Consuls) or Municipal, for proof of his statement. In the event that he is able to substantiate it, the foreigner concerned should be drastically dealt with.

S.V.C. EMERGENCY UNIT.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—An appreciable number of ex-service men, resident in Shanghai and not being members of the S.V.C., for various reasons do not wish to join up for the requisite period demanded by the Crops Regulations. Repeated inquiries have been made during the past few days as to the possibility of enrollment for the duration of the present hostilities, but apparently this matter has not yet received consideration.

Is it not possible to merge these men into different units, or, failing this, have a special Emergency Unit, which will assist in the protection of the Settlement in the same way that the Regulars and Volunteers are now doing? It will take time to fit out uniforms, but all that would be necessary at the outset would be rifles, ammunition, and a distinguishing badge such as an armlet so that they could be recognized as combatants.

The Emergency Unit scheme has the disadvantage in that an experienced gunner might find himself carrying ammunition on in an Infantry Unit, when his services could be much more valuable elsewhere.

Enclosing my card,

SHANGHAI AND THE WAR CLOUD

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—It was not until yesterday that I came to read in the "North China Herald" your leading article on "Shanghai and the War Cloud," reproduced from the "Daily News" of September 1. In this article you referred at some length to the Sino-foreign gathering at the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce on Thursday, August 28, and your remarks contained certain inaccuracies which I deem it is my imperative duty to point out as I was one of the participants at the meeting and served both sides in an interpretorial capacity.

You said that:—

"Another foreign speaker said that before he and his colleagues even considered taking steps to meet the Chinese proposals, they must have a guarantee that representative Chinese business men were wholeheartedly in the movement, would act with the foreigners in full accord and full publicity, not only secretly but on the housetops, not in Council chambers alone, but in the market place. This, to use another phrase which will not be denied, (The italics are the writer's.) 'put the lid on things.' The Chinese whispered together and then said they would refer the matter to their principals. . . ."

The bare facts of the case were:—

(1) The speaker in question asked Mr. Sung Han-chang, Chairman of the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce, whether in the event of the foreign Chambers of Commerce acting upon the suggestion of a joint delegation, composed of Chinese and foreigners, calling personally on the military leaders of Kiangsu and Chekiang, the foreign Chambers could be assured that there would be no outburst of anti-foreign feeling among the Chinese community. Mr. Sung answered emphatically that so far so Chinese business men were concerned, no opposition against such delegation could possibly arise but that being no politician himself, he could not say in advance what the politicians themselves might say on the subject. Not a single foreign speaker present on this occasion asked for or even suggested "a guarantee that representative Chinese business men were wholeheartedly in the movement."

(2) The words (that Chinese business men) "would act with the foreigners in full accord and full publicity, not only secretly but on the housetops. . . ." were words never heard at the gathering. If any speaker did utter anything of the kind, he must have spoken in a manner audible to himself.

(3) The Chinese neither whispered together nor did they say that they would refer the matter to their principals. On the contrary, it was the foreign speakers themselves, who said that they were unable to decide on the spot whether they would be able to accept the proposal of joining the Sino-foreign delegation, but that they would bring this matter up at their committee meetings, after which the Chinese Chamber would be officially notified of the attitude which the foreign Chambers would assume in this matter.

In the course of your article you said that you did not wish "to be rude to the Chinese business community," but in attributing to the Chinese speakers statements which they neither made nor contemplated to make, you appeared to have done the very thing you were anxious not to do. In your opinion the meeting, apart from its social aspects, "dispersed unfruitfully." The facts would warrant a different conclusion. The meeting was called for a very definite purpose. The Chinese business men were very eager to see both Kiangsu and Chêkiang declared a neutral zone, and in order to better drive home to the military authorities of both provinces the wisdom of such a measure in the interest of both Chinese and foreign trade, they conceived the idea of this Sino-foreign mediative delegation of business men. It was pointed out at the ouset of the meeting that the Chinese merchants sought the co-operation of the foreign merchants instead of consulting directly or indirectly the Consular Body because the Chinese themselves firmly believed that any form of international intervention would lead to the most disastrous consequences. The object of the meeting was, therefore, to sound the foreign Chamber of Commerce as to whether they were in a position of offering the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce the one form of cooperation that was sought from them—their moral support and nothing else without going through diplomatic channels.

I am, etc.,
FRANCIS ZIA.

Shanghai, Sept. 8, 1924.

*We never pretended, nor did we expect readers would read the article in this sense to use the actual words spoken at the meeting. But as regards its general purport and upshot we think that our informants' recollection of what happened is not less likely to be correct than Mr. Zia's.

CHINESE PATRIOTS.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—It is amazing how many Chinese patriots come forth with the hottest words of patriotism when they can find any possible excuse to go for the foreigner. When there are no facts to go on they invent the most atrocious lies or utterly distort facts.

Where are all these ardent patriots now? Chinese soldiers are desecrating Chinese soil; they are levying money from the populace in vast quantities: they are forcibly abducting thousands of the innocent people and causing the death of any amount of them: and generally are ruining the country as much or more than the very worst bandits: and withal they have no principle at stake or any just cause for their depredations. Now then all you hot-blooded patriots is your chance. Get out into the open and show what you are made of or henceforth hold your peace.

In a single word these same persons are not patriots at all but think they can get something by abusing the foreigners.

Let them consider the foreigners are doing more for China than the Chinese themselves.

I am, etc.,
"A."

Shanghai, Sept. 7, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I am at one with your correspondent "A" on this subject. But it is not long ago when the European soldiers desecrated the soil not only of Europe but also of other continents; levied money from the populace not only of England but of all the world over and in vaster quantities; forcibly abducted not thousands but millions of the innocent people and caused the death of any number of them; and generally ruined not their own countries alone but the whole world as much as, or more than, the very worst bandits—and for what purpose? The answer lies in the present conditions of Europe.

We must thank the foreigners for "doing more (presumably, good and not evil) for China than the Chinese themselves." In return for such kindness, we have to advise the foreigners that they ought to do more for Europe than for China and they had therefore better pack their belongings and go home like good patriots. Let them remember that charity starts at home.

WESTERN POWERS AND CHINA

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—The information under the heading, "Movement for Foreign Intervention and Insurance of (stored) Property, Notably in Shanghai," as given by the diplomatic correspondent of the "Daily Telegraph" appearing in to-day's "North China Daily News" has been of great interest to probably the majority of your readers. It inspires a ray of hope in our present dark situation to learn that at long last "the Home people" are beginning (even if in their own interests) to realize what their Nationals have been—and are—enduring through the "Lords of Misrule" and their factions in China.

Now, Sir, that we seem to have for the moment "caught the speaker's eye," what are we going to do? Are we to keep still and hope that something may be done for us to save us from the commercial ruin inevitable if present conditions are allowed to continue, or are we to do all in our power to insist upon permanent and binding guarantees that peaceable merchants and others be allowed to carry on their callings without hindrance from the intrigues of rival factions and other unnecessary obstacles, and with safety to their families and property in China.

Your journal, Sir, is our leading public print, and we look to you to bring all the power of the Press to bear on the formation of a movement in support of a general public endorsement by our local business world, foreign and leading Chinese, of this "Movement for Foreign Intervention in China." Send notice of said endorsement by cable, through the proper channels to our respective Home Governments, mentioning also, to show we are in earnest, that indemnities will be claimed from China for all business and other losses sustained by peaceful Foreigners through this internecine War.

THE WAR AND LIFE ASSURANCE

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Certain of the life assurance policies issued by companies operating in Shanghai bear a clause to the effect that "in the event of the assured engaging in war-like operations, the amount payable under the policy shall be limited in the event of claim to the aggregate of the premiums paid."

In the case of many members of the Volunteer Corps their life assurance must represent the substantial part of whatever estate they would leave to dependents in the event of death, and it seems to me (without any desire to create a panic) that it would be advisable for all such members to make enquiries of the insurance company before being mobilised, as to the position in respect of their particular policies. There is also the question as to what the Municipal Councils would or could do in the event of serious trouble, to provide compensation for any unfortunate members of the Corps.

I am, etc.,
JOHN ENGLAND.

Shanghai, Sept. 6, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—As a recent sufferer from the rigid adherence of insurance companies to the written word and their utter absence of regard for their true function—which I take to be the accumulation of funds in order to insure individual policy holders against loss and not merely to benefit their shareholders, I would like to sound a warning to those who, like myself, thought themselves securely covered against looting, etc., in the present struggle between Kiangsu and Chêkiang.

Besides the usual fire policy I hold a Householder's Complete Protection Policy covering loss from housebreaking, theft, typhoon, flood, burst water pipes and civil commotion and I was congratulating myself that now at least I was completely covered. This morning, however, my dream was rudely shattered. I was reliably informed that the struggle was not a "civil commotion" but a "war," which is excluded from the benefits of the policy, and so the Company could not be held liable for any loss resulting from it. The insurance companies take their stand on the following definition of Civil Commotion given by Lord Manfield.

"An insurrection of the people for general purpose of mischief not amounting to rebellion since no power is usurped."

This struggle is not an insurrection of the people but of two military commander who do usurp power—hence it is a "war."

Incidentally I might mention that I am informed that the Company with whom I am "insured" (save the mark) will not cover "war risk," so there you are.

So, Sir, let me again utter a warning against putting your trust in insurance, for assuredly, should there be a loophole anywhere, the Companies will avail themselves of it.

I am, etc.,

ONCE BITTEN.

Shanghai, Sept. 8, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In reply to your correspondent's inquiry as to the position of life insurance policy holders in the event of death occuring in the defense of the Settlement, I would say that those who hold policies in the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company are fully protected, and claims will be paid in full in the events of death.

I am, etc.,

A. G. HEARNE.
District Manager of the Manufacturing Life Ins. Co.

Shanghai, Sept. 9, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Apparently "Once Bitten" is one of those individuals who are never satisfied with getting exactly what they pay for, and considers that he is entitled to ask his insurance company to idemnify him for any and every sort of loss, irrespective of whether it is one which comes within the scope of his policy-contract or not. We have recently had an example of this, following the Japan earthquake, when the opinion was freely expressed in the press by numerous amateurs writing on insurance matters that Companies were under " a moral obligation" to pay for earthquake-fire damage, even though same was specifically excluded from the policies.

The "N.-C.D.N." recently reprinted an article which appeared in the London "Times" showing, inter alia, the percentage of underwriting profit earned by the leading British Offices, and whilst half a dozen or so were fortunate enough to get round about eight per cent., the remainder had to be satisfied with considerably less: further, some recently published figures dealing with a well managed local insurance company show that, for three consecutive years, underwriting was done at a loss.

These points are mentioned to show that premiums are already calculated to a fairly fine point in respect of the particular risks which are insured against, and it is impossible for Companies to be continuously going outside their contractual liabilities without seriously prejudicing their own financial security—which is, of course, the security of every policy holder. Policy conditions are practically standardized, and it is because the limits of their liability are clearly defined, that Companies are able to transact their business in a satisfactory manner.

No ordinary "fire" or "householder's" insurance includes war risks, and I have no doubt that "Once Bitten" would be amongst the first to kick, if, in times of peace and quietness, his premiums were increased to cover non-existent war risks. After all, it is only out of accumulated funds that losses are paid, and for every additional risk insured, a corresponding extra premium must be charged.

It would be interesting to know whether "Once Bitten" has actually already sustained a "war risk" loss (by looting or otherwise) which his Company has refused to pay, or whether he is a "recent sufferer" in anticipation? It may be inferred that he holds no insurance shares, and it is certain that his concluding remarks about loopholes are not in accordance with actual facts.

I am, etc.,

JOHN ENGLAND.

Shanghai, Sept. 10, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—It was very amusing to read the letter of "Once Bitten" under this heading which appeared in your columns on the 10th instant. "Once Bitten" simply informs everyone of his own ignorance.

I am a Shanghai merchant who have always had need of large insurance covers in many parts of the world insuring stocks in godowns and machinery in factories against fire, and practically all my insurances have been with the largest British companies. I have also had many marine policies and a few motor-car policies and whenever a loss has occurred I have always received most liberal treatment. Being a business man and thus reading my contracts of insurance I know that all companies have essential conditions in their policies, otherwise it would be impossible to carry on the business. For instance my fire policies and everyone else's exclude earthquake, war, and a few others. If my property insured by these policies is burnt as a result of earthquake, there is no liability under the policy and I should expect nothing—why should I expect compensation for which I have not paid a premium?

Going back to the householder's policy which "Once Bitten" thought covered him against everything, I also have one of those policies, and mine like his insures against riot and civil commotion, but in the conditions of the policies it clearly states that war is excluded. I am quite satisfied that if any damage occurs to my property resulting from riot and civil commotion, I shall be fully recompensed by my insurance company but on the other hand if damage results from war, say by a shell bursting, then I am not covered and I expect no recompense. It is a pity that "Once Bitten" is so lacking in intellect that he does not know the difference between civil commotion and war. The fight between Chêkiang and Kiangsu armed forces is war.

I apologize for taking so much space, Sir, but as one who has always had every consideration from insurance companies I felt I must reply to the letter of "Once Bitten."

WHAT IS MARTIAL LAW?

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—At the present time the Chapei district is supposed to be under strict martial law. Even people residing in this district are not allowed to proceed to their respective homes after 10 p.m. And yet on top of this there is a bar room called the Golden Star Buffet at No. 1434 North Szechuen Road, corner of Boundary Lane, full of bluejackets drinking and shouting till the small hours in the morning and on top of this even a Chinese policeman on duty outside of this above mentioned house. It would be interesting to know if this bar room, which is in the Chapei district, is under martial law or not.

A DANGER TO THE PORT

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—In the war news to-day there appears an article stating that a railway bridge has been blown up by dynamite.

To do this necessitates obtaining dynamite from somewhere and where would the rival factors turn their attentation to if not to the Dynamite Magazine which has been brought so forcibly into prominence by the local press? It stands to reason that, should it become necessary, one side or the other will try to gain possession of the contents of the Magazines and what is going to happen when a horde of coolies who are most likely to have been ignorant farmers impressed by the military, attempt to handle the dynamite, urged on by soldiers with loaded rifles. Do not the shipping companies realize that the distance from the Magazine to the centre of the channel is under 500 yards and that should an explosion take place the whole of the river bed would be completely changed, causing the whole of the shipping to be held up for an indefinite period? This would be the financial ruin for this Port for many a long day to come and it behoves the officials to take the necesssary precautions to safeguard the Magazines against any attempt to interfere with the contents.

I am, etc.,

QUEEN VICTORIA AND SOME OTHERS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I regret that Mr. Gargi Devi still insists upon "censuring" me and I still claim that "hiding under a pseudonym" he has no such right.

I'm afraid Mr. Gargi Devi has very little experience of English politics. A few days at the "hustings" even in Gladstone's day and later would have shocked him terribly I fear. Rival condidates calling each other by terrible names, accusing the opposing party of robbery, theft, political and even human murder—to wit Irish sympathizers in Liverpool during the 80-90's—and other crimes too numerous to mention. My designation of the British Government of to-day as being a Kuli or (coolie) Government is I maintain quite correct. To call it a "Labour" Government is wrong because although many of its members have been "labourers"—that is, please, as understood generally in Great Britain, manual labourers—a great number of those in the Government, War Office, Excise, Law, etc., permanent Government officials, etc., are certainly not manual labourers—they do not pull ricshas or carry bamboo poles, they do not plough, sow and reap in the fields—but they do work for hire and I maintain that even as myself they are Kuli's or (coolies).

This is the distinction, Mr. Gargi Devi. The Government of England from Elizabeth down to Victorian days was (except for permanent officials) voluntary. It is only quite recently that our legislators who control the Government, who vote for or withhold financial supplies have been paid or Kuli workers. In the old days there were many poor men in Parliament and in the Cabinet (Government) but their services to the country were voluntary and not "paid." These I maintain were better men than any "hired" parliamentarian such as to-day are to be found in the House of Commons.

I'm sorry, Mr. Gargi Devi, that you think I'm a liar. You see I was not writing with a view to "The East." I was thinking of the British Parliament and of the "payment of members" which I have always held was derogatory to that old institution. As for my personal classification in the Hong List I should not care in the least what it might be so long as it was correct and not equivalent to your implication, say:—liar or rogue.

I should certainly not be so foolish as to use bad language or to sue for libel. The first would be waste of breath and vulgar, the second would be stupid!

How was it, Mr. Gargi Devi, that the men of the Chinese Labour Corps did not object to be listed on the pay sheets and entered on their registration books as "coolies?" We had carpenters, excellent workmen; blacksmiths, splendid experts; plumbers, builders—oh! too many to mention, but classed as "coolies" or "Kulis" (I frequently wrote in official despatches the latter!)

Are you not possibly "championing" the Chinese—"working man" (term used for safety) without his consent or mandate? (Term used in international dealings with very wide margin of interpretation).

Cheerio! Mr. Gargi Devi. It has been pleasant to cross pens with you, but really I fear that the Editorial (not Parliamentary) closure is imminent.

There is only one thing I do wish and that is that you would disclose your identity even if only privately "per Editor" because I like you and your screeding. Absolutely no animus on my part! So shaking you a friendly Bon Jour M'sieur!

I am, etc.,

A. L. HALL.

Shanghai, Sept. 4, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—I expected a hot onslaught from Mr. Hall but was most pleasantly surprised on reading his courteous reply in to-day's issue. You are right Mr. Hall, I know little of politics. The subject is distasteful to me through I try to keep my information up-to-date. It is a far cry between the politician and the statesman and I prefer the latter. We have too many politicians and diplomatic tricksters but too few statesmen—men who serve their country without selfishness and with true loyalty. The tactics of politicians do shock me no doubt and I am apt to rush up in arms against anything that deviates from the "straight path."

I quite agree with you, Mr. Hall, that the voluntary government worker is far superior to the paid one, for a man must truly love his country to give his services without caring for reward.

Mr. Hall, I realize that you used the word "coolie" with its proper meaning, once you so open-mindedly admit that you would not mind being called one yourself. I certainly do not think you a liar, far less a rogue, for by the general tone of your letters one can see you are a gentleman. I thought you had intended the term to be taken as an insult. I find I am wrong, but still maintain that terms liable to be misunderstood should not be used. As to my identity, the name "Gargi Devi" need not be taken as anonymous. It was given to me and I consider it as one of my real names. Many of my friends know it and some call me by it. If you dropped the "Mr." you would come nearer the mark, more I do not wish to make public. It has been pleasant to meet with chivalry from an opponent and I sincerely appreciate it.

POSTS TO NANKING

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—As one interested in the well being of many friends in Nanking, may I inquire through the medium of your columns if there is any explanation as to why letters posted in Shanghai to that port on the morning of the 4th instant had not reached there on the 7th instant, as letters posted in Nanking on the morning of the 7th instant were received in Shanghai on the 8th?

If postal arrangements in a river port ensure prompt despatch and delivery of letters to Shanghai, how does it come about that the letters from Shanghai take so much longer in reaching the same outport? The river steamers are running regularly, and are proving far more satisfactory in the carrying of mails than the Sunkiang and waterways of China medium from this end mentioned in your paper a few days preciously. Nanking is under martial law and all foreign residents are called on strictly to abide by the military regulations in force there and they are anxious for news from Shanghai friends as we are from there.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Further to my letter appearing in your issue of to-day, I received a letter yesterday evening at 8 o'clock from Nanking (posted there on the 9th a.m.) in which it was stated that my letters of the 4th, 5th and 6th were delivered at their address at 4 p.m. on the 8th instant.

As I am a guest at one of the hotels in the Bubbling Well Road district, perhaps the sub-post office near Yu Yuen Road corner may be responsible for the cause of my inquiry as it certainly seems strange that letters posted by me on three different dates should be delivered to the addressee in Nanking on the same day. So much about the letters: the newspapers I sent on the same dates have not, however, been delivered yet. I suppose that they will eventually be delivered! Perhaps, perhaps not!

Thanking you for your courtesy in publishing this and my previous letter.

KAISAR-I-HIND

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Can you or any of your readers enlighten me as to the origin—not the meaning—of the phrase Kaisar-I-Hind? Shanghai, Sept. 4, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In response to "Inquirer's" request for information about the origin of the title Kaiser-i-Hind, I would refer him to H. G. Wells' "Outline of History" page 382, where it is stated that the Turkoman chieftain, Baber, a descendant of Genghis Khan, made himself master of Cabul early in the 16th. century, and in 1525 gained victories in India and assumed the title of Emperor of Hindustan. More about this chieftain can be seen in the Encyclopaedia Britannica. His descendants, and especially the famous Akbar, made the Mogul (Mongol) dynasty famous, and much of their work of consolidation and organization remained to be taken over by the British who became the successors of the Moguls, and the British monarch now uses the title Kaiser-i-Hind which the Mogul emperors originated.

INCOME TAX

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Are you, or is any one of your readers, in a position to throw light on the above subject as it affects those who go home from Shanghai to retire?

Take an imaginary case. In 1924 the one who proposes to retire is in receipt of £1000 "earned" income and £200 "unearned": in 1925 he will be in receipt of £900 "earned" income and £350 "unearned": in 1926 he will be in receipt of no "earned" income and £600 "unearned." On what basis will income tax for 1926 be reckoned supposing the man takes up his permanent residence in England as from December 1, 1925?

TRAINING FIELD DOGS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I have the advantage of being "town bred." This, however, has made me more able to handle a tea cup than a 12 bore gun and I am more accustomed to taking my exercise on the rugger field than in a paddy field.

Since making the great mistake of coming to China I have become the possessor of a gun and a field dog but beyond knowing which is the business end of both I find myself completely at a loss to know how to make either of them effective.

No doubt there are some of your readers who are gifted enough to give me postal tuition on how to kill game with a gun but I have hopes of learning this myself.

But can any of your readers recommend me to a good book on the training of a field dog?

I am, etc.,

COCKNEY.

Chekiang, Sept. 4, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—"Cockney," whose request for information as to a good book that will help him in the training of a field dog appeared in the "North-China Daily News" on Saturday, will find the best answer in the latest edition of the "Field" received out here. The Editor of that paper apparently was asked a similar question and he recommends several books. I would add that if "Cockney" regularly reads the "Field" he will benefit not only by book information but by the experience of experts gained in everyday work with field dogs. If "Cockney" is not aware of the fact, I would further remind him, he evidently being a dog-lover, that the "Field" just now is engaged with many of the leading medical and veterinary professors in experiments for the prevention and cure of distemper, a dog's greatest peril next to a bad master, that funds urgently are required for carrying on the good work, and that subscriptions thereto are being received at the "North-China Daily News" office.

"Cockney's" letter carries one a little further than the subject regarding which he is immediately concerned, for it is but another point proving the necessity for a properly organized Kennel Club here. I might mention a few of the queries that have come to me in only one week, "Cockney's" being indirect, but the others were made directly.

A lady sought a mate for her Tibetan poodle bitch. I only knew of one other in Shanghai and that I found had died.

A gentleman had three dogs, one of which contracted distemper and he wanted to know what to do. I had the sufferer packed off to a reliable veterinary surgeon—and it is now out of danger—and suitable precautions were taken with the others.

A lady found a stray fox terrier in her garden: it became violently ill and she was very much upset because she had a mind to keep it failing the discovery of its owner. I was able to assure her that the dog had done nothing worse than to eat some grass and that it would be all the better for it.

I cannot say how many in Shanghai have asked me to sell dogs for them and how many, especially from up-country, have asked if I could buy dogs for them. This happens every week.

All these questions and scores of others easily could be settled through the medium of a well-organized Kennel Club. Recently, several of the more interested sportsmen discussed the question of starting a club, but, in view of the fact that both the Dog Shows resulted in a financial loss, it was thought better to wait a while longer and see if more interest and support were forthcoming. It is proposed to hold a third show in November, which should be about the best time of the year for such a purpose and if we manage to do well then I do not think there will be any difficulty about forming a Kennel Club. Several sportsmen also are intent upon field trials and should such an event be arranged, "Cockney" should make every effort to attend. Books can teach a great deal, but an hour behind an expert is worth a whole book. A book cannot teach a man how to keep cool and quiet, not to worry his dogs and to accustom himself to all their moods and peculiarities. I have been out with men who have shot for many years in China—and probably never anywhere else—whose only idea of working a dog is to bawl, "Go on, Rover. Fetch 'em up," or "Come here, Rover." And I have seen terriers bring rats out of a drain in better condition than birds retrieved by Rover, but the poor fellow never had been taught better.

ROMANIZED CHINESE

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I was born in a country where a Latin idiom is spoken. I speak and write that idiom like any other native who went to school in his youth, and besides English, I can make myself equally understood in French and German. I also learned in my youth Greek (modern), Hebrew, Italian and Spanish, and in the course of my travels I have picked up a little Dutch, a little Russian and some Turkish, but most of the two latter I have forgotten, being now more than 20 years in this country. I have always tried to make an intimate acquaintance with all the languages I met, but owing to my advanced age when first arriving here and stress of circumstances, I could not take up Chinese as a regular subject of study.

I now wish to ask sinologues of British and American nationalities, what is the use of putting "h" before "s" in such words as hsien or hsin when transcribing in Roman letters their original Chinese characters? The only newspapers and books I read now are in the English language, and I do not know whether the French and other foreign newspapers and books printed in China use an "h" before "s" as described above. In no other language known to me have I encountered such a composition of these two syllables, and I confess that I do not know how to pronounce them. According to my knowledge, these two syllables should be pronounced like "chs" in German, "ch" to sound like the Scottish "ch" in "loch," but I have never heard Chinese of my acquaintance pronouncing the various Chinese characters like Sin, Sien, Soo, Zung, Sung Ziang, Tsang, Tseng or Tsung where "h" could be placed before "s," and I declare "h" before words like hsin, hsien, etc., as great an atrocity as that dreadful word "sorority."

Trusting you will find space for this letter in your valuable columns and thanking you in anticipation.

HAVE WE A BIBLE OF AUTHORITY?

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I have been deeply interested in recent articles appearing in your paper on the question of Modernism and Fundamentalism, and especially in your leader in the issue of August 25. I have also followed in papers and magazines from the United States the controversy as its grows over there. I was quite surprised, too, at your quotation in a recent issue from "Medical Press and Circular" as follows: "The fundamental truths of organic evolution are as firmly established as the rotundity of the earth and its revolution around the sun." When and by whom was this established? I emphatically do not believe it.

I have also looked in vain all summer for something from "Our Own Correspondent" in Washington, D.C., giving the situation in the controversy this year over there, since he hurried last year and the year before to report the progress of the Modernist ideas, especially in the annual meetings of the Northern Baptists and Northern Presbyterians. He seemed to me to give such a totally misleading idea of the general Baptist situation last year that I felt bound to make some reply to give more nearly the facts as they were. My opinion is that he has not been busy to report progress this year, because, as I have read reports, the gains this year seem on the wrong side to be pleasant to him to report. According to papers that I see, in the annual meetings of both these great bodies this year those who stand steadfastly for the Bible as God's inspired Book to man have been quite well in the lead.

I fully agree with you that this controversy over religion and especially when it has reference to the Christian religion will not and ought not to down, however, unpalatable to some Modernists the controversy may be, and that it will continue to the end of time.

My present aim is not to enter into any lengthy arguments on this much mooted question, but to beg that some one of your Modernist friends who is really qualified to do so will with clearness and simplicity answer the following: "Have we a Bible with any authority in its declarations and teachings? Where and what is that Bible? If we have such a Book, whence came it? Has any one any authority to change it—to take from or add to it? If so, who has this authority and from whom has he derived the same?"

I am sure that not a few, not only of Fundamentalists, but also some Modernists, would like to see these questions tackled by some really competent person, for I think it grows more and more apparent that the question at issue is really as to whether or not we have a Bible.

One of the saddest of all the sad things reported in the papers in recent months is that two high class young men who had just graduated at one of the most Modernistic schools in the United States and which is called a Christian School kidnapped and murdered in the name of science a bright young boy. I have not seen the details and cannot imagine what relation they gave to such a hellish deed to science.

Finally the Bible is either Divinely inspired or else man-made, and I have from childhood read it as God's own Book to tell me how to make the most of my life for the glory of God and to the help of my fellow beings. If men are wrong in such a conception there is then absolutely nowhere to look for guidance for this life and for the future and better life.

In conclusion I wish to say again that I think the supreme question is, Have we any authoritative Book to guide us in shaping our relations to our fellow men and to our God?

Sincerely hoping for an enlightening answer,

I am, etc.,
G. P. BOSTICK.

A LITTLE JUDICIOUS LEVITY.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Your many contributors will endorse Mr. Shastri's wishes that you should not lower the dignity, quality, and influence of the leading organ of news and opinion in the Far East, and, at the same time, they will understand and accept your comment.

But, Sir, the always serious-minded must not look down upon the jocular and apparently frivolous as really wanting in seriousness and earnestness! In these days of anxiety, disillusionment, and disappointment, want of prospect and promise in business, and possible financial strain, we delight in the opportunities given us, through the above feature, to maintain that gift of gifts—a sense of humour.

Lately, we have had some delicious examples of humour and the want of humour. The "Common-Sense" correspondent who seriously informs Mr. Petrié who "M. Barrée" was. The priceless leg-pull on the Bachelor Girl writing under a nom-de-plume of 18 words (let me suggest a short and appropriate one—"Philistia") who looks to meet a "decent and respectable" suitor who, in her being chaperoned, would not in the least resent the implied want of trust and slight on his honour and chivalry!

Even though some may strike a "childish" or futile note, do let them stand. They help to make "the wheels go round."

A JESSFIELD ROAD DAIRY

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—With reference to the report appearing in your paper of to-day's date on page 12 under the caption "A Jessfield Road Dairy" we would request you to publish an amendment of the final part of the report dealing with the Assessor's (Mr. Jacobs) statement of the Court's judgment.

According to the notes taken by our Mr. Lewis, who conducted the defence, Mr. Jacobs did not state "the best remedy is for the Council to cancel the licence of this dairy." In point of fact Mr. Jacobs was asked by the Council's representative if the Court would either order or suggest the cancellation of the licence in question and Mr. Jacobs refused to do this, pointing out that dismissal of the summons was based entirely upon the inapplicability of the Byelaw to this case. Upon the Council's representative commenting on the fact that the effect of the decision would be that the Council would have no control upon a large number of dairies situated outside the Setlement, Mr. Jacobs pointed out that was a matter which the Council should devise means to overcome and observed that the Council could always refuse to license or cancel the licence of a dairy outside Settlement limits. The question of the sufficiency of evidence produced as to the method of analysis, and identification of the milk analysed was raised subsequent to the Court's finding by Inspector Burted asking Mr. Jacobs if he accepted the analyst's certificate, to which Mr. Jacobs stated that the Court was satisfied with the certificate, but refused to state that mere production of certificate would be taken as conclusive evidence in the case, adding that the Court might require further evidence as to the identification of the milk, etc. although in the present case this question need not be discussed as the Court's finding was based purely on the applicability of the Byelaw.

We, therefore, suggest that in order to counteract the impression which is undoubtedly conveyed by the report in your paper that the Court suggested cancellation of the licence of this particular dairy, the following amended report of the judgment should be published.—

"The Assessor (Mr. Jacobs)—The accused was not charged with selling adulterated milk in the Settlement and in view of the fact that the dairy is outside the Settlement and the sample taken was also taken outside the Settlement this Court cannot take jurisdiction. The authority for taking proceedings of this nature is found in the Bye-laws attached to the Land Regulations which in this case are stated in the By-law (No. XXXIV) itself to apply only within the limits of the Settlement. In a case such as this which arises entirely outside the Settlement, we do not see how, even if the defendant has voluntarily agreed to take out a licence, the existence of a licence can be a sufficient ground for saying the matter comes within the Settlement.

The Council's representative asked if the Court would either order or suggest cancellation of the licence in the present case. The Court refused to do this, Mr. Jacobs pointing out that the case was dismissed on the construction of the Be-laws and no decision had been or could be given as to the merits of the case. The Council's representative subsequently observed that the effect of the decision might be that all Dairies outside Settlement limits would be beyond the control of the Settlement authorities. Mr. Jacobs pointed out that the Council's remedy is to insist on milk sold within the Settlement being pure and if found to be impure the council can refuse to allow the milk to be sold and either cancel or refuse to grant the licence. In the alternative, the Council might try and devise some means whereby it could establish fuller control, possibly by requiring a licence to consent to submit to the jurisdiction of the Mixed Court."

SHANGHAI VOLUNTEER CORPS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Referring to correspondence and to your leader in your issue of the 5th inst., would it not be possible to form an International Infantry Company with machine gun sections on the following lines:

Name: "Shanghai Rifles"
(or any other name).

(a) Infantry Unit:
Section 1 Danes)
" 2 Dutch)
" 3 Norwegians) Alphabetical
" 4 Swedes) Order
" 5 Swiss)
etc.

(b) Machine Gun Unit:
No. 1 Gun Team Danes
No. 2 " " Dutch
etc., as above.

Such a company should form a very strong crack unit, as most of the nationals referred to above will have had military training in their own national armies. The formation of national sections in one unit should lead to very interesting intersectional competitions. In case of inter-company competitions, each section could nominate one or two members to represent the "Shanghai Rifles."

In my opinion, there should be no difficulty in forming such a unit. Should this suggestion be of interest, why not arrange a meeting to discuss matters and to form a committee? It my be argued that such a unit may be rather strong, should every section have some 20 to 30 members. In such an eventuality the "Shanghai Rifles" could be split into 2 units, A and B, or the "Shanghai Rifles" could be spilt into two companies, sections 1 to 4 remaining in the old company, and sections 5 to 8, or whatever it may be, forming the nucleus of a new company.

THE TOO RAPID PACE

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—All papers of good standing, to which the much-esteemed "North-China Daily News" belongs, adhere strictly to the pledge that no names of any correspondent to their journals are devulged, and therefore the writer in to-day's issue need not fear that the "Bachelor of 32" will ever be able to find out who the "Bachelor Maid" is, even if he wishes to, and my intentions for writing the previous correspondence referred to were to inform the "Bachelor of 32" that there are some decent and respectable girls in the heart of gay Shanghai, but for no other motives whatsoever. I am sure I should not like to put the Editor to any extra work and especially not to that of match-making. I may mention that I have many friends of the "British Bachelor of 32's" type, all of whom appreciate my many virtues, not to say that I have no faults.

"Navigare Necesse Est" certainly seems to esteem the vampish type of woman amongst whom he most likely chooses his lady friends (nicotine and cocktail), well, I suppose it is a matter of every one to his taste.

Thanking you, dear sir, once again for allotting me such a big space in your esteemed paper.

I am, etc.,
One of the Bachelor Girls the British Bachelor (not gay) of 32 has not yet found in Shanghai.

Shanghai, Sept. 6, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I have read your correspondence entitled "The Too Rapid Pace" with much interest, and am now moved to plunge into the fray myself. To-day's letter I shall ignore, as it is simply designed to stir up ill feeling and has no bearing on the discussion, but as the "Bachelor of 32" seems genuinely concerned, it is to him I shall direct my remarks.

Mr. Bachelor, has it ever occurred to you that it may not be entirely the fault of the girls, that you find things as you do? The modern young men are a great deal to blame, since it is an absolute fact that the majority of them do not admire the old-fashioned womanly virtues in a girl. They prefer her to drink and smoke and paint, to go about half clad, and be a "vamp." That is, provided she doesn't carry these things to excess, of course. Nobody likes a girl to be "tight" nor behave like a demi-mondaine, but a great many of the modern young men seem to like her to ape such creatures! And if she fails to do so, at least in some degree, her popularity with the male sex suffers. If she objects to being pinched, squeezed and mauled about, in a motor-car or while dancing, she is either called "cold blooded," "stand offish," and begged not to be "a spoil-sport" or treated to uplifted brows and shrugs of scorn. It never seems to occur to the men to be ashamed of their actions, or feel any confusion when repulsed. Where is the chivalry, reverence, and respect for women, with which our grand-mothers, and even our mothers, were regarded in their girlhood days? The feeling which made men check bad language in a woman's pretence, which brought them to their feet instantly when she approached, which caused them to hesitate, and request permission, before they filled the air about her with tobacco fumes? Nowadays the young men don't think twice about swearing when out with a girl, generally quite frankly, occasionally with an ironical "excuse my French" or some such phrase thrown in for form's sake afterward. They loll in their chairs, as often as not, when a girl in passing stops to speak to them, if they mention their smokes it is after they've been lighted, an off hand "You don't mind, do you"? or "Have one?"

Some may say all this is the girls' fault, because she has lowered herself in the ways deplored by "Bachelor of 32" but if she has, why is it? Because the men like her to! Every normal girl, whatever she wants to do first, plans eventually to marry and settle down, and in order to have the opportunity to do so she must attract and please men, for, with our customs as they are today, the man is the one who makes the first decisive step. So the girl strives to please him, even if the ways are distasteful to her, and as a result she may be misjudged by appearances. Personally, I have been brought up to practise the old-fashioned virtues of modesty, simplicity, and a self-respect that forbids familiarity in the other sex, and I always feel uncomfortable when a young man attempts to paw me about, or squeezes my hand. I am modern enough to grant that there's no real harm in these things, but I'm sufficiently old-fashioned to be distressed that a so-called gentleman can feel free to attempt them with me.

So there's your answer, Mr. Bachelor. If the men are familiar, coarse, careless, and impertinent, you will find the girls that go with them inevitably so (at least, in appearance) as well. Whatever their real feelings may be, they have to pretend to like these things, because most modern young men will not be bothered to take out any other sort of girl, as to do so will mean practising manners and self-restraint that they can't be bothered with. If the men would stop going out with girls that drink, smoke, paint, and "vamp" they'd find the girls would soon stop doing these things.

FAMINE RELIEF APPEALS.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—The Chinese do little or nothing to prevent famines or assist the sufferers after famine or flood have done their worst. At the same time they gaily spend untold millions in utterly absurd war and revolution which benefits nobody except a few rascally Tuchuns and such like birds of prey.

The Chinese are at their old game of getting up heartrending accounts of suffering and asking the foreigners to help them, and send them more money.

In my opinion it would be very nearly a crime to send any money to China at the present time for any kind of famine relief. It only releases that amount of money for the working of further mischief in this country.

A BICYCLE MADE FOR TWO.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—May I say a few words in reply to "Cave's" letter appearing in Monday's edition of this paper?

I quite agree with him that it is a dangerous practice for two persons to travel on one cycle, that is to say through the busy throughfares of this city, and that this should be prohibited. On the other hand, if people like to take advantage of the quietude of roads that are seldom traversed by motor vehicles, etc., and travel two on a cycle, it would be unfair to deprive them of this enjoyment. Most often the cyclist carries a second person on his cycle with the sole intention of selecting a quiet spot in which to teach the novice, as everybody knows that it is quite the impossible and a most dangerous feat to learn to ride in the roads of the city.

So after all I am sure "Cave" only meant that cyclists should be prohibited from riding two on one cycle in the busy centres, and I am sure he had not the slightest intention of robbing us poor folks who cannot afford a motor car, as he probably has one, of this simple enjoyment.

THE RUSSIAN CADETS.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Could you help me, through your valuable paper, to find out what are the reasons of the delay in the sending to Serbia of the Russian Cadets, actually under the care of the International Committee for assistance and repatriation of Russian refugees.

The permission of H.M. the King of Serbia, so long waited for, has been officially granted over one month ago, but there is a fixed limit of time after which this permission may be cancelled.

The funds required for the transportation, having to be supplied by the contractor of the lotteries, up to an amount of $120,000 cannot be the reason of the delay.

The conditions made by some shipping companies here, as well as by Messrs. Thos. Cook & Son are, in the opinion of everybody, very satisfactory and might be accepted at once.

Having in hand the permission for the cadets to enter into Serbia, the funds required to pay the expenses for the transportation, and the shipping companies being ready to undertake such transportation at very good conditions, why is the committee delaying the departure of the cadets for the country where they should, and wish to, be?

WHY THE FOREIGNER COMPLAINS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I notice in this morning's paper that a "resident outside the Settlement" is advocating a friendly spirit between the foreigners and Chinese. Looking back on the last four or five years I do not think the most grasping and unreasonable Chinese could wish to say foreigners have not tried to be friendly. Always, however, it has been bad government or no government, anti-foreign jealousy, militarism, disorderly students and childish extremists who have prevented any real good feeling between ourselves and the Chinese.

The abolition of extraterritoriality presupposes a competent government in China. No nation is going to condemn their nationals to the jurisdiction of civil courts ruled by the will of the local military governors and swayed by the most noisy of the extremists.

It is foolish to compare the refugee Belgians who fled to England owing to the aggression of the Germans, (they were driven from their own country by the vast armies of an enemy nation), with the pitiful refugees who flee to the protection of foreigners to avoid the savagery of their own countrymen. Then to say the foreigner is constantly demanding and confiscating land and encroaching on the sovereign rights of China is also grossly unjust. When trade started between China and the foreigners it was found that trade was only possible if the local officials were bribed at a regular rate which would vary according to the amount of trade done. It was found that foreigners had no redress whatever if a Chinese merchant failed to deliver goods paid for or went bankrupt, etc. And it was found that the foreigners living in China for purposes of trade were at any time in danger of their lives should any matter of serious dispute arise. The result of this situation was the establishment of treaty ports for trade and, by honest government and administration, these small ports have now developed into the present Shanghai and other smaller but well run outports. Why then should these ports be returned to China? They were established because it was impossible to obtain fair dealing without them, though at that time China was as well run as it had been for some hundreds of years. Now China is not run at all. The Peking Government is a name only. Every military commander controls the place where he settles and fights the next man for it. Every soldier lives on the wretched countryman who has the misfortune to attract his attention. There is no law, no justice, there is only the sword and bribery and with these two forces the country runs itself.

The foreigners will be friendly enough when China shows that she possesses the ideals and determination of a nation. It is hard to be friendly with an individual one does not respect and cannot trust. So must it be between nations.

A few months ago the "Good Roads Movement" announced that they were going to build a road round the Settlement to keep the foreigners in! Now on all sides you hear that the foreigners shall exercise control 30 miles round Shanghai, all along the railways and should in fact stop the war.

There is a very old saying:—

"The devil was ill, the devil a monk would be,
The devil was well, the devil a monk was he."

It was applied originally to one of the despotic rulers from whom England suffered some hundreds of years ago but it applies to-day to China as a whole and to our local societies in particular.

I. S. S. BONDS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—One must presume that the proprietors of the I.S.S. are always anxious that every bondholder should feel perfectly satisfied that his chances in the monthly drawings are actually as good (or as bad), whichever way one likes to put it, as a plain reading of the Society's rules and the statements on the Bond certificates leads one to suppose; and that there are no unpublished circumstances relating to the method of the draw, or the number of "live" bonds participating therein and held by bona fide bondholders, which do in fact seriously militate against the chances of a paid-up bond drawing a prize. Assuming that the I.S.S. proprietors really value the good opinion of their bondholders I have no doubt that they will readily answer the following questions, in a manner that leaves the meaning of the reply beyond any misconception, either through the medium of your correspondence column or an advertisement on your front page.

The points which I am sure the interested public would very much like to have answered are:—

(1) Are the issued bonds numbered consecutively from 1 to the highest number issued?
(2) What proportion of the issued bonds are now "dead" through having been surrendered, not paid up, or from other causes?
(3) Have all "dead" numbers been re-issued to new bondholders?
(4) If not, do such dead numbers participate in the draw, and how many of them are there?
(5) If they do, and draw a prize, does such prize remain undistributed for that month, and, in fact, revert to the funds of the I.S.S.?
(6) How many bonds participating in the draw are the property of, and potential prize winners for, the I.S.S. itself?

I am, etc.,
CURIOUS.

Shanghai, Sept. 10, 1924.

Information such as that required by our correspondent may always be obtained by any bondholder in the International Savings Society on applicaton to the managers or the accountants, and this was given to us quite readily on calling to see them on our correspondent's behalf. In reply to the first query, the answer is in the affirmative and to the second query the reply is "none." All "dead" numbers have been re-issued to new bondholders. No bonds participating in the draw are the property of, and potential prize winners for, the International Savings Society itself. In view of the foregoing information, questions 4 and 5 require no reply.—Ed.

B. W. A. HOSPITAL AID

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I am asked by by the Hospital Aid Department of the British Women's Association to make appeal through the courtesy of your columns for more workers and funds wherewith to carry on auxiliary hospital work in the present acute conditions.

The work turned out by this Department goes, as a rule, to British Mission hospitals in the interior, but for the time being it has been arranged to forward it to the Chinese Red Cross Hospital in Avenue Haig. It is here, I am informed, that all the most seriously wounded soldiers are sent in the first instance for operations when—possible—after which, unless they succumb in the meantime, they are drafted to other hospitals. Doctors New and Tong, assisted by four well-known American doctors, Dr. Martha N. Hoahing and others, are in charge here, and I was told that hospital dressings of any description would be exceedingly acceptable: bed jackets (the ordinary short white coat, fastening down the middle, as worn by coolies); many-tail bandages (both large and small sizes); roller bandages; absorbent pads, and swabs are—in the order in which I have given them—most needed. The actual hospital including the new wards only completed a few weeks ago, is full-up; and in addition a large mat-shed has been erected in the grounds. The unfortunate men, who have been drafted into the last-named, are lying on the ground, the supply of beds being inadequate Arrangements are, however, I understand, being made to cope with this aspect of the situation. The need for coats, as I have indicated above, is really acute. It does not require much imagination to realise the condition of these wounded soldiers, when they are picked up by the stretcher-bearers from the ground, in weather conditions such as we have at present. From a Chinese source I learn that the military authorities are not particularly concerned with the comfort of their men once they have fallen. Indeed, it is said that their responsibility abruptly terminates when a soldier is wounded. The man may, or may not, be dragged out of the firing line; but then he is left to chance or to the Red Cross; no rations are provided for him, his pay ceases, no communication is made to his relatives, and if he dies, no coffin is provided. The Chinese Red Cross is doing its utmost, but on this unprecedentedly large scale of warfare in China, there are inevitably terrible delays in rescuing and treating the wounded.

With lively recollections of the splendid companies of Chinese coolies we sent to France and elsewhere from Wei-hai-wei in 1917-1918, and the admirable work they did there, and their generally good behaviour in war conditions, when they came to our aid, I make this appeal on behalf of the Hospital Aid Department, both for workers, materials of any description (bolts of sheeting are much desired) and funds, so that we may do what we can to mitigate the sufferings of the wounded,—and do it promptly.

INTERPORT POLO MATCH

Shanghai's Easy Victory by Seven Goals to Three

The Interport match on the Polo Ground on Saturday, between Hongkong and Shanghai, for possession of the handsome Keswick Cup, lacked the excitement of the wonderful game on the same field two years ago, but it was quite an interesting exhibition and the many hundreds who lined the boards and filled the pavilion must have been well content. The teams were:—

Hongkong.—No. 1.—E. L. E. Davies; No. 2.—J. J. Palmer; No. 3.—R. Neville (captain); Back.—E. L. Judd. Reserve.—Lieut.-Commander C. C. Flemming, R.N.

Shanghai.—No. 1.—D. L. Newbigging; No. 2.—E. H. McMichael (captain); No. 3.—C. C. Boyd; Back.—H. G. Robinson.

The mad excitement of the galloping game is such that even the coolest and most gentlemanly player occasionally cannot help committing a technical breach of the rules, and it says much for the sporting spirit and playing abilities of Saturday's Interporters, that the many uninitiated spectators could not possibly have gone away from the field with a clear knowledge, from practical illustration, of what constitutes foul play in polo. The controlling officials as well might have been off the field, so little was there for them to do.

As to the play particularly, it was most noticeable that Hongkong were at a serious disadvantage as regards ponies. They brought 11 with them, five belonging to people not on the team and therefore probably somewhat strange to them in actual use, and four more were lent to them in Shanghai by Mr. H. D. Rodger. There was nothing much wrong with the ponies and frequently some of them outpaced Shanghai's best, but in difficult situations it was many times apparent there was not that perfect understanding between player and pony which is so essential.

How They Shaped.

Of the men it must be said that Shanghai as a team were much superior to Hongkong, and the preponderance of goals, all of which were well earned, proves that, but even on the Shanghai side there was no player over whom one could go into raptures. The amount of false hitting on either side was remarkable and far more plentiful than it should have been with such men, even allowing for the natural excitement on such an occasion. McMichael (the Shanghai captain) was, as ever, dashing, forceful and untiring, hitting with amazing length and accuracy, but he was not so impressive at No. 2 as he is at Back. Practically the same can be said of Robinson. Like his captain, he scarcely ever goes altogether off colour, but again it is very seldom that he misses the ball so often as he did on Saturday. It was stated on the programme that he was "only fairly mounted" and that may be the explanation, for there were many occasions when he was compelled to give more attention to the pony than probably he cared for. Yet Robinson played a good game and it was seldom he did not do the right thing when in a really tight corner. Boyd was distinctly patchy. At times he was absolutely brilliant and at others he was woeful, with his stick going like a semaphore. He was always in the game, ever making amends for past mistakes and at riding-off Neville was his only rival. Newbigging well deserved his place in the team. He rode like the wind, engineered openings and made the most use of others that were offered to him. He shared with Robinson the honour of being top scorer, and it was only bad luck that prevented him having more goals to his credit.

Neville's Great Game.

Neville (the Hongkong captain) easily was the best man on the field and a team all of his calibre would have taken the cup to Hongkong. No. 3 should be a ubiquitous person and Neville was all that. Wherever there was danger or a possibility of scoring, Neville had a say in it. Not even McMichael hit harder than he and not one of the other seven could approach him for accuracy. Yet he did not attempt to monopolize the play and he gave some fine exhibitions of riding-off whilst others were on the ball. Hongkong were beaten, but not Neville. Neither could fault be found with Judd. He is of that quiet, steady nature, never noticeable until something brilliant happens—the type of player who always drops into the right place without an effort, sensing a change of tactics even before it is put into operation. Judd was largely responsible for keeping the score as low as it was and he was not to blame for the goals that were scored. Davies and Palmer were outclassed by their comrades and their opponents. Both worked tremendously hard and tried from start to finish, but Davies in particular was very weak in front of goal.

The Compliments.

After the match, Mr. R. I. Fearon congratulated both teams on the play they had shown and said that special praise was due to the Hongkong men for coming up so far and putting up such a game fight.

Mrs. E. H. McMichael then presented the Keswick Cup and miniatures to the winners and herself received a beautiful basket of flowers from Mr. Robinson on behalf of the Polo Club. This was followed by another pleasing function, when Capt. Neville called for Mr. H. D. Rodger and handed him a memento from the Hongkong team, remarking amidst cheers that they were deeply grateful for his sporting action in placing four good ponies at their disposal. Hearty cheers were given for Mrs. McMichael and both teams, and the players and other members of the Polo Club then went off to prepare for a dinner, which, according to the programme, was governed, like the game, by Hurlingham rules.

INTERPORT LAWN BOWLS

The Recs. management made no mistake about the arrangements made to entertain both the teams and spectators and although a sombre threatening cloud hovered over the venue during the whole game the rain kindly kept off until the finish.

The green was in excellent condition and was playing very fast. Hankow took the first honour by scoring a single at the first end to which the Homesters replied with 2 shots. Scoring at the next two ends Hankow led 3-2 but met a snag in the shape of 5 at the next end which should have been saved as there was nothing remarkably near the Jack. Score 7-3.

The same can be said of the next four ends when Hankow scored a three-four and Shanghai two fours the newest wood in each case being two feet from the objective. Score 15-10.

From this point however Geordie's team found their form and, except for one or two ends, outplayed their opponents, This was in a large measure due to Stuart Young's perfect leading as end after end his woods were laid down in a beautiful position whilst Porter, coming into form sent down five drawing shots. After scoing 1 shot through the medium of Arch Crosbies neat chip on a side wood Hankow failed to score again until the 19th end when the score Shanghai 30-12. Although the score was heavy Hankow had been playing quite good bowls and after lay the shots until Cyril Porter and Geordie sent their woods down. On one occasion with Hankow lying 2 inches in front of the jack Porter just clicked it for a counter with his first and improved it with his second with a dead toucher drawn. Geordie also made several good saves and moved some perfect woods which had been sent down by Owen. The game ended in favour of Shanghai by 33 shots to 13.

The Teams were:—

Shanghai	Skip	Hankow
G. McMurdo		Arch. Crosbie
C. Porter		J. Owen
D. McAlister		H. Bowling

S'HAI INTERNATIONAL SWIMMING CLUB

Annual Gala: Good Times in Preliminaries

The annual swimming gala and aquatic sports of the Shanghai International Swimming Club began last Friday in a most successful manner at the Municipal Baths.

There was a gratifyingly large crowd of spectators, inclusive of many fair followers of the art of natation, and a thoroughly enjoyable evening was spent by all.

The committee are to be congratulated upon the excellence of the arrangements. The bath building was, if anything, more tastefully decorated than ever, by a profusion of flags and bunting, and great festoons of Chinese lanterns encasing electric bulbs which lent a very gay appearance to the ordinarily rather drab-looking building. A capital orchestra had been secured and its répertoire was fully appreciated by the competitors and spectators alike.

All the events on the formidably long programme were got off sharply to time, and there was a pleasing lack of those tedious waits between events that sometimes detract from the enjoyability of such functions.

Record Time in 100 Yd. Back Stroke

The annual swimming gala and aquatic sports of the Shanghai International Swimming Club were brought to a successful conclusion on Saturday night. The attendance was even greater than on the preceding evening, and many of the events were productive of very close finishes, notably the 50 yards Shanghai Championship, which was won by J. R. Tordy in the excellent time of 26⅘ secs. If it is arranged to accept the invitation of the Victoria Recreation Club to an interport meeting at Hongkong towards the latter part of this month local followers of the sport will look forward with interest to seeing how this promising swimmer will compare with the best of the Crown Colony's sprinters. The club championship for the Gutierrez Cup was well won by the Shanghai diving champion, E. A. Roche, in awarding first honours to whom the judges were unanimous. A. Jesu was second and J. R. Tordy third, and the standard of diving exhibited was of a very high order. The back-stroke 100 yards Shanghai championship brought out only two entrants, F. H. Johnston and J. R. Tordy, the former of whom won comfortably in the record time of 85 secs. beating the previous best (85⅘ secs. made in 1922) by C. V. Jensen, who did not defend his title. The half-mile Shanghai Championship was won by J. B. Brown, whose time, 14 mins. 27⅘ secs. was 4⅘ secs. worse than last year. R. W. MacCabe was second. J. R. Tordy gave up after the 14th length. The inter-club relay race was won fairly easily by the Rowing Club, who also had matters more or less all their own way in the inter-club water polo match, which they annexed to the tune of 7 goals to 2.

At the conclusion of the sports the prizes were graciously distributed to the successful competitors by Mrs. W. F. Hamlin, who was presented with a beautiful basket of flowers by Mr. J. H. McGregor on behalf of the members of the S.I.S.C. In thanking the members for the presentation, on behalf of his wife, Mr. W. F. Hamlin made a neat little speech, in which he stated that he was glad to be back in the game after a year or twos' absence, and paid a well deserved tribute to the energy and enthusiasm of the S.I.S.C. president, Mr. J. H. McGregor, to whose continued interest in the club its success for many years past has been due. He voiced the hope that greater support might be forthcoming next year from the junior and more active swimming members of the club.

LAWN TENNIS

The Davis Cup Competition: Australia to Meet U. S. A. in Challenge Round

Boston, Sept. 4.

In the first match in the final round of the Davis Cup competition, Lacoste (France) defeated Patterson (Australia) 6-3, 6-2, 10-8.

Lacoste's youth and steadiness accounted for his very unexpected defeat of Patterson, who, in the third set, put up a spirited fight. Lacoste, who was most tenacious, played a back-court game and concentrated on the Australian's backhand.

Later.

O'Hara Wood (Australia) beat Borotra (France) in the second singles match to-day of the Davis Cup final.

The score was:—1-6, 6-4, 1-6, 6-4, 6-2.—Reuter's American Service.

Borotra's supers volleys, placing and returns at dizzy angles gave the Frenchman an advantage in the earlier stages, but at the crucial point Wood put on an extra turn of speed, when the Frenchman was visibly tiring.—Reuter's American Service.

Boston, Sept. 5.

Patterson and O'Hara Wood (Australia) defeated Lacoste and Brugnon (France), 6-4, 6-4, 6-2, in the doubles match of the Davis Cup final. Australia thus leads by two matches to one.

The Frenchmen won the toss, but the Australians broke through Lacoste's service in the fifth game, thus securing the lead, which they never relinquished. The Frenchmen battled fiercely in the second set, breaking through Patterson's service in the sixth game but the Australians magnificent volleying and dazzling placements triumphed. All four players showed nervousness in the third set, but Patterson obtained control early and soon secured the match, the Frenchmen failing to make a serious impression in spite of their frantic efforts.

The Defeat of France

Sept. 6.

Australia has defeated France in the final round of the Davis Cup Competition, thus earning the right to meet the United States in the challenge round. Patterson to-day beat Borotra, 6-3, 6-1, 6-3. There remains one singles match to be played.

The Frenchman scored brilliantly in the first set on Patterson's service. In the second Patterson quickly took the lead in spite of the utmost efforts of his opponent, who slipped and slid on the soft court.

The third set was an exciting fight. Borotra made a very plucky attempt to save the game, but was finally routed.

The match, which was played in perfect weather, lasted 54 minutes.

Boston, Sept. 6.

Lacoste beat O'Hara Wood in the list match of the final round of the Davis Cup Competition. Australia has thus won three games to France's two.

The score was 8-10, 6-1, 6-1, 7-5. Wood started well, repeated breaking through the Frenchman's service. Lacoste's subsequent victory was mainly due to the tiredness of his opponent, who was unable to maintain the terrific pace. Lacoste was in his best form in the fourth set, producing strokes of deadly accuracy.—Reuter's American Service.

New York, Sept. 10.

W. T. Tilden and Vincent Richards have been nominated to play in the Davis Cup Singles against the Australians. W. M. Johnston and Tilden will play in the doubles.—Reuter's American Service.

HOME RACING

St. Leger Stakes Won by H. H. the Aga Khan: Second

London, Sept. 10.

The following is the result of the St. Leger Stakes, run at Doncaster to-day:—

Salmon Trout.....1
Santorb 2
Polyphontes 3

Won by two lengths; half a length separating second and third. Seventeen ran.

Betting: 6 to 1 Salmon Trout; 40 to 1 Santorb; 100 to 30 Polyphontes.—Reuter.

The Race Described.

A good start was made. Arcade quickly gave way to Hurrybelle, the pair being followed by Eaglestone, Santors, Watford, Irismond, Polyphontes and Zodiac, with Salmon Trout last, just behind Sansovino. Thus they raced for a half-mile, when Eaglestone forced the pace, clear of Hurrybelle, Arcade, Polyphontes and Santors, the whipper-in still being Salmon Trout. Half way Polyphontes went up third place. There was no further change until entering the straight, when Polyphontes shot to the front, pursued by Santorb, Watford, Transvaal II, Irismond, Cape Horn and Salmon Trout. A quarter of a mile from home, Santors closed with Polyphontes and took command at the distance, but was promptly challenged by Salmon Trout, who came on with a "wet sail" and won comfortably. Obliterate was fourth, Sansovino eighth and Spalpeen last. The time was 3 min. 13⅘ sec.

It was only known that Santorb was running late this morning. The starters were: Arcade (Childs), Bucks Yeoman (Beary), Cape Horn (Victor Smyth), Eaglestone (J. Leach), Great Barrier (Elliott), Hurrybelle (Winter), Irismond (Donoghue), Obliterate (Burns), Polyphontes (McLachlan), Salmon Trout (Carslake), Sansovino (Weston), Santorb (Hulme), Spalpeen (O'Neill), Transvaal (Ferre), Watford (A. Smyth), Winalot (Jellis), Zodiac (Archibald).—Reuter.

LAW REPORTS

CHINESE PRESS AND INSP. DUNNE

Alleged Publication of Libellous Comments: Managerial and Editorial Risks

The further hearing of the case of the six Chinese newspaper men, charged with having published libellous statements against Sub-Inspector Dunne, was resumed in the Mixed Court on Saturday before Assessor Whitamore and Magistrate Loh. Mr. Rodger, appearing for all the defendants except Ma Hsu, in addressing the Court stated that according to Chinese Law there was no such thing as libel. The Code stated quite clearly that whoever spoke words which were liable to cause offence was guilty of a punishable action. That did not mean publishing such statements in a newspaper, but by word of mouth.

The Assessor—The Magistrate says it could mean either.

Mr. Rogers—I ask the Court to refer to Article 10 which states that in accordance with Chinese Law no act is an offence unless that act is especially set down."

The Assessor—Surely this is all covered by the Magistrate's interpretation. It might be an offence to the eye—a libel, or an offence to the ear—a rumour. Because it has two meanings is of no avail.

Mr. Rodger then went on to point out that the information contained in these newspapers was based on what was thought to be a reliable news report namely that of the South Eastern News Agency. It was mistaken, but for that matter Reuter might make a mistake. Moreover this news was received direct from the brother of the deceased, a coolie who had informed the Ningpo Guild. He had in his turn been told the story by the dying coolie. These reports were received from a proper source and were believed to be bona-fide reports of the facts then known. This was more understandable when it was known that the case of manslaughter was filed in the British Court against Sub-Inspector Dunne. Mr. Rodger asked the Court to note that in the report the defendants stated where they had received their news. Their comment was that "if the report is true the authorities must look into the matter."

Managers' Responsibility

Although the defendants had not retracted their statements, they had published the news of the British Court proceedings and of the inquest, so that they did actually correct their statements. The facts had changed and they changed their reports. A further point was that publication was made without the knowledge of the managing directors. The managing directors were in charge of the financial affairs of the newspaper and according to Chinese Law no criminal offence could be charged against a man if the offence was committed without his knowledge or approval. How was it possible to hold responsible a managing director who had nothing to do with the editorial work? The same applied to the editors. Mr. Sun was away on leave in Soochow when these articles were published. As to the other two editors, they did not write the articles and were only responsible for the first page. They never even saw these articles, nor was it their duty to do so. There was no evidence on these points. They were sued as individuals, but evidence showed that they were not responsible, not any of them. The plaintiff should sue the individual who wrote the articles.

Mr. Covey, appearing for the relatives of the deceased, asked if the police had taken the trouble to vouch for the truth? Had they gone into the case of the kicking of the coolie down 18 or 20 steps. He maintained they had not done so. They merely said, "Thank goodness, we have our discharge, we will go to the parties who have spread the rumour. We are in China." Mr. Covey added "not in England or America." The papers had every right to publish a report which they believed. Did the complainants put Dunne on any other charge when he had been acquitted of the charge of manslaughter? No they were afraid!

Mr. Maitland—"I asked to put Dunne in the box. I was told it was not necessary."

Mr. Covey—Has Sergent Dunne lost one little bit of prestige? Have the police? No! I say no! This criminal case is only brought about to bring about a civil action. I believe Sgt. Dunne is asking Tls. 20,000 damages.

The Assessor.—All this is purely hypothetical.

Mr. Covey (continuing)—Did the police present the case to the full extent of their authority?

The Assessor—You want to argue this case on the case dismissed in the British Court.

Mr. Covey—Was Dr. Davenport ever taken to Court?

The Assessor—I must stop you. The case has been settled in the British Court.

Mr. Preston, appearing for Mr. Hsu Chien-ping, and the two defendants of the "Eastern Times," made reference to the evidence of Mr. Jabin Hsu, managing Director of the "Shanghai Journal of Commerce." "I am called the managing director," the latter had stated. "I am one of a board of eight others. Our duties are concerned with the finance of the newspaper. I have nothing to do with the editing of the newspaper." Mr. Preston went on to say that we must put out of mind British Law. It was British Law which was at the back of the charge of alleged libel. The prosecutors had picked on the managing director and the editor in each case regardless of their personal concern in the matter. They had chosen them as representing their respective newspapers and yet they had chosen them before this Court as individuals. There was nothing in Chinese Law to permit that.

Editors or Writers Responsible?

Mr. Preston suggested that the writers of the libellous statements should be charged. In a foreign paper it would be difficult to trace the writer of an article. In a Chinese paper that was not so. Every editorial was signed and anybody could at once find who wrote the article. Therefore it was not necessary to have a special law to make the owners responsible as the author was always identified by his signature. The man who was wronged had his remedy and could have charged the local news editor. In the case of the "Eastern Times," which was registered at the French Consulate, the French law stated that only false rumours which were published to disturb the public peace or which were made in bad faith were libellous. He submitted it to the Court that those articles did not affect the public peace, nor were they made in bad faith. A coolie employed in Louza Station had been struck. He had died and Sub-Inspector Dunne who charged with manslaughter. The newspaper agency sent a long report of what was supposed to be an interview between the deceased's brother and the Ningpo Guild. Those were the facts. There could hardly be any bad faith, as the police had charged one of their own men with manslaughter.

The prosecution had its remedy and he asked that the three accused which he represented should be discharged.

Centre of Responsibility

Mr. Maitland—"Mr. Preston said the Editorials in a Chinese newspapers are signed—therefore we know who wrote them—therefore we can't prosecute the other people. If so any newspaper wishing to publish a libel merely tells the office coolie to put his initials at the bottom.—A very simple way out." It had been suggested, Mr. Maitland continued that the managing directors were not responsible because they alleged that they did not know the articles were published. The work of a newspaper was often done in circumstances of great hurry, by many different minds, not always aware what the others were doing. The result was a composite faith. There must be a centre of responsibility. He suggested that it was quite impossible that men in a responsible position should be excused because they did not know what was happening. These men had made a remarkable case. They had attempted a plea of justification all through. Further the reporter from the news agency denied having said anything about Sub-Inspector Dunne stamping on the coolie's back. That was a deliberate addition by the Journal of Commerce, the article in Journal of Commerce was as libellous and inflamatory as anything that could be written. The same applied to the Shanghai Tribune. He considered that $100 fine was totally inadequate. He asked for a sentence of imprisonment. There was a further reason too. Because of the attitude of the accused in Court. All had tried to justify their articles. The only apology had been made by Mr. Lee who had said. "If the Court thinks something is wrong in my paper I am sorry."

Master and Servant.

Mr. Whitamore (the Assessor) in summing up said that in the general principle of the Law the master was liable for the acts of his servants, except in unreasonable circumstances. The libel in this case was very hard on the directors. If the proprietors could prove that the agents had published the libel it was a defence to criminal proceeding. The magistrate and he were agreed on this matter and they did not intend to inflict a sentence of imprisonment. The three directors were discharged. The Editors however were certainly reponsible for what was written. The articles were extremely libellous. The Articles in the "Eastern Times" were libellous but not so bad in degree as the others. The Editor would be told not to be so foolish again. Mr. Sun was away and was therefore discharged. The third editor Mr. Zung Pao-lai of the Journal of Commerce was responsible. He would be fined $99.

MOTOR CYCLE NUISANCE

A young man named S. A. Judah appeared before Mr. G. W. King in the British Police Court, on Tuesday, to answer a summons charging him with having ridden a motor cycle with an open exhaust.

Acting Head Constable Herbert, of the Police Reserve, said that the cycle, with an open exhaust, passed him in the Western District on the 3rd instant. Defendant was riding it. Witness was perfectly certain defendant was the rider, as he had seen him many times. The fact of the exhaust being open was not a mistake, as it had occurred many times. Witness lived within 100 yd. of defendant's house, and he could say that this open exhaust was a perfect nuisance.

Defendant denied that he was riding the cycle at the time of the complaint. He sold it previously to that and his friend, Mr. Shekury, had admitted that he was the rider.

Mr. Herbert said that he was not in any doubt about the defendant being the rider. He had seen him riding the machine many times previously and also since the date of this complaint.

The defendant was fined $3.

THE petition to dispose of 35 Nash-Mongolia bonds belonging to the estate of the late Charles L. Coltman for $50 each was denied by the U. S. Court on Monday. The Court ordered that these bonds should be sold at private sale, no offers under $50 being entertained.

MAKIN Singh, who recently was committed for trial on a charge of cutting off the right ear of a Chinese girl, with intent to commit grievous bodily harm, pleaded guilty on Wednesday when brought before Judge Grain and a jury in the British Supreme Court. and was sentenced to two years' penal servitude.

MR. Leonard G. Husar, U. S. Attorney, arrived in Shanghai on Tuesday morning on the str. President Cleveland, in fine condition after his holiday in the States, and glad to be back at work again, he told a representative of the "North-China Daily News." Mr. Husar said that when he arrived in May the country was feeling a slight business depression, but that slump had now passed due, he thinks, to the confidence that President Coolidge will be re-elected. Wherever he travelled, in New York and Washington, through the South and in California, Mr. Husar found the betting about three to one in favour of Coolidge. He feels that business conditions in the United States are in a very satisfactory shape at the present time.

MUNICIPAL GAZETTE NEWS

Conflict Between the Armed Forces of the Provinces of Chekiang and Kiangsu.

For some time recently, the state of tension existing between the Provincial Chiefs of Chêkiang and Kiangsu, has been a cause of concern to the Council, owing to the proximity to the Foreign Settlement of the armed forces of both Provinces, and, following upon the outbreak of war on September 3, preparations were duly undertaken to place the Settlement in an adequate condition of defence, and to secure the assistance, in case of need, of naval landing parties from the men-of-war in harbour.

In the meantime the forces of the belligerents became actively engaged in hostilities, and, as a result of information received late on Monday evening, September 8, a Proclamation was issued early on Tuesday morning declaring a State of Emergency, and Mobilization was ordered of the Defence Forces of the Settlement. At the same time, at the request of the Council, Naval Detachments were landed to assist in the Defence Measures of the Settlement, and all troops immediately occupied the positions allotted to them.

The following letter to the Senior Consul relates to the operations on the borders of the Settlement, of press gangs engaged in capturing Chinese coolies, which resulted in an immediate influx of panic-stricken refugees into the Settlement:—

Council Chamber,
Shanghai, September 8, 1924.

SIR,—I have the honour to inform you that impressment of labourers is taking place daily in the neighbourhood of the foreign Settlement, and that the forcible action of a press gang in the Northern suburb (Chapei) on the afternoon of September 3, in binding and leading into captivity a number of native labourers, caused a stampede of natives across the boundary line into the Settlement.

I have the honour to draw your attention to the fact that any forcible measures put into operation on those suburbs of the Settlement beyond the boundary line, which may cause influx into the Settlement of thousands of native refugees, will cause serious inconvenience to the Municipal Authorities, and may result in the presence of mobs of unemployed and destitute people, thus prejudicing the peace, order and security of the Settlement.

I have the honour, therefore, to request that the Consular Body will be so good as to make such representations to the belligerent provincial factions, as may result in discontinuance of such action in the vicinity of the foreign Settlement.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
S. FESSENDEN,
Chairman.

N. U. COMM. G. de' ROSSI,

Senior Consulate,

SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your communication of the 8th instant in regard to the impressment of labourers in the neighbourhood of the Foreign Settlement and in reply thereto to inform you that I have already made representations on the lines suggested by you to the competent authorities.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
G. DE ROSSI,
Consul-General for Italy and Senior Consul.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS COUNCIL

French Insistence on Treaty Assistance: Other Nations Decidedly Lukewarm

Geneva, Sept. 5.

Lord Parmoor, in a powerful speech, which was frequently applauded, endorsed many of the principles laid down by M. Herriot. He declared that the Covenant of the League was a remedy for the present situation in the world.

At the afternoon sitting, M. Théunis said that Belgium would follow France and Britain and regard compulsory arbitration the best guarantee of peace. There was a prospect of a coalition of all the civilized peoples against an aggressor.

Dr. Benes (Czecho-Slovakia) also advocated arbitration.

The debate was then adjourned till to-morrow.

In the course of his speech to-day, M. Herriot praised the draft treaty of mutual assistance, in which connexion France, he said, was very optimistic. The French Premier expressed gratification at Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's support of the proposed arbitration. He declared that violation of frontiers no longer provided a satisfactory criterion of aggression, but enlarged the necessity for backing up arbitration and justice by force. "We must make," he continued, "what is mighty, just, and what is just, mighty, if we are to save the peoples from a repetition of their sufferings."

M. Herriot declared that France strongly favoured all measures calculated to control traffic in arms and prevent secret preparations for war, which, he asserted, were at present proceeding.

The speaker supported the idea of a disarmament conference.

As to Germany and Russia joining the League, M. Herriot said that the conditions under which these countries could be admitted were clearly laid down in the articles of the Covenant.

Geneva, Sept. 6.

The Assembly of the League of Nations to-day unanimously adopted the disarmament resolution, regarding which Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and M. Herriot had previously had a long discussion.

The result was received with prolonged cheering.—Reuter.

French Press Bitterness with British Premier.

Paris, Sept. 5.

The newspapers express astonishment and disillusionment at Mr. MacDonald's speech at Geneva, especially the passage relating to armaments and admission of Germany to the League.

The "Matin" comments bitterly on what it calls Mr. MacDonald's failure to throw light on British plans for disarmament and security, or to explain the rejection of the League's Mutual Assistance Pact.

The "Peitit Parisien" says that the British Government cannot entirely wipe out the former decisions of the Assembly, and describe as a complete failure what can only be regarded as a first effort.

The "Petit Journal" says that apparently Great Britain herself momentarily is not fearing aggression, and loses interest in the fate of the more exposed nations. The paper trusts that M. Herriot will emphasize the French point of view.

The "Figaro" says that Mr. MacDonald in urging the creation of a system of automatic arbitration, seriously modifies the spirit of the League.

The "Ere Nouvelle" says the speech is far from what was expected of a great British democrat.

The "Œuvre" deplores the negative character of the speech, but is confident that M. Herriot and Mr. MacDonald will find common ground to explore the road leading to justice and peace.

The "Gaulois" says that it is not admissible to ask France to expose her frontiers by demilitarization.

The "Excelsior" says that a formula must be found to reconcile the principle of arbitration with the system of assistance and sanctions.

The former Minister, M. Klotz, in an interview with the "Echo de Paris" said that unless the Anglo-French American Pact of 1919 can be replaced by a similar guarantee, the left bank of the Rhine will not be evacuated in 1925.—Reuter.

Hague Court of Justice.

The Hague, Sept. 5.

The Permanent Court of International Justice has elected M. Huber (Switzerland) as President in 1925-27, in succession to Dr. Loder (Netherlands). The change is a very interesting one, in view of the importance of the part the President will play in connexion with the Dawes plan

The Debate on Armaments.

Geneva, Sept. 6.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald was present at the Assembly of the League of Nations during the debate on armaments, which the President, M. Motta, said he was anxious to conclude to-day.

The Maharajah of Bikanir voiced the ardent interest of the Princes of India in the securing of peace and justice. They associated themselves with the proposal concerning arbitration. He entirely concurred with with Mr. MacDonald's rejection of the draft treaty of mutual assistance. It was imprudent to reduce armaments unless security were previously assured. The Maharajah, referring to the exceptional position of India and the complex problem of the frontier, said that the reduction of a garrison would weaken the security of India. —Reuter.

An Invidious Comparison.

Paris, Sept. 6.

M. Herriot's speech at Geneva yesterday is acclaimed by the press for its clearness as compared with the British Prime Minister's vagueness. The papers declare that M. Herriot dissipated the illusion that France would abandon the mutual assistance pact as promptly as she has abandoned the Ruhr.—Reuter.

Herr Marx's Indiscretion.

Geneva, Sept. 6.

Herr Marx, the German Chancellor, recently wrote to M. Herriot, stating that public opinion in Germany compelled him to issue a proclamation to the world repudiating Germany's war guilt, similar to his statement in the Reichstag.

M. Herriot instructed the French Ambassador in Berlin to point out the deplorable effect that such a pronouncemnt would produce on the world, and most of the German journalists at Geneva telegraphed Herr Marx in this sense.

Basis of Secure Peace Reached.

Geneva, Sept. 6.

A stirring scene was witnessed at the Assembly of the League of Nations this afternoon.

The British Delegation were convoked after the morning session and unanimously adopted the drafting of the armaments resolution, on which Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and M. Herriot subsequently had a long discussion in private

M. Motta, the President of the Assembly, read the resolution to all the delegates in the names of Britain and France: "The Assembly, noting the declarations of the Governments represented, remarks with satisfaction that they contain the basis of an understanding tending to establish and secure peace, and decides:—

(1) that, with a view to reconciling in new proposals divergencies of certain points of view, and, when agreement has been reached, with a view to enabling the convocation as early as possible of an international armaments conference by the League, the Third Committee is requested to consider material dealing with security and the reduction of armaments, particularly observations of Governments on the draft treaty of mutual assistance, in pursuance of Resolution XIV. of the Third Assembly, and other plans prepared and presented to the Secretariat since publication of the draft treaty, and to examine the obligations contained in the Covenant of the League in relation to guarantees of security that resort to arbitration and reduction of armaments may require;

(2) that the First Committee is requested, firstly, to consider, in view of possible amendments, Articles of the Covenant relating to the settlement of disputes; and, secondly, to examine within what limits the terms of Article XXXVI, paragraph 2, of the Statute establishing an international court, might be rendered more precise and thereby facilitate more general acceptance of the clause and thus strengthen the solidarity and security of the nations of the world by setting by pacific means all disputes which may arise between States."

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

There was loud and prolonged cheering after the speeches of Mr. MacDonald and M. Herriot.—Reuter.

Mr. MacDonald's Idealism.

The Britsh Prime Minister mounted the tribune immediately the reading of the resolution was finished.

In a brief, impassioned speech, Mr. MacDonald emphasized, with his hand beating the desk, the awful results of the Great War, and urged the Assembly to agree to the resolution, the nature of which he explained.

"We want to fill the gap," he declared, "by deciding exactly what are security, arbitration and disarmament, and provide for their realization. M. Herriot and myself have worked towards the same ends. We have used the same road and although we often started from opposite sides of the road we have always found ourselves eventually in the middle of the road." If the Assembly succeeded in carrying out the resolution, he said in conclusion, it would give the world "real, most sure security."

Mr. MacDonald was cheered to the echo as, with emotion and bowed head, he resumed his seat.

The French Premier then ascended the tribune. He said that it would be deplorable if the debate ended in a mere academic discussion. M. Herriot was convinced that the resolution was a great step towards the creation of a real living spirit of international solidarity. It possibly was not a perfect solution but it showed the desire and will of the Assembly to realize real progress towards an era of peace.—Reuter.

Guarantee Pact Widely Supported.

London, Sept. 6.

The formation of European, American and other groups inside the League of Nations for dealing with purely local problems, is the most novel feature of a plan which has been awarded the prize of £1,000 in the British Section of the competition, arranged by the American Mr. Edward Fileno, for the best essays on how to restore the peace and prosperity of Europe by international co-operation.

The prize-winner also favours the European Mutual Guarantee Treaty, or a similar pact, to which Great Britain and Ireland should adhere with the consent of the Dominions, who, however, would not participate.

A survey of other 36 prize-winning plans and essays of 4,700 British and Dominion competitors, shows that nearly half regard the League as the chief instrument of international co-operation. The majority urge the admission of Germany to the League, while the Guarantee Pact is widely supported.—Reuter.

Geneva, Sept. 6.

Mr. MacDonald and M. Herriot have left for Paris. They were given a splendid send-off by a large crowd, including many delegates. Mr. MacDonald told the pressmen that he was satisfied with the results of his visit.—Reuter.

Foundations for World Peace

Paris, Sept. 7.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and M. Herriot arrived here this morning from Geneva. Mr. MacDonald immediately departed for London.—Reuter.

London, Sept. 7.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald arrived here this evening. In an interview with Reuter's representative he stated that the foundations for world peace had been well and truly laid. Mr. MacDonald expressed the opinion that the names, Herriot and Geneva, would be ever associated with the new world era. M. Herriot had declared that for the first time we had seriously envisaged practical measures to enforce and ensure peace and that, apart from the Commissioners' work of elaborating the schemes, all schools and universities must be taught that our countries' aim was peace and not war.—Reuter.

An Appeal for a Home for Armenians: Italy and the Mutual Pact

Geneva, Sept. 8.

In a less tense atmosphere and with a smaller public attendance, the Assembly of the League of Nations this morning settled down to the ordinary work of the session, and discussion of the report of the work of the Council last year was resumed.

M. Ador (Switzerland), who strongly appealed in favour of arbitration to settle conflicts, also appealed for a home for the Armenian people.

The Assembly subsequently addjourned till to-morrow, and the afternoon was devoted to committee work.—Reuter.

Geneva, Sept. 9.

An important statement as to Italy's attitude was made by Sig. Schanzer at a meeting of the Third Committee dealing with the reduction of armaments. He said that Italy preferred strengthening, if necessary, the Covenant of the League rather than establishing new machinery which might divide the world into two camps: one standing by the Covenant, the other supporting the proposed treaty of Mutual Assistance. The Covenant was already a treaty of mutual guarantee. He had the same objections to the American project. Italy, however, was prepared to collaborate in amending the Covenant, which itself contained guarantees. The American plan proposed to give the International Court of Justice powers which did not belong to it. With regard to obligatory arbitration, Sig. Schanzer pointed out that certain questions were unsuitable for judicial procedure and he suggested that the Council of the League should deal with such. The Committee finally referred the replies of the various Governments on the draft Treaty of Mutual Assistance to a small sub-committee.—Reuter.

FRANCE SECURE OF AID IF ATTACKED

Gratification at Lord Parmoor's Offers at Geneva

Paris, Sept. 10.

The newspapers are very gratified at what they describe as the Anglo-French rapprochement at Geneva yesterday. They emphasize the importance of the cautious statement by Lord Parmoor that the question of sanctions required consideration as an accompaniment to arbitration.

The "Petit Journal" says it now appears that in the case of war, France will be in exactly the same position as in July, 1914.

The "Oeuvre" points out that for the first time Lord Parmoor when using the word "sanction" did not qualify it by "economic."

The "Matin" says that if Great Britain is really determined to lend the aid of her formidable fleet to attacked countries, it will be a real Franco-British shoulder to shoulder.

"The "Gaulois" is of the opinion that Lord Parmoor's declaration is valuable, and affords satisfaction to the French thesis, but cannot replace the mutual assistance treaty. —Reuter.

Geneva, Sept. 10.

In the course of the debate to-day on the work of the Council of the League last year, Mr. Tang Tsai-fou declared that there was no real peace unless it was based on principles of justice. He paid a tribute to the creat American State and to President Wilson, the founder of the League, and said that there was no real disarmament unless it was preceded by a moral disarmament.—Reuter.

Moscow' Sept. 10.—Mynheer Edo Fimmen, a Dutch trade unionist, and one of the members of the Second International, arrived here to-day.—Reuter.

GERMANY'S DENIAL OF WAR GUILT

British and French Premiers' Warning Against an Act of Folly

Berlin, Sept. 7.

In connexion with the question of Germany's war guilt, the Geneva correspondent of "Vorwaerts" states that the news that the German Government intended to send a Note to the Allies repudiating her guilt has caused general stupefaction, and that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald telegraphed warning the German Government against committing such an act of folly, and that Dr. Branting and Dr. Nansen acted similarly. The journal says that a high British personage declared that if Germany did this then everything would be finished. Apparently the warnings have not been without effect, for up to the present the German Government has not sent the Note and has not decided whether it will be sent at all, though omission to send it will arouse wrath among the German Nationals.

Later.

The French Ambassador, acting upon instructions from M. Herriot, has informed Herr Maltzahn, the Foreign Under-Secretary, that despatch of Germany's Note disclaiming responsibility for the war would at present create a bad impression in France. Therefore it would not be to Germany's interests to send it.

Herr Maltzahn admitted that the Government was adverse to sending the Note but it felt bound by its pledge to the German Nationalists, who had made the Note one of the conditions of their support of the Dawes Agreement.

It is understood that Herr Marx and Dr. Stresemann, who are on a holiday, have been asked whether the Note should be sent to the Allies or not.

Lord D'Abernon, the British Ambassador, has not yet been instructed to make representations similar to those made by the French Ambassador.—Reuter.

Berlin, Sept. 8.

It is officially announced that the Cabinet will not meet before the beginning of next week in order to decide the date and form of the notification to the Allies with regard to its repudiation of responsibility for the War.—Reuter.

THE TRADE UNION CONGRESS

Employment of Asiatics on British Steamers; Free Trade and Protection

London, Sept. 5.

The Trade Union Congress at Hull to-day passed a resolution empowering the general council to investigate the conditions of labour in eastern countries and also protesting against the continued employment of Chinese and other cheap Asiatic labour on British steamers. The resolution calls for a bill to make such employment illegal on British ships west of the Suez Canal.

Sept. 6.

The Trade Union Congress, before concluding to-day, overwhelmingly rejected a resolution submitted by the Printing, Bookbinding and Paper-workers' Union referring to trade union differences on the subject of free trade, protection and Imperial preference and asking the General Council to approach the Labour Party with a view to establishing a joint committee to investigate industries separately and report to the next Congress.

Mr. Cook, of the Miners' Federation, said that the resolution was one of the most dangerous submitted to the Congress.

Mr. McNamara on behalf of the textile workers of Lancashire opposed the resolution

The Congress adopted a resolution affirming its determined opposition to compulsory arbitration. —Reuter.

New York, Sept. 4.—Canadian National Railway 4½ per cent. bonds to the value of $26,000,000 have been issued, simultaneously in the United States and Canada, at 96.—Reuter's American Service.

ANGLO-SOVIET TRADE TREATY

Determined Resistance to Ratification in British Commercial Centres

London, Sept. 9.

There are increasing indications of determined resistance to the ratification of the Anglo-Soviet Treaty at the approaching Parliamentary session. The hostility of the commercial world is reflected in resolutions passed by the Chambers of Commerce of important centres like London, Manchester, Glasgow and Coventry. It is expected that the Conservatives will solidly oppose ratification, but whether the Liberals will ensure its rejection by voting against it and thus precipitating an appeal to the country is still uncertain; though it is significant that Mr. Lloyd George's adverse views are apparently shared by Sir John Simon and Mr. Walter Runciman. The Labour and the Unionist Parties are planning big autumn—campaigns in which the Treaty will be one of the principal topics. Both hope to benefit at the expense of the Liberals in the elections, which many believe are not far off.—Reuter.

Canada's Limited Recognition.

Ottawa, Ontario, Aug. 7.

Canada's recognition of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, confirmed last March, when its agency was established in Montreal, extends only to trade matters. A sharp reminder of this was conveyed by Premier MacKenzie King to the Soviet Agent, Alexander Zaziloff, in the course of conferences which have been progressing in the last two days in Ottawa.—Reuter's American Service.

Denounced by Mr. Lloyd George as "Fake and Folly:" The Irish Boundary

London, Sept. 10.

In a speech to-day at Penmaenmawr, Mr. Lloyd George denounced the Russian Treaty as fake and folly. The Prime Minister had been held up by Socialist gunmen. It was an act of criminal recklessness to guarantee huge sums to be spent by organisers of anarchy. The Liberal Party, declared the ex-Premier, would forfeit the respect of the nation if it shirked the challenge. The Government would suffer unparalleled defeat if it appealed to the country on the Treaty.

Mr. Lloyd George supported the Government's Irish policy and approved the letter from Lord Birkenhead to the Earl of Balfour, in which the former, who was one of the negotiators of the Anglo-Irish Treaty, contended strongly that the boundary clause meant that the Boundary Commission was intended to make only minor adjustments.—Reuter.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

Eight-hour Day Principle Ratified by All Representatives

Berne, Sept. 9.

The Conference of Labour Ministers concluded to-day. The Ministers agreed on the desirability of reaching a practical international application of the principle of the eight-hour day on the basis of the Washington Convention.

The German Minister, Herr Brauns, emphasized that he could not accept anything implying any sort of foreign control on German economic legislation. He was assured that the position of all countries signing the convention would be exactly the same. Any country doubting the efficacy of the application of the eight-hour day in another, may complain to the governing body of the International Labour Office, which may inquire into the matter. Finally the complaint may have to be submitted to the International Court of Justice.

Herr Brauns thereupon agreed to recommend the ratification of the convention by Germany.

M. Albert Thomas, the Director of the International Labour Office, speaking subsequently on the results of the Conference, declared that the full and sincere ratification of the Convention was bound to follow.—Reuter.

BRITAIN, EGYPT AND THE SUDAN

British Premier's Repudiation of Alleged Interview

Geneva, Sept. 4.

At a reception to pressmen here to-day, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald emphatically repudiated his alleged interview with reference to Egypt, in which he was stated to have declared that Zaghlul Pasha had ignored his last invitation to come to London and that he was convinced that the recent disturbances in the Sudan had been engineered by members of the Egyptian Government.—Reuter.

Meeting to Take Place in London Between British and Egyptian Premiers

London, Sept. 8.

Reuter's Agency understands that Zaglul Pasha has informed Mr Ramsay MacDonald that he is ready to meet him and that Mr. MacDonald has accordingly sent a communication expressing the hope that the meeting will take place towards the end of September. It appears almost certain that the meeting will be in London, in view of the fact that Mr. MacDonald, owing to numerous engagements, will not be able to leave England.—Reuter.

U. S. ISOLATION "NOT REAL INDEPENDENCE"

Baltimore, Sept. 6.

President Coolidge in a Lafayette Day address declared that there is no real independence in isolation, save as America secured it through the law of service. He claimed that the United States while avoiding entanglements had pursued that policy in Latin America and the adjustment of war problems of Europe. "If," the President said, "we want France and the other Allies paid, we can best work for that end by assisting the German people, now shorn of militarism, to their full place in the family of peaceful mankind."—Reuter American Service.

AMERICAN PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN

Republican Votes Likely to Be Affected by Woollen Market Break

New York, Sept. 6.

The political campaigns of the rival parties is likely to be affected by the passing of the American Woollen Co.'s common dividend, which has caused a break on the whole stock market, the woollen stock market itself dropping 18 points.

The Democats maintain that the action of the company has proved conclusively that the Republican cry of prosperity is a myth, and demonstrates the complete breakdown of the Fordney Tariff Bill.—Reuter's American Service.

Contradictory Reports

Madrid, Sept. 7.

General De Rivera, who has arrived at Tetuan, has sent a message stating that the situation in Morocco has slightly improved but, according to an official communiqué, the Spanish forces have been compelled to evacuate two posts in the Western zone. The enemy continued the pressure, but was finally repulsed. The Spanish losses are described as appreciable, but small as compared with the importance of the engagement.—Reuter.

THE IRISH BOUNDARY CONTROVERSY

Possibility of Agreement by Ulster to Appointment of Commissioner

London, Sept. 7.

It is hoped in some quarters that the Ulster Government may be influenced to favour agreeing to appoint a boundary commissioner by the action of Mr. Balfour publishing a letter form Lord Birkenhead, one of the negotiators of the Anglo-Irish Treaty. The latter wrote Mr. Balfour on March, 1922, strongly contending that the boundary clause meant that the Boundary Commission was intended to make only minor adjustments, and saying it was inconceivable that any competent or honest arbitrator could take the opposite view.

Thirty members of Parliament of all parties are touring the boundary of the region at the present time and investigating the situation.—Reuter.

SENSATIONAL CRIME TRIAL IN CHICAGO

Two University Students Admit Their Guilt: Sentence of Life Imprisonment

Chicago, Sept. 10.

The sensational trial concluded here to-day in which Richard Loeb and Nathan Leopold, 19-year old students of the Chicago University and sons of two Chicago millionaries, were accused of kidnapping and murdering the 14-year old schoolboy, Robert Franks, son of a well-known Chicago business man, from whom the accuced were alleged to have demanded $10,000 ransom.

Loeb and Leopold confessed to the crime. Each alleged that the other had struck the blow which killed Franks. The crime had apparently been carefully planned.

The defence pleaded for imprisonment rather than death on the ground that the accused were suffering from "mental sickness."

The case aroused the greatest excitement. The Chicago police had taken extraordinary measures to prevent a demonstration when the sentence was pronounced to-day. Threats to lynch the accused had been freely made, and many persons connected with the case had received anonymous letters from the Ku Klux Klan and other secret societies.

Later.

Richard Loeb and Nathan Leopold have been sentenced to imprisonment for life.

No Death Sentence for Minors.

Unparalleled precautions were taken to ensure the safety of Judge Caverly. Extra guards occupied the Court room throughout the night. The force inside and outside was increased to 500 men at dawn.

The proceedings lasted 10 minutes. The Judge pointed out that no minor had ever been sentenced to death in Illinois on a plea of guilty. While finding no mitigation in the crime itself, in the personality of the defendants or in that of their antecedents, he accepted full responsibility in declining to impose a death penalty on minors.

In order to comply with technicalities there were separate sentences: life imprisonment for murder and 99 years for kidnapping.

The Sentence Explained.

The sentence of 99 years on the kidnapping charge means that the prisoners cannot be released on parole for 37 years, whereas the life term alone would permit of release after about 20 years. The Court urged the Department of Public Welfare never to admit the prisoners to parole.—Reuter's American Service.

Reporting to the League of Nations, the Commissioner appointed to inquire into conditions on the Island of Nauru states that Chinese Kanakas and Nauruans are living together amicably and are well-behaved, industrious and well fed. No petitions have been received for transmission to the League.

Mr. John Ainsworth, who was deputed by the Commonwealth Government to report on the administration of former German New Guinea, recommends the appointment of an advisory council to assist the administration and also suggests admission of Asiatics.—Reuter.

BOLSHEVIK BARBARITY TO BRITISH SHIP

London, Sept. 5.

Remarkable allegations are made by the crew of the Cardiff steamer Glenester which arrived to-day at Barry from Russia.

The crew stated that a man who had been employed to guard the ship shot himself. The Rusian authorities detained the wireless operator and the third engineer, who went to fetch a doctor, and kept them in a barbed wire enclosure throughout the night, where they were cruelly illtreated by the Russian guard. The Russian authorities arrested the ship. Captain Young, who protested, was pinned against the rails with a revolver held against his stomach. The mate was hurled across the deck. The Russian guards terrorized the crew. The ship was only allowed to sail after the captain had been forced to sign a declaration that he and the crew were treated very courteously.—Reuter.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND DRUG TRAFFIC

China's Good Intentions Handicapped by Foreign Treaty Rights

Geneva, Sept. 11.

During the discussion on the opium question in the Fifth Committee of the League of Nations, Mr. Chu Chao-hsin expressed the opinion that the question had become a worldwide one.

China had good intentions with regard to suppressing the traffic, but unfortunately, she was bound by treaty and could not control the opium supply in her own territory because many foreigners in China still enjoyed extraterritorial rights. China would endeavour to do her best, but must look to the foreign Powers to do their best to assist her in fighting this evil. China had not yet been able to carry out the import certificate system adopted by the Third Assembly of the League, as the foreign Diplomatic Body of Peking had not yet given their approval.

When the Central Government of China had full power to enforce its law, the opium traffic would be abolished Immediately. They wanted to arouse public interst in the question, but the Chinese Government and people would never agree to any action or intention which would lead to interference of the sovereign rights of China.—Reuter.

ANTI-SOVIET REVOLT IN GEORGIA

League of Nations Watching Events: Desirability of Interference

Geneva, Sept. 11.

The Assembly of the League of Nations to-day referred to the Agenda Committee a joint resolution in the name of the British, French and Belgian delegates inviting the Council to watch attentively the anti-Soviet insurrection in Georgia and to seize the opportunity to enable the country to return to a state of peace.

M. Boncour (France) on behalf of the three delegations said that in the face of bloodshed it seemed disirable that the Assembly should make a gesture against which no State could take umbrage. "We have heard talk of peace; yet blood is flowing."

M. Boncour mentioned that before they left Geneva Mr. MacDonald and M. Herriot had received an appeal from Georgia.—Reuter.

Bolshevist Defeats.

DEATH OF WELL-KNOWN ARCHAEOLOGIST

Verdict of Suicide While of Unsound Mind: A Fatal Curse

Leeds, Sept. 11.

A verdict of "suicide while of unsound mind" was returned at the inquest to-day on Mr. H. G. Evelyn White, the well-known Far East and Egypt archæologist, who shot himself on Tuesday while proceeding to the inquest on Miss Helen Nind, a Leeds music teacher who had poisoned herself.

A brother of the deceased said that Mr. White a week ago had been very upset and had told him that Miss Nind had been pursuing him and that he had no affection for her. Miss Nind had threatened to commit suicide.

Dr. Maxwell-Telling, a personal friend of Mr. White, expressed the conviction that the relationship between the deceased and Miss Nind had been absolutely innocent.

A letter Written by deceased said: ".... I know there was a curse on me. Though I had leave to take those manuscripts to Cairo, the monks told me that the curse would work all the same. Now it has done so."—Reuter.

THE IRISH BOUNDARY CONTROVERSY

Ulster Premier's Determined Attitude

London, Sept. 12.

Sir James Craig, the Premier of Northern Ireland, in an interview to-day said that the letter which Lord Birkenhead wrote to the Earl of Balfour in March, 1922. strongly contending that the boundary clause meant that the Boundary Commission was intended to make only minor adjustments, made no difference whatever in his attitude in regard to appointing a Boundary Commissioner.—Reuter.

HEAVYWEIGHT BOXING

Firpo Defeated by Wills

New York, Sept. 11.

Harry Wills defeated Luis Firpo on points in their twelve-round bout this evening.

Eighty thousand persons were present at the fight. Firpo proved no match for Wills, whose defence was impenetrable. Wills succeeded in holding Firpo's rushes beautifully and at the same time inflicted heavy punishment on his opponent.

The only knock-down was in the second round, when Wills floored Firpo with a left to the jaw. The referee frequently had to pry the men apart owing to clinching. Firpo's gameness alone carried him through the terrific punishment which the negro administered.—Reuter's American Service.

THE SPANISH REVERSE IN MOROCCO

Contemplated Withdrawal from Occupied Territories: A Desperate Plight

London, Sept. 10.

A very gloomy view of the Spanish position in Morocco is taken by the Paris correspondent of the "Manchester Guardian." He says there is now hardly any doubt that the Spanish defeat in the Rift zone is irremediable. The Riffians are now almost under the walls of Tetuan, while communications with Ceuta are cut.

The Spanish expeditionary force of from 70,000 to 80,000 men are in a desperate plight, and barely able to hold their own on a narrow strip of territory close to the sea. The town of Sheshuan, with a Spanish garrison of 10,000, is completely cut off by the enemy.

General de Rivera will probably attempt to organize a special withdrawal from all the territories still occupied, except Ceuta and Melilla. —Reuter.

FROM THE FOUR WINDS

OUR AUSTRALIAN LETTER

A Political Crisis: The Banking Bill: The "Dead Heart" of Australia: Favourable Reports by Mr. Stefansson: Robbery under Arms: The White Ants of Communism

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Melbourne, July 30.

The position in Federal politics is approaching a crisis. The agreement between Mr. Bruce, the Prime Minister, and Dr. Page, leader of the Country party and also Commonwealth Treasurer, has not been accepted by the County organizations, though it has not been finally rejected. At a recent Inter-State Conference the delegates of the Farmers' Unions offered to compromise by agreeing to immunity at the next elections in regard to 70 out of the 75 seats, sitting members to be supported by both the Nationalists and the Country party, and where other candidates against Labour intrude preferences to be given away from Labour. The five seats are to be left an open question, and the whole arrangement is to depend upon a political policy agreed to by both sections of the present Ministerial following. Mr. Bruce has not yet accepted this, and seems disposed to seek some other way out of what threatens to be an impasse. Various suggestions are afoot, one that he should form a strictly Nationalist Ministry including such prominent politicians as Mr. Hughes, the late Prime Minister, Mr. Watt, the present Speaker, and Mr. Massy Greene, late Minister for Trade and Customs, who is now in the Senate, after being defeated by the County party at the last elections. Such an administration would, of course, be an exceptionally strong one, but the personal equation will intervene. Will Mr. Hughes agree to play second fiddle, after having been Prime Minister so long? Will Mr. Watt sink his differences with Mr. Hughes and sit with him in the same Cabinet, despite his previous declaration that he could no longer act with a man who was once a member of the Labour party? Dr. Page will deliver his budget this week, and there are hints that Mr. Bruce is postponing his final decision until he has done so. Amongst some of the Nationalist organizations there is a feeling of hostility towards any compromise with the Country party, which is disposed to coquet with Labour. How dangerous the Country party is may be gathered from the fact that at the very time it was professing its desire to come to some arrangement for co-operation with the Nationalists in Federal matters it was co-operating with Labour in the State Parliament to return a Labour man to the Senate against the President of the Nationalist Federation. The death of Senator Stephen Barker created a vacancy in the representation of Victoria in the Senate, and this had to be filled by a joint meeting of the two Houses of the State Parliament. The voting was by exhaustive ballot, and in the final vote every Country member, except two, voted with Labour to defeat the Nationalist. Undoubtedly this was an object lesson to Mr. Bruce, if ever he questioned the trickiness of his allies, and it would surprise no-one if he were to counter such slimness with similar slimness on his own part. His immediate Nationalist following is naturally furious, and by no means inclined to turn the other cheek to the smiter.

The Banking Bill.

The Government has quite unexpectedly been pulled up short over its Banking Bill, and by no less a person than Senator Massy Greene, whom the Country party thought they had eliminated from politics at the last general elections. Following upon the death of Senator E. D. Millen, the New South Wales Parliament, at a joint sitting, appointed Mr. Greene to fill the vacancy until the next elections, and the new Senator has made his voice very effectively heard without delay. He himself is an ex-banker and an ex-Minister and is a very capable and hard-working politician. His invention of the three-decker tariff and his handling of the schedules two years ago were masterly. Somehow I think Ministers had forgotten him. The Senate seems so remote, and sits so seldom. However, Senator Greene denounced the Banking Bill. He declared that it had been drafted by men who knew nothing of banking, while the Government had not consulted the private banks or even the Governor of its own bank. The Treasurer was neither a banker nor a commercial man, which was true enough, seeing that he is a medical practitioner. Senator Greene said that if he was sitting on the Opposition benches he certainly would support the measure, as it went nearer to the nationalization of private banking than anything so far proposed. He denounced the Notes Issue Board, and its failure to meet the currency requirements of the private banks which were financing the great primary productions of wool, wheat, etc. He suggested that the Bill should be hung up until a royal commission of banking experts had investigated the position. The Government hastily gave notice of several amendments, which were eventually adopted and the Bill sent back to the Representatives in a form which made it almost unrecognizable. The incident has also given the Prime Minister much to think about, seeing that the Bill was the offspring of Dr. Page's department.

Loans for Public Works.

Dr. Page, the Treasurer, has been following in the lines of his predecessors in trying to get some co-ordination in the matter of borrowing money for public works. He differs only from those who tried before him in his habit of talking of co-ordination as if it were the special policy of himself and the Country party instead of being the common ambition of all thoughtful public men. The States have always been very jealous of their rights to go into either the local or foreign markets for loans. Queensland actually borrowed in New York, but London is cheaper, and the experiment is not likely to be repeated. But the position is gradually becoming more difficult, and the smaller States, namely Queensland, Western and South Australia, have at last agreed to place their requirements before the Commonwealth Loan Council, and let it borrow for them on the most advantageous terms and at the most suitable times. The Loan Council consists of the State Treasurers and the Commonwealth Treasurer, but it is only advisory. Dr. Page seems gratified that he has made some little headway in this matter, but little can be gained until the two big States—Victoria and New South Wales—agree to pooling their loan requirements in the general scheme. Victoria, having a Labour government in office, will probably join in, for Labour will support anything which makes for unification. It is opportunist to the backbone, and supports unification because it holds that it would be easier to carry out the Labour policy if there were one supreme parliament than if there were seven parliaments to deal with. That it would be equally easier for the so-called anti-Labour governments does not apparently occur to the leaders of "Socialism in our Time."

Central Australia.

If ever an author regretted the title chosen for his book it must be John Walter Gregory, Professor of Geology at Glasgow and author of "The Dead Heart of Australia," published in 1906. The title has stuck to central Australia just as the belief that the North Pole marks a country of eternal night, and the absence of all life. It was in vain that the people who lived in the dead heart protested that they were not dead. Professor Baldwin Spencer travelled through the country and wrote a learned book on the aborigines, or what were left of them in the remnants of an ancient people of the stone age, with implements similar to those used in the Nile Valley before Tutankhamen existed, and with religious ceremonies, the origin of which has been lost in the passing centuries; but this work only served to strengthen the impression that central Australia, if not dead, was well on its way to that end. Now we are trying to absorb a new impression. Vilhjalmur Stefansson, the Arctic explorer, who has been lecturing to us on the subject of the flowers that bloom in the spring, and the butterflies that revel in the sunshine of the polar regions, has visited and indeed is now visiting central Australia. He telegraphs short daily letters to the press, while his lady publicity agent is doing the same thing. Interest is added by the fact that the Countess of Stradbroke, wife of the Governor of Victoria, is visiting the "dead heart" at the same time, and the Governor, Lord Stradbroke, who was delayed in Melbourne by political events, should have about joined them now It is alleged that just now the "Heart" is suffering from insufficient nourishment in the form of rain, none having fallen since last January, but the local stock-owners declare that they can easily carry on for another six months. Stefansson has made some interesting comments. He declares that there is no true desert, and compares conditions with those of Wyoming and Utah, in the U.S.A., much to the advantage of Australia. He saw, inter alia, some remnants of old tropical vegetation, and a few surviving palms, indicating that at one time central Australia had a humid climate and dense vegetation. Immense numbers of kangaroos were seen, considerable herds of cattle and horses, and irrigated vegetable gardens. He considered that the country had great pastoral possibilities, to say nothing of cultivation under irrigation. Indeed, it looks as if a colony of Mormons would de better there even than they have already done in Utah. Of course, communications are the trouble. Freight from the railhead at Oodnadatta to Alice Springs, a matter of 300 miles, is from £12 to £17 a ton, while the railway freight from Adelaide to Oodnadatta, 688 miles, is in itself a very serious item. It is expected that the present Commonwealth government will ask Parliament to extend the present line to Alice Springs. This will cost over £4,000,000, and will still leave 718 miles to connect up the southern half of the north-south line with the terminus from the North on the Katherine river, over which a bridge is now being built. An interesting fact recorded by Stefansson is that the aborigines, numbering about 230, who are looked after by a Lutheran mission, are so increasing in numbers by the excess of births over deaths that the question of supporting them is becoming something of a problem, with camel freight from Oodnadatta costing £12 a ton for flour alone.

An Incredible Story.

The most imaginative writer of adventure by flood and field could hardly suggest anything more blood-curdling than the story which is now being investigated by the Commonwealth authorities in the Northern Territory. It rests upon reports of travellers who have met aborigines at various places along the coast at the extreme north-west of the Gulf of Carpentaria, and the tragedy is pieced together something as follows. I believe I mentioned about this time last year that a steamer trading in the Gulf of Carpentaria, and round to Thursday Island was supposed to have been lost with all hands and some passengers in the heavy cyclonic storms about that time. The vessel was the Douglas Mawson, a small steamer, which left Normanton with 13 of a crew and Mr. and Mrs Willett and their five children. Mrs. Willett was 35 years of age and a daughter was aged 14. The vessel was said to have gone ashore at Cape Wilberforce, and the ship's Company reached the shore. While camped the party was attacked by blacks, all the men speared and their bodies burnt, while two women—one old and one young—were carried off inland. There is added to this the touch of the novelist in the allegation that two white men (bad men of course) landed and robbed the blacks of their booty in the way of money, threatened them that they must hold their tongues, and sailed away. Even the bad man of the novelist should have proved a hero and rescued the white women, as well as the hard cash. It seems incredible to those who know the country that the story can be true, but for all that the authorities are sending an armed expedition into the country—probably a procedure unknown in Australia for the past half-century. There have been many murders along the coast in this part of Australia, and the aborigines are known to be particularly savage and daring, but it seems unreasonable to accept the story that the white men landed with money on them, but omitted to carry firearms, or take the necessary precautions against surprise. The white man who hugs the North Australian coast is sometimes foolhardy, and trusts the natives to his own undoing, but to get 13 white fools together seems to accomplish the impossible. Curiously enough the authorities are incredulous, chiefly because the "bush telegraph" of the natives did not bring the news sooner. They believe that the Douglas Mawson went down in the Gulf with all hands; wreckage was found about this spot when a police search was made, but nothing was then to be heard to suggest the story which is now agitating Australia.

How Workers are Fooled.

Melbourne is still busily fighting out the question of bus v. trams, and I have only noticed one serious suggestion that we should have both buses and trams and let the best means of transport win. It is amusing to note that "Money" has got its back up against the wall. It is, on principle, a strong supporter of private enterprise, and hates Socialism as the devil is said to hate holy water. But in this particular case Money, representing those who are ratepayers, and must pay up any losses made by the municipal tramways, is strongly in favour of socialism. Like the tiger once it has tasted the blood of the multitude, it has no intention of going back to shedding its own blood. Labour on the other hand, finds itself holding on to Money and begging it to suppress private enterprise lest the men in very comfortable government jobs should find themselves thrown upon the cold, cold world. Poor Money cannot make out whether he should shake Labour's hand off and agree to fight the accursed private enterprise, or whether he should stand by his life-long convictions and fight for private enterprise. But there is suddenly thrust upon us a strange fact. It may be remembered that the tramway strike, which awakened private enterprise to the opportunities awaiting buses, was caused because a certain gripman refused to instruct a recruit on the grounds that the said recruit had offered his services as a special constable at the time of the police strike. The gripman got the sack, and the men, to the number of several thousand, promptly struck work. Now it has transpired that the recruit, over whom the trouble arose, was a recent arrival in the country, that he never volunteered as a special constable, and that the worst that can be said about him was that he offered to join the police in the ordinary way weeks after the police strike had finished. The intelligent executive of the Tramway Union has endorsed this statement, which has been duly published in the official organ of the tramway employees. Meanwhile, except at hours of peak loading, the tramcars are running empty, the motor-buses are riotously prosperous and adding to their numbers, and much newspaper space and printer's ink is being wasted in an endless controversy. And all because the men rushed into a strike—against the advice of their leaders, it is true—because they had been told something by some one and at once believed it. It looks remarkably as if the "white ants" of communism had been putting in some very useful work, which, according to Gompers, the American leader, chiefly consists of smashing up the trades unions.

Whether it is the aftermath of the police strike or not, Melbourne is having a very lively time just now with her armed criminals and footpads. No Friday evening passes without a certain number of people—supposed to be carrying home their week's wages—being struck up by armed men and robbed. The police authorities are making calculations. Last week they say that the shopbreaking and housebreaking cases averaged five a day, while there were 87 cases of larceny from dwellings, and 22 bicycles were stolen. The number of cases exceeded that of last year at the same time by 21, and the value of the goods reported stolen was £2,437. For the past fortnight there were 233 larceny and "breaking" cases, and 46 bicycles were reported stolen, the value of the property lost being £4,838, which averages a yield of about £16 per theft. This is not, of course, very serious, except that it is most disturbing to the humble citizen. More exciting, and profitable, was the hold up of a bank in the Canterbury suburb to-day. The manager was enticed out by a bogus message and then an armed man entered and after a struggle with the teller, during which the latter was shot in the foot and the wrist, escaped with £568 in notes. The scene of the crime is almost exactly opposite the Canterbury railway station, which is six miles from the centre of Melbourne. About 160 trains pass through daily, all stopping, so that it is a fairly busy centre. In regard to other robberies the police are making arrests, but are having difficulties in the matter of identification. The New Labour Premier of the State is declaring that crime must be put down, and already there is talk of greatly increasing the police force, the inadequacy of which was admitted by the last government, but allowed to persist in the sacred name of economy. The present government is likely to take advantage of the general scare to reinstate most of the police strikers, in accordance with the promise made by Mr. Prendergast, the Premier, during the recent elections.

Sale of Fruit Crops.

To those who recall the wailings of the fruit-canners, and their threats that unless they were able to buy up the over-supply of fruits at their own prices they would have to close down, the news that the whole of this year's pack has been profitably disposed of will come as a relief, more especially as many of the fruit-growers are returned soldiers who have been placed on their farms at very considerable public expense. But the canners have not only sold the current pack; they have received an offer from London to take the whole of next season's output at Californian parity. Of course one may expect the canners to look this apparent gift horse closely in the mouth, and to find reasons why it should not be all that it appears. They will probably complain about the price of sugar, though they use very little, and will ignore the fact that the Board of Sugar Control allows them a rebate on all sugar used so as to bring the cost to them of sugar in their exports down to world's parity. The growers of grapes, used for dried fruits such as raisins, currants, lexias and so forth, have also been on the verge of insolvency. There is an Australian Dried Fruits Association, which controls 95 per cent. of the output, but unhappily it has devoted most of its attention to promoting the sale of its products in Australia instead of looking abroad for additional markets. Thus New Zealand, close to our doors, imports immense quantities of dried fruits from the United Kingdom and the United States. The last-named country sells to new Zealand seven times as much currants and twice as much raisins as does Australia. The position of the returned soldiers, of whom there are several thousand in this industry, has certainly become precarious. It is not their fault, but that of those controlling the marketing of their produce. The government is now taking the matter in hand, and tiding growers over their tight places by making advances against this year's exports. It is worth remembering that Senator Wilson, who represented the Government at Wembley, reported on his return that it was not the question of price in London but merely the organization of the marketing. There were offers, he said, from London, to buy thousands of tons of dried fruits, but the sellers at the Australian end stood in the way by the unsatisfactory arrangements they made.

M. Herriot found time amid the heavy duties of the Conference to visit the "Cheshire Cheese" and partake of its famous pudding. He probably found, as other visitors have done, that the Dr. Johnson who is said to have frequented the famous tavern was not a forbear of the "Pussyfoot" bearer of that name, When the French Ambassador was at the "Cheese" last year he pointed out that it was far more important to agree about gastronomy than about politics, and it may be that the "pudden" will have a more direct influence on Anglo-French friendship than many of the things that have been said in Downing Street.

OUR PARIS LETTER

Close of Olympic Games: Nations that Require Lessons in Sportsmanship

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Paris, July 2!

Except for a few comparatively unimportant events, the Olympic Games have now come to an end with the United States first and the rest virtually "nowhere."

It is fortunate that the athletic competitions held in the arena, in the presence of the largest crowds, passed off without any serious friction, the only unpleasant incidents being the barracking of American athletes, in consequence, no doubt, of a feeling that they were really having too much success. The worst trouble occurred in the comparatively limited area of the fencing hall. The Italian sabre team would not accept some decisions of the judges, and one of the Italians behaved in such a manner towads a Hungarian that the executive committee, an international body, yesterday disqualified the Italian for all future Olympic events, censured the Italian sabre team and requested the Italian Olympic and fencing authorities to take strong measures against the offenders. Some people argue that it would be better to abandon the Olympic Games than to provide such occasions for international quarrels. On the other hand, as Mr. De Courcy Laffan points out, the greatest object of the Games is to provide a lesson in sportsmanship and fair play. The countries that are comparatively new to international athletic competitions need education in the best traditions, and they may learn to keep passion and politics out of sport when they get a few impartial judgments from such a thoroughly international body as the Olympic executive.

The Cycle Circuit of France

The cycle circuit of France, the longest and most exacting race of its kind in the world, was won by an Italian named Bottecchia, whose arrival at the finishing-post at the Parc des Princes velodrome was witnessed by 50,000 enthusiastic spectators.

The size of this crowd is typical of the interest aroused all over the country by this colossal test of courage and endurance. The inhabitants of almost every town and village through which the riders passed turned out in a mass to see them. In many places the obstruction caused by spectators on foot and in motor-cars was positively dangerous to the competitors. One of them was actually ridden down and dragged along for some yards by a car. Bottecchia was bowled over by an officious dog and narrowly escaped serious injury.

Out of 157 riders who started out from Paris on June 22 on the journey of 3,385 miles, only 61 completed it. There were 15 stages, separated by a day's rest, and some of them were over 250 miles. The course was from Paris to Havre, westward to Cherbourg and Brest, then southward along the coast to Bayonne, eastward along the Pyrenées to Nice, then northward through the Alps to Briancon, Metz, Strasburg and Dunkirk, and finally back to Paris.

The average distance per day to be covered was about 225 miles. The start generally took place about 2 a.m., and the riders were exposed to chilly nights and intensely hot days. In the northwest, they had a day of rain-squalls. In the mountains they had to climb terrific gradients and tear down the other side at breakneck speed. Most of them drank great quantities of liquid, and some drenched themselves with buckets of water as a relief from the heat. In the high altitudes they stuffed newspapers under their jerseys to keep out the cold.

The majority of the riders were professionals employed by leading firms of bicycle and tyre makers, who had staffs of masseurs and mechanics to look after the riders and machines at every stopping-place. The other competitors were ambitious amateurs, some of whom came unaided through this terrible test of endurance. One is a well-to-do farmer. Another, who broke down, is a Paris cyclist policeman. He evidently looks upon the race as a busman's holiday. The notary who started in the 1923 event was not allowed to compete this year. His mother, who acts as his trainer, did not consider him fit. She says she will look after him during the 1925 race if she can get him into proper condition!

Winner's Life Ambition Realized.

Bottecchia, the winner, was originally a stonemason. It occurred to him one day, on reading a newspaper containing accounts of cycle races, that he perhaps had more money in his legs than in his arms. He began to train, became a professional cyclist, and started out with the intention of making 150,000 lire, this being the amount which he considered necessary to rebuild the family home and create a nest-egg. This laudable ambition is now accomplished.

In the Tour de France race, prizes are given not only for the best times over the whole distance, but for the winner of each stage, and Bottecchia's total gains are in the neighbourhood of 100,000 fr. Having reaped sufficient glory and pelf, he is now retiring from the ranks of professional cyclists, but he threatens to provide a substitute in the person of another Italian stonemason who, he says, can do even better.

A Marriage in Mongolia

The story of a hasty marriage in Mongolia has just been told before the 1st Chamber of the Seine Tribunal.

In 1904, Comte Jacques de Lesdain, who was attached to the French Consulate-General at Shanghai, set out an a journey through Tibet and Mongolia. While in the latter country he encountered Miss Carmen Beley, daughter of an American railroad director. They fell in love and agreed to marry at once, and the ceremony was performed at Chabanor by two Belgian missionaries. It seems to have occurred to the lady that the legality of the union might be questioned; and, as soon as she arrived at Shanghai from the interior, she caused the marriage to be recorded at the French Consulate-General.

As her husband was attached to that institution, it may fairly be presumed that he, too, considered himself married. Returning to France with her husband, the lady notified the union to the French civil authority at Dunkirk; but, as love laughs not only at locksmiths but at lawyers, she assumed that the two notifications were sufficient. She did not know that, up to an age which appears remarkably mature in American eyes, a French citizen cannot legally marry without obtaining the consent of his parents or at least notifying them of his intention to commit matrimony and giving them time to dissuade him from the fatal step. Twenty years later, Comte Jacques de Lesdain, desiring to free himself, took proceedings for nullity of marriage, on the ground that no previous notice was given, that the consent of his parents was not obtained, and that the missionaries had no authority to celebrate marriages.

The court held that these legal arguments were sound, and granted the nullity decree asked for.

Recognition for War Generals: The Paris Communists and Jean Jaures

Paris, Aug. 1.

Continuing the process of correcting mistakes of the war period, the Chamber has just voted a Bill replacing Gen. Sarrail on the active list of the army, and this measure will no doubt be followed by others of the same nature. Any French general who has been put on half-pay can be replaced on the active list for the rest of his life if at any time he has been in chief command of French forces in the field. The only general at present on the active list in virtue of this regulation is De Curières de Castelnau, who, after the war, went into politics and sat in the last Chamber. Lyautey and Fayolle are marshals and Nivelle is dead.

If the special measure on behalf of Gen. Sarrail is confirmed by the Senate, the friends of other generals who are supposed to have been unjustly treated will agitate on their behalf. One of these is Gen. Lanrezac, who commanded the 5th Army in France in August, 1914. He repeatedly expressed his conviction that the Germans would advance through Belgium. He anticipated the turning movement which they made at the beginning of the campaign, and repeatedly asked permission to move his army up the Sambre, but G.Q.G. was not convinced and waited until it was too late.

Gen. Lanrezac is credited with having saved the situation after the battle of Charleroi and with having thus enabled the Allied forces to be reconstituted for the battle of the Marne. Before the war was a month old, Lanrezac was relieved of his command in consequence of his comments on headquarters—in which he openly said he had no confidence—his quarrels with the British command and the great freedom with which he criticised those who did not happen to agree with him. Although he saved his country from defeat at a most critical time, he has been left on half-pay for ten years, and he has not even the Croix de Guerre, so freely distributed to the humblest soldiers.

The Pacifier of Morocco.

Another commander who was hardly used is General d'Amade, who has twice directed operations against the enemy. It was he, more than anyone else, who drove the savage Moorish tribes back to the mountains, and he has been called the "Pacifier of Morocco." When Turkey joined in the war, Gen. d'Amade recommended an advance on Constantinople along the coast of the mainland, with Mytilene as the base of operations. The Allies preferred Sir Ian Hamilton's scheme for a combined naval and military attack on Gallipoli, the disastrous results of which are a matter of history.

"Enfants de Lenine."

The tenth anniversary of the murder of Jean Jaurès the great Socialist orator (whose ashes, Parliament has just decided, are to be placed in the vaults of the Panthéon) was celebrated in Paris by a Communist demonstration. Those who unconsciously associate the word "communist" with what happened in Paris in 1871 may be at once reassured. The "demonstration" was not nearly so terrible as it sounds. It was quite orderly, and was carried out in strict accordance with plan. The Paris Communists, be it stated, have forms and ceremonies of their own, and their public manifestations are beginning to look more and more like religious gatherings, if, of course, we leave the red banners out of account.

The Communists assembled in the Avenue Malakoff and marched along the Avenue Henri Martin to the Square Lamartine, where a bust of Jaurès was to be unveiled. At the foot of this piece of statuary, two members of Parliament, MM. Cachin and Semard, whose faces wore an expression of great solemnity, deposited wreaths. Then came a march-past accompanied by choruses which sounded remarkably like hymns. The way was led by a lot of unfortunate children called the "Enfants de Lénine," in red breeches. Some of them were so little that one wondered why their mothers were not there to lead them by the hand, but perhaps they were orphans. In any case they must have wondered what it all meant. Then came a few lads and girls and finally the bulk of the Communists. It was not really very bulky. The banners were plentiful but their escorts were far from large. At four o'clock the ceremony ended, the banners were rolled up and carefully put into their cases to protect them from possible rain, and the ardent Communists went on to the adjoining Bois de Boulogne, where it was soon impossible to distinguish them from mere members of the middle classes.

St. Louis Up to Date.

The Ile St. Louis—the small island in the Seine, adjoining the one on which Notre Dame stands—is going in for comic "stunts," having been encouraged, no doubt, by the success which has attended the efforts of the "free commune of Montmartre." The Ile St. Louis even goes one better than Montmartre. It is not content to be a mere commune. It is a "republic," and its present mission is to hold Sunday afternoon open-air entertainments.

The "republic" is governed, like ancient Venice, by a Doge and a Council of Ten, and the Doge, who is M. Roger Devigne in private life, has remembered that St. Louis, when King of France seven centuries ago, used to sit under an oak tree and administer justice to his subjects. The Doge has made up his mind to revive this excellent practice, but as the island does not produce any oaks he has had one made out of cardboard and set upon wheels. On Sunday afternoon, sitting beneath its slightly inadequate branches, he will, by trumpet blast, summon for trial an offender against the laws of the "republic." The criminal was allowed to wear a bright green uniform belonging to the "republic" at the last Sunday festivities, and it is alleged that he neglected to use proper and sufficient care, with the result that the uniform was soiled and had to be sent to a cleaner's, thus putting a strain on the public finances. These frolics are to be encouraged. They help to make people forget their taxes and other troubles.

"Jeu de Graces."

An old Parisian, strolling casually the other day through the bric-à-brac fair in the Boulevard de Sebastopol, spotted an article the very name of which is quite unknown to the younger generation. It was a "jeu de grâces"—a set of the simple apparatus for playing a game that was once popular among French women, long before lawn tennis, in its modern form, was invented. Each player had two wands, painted in bright colours, about 18 inches long, and two 12-inch rings covered with leather or velvet. The players stood about 20 yards apart, and one of them, taking a ring on both wands, separated them sharply and sent the ring flying towards her adversary, who had to catch it on both wands or on one. To play the game well required considerable deftness and agility, and it could be, and generally was, invested with the gracefulness from which it derived its name. Perhaps there is still an old-fashioned shop in some provincial town that keeps appliances for this innocent pastime, but it would be very hard to find.

BOTTOMLEY'S PRISON LIFE

Story of Favoured Treatment: "Valet" to Wash Him and Lace his Shoes

That Horatio Bottomley was receiving special treatment in prison has been often stated, but no actual account of the favours he is allowed to enjoy has yet been made public.

The following letter has been written to the "Daily Herald" by one who was until lately a fellow-prisoner with Bottomley and worked side by side with him. It describes exactly what is the difference between the conditions under which Bottomley is serving his sentence and those which apply to "ordinary" prisoners. It is time that the question should be asked: Why does Horatio Bottomley enjoy preferential treatment which has not previously been accorded to any convict, political or otherwise?

"Bottomley, as you may know, lives in the hospital. As far as Maidstone Prison is concerned, men try to keep out of hospital. Admission thereto was (and still is in the case of all other prisoners) always regarded as a form of solitary confinement.

"No such restrictions, however, apply to Bottomley, who is permitted to use the hospital for purposes of eating and sleeping, and still enjoys the privilege of associated labour in the workshop.

Reference to Bevan.

"He not only enjoys a dietary which would keep a navvy fit, and which includes fish and grilled mutton chops, but has actually got a valet to wash his back, lace his shoes, etc.

"Older men than he are sent to prison, men in worse physical condition than his are to be found there; unfortunately for them, they cannot claim friendship with highly placed personages.

"There is at least one other prisoner at Maidstone serving a like sentence, who is, in regard to age and infirmity, Bottomleys equal, and who was socially his superior, but who made the huge mistake of robbing his own class instead of the workers. He neither asks for, nor receives, preferential treatment, but takes his punishment without squealing or getting others to squeal on his behalf.

[The reference is presumably to Gerard Leigh Bevan.—Ed., Daily Herald.]

"Ordinary criminals have exercised, had breakfast, and are working by 8 a.m. Bottomley does not arrive at the printer's shop before 10 a.m. (and in winter time he is the only one to arrive in overcoat and gloves). He is accommodated with an arm-chair (with plenty of cushions), placed on a slightly raised platform in order that the soles of his shoes shall not rest upon the concrete floor.

Bottomley's Task.

"Lunch is taken from 12.30 till 2 p.m., and, although all other prisoners are kept at work until a few minutes before 6 p.m., 'Horatio' still keeps to his usual office hours, and quits the printer's shop about 4.30 p.m.

"A value is usually placed on each convict's labour, but the patriot's contribution is such that neither his name nor his number (which happens to be 13) is included in the roll of men employed. His precise occupation consists of separating the sections of old bound library books with the aid of a knife or scissors, preparatory to their being rebound.

"No other man who is living in the hospital is permitted to break the monotony by being allowed the privilege of going into a workshop where he may see and sometimes speak to other prisoners.

HOUSES IN THREE DAYS

M.P. Explains His New Invention: Light Material Strong as Concrete

Commander Burney, M.P., who, as the result of the invention of a new material holds out the prospect of building houses in three days, gave details of his discovery—which is being considered by Mr. Wheatley, the Minister of Health—to a "Daily News" representative.

The material is the joint invention of Commander Burney and an English chemist. It has, the Commander claims, a cement basis and the tensile strength of steel.

The purchase price of a parlour house (three bedrooms, a kitchen, a parlour and a living room) made from this material, he estimates at £470 inclusive.

At the moment Commander Burney is making arrangements to acquire a factory site.

This year two experimental houses only will be built, after which he expects to be in a position to begin to manufacture on a large scale.

"Twice as Strong as Concrete."

"The material," he said, "has taken over a year to evolve. Its chief assets are that it is twice as strong as concrete and half as heavy. Unlike concrete, too, it is not brittle. Its cost I estimate at about 8½d. per cubic foot.

"It is again as permanent as concrete, if anything more watertight, as heat-resisting and will take on any colour.

"The houses I propose to build will have hollow walls—each wall to have a 7-inch air space—and but for the doors the houses will contain no wood in their construction. They will be built, of course, in sections—each pair of houses in 240 parts."

The houses, he added, would be of varied design, and contain all known labour-saving and hygienic devices.

The material had been subjected to severe tests. "It cracks only after a sustained pressure of 4,700 lb. to the square inch." Commander Burney said "Yet it is barely heavier than wood.

The "Kent" Scheme

which is receiving Mr. Wheatley's personal attention is that known as the "Kent" system of rapid house-building. In this Lady Terrington is directly interested.

Houses of subsidy size and built in sections of concrete slabs could be erected quickly, Lord Terrington told the "Daily News," at an approximate cost of £400.

"The slabs fit into upright posts of concrete, and do not require any real laying. The work can be carried out mainly by unskilled labour" (as in Commander Burney's scheme.)

To-morrow, at Marlow, a further demonstration of Colonel Caughan Kent's system is to be given, when a gang of unskilled labourers will attempt to erect the complete front and the side walls of a pair of houses in eight hours, or one working day.

OUR SCOTTISH LETTER

Mendelssohn and the Bagpipes: When to Visit Scotland: What is a Short Putt?

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Edinburgh, July 30.

August is the month in which the Scottish people vacate their old country to make room for the English. From the end of this week until well on in September the Scottish accent will be little in evidence in Edinburgh's Princes Street or north and west of Perth. Fashion, tradition, and grouse shooting are the regulatory factors of the English invasion. There is also the attraction of heather in bloom. But August is by no means the best month in the Scottish year. It is in June and September, the months respectively of fesh foliage and autumnal tints, and in both cases of brilliant atmospheric effects, that the Highlands attain their true glory.

The conventional English tripper seldom sees Scotland at its best. And though the lure of Scotland's beauty is as potent as ever, the highest appreciation of it is reserved for Scottish people themselves. A succession of holidays in their own country tends to stale their enjoyment. But they have only got to spend part of a holiday out of Scotland to realize on their return the prodigality with which Nature has distributed her varied gifts of beauty over the greater part of Britain north of Carlisle and the Tweed.

Norway and Switzerland excel Scotland in sheer grandeur, and Italy in the combination of grandeur and richness. But the beauties of those countries are, so to speak, standardized, and at many points even monotonous. The endless variety of Scotland does not depend merely on the contrasts between lowland and mountain scenery, it prevails to an even more surprising extent within the Highland area itself, where both the scenery and the atmosphere that envelops it and gives it character vary in so subtle yet so definite a fashion that every mile of a walking tour leaves a separate and indelible impression in the mind. And when heat haze or rainy mist dims the wider prospects the eye can find delight in minor details of scenery that are excelled only in some of the islands of the West Indies. The only feature lacking is the native human accompaniment. "But where are your peasants?" the German tourists used to ask when they visited Loch Lomond and the Trossachs. That, of course, is another story.

Mr. MacDonald and Moray Golf Club.

A motion rescinding the expulsion of Mr. Ramsay Macdonald in 1916 for his conduct during the war was carried at a special meeting of the Moray Golf Club, but the original decision still stands as the club's constitution requires a two-thirds majority.

The Chaffering Chinese.

An Edinburgh lady in a letter from Vernon, British Columbia, remarks: We had a great time hunting for land. We saw land so poor you could not raise an umbrella on it. We saw other land poorer still, on which we were assured an Irishman could not have raised a disturbance. Then she goes on,—I recently sold my ducks to a Chinaman. Selling ducks to a Chinaman is no small matter. It extends over days—nay, weeks. First, he comes and asks for "big bossy-man." "Me big bossy-man," says I. "You ducks," says he, pointing to said ducks. "Me ducks," I nod. "Me sullum. How much?" "Fifteen cents a pound," he says. At that you laugh uproariously. It's a thoroughly good joke. "Thity-five cents a pound," you say. His whole Mongolian face shines in one comprehending grin. You are a jester, you; you have a fine sense of the humour of life. These little commerce. It puts one in a good frame of mind to talk of large sums like 35 cents. but, of course, "sixten cents," says he. But you say no, and having no further time to waste, shut the door. That, however, is merely a beginning. The Chinese do not get discouraged. He hangs around all day, looks at the ducks, goes away, comes back, offers a cent more, and so on. Next day he appears again. He has a different offer, $1.20 per bird. "They big ducks," you say. "No, no," says he, pitying your ignorance, "small ducks." You pick one up and weigh it. "Seven pounds," you say. He positively giggles at this. Not only are you a jester, but your scales are a joke. With the most charming childlike smile in the world he mutters something unintelligible, which you may or may not interpret to be "You damliar," "Five pounds," he suggests. After interminable haggling you maybe get $1.25 or $1.30 per duck. He has the patience of eternity.

The Bagpipe.

According to Mr. Frank Adam in "The Highland Septs and Regiments of the Scottish Highlands," a newly published and most interesting volume, in their earliest form the pipes appear to have been used without any bag. In this form the strain upon the player of the pipes was so great that he had his lips and cheeks bandaged with a sort of leathern headpiece, which was known to the Romans as the "capistrum." It was probably this form of the bagpipe which is referred to in the Scriptures. It would appear that, even at that time, the pipes were a very loud-sounding instrument. There is record of a promise made by the Roman Emperor Nero to appear before his subjects as a utricularius or bagpipe player. The second of the series of evolutions of the pipes was the addition of a small bag and blowpipe to a chante of three or four holes. In this garb the pipes can be traced back to the ninth century A.D.

Mr. Adam details the history of the pipes in a most interesting manner, and tells some good stories. A piper from Coire-Garf, in Mar, named Donald Ferguson, joined Prince Charlie's army during "the '45." When Colonel Roy Stewart surprised and made prisoners a party of Hanoverian troops at Keith, Donald was thrown, in the skirmish, off the bridge into the Isla. However, he stuck to his pipes, and these, with great presence of mind Donald kept blowing with vigour, the inflated bag completely keeping him above water until he was rescued by some of his comrades.

Many people argue that there is no music in the bag-pipe, but as might be expected, Mr. Adam recalls that at least one musical composer of European celebrity learnt to appreciate the great Highland bagpipe. He alludes to Mendelssohn, who introduced an imitation of its strains into his Overture to the "Hebrides." Mendelssohn actually wrote 20 bars of that music in Fingal's Cave. In Edinburgh he was present at the annual competition of Highland pipers in the Theatre Royal. He also visited Holyrood Palace, saw the traditional scene of the murder of Rizzio, and the chapel with the altar at which Mary was crowned, standing "open to the sky, and surrounded with grass and ivy, and every thing ruined and decayed." "I think," he continues, "that I found there the beginning of my Scotch Symphony."

A Golf Query.

The short putt is so often in the golf dock that we overlook the disparity there may be in the views of what actually constitutes a short putt. It may be anything from a pencil's length to a yard, or even more. One man's child's-play in this matter may be another man's penance, though the putt of 24 inches or up to 3 feet appears by common consent to be the indictable range. Willie Park's idea of a short putt was, however, longer than that. This prince among putters in his book assesses any range up to 5 feet from the hole as a short putt. To many 5 feet is, to put it mildly, "that nasty distance," and a short putt in their view is played from distinctly nearer the hole. As we become permanently surer with our putters, if we ever do, or in proportion to the measure of our confidence on any given day, the five feet estimate may set the standard of the short putt, and a new higher standpoint in this respect may be one of the possibilities of the putting course vogue of which we see a good deal nowadays. It is refreshing to watch juvenile putting. There is no "now I'm for it," strained look, no furrowed brows, and the ball quite frequently gets into the hole—even from that short putt distance wherever you define the maximum. What the child seldom lacks is confidence. Some time ago a writer described someone's putting as childish. What was wrong with it in respect of confidence probably was that it was not childish enough.

Duncan Couldn't Do This.

I have just come across an account of a marvellous golfer who ought to be heard of in the Open Championship. He is Lord Bakefield, a character in a new novel by Maurice Leblanc, the French writer. When Lord Bakefield drove off on this particular occasion "the ball flew through the air and suddenly veered to the left; then, curving to the right after passing a clump of trees which formed an obstacle to be avoided, it fell on the putting green at a few yards distance from the hole." The author might have made it a few inches, but he's none of your romancers. And did Lord Bakefield look dazed, gaze in wonder at the ball which had performed so marvellous a flight? He did not. Listen. "'Well done!' cried Simon. 'A very pretty screw.' 'Not so bad, not so bad,' said Lord Bakefield, resuming his round."

Back to the Porridge and Oatcake.

Porridge is one of the three principal ingredients—the other being whiskey and the Shorther Catechism—which are supposed to have gone to the making of the Scots character. And if Scots character is not what it was, and should be, we presume it is because whisky is too dear, the Catechism rather unpopular, and porridge a gradually disappearing dish. It is, however, a question not only of character but of health and physique, according to the British Medical Association. In the opinion of Dr. Simpson, of Golspie, the Highlands of Scotland in the last 20 years have shown great deterioration through diet. The crofter formerly took porridge, milk, and mutton broth; he was then worth looking at. Tea had now largely taken their place. "Instead of oatcake," he remarked, "we have bakers' bread of the whitest description. The nearer we get to civilization the whiter becomes our bread."

If porridge is less popular with the Scots perhaps the balance is to some extent restored by the steadily-growing popularity of the dish in London. It is served as part of the regular breakfast menu at the boarding-houses of Soho, Bayswater, Clapham, and Brixton, and is daily served at all the leading hotels. Even at the Ritz, Savoy, and Carlton it is always available. Moreover, the porridge habit has obtained a hold of London's middle classes. Both at hotels and private houses, however, the meal employed is not the rough stuff of old Scotland but oats prepared in special patent ways, and there is a big difference between the natural and manufactured food.

In days of old the sturdy Scot,
Was hard and tough as steel,
Because, they say, he ate a lot
Of homely, healthy meal.
But if instead he turns to tea
The retribution cruel
Will be, we understand,, that he Can't give a foe his gruel!

Speaking of porridge, have you heard this one? It was told by a prominent curler at the dinner of the Royal Caledonian Curling Club at Perth. A Scotsman died and found himself at the gates of Heaven. He was interviewed by the Apostle Peter, who asked him where he came from. On being told that he hailed from Scotland, he was informed that he would have to go away as they could not afford to make porridge for one.

THE BOMAN DAYS

The Ordnance Survey, by way of a diversion from its great task of mapping modern England, has had the happy thought of putting Roman Britain on a map, with all its roads, so far as they are known or almost known, and its forts and legionary camps and colonies and towns (says the "Manchester Guardian"). Simple as the map is, it must be in its way one of the most remarkable that have ever been compiled. In the lines that mark its roads and the circles and squares that stand for civil communities and military posts may be read the successive chapters of the conquest of a country and the growth of a civilization that lasted for nearly four hundred years and then crumbled and passed utterly away under the shock of a barbarian onslaught both by land and by sea. The first road that the Romans must have made, from Richborough to London, is here, together with those to Silchester, St. Albans, and Colchester, by which they set out, fanwise, on the great conquest. West of the road from Gloucester up to Chester lie the groups of forts by which they sought to hold the Celts in Wales, while up the low-lying lands of the west and east coasts run the roads by which they isolated the fierce tribes of the Pennines, with occasional connecting roads from east to west, and chains of forts as they reached the line where eventually ran Hadrian's wall. In Wales and the north the forts and camps predominate; in the Midlands and south were the settled and peaceful townships. How many of these there were, how thoroughly England was covered by the network of roads (and where it was not covered the roads were still a network thrown round the enemy to contain him), may be seen on a map like this and not easily otherwise. It is a complete chapter in England's history, a monument of the Romans' energy, and an evidence also of the fierce and determined spirit of the invaders who so utterly destroyed them and their works.

DISSATISFACTION OF WOMEN

Labour Government's Failure to Meet Their Wishes in Legislating

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

London, Aug. 12.

There is one class which seems thoroughly dissatisfied with what Parliament and the community are doing for them—women! When the present Labour Government came into office they expected great things from it, since they were apparently innocent enough to imagine that all the Labour promises would materialize at the earliest opportunity. As a matter of fact, nothing has been done up to the present to carry out a single thing for which the women were campaigning, and this annoys them intensely because undoubtedly they thought they were making great progress politically and carrying all before them.

Every Flapper Her Vote

In the first place, there was the promised Equal Franchise. A Bill was brought into the House this Session, but it is still hung up, while each Party contends that the other is to blame. The candid truth is that nobody approves privately, whatever they may say publicly, the lowering of the voting age of women from 30 to 21 at one sweep. Most people would not object to 25, but between 21 and that age, a vast number of women, though there are of course exceptions, know nothing whatever about public affairs and for the most part take little interest in them. Although an immense amount of correspondence sent to members of Parliament passes through my hands I have not yet seen a single protest by any individual woman against the delay in passing the Equal Franchise Bill. One or two Societies have moved, but then that is their paid job. Of course, the Labour Party could have passed the Bill, and would have cornered the other Parties if it had pushed it to the front, but I gather that it is not quite so sure how these women would vote if they were placed on the register, and so it has lost some of its keenness in the matter. It now proposes to drop the Bill altogether, and go to the county alleging that the other two Parties have killed it. Such are politics.

In the next place the women claimed equal guardianship of both parents over their children. The Government could not swallow that. They introduced a Guardianship of Infants Bill, which goes a certain way along the lines required, but not as far as the women would like. Here again, there does not seem to be any great popular backing of the Equal Guardianship cry. I suppose that most married women always feel that there must be some sort of final deciding authority in any household, since a family which always found its affairs at a deadlock would speedily break up altogether.

As Usual No Money

Next, come Widows' Pensions. The principle has been approved by the Commons, but there is still no money in sight. The fourth sex problem was "Equal Pay for Men and Women in the Civil Service." The topic came up again this year, but the Government, while approving the principle, said they could not afford it as it would add £10,000,000 to the estimates. This has very greatly annoyed the women civil servants, or, at all events, some of them, and this annoyance has not been diminished by the campaign of the ex-service men to get the women out of the Civil Service as much as they can. This is not out of hostility to women, but because they want a livelihood for themselves.

Finally, there come the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Bill and the Legitimacy Bill, dealing with two groups of unfortunate women, viz., the ill-treated wife and the unmarried mother. These Bills will get through all right, and they would have got through long ago but for the fact that woman in politics is never an opportunist, and if she cannot have what she wants she usually prefers to have nothing at all.

Women Quitting the Shops

Industrially, the women are finding quite as little to encourage them. In the annual report of the Chief Inspector of Factories and Workshops for 1923 occurs the following passage:—

"There is a general consensus of opinion that the reversal of the process which was so striking a feature of wartime industry is now practically complete. Women have returned to women's industries, and very few of them are to be found even in those sections of men's trades for which wartime observation showed them to be peculiarly well fitted. Those who do remain have been retained as survivors of a vanishing period, and, although they will not be dismissed, they will be succeeded as they marry or retire, by men.

A statement like this is, of course, very unpalatable and the women's newspaper organs are trying to explain. They contend that the distinction between men's and women's trades does not depend upon the amount of physical exertion required. They put forward as the explanation not the work itself, but the history of the past 100 years governing the whole problem of women's industrial position. After the war a fourfold movement set in to operate against the retention of women in industry. First came the return of the ex-Service men. Pre-war employers in arranging staff reductions cynically acted upon the old courtesy adage of "ladies first." Then the ex-Service man had to be provided for—this meant the departure of more women. Thirdly the trade slump prejudiced the position of women far more than it did that of men, and fourthly the Trade Unions, when faced with the question as to who was to stay in and who to go out of the industries, decided, almost inevitably, that it should be "ladies first." These causes explain why women at the present time have practically lost all the ground they gained in the war, and the heartsearching as to causes has yielded the following concrete result. The whole position hangs again upon the old problem of equal pay for equal work. While women accept lower wages and humbler positions for equal work, the Unions must fear their competition and condone their exclusion.

The Question of Efficiency

Probably the women are more to blame themselves than they will admit. Their standard of general ability and usefulness in business is never, on the average, so high as it is among men. The majority are quite willing to attain to a certain standard but show no keenness by study or by self-education to go beyond it. It is for this reason that the majority of them, while able successfully to compete for posts in the lower grades, find that the avenues of promotion are nearly always barred. They are not barred in any way on sex grounds, but merely on the ground of efficiency.

MELBOURNE, Sept. 5.—Mr. S. M. Bruce, the Prime Minister, to-day announced that the Australian Government were not involved in any loss in connexion with the British Empire Exhibition.—Reuter.

THE LIGHT SIDE OF LIFE

In Search of Humour

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

London, Aug. 7.

We all search for humour nowadays and I think the palm should be awarded to the gentleman mentioned in the appended paragraph—

A Scotsman charged at the North London Police Court yesterday with being drunk was asked by the magistrate if he had anything to say. "Only," he replied, "that I was in the worst 2 min. in the morning paleing the tramlines."

He is not exceptional. In the old days when gas was used and before electric light came in it was common for smokers to climb the posts in search of a light and if in hilarious mood they frequently cleaned the glass sides and did other cheerful misdeeds which a sober and matter-of-fact public always misinterpreted.

The latest effort at imparting humour and excitement into life is the formation of the Society of the Bright Young Things. They have been getting into sad trouble of late, getting into sad trouble of late. These Bright Young Things—by the way no age is apparently barred since "young" means young in mind and not in years—have paper chases by motor-car early in the morning. They subscribe to a pool and then one of their number works out a sort of scheme of missing and cryptic clues. They are handed the first clue and when they proceed to the spot and unravel it they are then and there confronted with another similar clue and have to continue on from clue to clue until they run their final quarry to earth. There is a good deal of excitement clearly in that business both to those who take part in it and to those who don't as the participants tear about London in their motor-cars at breakneck speeds, but since the hunt seldom begins till after midnight accidents are few and the only prosecutions hitherto have been for exceeding the limit of pace.

The Bright Young Things are mostly actresses and a certain proportion of the male jeunesse dorée—but none the less their keenness and youth have not saved them from caustic comment on the absurdity and recklessness of the whole business, especially in these democratic days. Much of the criticism is top-heavy. I think the whole scheme is a bit ridiculous and not a little selfish, but to denounce it with the ferocity now employed is like killing a fly with a hammer. Anyway the Bright Young Things are still going on with their pastime since there is nothing in it actually contrary to law.

Successor to "Beaver."

Then there is another new pastime—it is about as stupid as the game of "Beaver" which was uttered on seeing a bearded individual, the person who made the exclamation first at the sight of a face-fungused individual being regarded as the winner. With the new pastime two persons ascend an omnibus and sit on different seats and as the vehicle passes some well-known spot or edifice one says to the other—supposing it is Westminster Abbey—"Just look at the Law Courts." Thereupon some stranger sitting near probably interposes with "You will forgive me, but that is Westminster Abbey" whereupon Number One politely rejoins, "I thank you Sir. That is 'one up' to me." He probably thinks you have only left Hanwell a little while before, but you are unperturbed and you leave your colleague to try his inventive powers and see if anyone will "fall" to them.

These stunts seem always popular. We are still fond of the old jape of standing on the street pavement and looking fixedly up at the roof of the building opposite. At intervals you remark in long drawn out accents "Ah-h-h-h." In about five minutes you will have at least 350 people all looking up at the roof whereupon your cue is to retire before they tumble to what is happening and seek your gore.

Such "exploits" are modest enough. We have not the courage of the young bloods in the olden days, when as Lord Montagu related the other day in the House of Lords, he and some youthful friends wishing to show the ease with which the streets of London could be dug up without challenge, actually selected a busy thoroughfare near the Bank, calmly stopped all the traffic and took up a large section of the roadway without the least inquiry from anyone as to their rights in so doing. Yet I almost think you could do it now.

What is the one thing in the side streets of London which will always draw a huge crowd—a Punch and Judy Show. There are still a few of these left though the race is dying out and despite the general assertion that they are only intended for children, I have long ago come to the conclusion that they are secretly maintained by adults. Children have, I fear, less humour than grown-ups, as only to-day we are assured they have long since ceased to read Dickens and Thackeray and devote themselves exclusively to Wells and Shaw.

Frankly we all look for humour in the streets. That is why we think the Scotsman referred to above was such a joyous soul. They ought not to have fined him. They ought to have paid his Wembley expenses, and invited him to come back to London next year.

SMOKELESS CITIES

Coal-Power Research

Sir H. Dennis Readett-Bayley, managing director of the Digby Collieries, Nottingham, has sent a letter to the Prime Minister on the subject of the recent coal-power research memorandum issued by the Mines Department and the Department of Scientific and Industrial Research. He points out that after many years of experiment and investigation low temperature carbonisation is an established fact, and within a short period (a year or two at the most) it will be possible, he states, if energy is put into the "peace-time" right as it was put into the "war-time" fight, that there will be no smoke in our great cities, but the wasteful smoke will be harnessed to produce cheap light, cheap electical power, and complete utilization of the last item of value in coal.

Low temperature carbonisation, the letter states, will make coal mining in Great Britain free from explosion. The great fights made by mine owners and others have done much to prevent explosion of coal dust, and this dust will be almost entirely eliminated by the adoption of low temperature carbonisation, which uses all the small waste coal and dust and concerts it into a smokeless fuel. The coal dust that is now being left in the "gobs" would be raised and become a marketable commodity.

Sir Dennis adds that he is erecting a low temperature carbonisation plant at the Digby Colliery to treat 1,000 tons of coal a day for converting small coal into oils and smokeless fuel.

SOLICITORS' BLUFF.

Names to Advertisements of No Legal Effect

By 21 votes to 17 the annual meeting of the Law Society in London on July 25 requested the Council of the Society to take steps to discipline all solicitors who in future associated their names with any advertisement purporting to be of a legal nature which had no legal effect, and to prevent them from attaching their names to advertisements where their names were superfluous.

Mr. Percy Braby, of London, protested strongly against a solicitor's name being used in connexion with advertisements in which a husband disclaimed responsibility for his wife's debts. All those who published such advertisements were doing something which was totally ineffective.

The president said a week never passed without the committee considering a case of a solicitor advertising.

The Council, in their annual report, expressed the opinion that it would be dangerous for English and Scottish solicitors to take advantage of legislation passed by the Irish Free State, permitting them to practise in the Free State on their English and Scottish qualifications; and that it would be equally dangerous to allow Free State solicitors to practise in England and Scotland on their Free State qualifications.

THE MASTER OF THE CUTTY SARK

London, Aug. 7.

"On Monday at Falmouth, Captain Woodget will take command again of the ship he loves so well, and the soul of that great ship will awake to life again. I am going down myself to take the wheel at which I first learnt to steer 40 years ago, and will say 'Aye, aye, sir' to my old commander."

The room in Anderton's Hotel in Fleet Street roared as it never had before in its long history of celebrations as the brown-faced steady-eyed men of the Seven Seas Club and the Anchorite reacted to these words of Captain Millett, once mate of the Cutty Sark, that stirred them all deeply. The famous skipper of the Cutty Sark, in the emotion of the night, looked for a moment his 78 years.

Captain Woodget is a small, white-bearded man whom no landsman would take for a sailor, although his features have a peering look and recede a little under the dome of his head, as though blown in by strong winds and beating seas, and his hands are "rope-hookey," as sailors say, and still strong and hard for all his years. "An old eloquent" they say of ancient active statesmen, an old master mariner this whose eloquence spoke only to the initiate of the sea. To the shoreman he looked like a little local preacher in his old-fashioned black coat and black tie.

Service in Sail.

The men round the room included four old shipmasters, and nearly all of them had served in sailing ships and knew the ports of the world.

Captain Woodget did not reply to the toast. The voice that had roared against the tempest in the 'seventies and 'eighties could not now be heard in Anderton's room, and his return to see life and the welcome of his fellows had unnerved the old man so that his hard old hands shook as he clutched his gold watch chain. So his old apprentice, Captain Millett, spoke for him, and often the old man pulled the speaker up to qualify or explain a point.

Captain Millett told the great story of the Cutty Sark that is now popular history, the greatest sailing ship in history, not for her records, although she had many, but for the consistent wonder of her sailing so that people could count on her arrival in and out to Australia within a day. She is now 35. She was built to race the Thermopylae, the greatest clipper of her time, and proofs that she was better than the Thermopylae were discussed again.

They raced only once, and the Cutty Sark lost her rudder and 11 days in making the finest jury rudder ever made, yet she came in only six days behind her rival. She had never made passages like the American ships Lightning, James Bayes, and Schomberg, but their fine ships were three times her size and spread of canvas, and were passenger ships able to carry 5,000 tons of cargo, and carrying 1,400. The Lightning had made 436 miles in 24 hours; the Cutty Sark had averaged five hours at 1 knot an hour and had averaged 13 knots for seven days.

Captain Millett's Reminiscences.

Captain Millett in his narrative gave some of his own reminiscences. He was apprentice in the Cutty Sark under Moore before Woodget took over. "I was at the wheel in the South-East Trades," he said, "close-hauled, and Moore was walking back and forward much strung up, although, being a boy, I did not see what was happening as he did. At last he broke out; 'Here, my boy, don't you ever forget all your life that we are going 15 knots full and boy, and that's going.

Captain Millett many years afterwards when in Sydney saw the log of the crack ship Britannia, showing that she had come up at 14.7 knots, and an officer of the Britannia told him when they were coming along like that it was reported that a ship was coming up on them. He couldn't believe it, but sure enough "there was our famous friend the Cutty Sark coming up and past, and she was inside Sydney heads before the Britannia arrived."

The Return of the Cutty Sark.

He told the later history of the Cutty Sark, which, after years in bondage with her tall masts cut down and sailed in another rig under an alien flag, had at last returned to the British flag, rigged as in her great days by the great-hearted act of Mrs. Dowman and Captain Dowman. The Cutty Sark, under Captain Woodget is sailing from Falmouth to Fowey, where she will be the flagship of the regatta. The great mariner "swallowed the anchor" in 1898 and has been living in the depth of the country until Captain Dowman, having rescued the old Cutty Sark, asked the old commander to go on board again.

The other speeches at the gathering included a very interesting one from Captain Delix Riesenberg, of the American cadet barquentine Newport, now lying at Gravesend. He said, to the enthusiastic assent of the gathering, that a sailor must be trained on sail because the law of sail was emergency, and a sailor, whether of steam or sail, must have that in his bones.

Another speaker deplored the absence of anything related to the mercantile marine in the Empire Exhibition. Without the mercantile marine would there have been an Empire? Yet the only sign of it there was an exhibit of Indian teak in the form of a captain's cabin with a bottle of whisky and a syphon of soda on the table.

It was a memorable gathering and as many of the members said sadly as they dispersed, there would never be another like it in the world. "It is a landmark in the history of our mercantile marine," said one. "It is a landfall," sadly said another.

THE NORTHCLIFFE MILLIONS

Rothermere to Find £100,000

A suggested compromise for the settlement of outstanding questions relating to the administration of the estate of the late Lord Northcliffe was accepted in the Chancery Court by Mr. Justice Russell.

The compromise was chiefly concerned with charitable bequests amounting to between £500,000 and £600,000.

Sir Patrick Hasting, K. C. (the Attorney-General), said there was a substantial portion of the estate of something like 29 one hundred and third parts of residue which might ultimately come to charities, in which the Crown would be interested.

As it appeared that there might be a hardship to the employees largely intended to benefit, a suggestion had been made that he should renounce his right on certain conditions. The 29 one hundred and third parts would result in £500,000 or £600,000.

The Charity Money.

Lord Rothermere had undertaken to find £100,000, so to that extent the total fund would be relieved. Thus the Crown and the other charities would each receive immediately a sum of £10,000.

He thought there ought to be a very exhaustive inquiry into the financial position, but the settlement was one he could properly accept and would be in accordance with the testator's wishes.

Mr. Maugham, K.C., for Sir George Sutton (an executor), said the legatees they were now dealing with numbered about 6,000. The compromise would clear up the state in a miraculous manner.

Mr. Luxmore, K.C., said that Lord Rothermere had put up the £100,000 so that the employees should be paid in full.

IS THE ETON BOY TAMER?

"Washes More and Dresses Less," Says a Master

"Eton boys are very much more orderly now, and in a way gentler and tamer than in my generation," declares Mr. Lionel S. R. Byrne, one of the assistant masters, who is retiring after 35 years' service. He speaks from an even wider experience, for he himself was educated at the college.

"I think the boys then were more independent and rougher," he added, "I should say the change is entirely for the better. They also wash more and dress less; that is certainly true."

Asked as to the changes which have taken place, Mr. Byrne remarked: "Everything has altered. When I first came to Eton little was taught but classics and mathematics, and now, at the top of the school, only a small minority of the boys do classics.

Bishop and "Bully."

"There is another very important social change," continued Mr. Byrne. "The barrier between masters and boys has almost entirely broken down. Boys now talk quite openly to their master, whereas in the old days there was a sort of divinity which hedged him round. This change is very largely due to the spread of athletics.

"The master of 40 or 50 years ago never appeared out of his ordinary black clothes and white tie; but now you are just as likely to find a master swimming as doing anything else.

"The first time I became impressed with this social change was in the case of a master who ultimately became a bishop. I saw him on a Saturday evening, with his face in the mud in South Meadow, with the whole of an Eton bully ("Scrum" in Rugby football) on top of him. On Sunday morning he was preaching in chapel.

College Boat Builders.

"I suppose in the 18th century the school was, to a certain extent, self-supporting," continued Mr. Byrne. "It used to bake and brew for itself. In the 19th century all that disappeared. It now seems, in the 20th century, that the school is going to see a certain amount of the self-sufficing principle restored.

"The college builds its own boats and hires them out and has by far the biggest boathouse in the country. We do a good deal of our own carting by motor-lorry, and supply bats and balls and athletic goods in general.

"Eton is relatively cheap. I do not say absolutely cheap, but relatively cheap, as compared with other schools."

The Headmaster (Dr. C. A. Alington), writing in the "Eton College Chronicle" concerning Mr. Byrne's departure, terminated a tribute in verse, in these words:—

When you are 'twere hard, indeed, to find
A man so competent and yet so kind.

SOUTHERN RHODESIA

SOUTHERN Rhodesia which was inaugurated as the youngest self governing Colony of the British Empire on October 1, 1923, and which had previously for 33 years been ably administered by the British South Africa Company possesses one of the finest climates in the world with long hours of sunshine, breezy temperate days and cool nights. For those who wish to take up farming or ranching in order to make the most they can of their capital, energy and technical knowledge, or for those who wish to retire from strenuous business or professional life and make a home, Rhodesia offers many advantages unequalled elsewhere. The business, social, sporting, educational and medical facilities bear favourable comparison with those of other countries. Native labour is plentiful and when properly managed is cheap and efficient. Taxation is light. Good land in healthy surroundings and amidst fine scenery is plentiful and not expensive.

Full information is obtainable on application to The Secretary, Southern Rhodesia Settlers' Board (attached to the Government of Southern Rhodesia), P. O. Box 372, Salisbury S., Rhodesia.

The giving of advice to prospective settlers will be facilitated if applicants will advise the Board in detail of their circumstances and the amount of capital they would be prepared to invest in a suitable venture.

"WE WOULD SEE JESUS"

John 12:20,21: Certain Greeks. . . . came. . . . to Phillip. . . and desired him, saying, Sir, we would see Jesus.

How many are making this same request in the days through which we are now passing from whom we would least expect it! Who, for instance, would have expected these strangers from some distant place—we do not know exactly whence—during the limited, and for them, I suppose, busy time spent in the city, to have turned from other pursuits and other interests to take the trouble of coming to Philip and making this request: "Sir, we would see Jesus"? I believe in these days there is probably a greater interest taken in the Person of Jesus Christ, from one motive and another, than in any day in the world's history. Men and women—yes, and boys and girls too—are intensely interested in Jesus Christ; and although many of them are not forming their request in anything like the same language in which these men expressed it, down deep in their hearts there is the same longing to know about Jesus, Who and What He is, and what He can do for the sons and daughters of men.

I am quite sure myself that this is the case in many of our home churches. I remember some years ago being asked to preach in one of the largest, and, at the time at least, one of the most fashionable churches in the West End of London. At the time of the sermon I was conducted in state to the great marble pulpit, with polished steps leading up to it; and as I ascended the steps, entered the great pulpit and came forward to lay my Bible upon the little lectern provided for the purpose, there caught my eye, just under the lectern, coming between the upturned faces of the people and where I stood, a little brass plate engraven with these words, "Sir, we would see Jesus." And since that time I have scarcely ever preached or spoken in the Name of the Master, but, in one form or another, the same petition has seemed to be coming up from the waiting people. It is the desire of many a heart in our home churches to-day to see and hear about the Lord Jesus Christ. They are sick and tired to death of a great many of the sermons which are being poured out upon their inoffensive heads. There is politics, there is science, there is morality, there is education, there is the last thing that has been discovered in every line of modern interest; and not long everywhere there has been the War. This, that, and the other thing are imperceptibly and yet irresistibly crowding out the Centre of it all, the Lord Jesus Christ. And business men are coming to church, and they are saying: "We read all that in the newspapers, we hear it in the clubs, we discuss it at the luncheon table; it is in the street and the office, in the daily papers, in everything, all through the week; when we come to the Lord's House on Lord's Day, oh, do tell us something about Jesus Christ."

The Great Commission

You come from all sorts of Churches; you are Sunday-school teachers; some of you are brothers in the ministry. Let me say this to you, that we have no special commission from God for these things, but we have a great, outstanding unalterable commission to tell people about the Lord Jesus Christ; and in every Sunday-school lesson, in every address, in every sermon we preach, I plead with you in His name, let us preach about Jesus; let us hear that silent cry come from weary hearts; "Sir, we would see Jesus." Let us remember that He is standing in the midst and listening, listening for His own name. But oh, how sadly often He is disappointed! We talk about everything except about Him.

Well, as to the home churches you may have your opinion and I may have mine, but I do not think there is any question or doubt as to the attitude of mind and need of the nations beyond the seas. There never has been a day like this since the Lord Jesus Christ established His Church on earth. Just think for a moment of South America. It is a continent of religions, of churches, of altars and of ministers, and has been for many generations and even centuries past; and yet those who know South America best, tell us that by thousands and tens of thousands in that great neglected continent people are turning away from churches, turning their backs upon their priests and upon their religion. Religion has been forced upon them, but it has utterly failed; it has not gripped the hearts of men; it has not done anything to help them. It has been "weighed in the balances, and . . . found wanting," and these people are casting their religion from them, and are sending to us that pleading cry all over Chrisendom: "'Sir, we would see Jesus.' It is the Lord Jesus we want to know about."

What a solemn responsibility rests upon us who have seen Jesus Christ, and seen in Him our own Saviour, to send out to the very ends of the earth, and tell them of what we have seen in Him! What an unparalleled opportunity and privilege is ours who know Him as Saviour and Friend, to go out to the very ends of the earth, and tell them everywhere what a Saviour we have found! Never was there such a responsibility laid upon any people from the very foundation of the Christian Church to the present time. Never has there been such an open door, never has there been such a God-given chance to win people for Jesus Christ, as there is in this day of great and wonderful changes. These are terrible days, they are days of darkness and of suffering and of shame unparalled; and yet I venture to say that these are great days, God-given to us Christians. We have the opportunity and chance to do things for God and for our fellows that no generation has ever known in the past.

Jesus in the Book

But where is the Lord Jesus to be seen? Above all other places, here in this Book. Am I speaking to any, perchance, who have found Bible-study a little uninteresting lately? It has been a little difficult to keep up the regular Bible-study; it seems to have palled a little bit upon them. Do you want me to give you a golden key to unlock this wonderful Book from Genesis to Revelation, and open to you its beauty and its power? I will give you the key. It is of pure gold and of priceless value. In every Book of the Bible, on every page, look for the image of Jesus Christ, and you will never be disappointed. It will become the most enthralling Book in all literature. It will command your interest and your appetite far more than the latest novel, if only you will take the golden key, and open these wonderful Books which together make up the Bible.

What do I mean? I mean this: When you go to the Book of Genesis, look for the Lord Jesus Christ there. The promise is given that the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head. Then turn to Exodus, and you find that He is the One and the only One who can lead a soul out of the land of bondage into the liberty of the sons of God. You study that wonderful Book of Leviticus, those forms and ceremonies, those types and shadows, and they are all an enigma until you get the golden key, and find that they all point on to the coming of Him Who shall fulfil them in His one great sacrifice on the Cross of Calvary. You read the Book of Deuteronomy and you remember that "the law [is] our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ." You go on and study the Book of the Kings, and find that all the kings were imperfect and more or less failed, that all were but types of the coming of the King of kings, the only perfect Ruler of His people. You read that beautiful Book of the Psalms, and more or less directly they all centre in the one great Messiah Who is to come. Then go on and study the Major and Minor Prophets, and each in turn points on and on to the fulness of time when He of Whom they speak shall come, the Lord Jesus Christ.

Then in turn you read the Gospels. What are they? They are simply the story of the birth, the life, the suffering, the death, the resurrection and the ascension of the Lord. Then you turn to the Book of the Acts, the only unfinished book in the Bible, and you find that it is just an intensely interesting record of the triumps of the early Church of Jesus Christ. Then go on and study the Epistles, and you will find that they are merely the letters that formulated, and put within easy reach of the mind of man, the doctrines and teachings which centre in the Lord Jesus Christ. And then you approach that which, to my mind, is one of the most beautiful books of the whole Bible, the one with which it closes, the Book of the Revelation, and, as it were, the veil is for a little time drawn aside, and you and I are allowed to look in yonder and see a little bit of the Lord Jesus Christ on the throne of His power.

The whole Book is about Jesus, from beginning to end. And what I plead is that you will go back to your churches, back to your Bible-class, back to your Sunday-school, and try by God's grace to create a new interest in Bible-study, Bible-study that is more and more centralized in a search for the beautiful face and character of Jesus Christ.

"Written Epistles"

The Lord Jesus Christ is also to be seen in the daily lives of His disciples here on earth, and I know of no more solemn message that one Christian man can bring to another than this to which I am now giving utterance. The very moment we take our stand on the side of the Lord Christ and are known as Christians, that very moment we become marked men and women, marked boys and girls, and those who live nearest to us and know us best begin watching us. They watch us, not merely on Sunday when we have on our best clothes with our Bibles under our arms, but when we are not thinking about it at all—to see if they can trace the image and likeness of our Saviour.

Two years before the War, my daughter and I were taking a holiday trip in Italy. I found one of the most interesting places in Italy was the palace where the Pope lives, and one of the most interesting places in the Vatican is the Sistine Chapel, because some of the greatest paintings in the world, those of Michael Angelo, are to be found there. With the others we sought that beautiful chapel in order to see and study those wonderful works of the master artist. Strange to say, in painting these pictures, the great master, instead of painting them on the walls of the chapel, painted them as frescoes on the ceiling. And yet the score of people who were there studying those works of art that morning were not looking up at the ceiling at all; they were looking down. People had found out long ago that it was a very wearisome thing to keep looking up; but they wanted to see the beauty of art and colour and form, and so over yonder, as each one entered at the end of the chapel, he had hired for a small amount of money a little mirror, and there they were wandering about looking down into the mirror, in order that they might study the beauty of art and colour reflected there of the master-piece above.

Do I need apply the parable? Do you know that men and women, and children too, are too busy and preoccupied in these days to take the trouble to study the character of the Lord Christ in heaven! But they are exceedingly interested; they want to know about Him, they are going to pass judgment upon Him. Do you know where they are looking? They are watching your life and mine. And as they see or fail to see Christ in us, they pass judgment upon Him themselves.

To see the Lord Jesus Christ is to fall in love with Him; to see the Lord Jesus as He is, is to trust Him absolutely; to see Him is to want to serve Him.

"OUTSIDE RANGOON"

The sea makes one forget, forget,
That days are not like this all fair
With kiss or croon—and yet, and yet,
The sea has too its care.

All discontents molest the sea
Which is the same, enduring, yet—
Nor whenit still and fair would be
Can ever quite its care forget.

Take heart from that, O you and me
(When cares shall wind their narrow net),
And smile like this blue Indian Sea—
The sea that care would fain forget.

MERI—WHO CAN PLACE IT ON THE MAP?

A Visit to Borneo's Great Oil Territory

FROM ONE OF OUR CORRESPONDENTS.

Aug. 23, 1924.

When the agent of the Hugo Stinnes Line furnished me with information about the ports of call, I was interest to find that we were to touch at a port in Borneo, called Meri. Whereabouts in Borneo Meri was, neither the agent nor I could get any further information. It was not until after we started that I knew that the str. Emil Kirdorf burns oil and that the call at Meri was solely for the purpose of getting oil. The ardour of the sightseer was considerably damped to be told that Meri was only a small insignificant town, that lay tucked behind a shallow sand bar, at least four miles from the oil pipes; that there was nothing to see, that there were no launches or other means of open sea and that if there were and we chanced going ashore, a wind might spring up at any moment and any make it impossible for any launch or boat to bring us back again.

However, a select few of us were in luck's way. Everything we were told was quite correct, but amongst the passengers whom we took on at Manila was the Resident Official in charge of a district measuring 70 miles along the coast and as far inland as the jungle was cleared whose headquarters are at Meri. A launch had to come out to take him ashore and he was good enough to take as many as he could with him and to promise to do his best to send us back. One final incident rendered us somewhat indifferent to a rising storm: the captain was persuaded to be one of the chosen few. Of course a dozen mere passengers might have been left stranded at Meri—but not the captain. We felt that we could at any rate see whether or not there was "nothing to see" and, of course, we should be able to say at any opportune moment "When I was in Meri. . . . ."

Sins of the Atlas

Having the Resident on board, we were able to get quite posted up as to Meri and its reason for being in existence. Certainly I found myself in considerable need of being "put wise." First of all, I learnt that "Borneo" is not the name of the whole island at all, except in western lands. Malay is the language spoken—but I can make no attempt to reproduce in writing (or in speaking) the liquid syllables which glided so smoothly off my informant's lips, as he told me the proper name of the island. "Borneo" is a puzzle. It is hardly known how the name arose, what language it is supposed to represent, or what its meaning is. It is only a convenient name for all non-Bornean atlases and gazeteers (which, I presume, include all there are of such books).

The next sin of the atlases I know is to make Sarawak the name of a city—as such it is duly marked on the map, but no such city exists. Sarawak is the whole territory that was carved out of the west side of Borneo some time last century, by a Devonian adventurer who gained for himself the title of Rajah Brooke. His grand-nephew is the present rajah and ruler of Sarawak, with a 400-mile coast line, and a somewhat indefinite depth inland somewhere in the thick, almost impenetrable jungle. He exercises his authority through District Residents and his realm is regarded by the British Government as an Independent Protectorate, which communicates with the Colonial and not the Foreign Office at Whitehall. The flag is a yellow ground with a rectangular cross, the outside half, black, the inside, red (not at all a pleasant combination of colours). The capital is called Kuching, a name which means "Cat."

Oil Pipes Under Sea

Long before Rajah Brooke's day, the natives got lamp oil from surface wells at Meri. It was not until 12 years ago that the Shell Company got concessions and began the extensive works where to-day 200 Europeans and 3,000 Chinese in addition to large numbers of Malays find employment, and produce as the result of their labours 3,000 tons of oil a day. Oil pipes (with telephone wires attached) run out under the sea, some of them for three miles. With the pilot, came out several Malay workmen with all that is necessary to connect the sea end of the pipe (each of which is marked by four buoys, with the ship's reservoirs.

We left those on board to watch the interesting sight of the connexion while we hurried ashore. It was not until we had got right at the actual mouth of the river on which Meri stands that we could see any break in the coast line. The last reach of the river runs parallel to the shore, from which it is separated by a narrow belt of land, of course, covered with vegetation and tapering off to a very shallow sandbar. At the equinoctial tides there is a difference of six feet, giving seven and a half and one and a half feet of water on the bar, at high and low tide, respectively. At ordinary neap tides, there is a mere rise and fall of a foot or two.

The river has a tidal estuary, up which launches can run for 20 miles. Near the end of the estuary are some high rocks with large caves in which the swallows build the edible birds' nests so valued by the Chinese. Only very rough paths lead to the caves.

The Resident's home stands on the crest of a small hill overlooking the river and sea, a charming spot. We motored there up the steepest grade I think I have ever ridden in a car. One realized that the car was running up and down many times every day, and therefore when returning one felt as safe as if one had been on the Bubbling Well Road. But, I would rather have walked than trusted myself to a Bubbling Well Road chauffeur to bring me down.

It was interesting to find that, although between the 4th and 5th parallels of North latitude, the sea breeze by day and land breeze by night were so regular and strong that there were no electric fans in use. (As a matter of fact, the night before it had been quite chilly on deck—an impossible temperature for Hankow in August).

There are the usual amenities for a European community in the tropics: a good club house overlooking extensive recreation grounds on which, being Saturday afternoon, cricket and tennis, baseball and even football were in full swing. On Saturday nights a screen shows the most recent cinema pictures, viewed on one side by the Europeans from the club balconies, on the other by crowds on the grass of Recreation Grounds.

An Every-day Affair.

We had our adventures in returning: a breakdown on our launch, a hitch in getting a substitute that swallowed up the brief twilight and led us to negotiate the bar with a falling tide and a rising wind. We bumped and backed and grazed here and went ashore there. Finally we were a good hour late for dinner. Of course, the captain pressed our host and his two friends who had come off with us to stay to dinner—the more easily as the ship was steaming back towards the town. But while we were at dinner a sharp breeze blew up, and there was considerable consternation to find the launch had fled to safety without saying a word and there were no means of putting our guests ashore. Boo, boo, boo went our huge buzzer; blue lights were burnt, but still no launch. At last, the utmost limit of the captain's patience was reached and he had to decide to take on his guests to Singapore. Just in the nick of time, the wind having dropped, a motor was heard then the lights appeared coming over the bar, and it was not long before we received a wireless telling us of the safe arrival home of our friends and wishing us bon voyage.

I am afraid the captain is firmly convinced that there is nothing to see in Meri worth the risk of seeing it. I, on my part, am firmly convinced that I have been to Meri and shall ever carry pleasant memories of my visit.

THE NEW YEAR OF THE PARSEES

Its Chronology and its Calendar

BY D. S. DADY BURJOR.

On September 9, 1924, the Parsees celebrated the advent of their political New Year, the 1,294th of the era of Yezdezard, the last of the Persian monarchs of the Sassanian Dynasty.

The celebrated Battle of Nehavend, fought in the year 650 A.D. between the Arab army sent by Caliph Omar, under the command of the famous general No'main ben Mokarren, and the Persians under the immediate command of King Yezdezard, sealed the doom of the Persian Empire. The Persian Army sustained a disastrous and signal defeat, and was annihilated and almost wiped out, and King Yezdezard, who fled to Seistan, and then to Merv, was assasinated by a Persian miller, who at first gave him shelter in his mill, but who could not resist the glittering glamour of gold and valuable jewels hidden on his monarch's person, succumbing to the temptation to take possession of them. The modern Parsees count their era from the year of the fall of this their last monarch Yezdezard Sheheriar.

All Conquering Islam

The subjugation of the whole of Persia was soon after achieved with amazing rapidity and the Arab conquerors imposed upon the whole of the nation the religion of Islam. Those who were unwilling to bend their knees and accept the doctrine of the Koran were put to the sword if they were captured, and the rest escaped and and took refuge in the mountains of Khorassan. The iron hand of the Arab dictators, nevertheless, soon reached them there and drove them out of their mountain fastness, and they were compelled to set sail for India, where they expected to receive the help and protection of the Hindus, with whom the ancient Persians had cultivated a close and cordial political, commercial, and even religious intercourse.

Dr. Haug says in his famous "Essays on the Parsees," that not later than B. C. 1000 the Great Brahmin divine, Tchengreghatchah, who had gone to Persia to study the religion of Zoroaster under the guidance of the ancient Magis, went back to India to propagate the doctrines of Zoroaster amongst the Hindus. So, when after a very stormy passage through the Gulf of Ormuz, where thousands of fugitives perished owing to the destructive storms that were raging at that time, a small band of about 500 souls, men women and children, reached the hospitable shores of India, and landed at a place called Sanjan, situated about 140 miles from the modern city of Bombay.

An Asylum in India

The Hindu Prince Jadav Rana, who was at that time ruling the surrounding territory, extended to them his protection and granted them full permission to follow the faith of their forefathers. He, moreover, allotted to them a large tract of land in his territory, where they established a colony of their own. With his sanction and approval, they built a shrine to Ahuramazada, the Infinite Creator of this finite world. The fire on that altar has been kept alive and burning for these last 12 centuries, and is now enshrined in a beautiful marble temple built by a wealthy Parsee family of Bombay, in the village of Udwada, near Bombay, and it is a place of pilgrimage to all the Parsees.

In grateful memory of the magnanimity of the broad-minded Hindu ruler, Prince Jadav Rana's name is invoked and adored in all Zoroastrian rituals, and as the modern Parsees are the descendants of this tiny band, whom he sheltered and protected, the name and hallowed memory of Jadav Rana will remain enshrined in their hearts as long as the race continues to exist.

According to the figures of the latest census of 1911 there were 100,448 Parsees all over the earth, of whom 51,375 were males, and 49,073 females.

The Zoroastrian Calendar

The Zoroastrian year consists of 365¼ days, divided into 12 months, each of 30 days, and at the end of 360 days, five addtional or complementary days, called the "Gathas," are added, making in reality the year consist of 365 days only. In ancient Iran, it was customary to add one month at the end of every 120 years in order to make up for the loss of the quarter of a day, or to be exact, five hours and 54 seconds, and thus bring their calendar in a line and in strict accordance with the calculation of the Solar year This process of intercalation of one month at the end of every 120 years was known in ancient Persia under the name of "Kabisa," or "Kabisseh." It is said that those Persian Zoroastrian, who still remained in hiding in Persia after the loss of their Empire, either forgot, or through their ignorance neglected to intercalate one month at the proper time of the "Kabisa," whilst those Zoroastrians who fled to India from the mountains of Khorassan had continued this intercalary month at the proper time due for "Kabisa."

The result of this unfortunate muddle is that the Persian Zoroastrians in Persia even now are one month ahead in their calculation of the Parsees in India, and whilst the Parsees will celebrate their 1,294th year of Yezdezard on the September 9, their brother coreligionists in Persia have already entered upon their new year of their era on August 10. This mistake was found out late in A.D. 1720, when a learned Persian Zoroastrian priest escaped from Persia, and landed at Surat.

"Ancients" and "Imperials"

The discovery of this discrepancy, however, created two sharp divisions amongst the Parsees of India, as some of them adopted the Persian Zoroastrian Calendar, and thus even now are divided into two parties or schisms, one calling themselves "Kadimis" or ancients, from the Persian derivative "Kadim" meaning ancient or old. The other sect is styled the "Shahanshais," which means "Imperials," or those following the ancient usage of the Persian Empire. It goes without saying, that both the parties are in the wrong, for it is evident from the Avesta, or Zoroastrian Scriptures, that the ancient Iranians regulated and adjusted their calendar by observing the custom of "Kabisa" or intercalation, but the Parsees of India have on account of the precarious conditions under which they had to live for centuries in India, and in constant fear of religious persecution, failed to observe "Kabisa," or intercalation for nearly 12 centuries, and virtually the present calendar does not admit of more than 365 days of their Solar Year, and is therefore out of reckoning.

Dr. West, in his "Sacred Books of the East" series, and Dr. Hope Moulton in his "Early Zoroastrianism" express a belief that Zoroastrian Calendar was reformed and brought up to date by Darius Hystaspes in the year 500 B. C. Again, according to the Zoroastrian Calendar the day of 24 hours duration is divided into five "Gahs" or sections. From early dawn to noon, it is "Howan Gah," from 12 to three o'clock it is "Rapithvan Gah," from three o'clock to sunset it is "Oujiran Gah," from sunset to 12 a.m. it is "Aivisruthrem Gah" and from 12 a.m. to sunrise it is "Hooshen Gah."

Baneficent Deities

Certain rituals and ceremonies are enjoined to be performed in certain Gahs only. The disposal of a dead body is enjoined to be consumated only during the day, from sunrise to sunset that is, during Howan, Rapithvan and Oujiran Gahs only. The priest in the temple is enjoined to feed the holy fire on the Altar, and offer his prayer to Ahuramazda, the Infinite Creator of the Universe, in every Gah, and invoke His blessings on all those who live in this universe, regardless of cast, creed, sex or religion, thus creating an endless chain of universal brotherhood, and banishing from human mind all sense of separateness amongst mankind.

Each of the 30 days of the month as well as each of the 12 months of the year are named after and are dedicated to a special divinity. According to the teachings of Zoroaster, in the Hierarchy of Ahuramazda there are seven "Ameshaspands," or Arch-angels and 33 "Yezads," or Angels serving Him in the process of the creation and preservation of the Universe. To us Parsees, these are high, divine intelligences, embodiments or outward manifestations of the different aspects of the Infinite and Supreme power of the Deity Ahuramazada, and it is after one or the other of these divinities that the names of the 12 months and of the 30 days are given.

The first day of the month is named after and dedicated to Ahuramazda, the Supreme Creator, and each month is divided into four weekly sections, in such a way that the first two sections consist of seven days and the following weekly divisions consist of eight days. The first division or week begins with the name of Ahuramazda, and each of the following days are named after an "Ameshaspund" or Arch-angle. The second week starts with an appellation of Ahuramazda, and the following six days are also named after an "Yezad" or angel. The third and fourth week begin also with an appellation of the Creator, and each of the following seven days are named after, and dedicated to an "Yezad" or Angel. The last five days of the 12th months and the five intercalary, or complementary days are set apart and dedicated to the memory of the departed dear ones, and these 10 days are known as the 10 "Fravardegan" days, and are considered as holy.

The Human Soul

According to the teachings of Zoroaster as contained in the Avesta, the soul is immortal and eternal, and it is therefore indestructible and imperishable. The whole Human System, according to the Avesta, is divided into three main parts or principles, viz., the physical, the mental, and the spiritual. The physical is perishable, the mental is perishable also in so far as a higher and more refined mentality is evolved as the soul passes on its onward march of evolution, but the spiritual remains alive and active for ever. The soul is but a ray of the "Froher" of the Spirit, and as the Spirit is a part of the Immortal Easence of Divinity, the soul is immune from death or destruction, and those who have departed this life and have gone to the Great Beyond are, therefore, to us as alive and active as when their souls lived in their physical bodies on this earth plane. Professor Jackson in his "Persia Past and Present" rightly observes the "Farvardegan" Festival is a perpetuation of the Avestan Fravashi worship or commemoration of the Souls of the departed, "like our All Saints Day." These 10 days of the "Fravardegan" festival are, therefore, spent by the Parsees in the recitation of prayers and in meditation, and in the celebration of rites, in memory of their deceased beloved ones.

Gratitude Enjoined

It is a duty enjoined on every follower of the faith, as according to the Law of Compensation as innunciated in the Avesta, we owe a deep debt of gratitude to all those who during their life on earth have shown us love and kindness, and evinced solicitude for our welfare and happiness. The only regreattable part of the present-day celebration of this sacred festival is that it does not fall at the proper time, owing to the failure of the Modern Parsees to observe the intercalation described above, and adjust their calendar in strict accordance with the reckoning of the Solar Year. For according to the Avestan literature, the position of this fastival is somehere near the Summer Solstice, as was the case in ancient Iran. Perhaps it will not be amiss to add here that neither the ancient Iranians, nor the modern Parsees are the only people who have set aside these days as sacred to the memory of the "Fravashis" or "Manes," or Spiritual representatives of the deceased. These 10 days resemble somewhat the festival of "Dvadashana' 'or 12 days observed by those Hindus, who are the followers of Vedic Philosophy. Bal Gungadhur Tilak, one of the famous and foremost Hindu writers of modern times, states in his monumental work "Orion, or the Antiquity of the Vedas" that the ancient Hindus added these 12 days at the end of their Lunar year of 354 days to bring it in a line, and make it correspond with the Solar year, and moreover, they set aside these 12 days as dedicated to the hallowed memory of the deceased, and held them as the holiest of the whole year as," the Gods were believed to descend from Heaven, and to revisit the abodes of men."

It is also an historical fact that the ancient Egyptians celebrated the Festival of the Dead, the "Vaguit" during the month "Thot" commencing from the Summer Solstice, and that Ancient Chaldeans, Phœnicians, and Syrians likewise held the month "Tammuz," which also had its commencement with the Summer Solstice, as sacred to the memory of the dead. Doctor Moulton in his "Early Zoroastrianism" says "in the mythology of our own Germanic peoples, at the other end of the Indo-European area, there is a similar association of intercalary days at the end of the year with the annual feast of the dead. The German "Kleinjahr" of the 12 lunar months of 354 days, instead of the 12 lunar months of 360 days and the German Year ended when the sun began to turn northwards after the Solstice, and not with the Vernal Equinox. The Roman "Parentalia" celebration from Fubruary 13 to Fubruary 21 stands near the end of the last month in the old Roman Year, and recalls the "Fravardegan" by its character. At the same time was the Greek celebration of the "Anthesteria."

"Nature's New Year"

In the opening part of this article, I have stated that the Parsees celetrated their "Political" New Year on September 9. As this remark is suggestive of the impression that the Parsees are celebrating some other New Year also, I may at once proceed to say that the Parsees celebrate another New Year also, which they call "Nature's New Year" on the March 21. It is the day of the Vernal Equinox when the sun enters the Sign of Aries, and it is said to have been originated, and first inaugurated as the Universal New Year by the ancient Persian King Jamshed of the Peshdadian Dynasty, and it is now styled as the "Jamshedi Navroz," or the New Year of Jamshed. The history of Jamshed is buried way out somewhere in the twilight of ages, as King Jamshed is supposed to have flourished somewhere about 4000 B.C. and so much of romance, legend, tradition, and dim historical records cluster around his name that it will be necessary to describe it in a separate article on the appropriate occasion. Suffice it, therefore, to say at present that this Jamshedi Navroz is celebrated not only by the modern Parsees, but it is observed with great pomp and ceremony also by the whole of the Mahomadan population of modern Persia, Afganistan, Baluchistan, and the Frontier Provinces of India, and Navroz Durbars are held by the Mahomadan potentates of these countries.

AMATEUR PHOTOGRAPHY

IX.—General Information

BY R. V. DENT.

In this, our last article, we shall deal with little-known facts and methods that may be useful to the aspiring amateur and which are many of them the result of practical experience during 20 years of photography.

Primarily we repeat that the two greatest pitfalls to be guarded against are underexposure and movement of the camera, as far as the technical side of camera-work is concerned. Keep this constantly in mind and your standard of work will greatly increase. Use a meter and employ a tripod. With this valediction we leave the amateur as far as taking photographs is concerned, and wish him luck!!

How to Get Good Tones

The beautiful tones varying from light sepia to deep brown, so much admired but seldom seen in amateur work, are obtained on bromide paper with ease and certainty as a result of experience and experiment. The secret is a properly-exposed print, fully developed to a factor of five to six with an elon-hydroquinone developer; the toned colour will then vary according to the amount of bromide used. The more bromide used the darker the final brown; the less, the lighter the sepia. Too much bromide restrains the high-lights unduly or entirely, and degrades the tone. Developers generate bromide when used continuously and thus the colour resulting from developer which has been used before will not be the same as fresh developer; it is advisable for enlargements to use the developer in small quantities and twice at the most. No poor-toned black print will give a good sepia; a good rich black to start with is essential. Amidol black is no better than elon-hydroquinone black, notwithstanding the general belief to the contrary, and the toned dark browns of the latter are fully equal to those of the former. Any standard ferricyanide bleacher will work. Blisters during sulphiding are a result of different temperatures in the various solutions including the washing-water; otherwise they will not occur; in hot weather prints to be toned should be hardened first. Handle the prints carefully as sulphiding makes them very soft and easily damaged.

A Warm Weather Process

Sulphiding first, then bleaching and re-sulphiding increases the depth of deep browns but is not good when real sepias are required. Hypo-alum toning is extremely convenient in warm weather as all that is necessary is that the print be placed in it direct from the fixing-bath and left there overnight; in the morning they are fully toned. It becomes too slow in cool weather unless the solution is heated. The most practical way of making the hypo-alum toning solution is to take 40 ounces of hot water, add five ounces ordinary hypo, then one ounce alum; after which add 20 drops of nitrate of silver. This latter is important as otherwise the hypo and alum combine to form a reducer. This solution lasts indefinitely, costs extremely little, and improves with use.

The effect of sulphide toning (hypo-alum results are identical chemically) is to convert the metallic silver into silver sulphide. The latter is transparent and thus gives far richer effects than non-transparent metallic black silver. It is therefore invariably more beautiful even though an almost-black sulphide tone is made. A sulphide-toned print is absolutely permanent and will last as long as the paper support, because unless the print was washed free of hypo it would have been destroyed in the toning.

The reason for this is that hypo and ferricyanide combine to form a powerful reducer, well-known as the "Farmer" reducer; hence the need for thorough washing before toning. Sepia, dark browns, and black are the most suitable colours for chemical toning. Do each process thoroughly if absolute permanence is wanted. Partial bleaching will give black-brown tones, as will bleaching, partial-redeveloping and then sulphiding, but permanence by these methods is not assured and it is rather uncertain what the final tone will prove to be. Double toning—bleaching with a paint-brush—is freak work, easy enough to produce. Over-exposures give muddy reddish tones.

Some workers dry their prints before toning. It is a matter of taste as regards the final colour desired.

Pretty but Dubious

Copper toning gives beautiful results but it is doubtful how long it lasts. The only reasonably safe tone by his process is the final deep pink but even that is not safe to sunlight. Greens and blues are seldom desirable but when they are, aniline dyeing (staining) is generally preferable. Green toning fades, while blue toning increases density so greatly that this must be allowed for in advance.

Mordant dyeing (using chromic acid bleacher), then dissolving out entirely the silver base with a copper-sulphate fixing bath, leaving nothing but a dye image, produces the clearest transparencies known, as there is nothing but a dye image. But it won't work for paper. Dyeing toned image gives excellent results, particularly for snow, night, and fire-side effects. There is no end to interesting experiments along these lines.

To convert a bromide print into a pen and ink drawing, outline the desired image with waterproof ink, bleach the print, and fix out in ordinary hypo. This finally leaves nothing but the drawing. The same idea is used for reliable reduction of too contrasty negative when they are required for enlarging. Bleach, redevelop with your usual developer taking care not to over-develop, and when the desired contrast is reached fix out the remainder in the fixing-bath. Halation can be considerably reduced in this way. Glazing glossy prints is done by squeegeeing to a ferrotype plate or, better, a sheet of celluloid. Hardened prints give a higher gloss, and glazing should always be done if glossy paper is used. If the ferrotype board is kept thoroughly clean, prints will not stick if they are properly dry. If the print was alum-hardened every trace of alum must have been washed off the surface before glazing; formalin hardening does not need this.

A Few Tips

Varnishing enlargements improves their appearance considerably provided the varnish is not glossy. Artists' megilp is the best thing to use; the shadows are made much richer.

Old safety-razor blades make excellent trimming-knives, transparent set-squares, and be careful to trim perfectly true, having first marked out where to cut and then doing the cutting. Sloping horizons can be cured by judicious trimming. Decide what to trim by using two L-shaped pieces of cardboard, moving them until the best picture is found.

Sunning-down is a good dodge when there is too much white in a print. It is done by an extremely brief exposure of the whole print, and is expecially useful for night-effects but of course must be used with discretion or the result is sad.

For night-work, do not fear over-exposure except on electric illuminations; these can be photographed in a few seconds or less. In the open country with bright moonlight half-an-hour at F 8 is likely to prove insufficient. Impossible to give night-exposures here, as conditions vary so greatly. Moonlight "instantaneous" pictures are simple fakes, done at twilight or dawn or else the moon is retouched in. Night effects showing all detail but obviously taken at night are obtained by double exposure, one at twilight and a full exposure by night-light (street-lamps, etc;) great care having been taken not to move the camera between the exposures.

A lens can be shaded by a piece of cardboard on the camera just as in enlarging. Vignetting the camera-lens is only shading. To photograph the view outside the window while getting a view of the room is a useful trick to know. It is done by drawing down the blinds, or rigging up a brown-paper screen temporarily, giving full exposure for the room, and then a very brief one (about ½ second) (F8, bright day outside) with the blinds up or screen removed. The resulting negative quite conceals the blinds of the first exposure, and shows both room and view.

Plate-marking a finished print is very effective. A simple way is to cut a piece of card-board to the exact size and shape wanted for the plate-mark, place this in position on the face of the print, turn over and go over the edge with a blunt instrument such as a paper-knife. Care must be used, of course, to follow the shape evenly. If it can be done over ground-glass illuminated from beneath it is easier, but this method is entirely satisfactory. It looks superior to ruling lines around the print and gives a well-finished appearance.

Colouring and Copying

Colouring prints is not nearly so difficult as generally thought; either aniline dyes (such as Velox water-colours) or transparent oil-colours (such as Roehrig's) are suitable. But the result is neither photography nor painting and the mixture of mediums is never artistically desirable. Serious workers will not have it done and of course striking metallic greens and flaming crimsons are horrible.

When copying, such as re-photographing another photograph, it is important to develop for extreme contrast or the result will be flat. Also remember that using a double-extension alters the F values of a lens, as does using the single components of those compound lenses which can be used singly; usually this means quadrupling the exposure, F. 8 becoming F 16. Also remember that a filter used mounted behind a lens alters its focus by the thickness of the filter, and this must be reckoned with when filters are so mounted. The reason why this does not apply to Autochrome filters is because the plate itself is used reversed (glass to front) and this automatically provides for the different focus. If in doubt about the exact focus, stopping down will correct minor errors.

Time Your Work

A thermometer and a time-clock are two essentials for the serious worker. When working in total darkness (indispensable for the fastest panchromatic plates, but, with due care, not necessary for any other plates made) set the clock five seconds back and allow the five seconds for turning out the light and getting ready; this eliminates all doubt and worry and ensures results. Time all printing and enlarging with a clock, as guessing will not work. Keep your acid fixing-bath covered when not in use, preferably in a vulcanite tank which can be properly covered; in this way it not only lasts longer but works better.

Holding the camera on top of a walking-stick for brief time exposures, if no better support is available makes a passible substitute for a tripod. Heavy cameras are easier to hold steady than light ones, and the minature ones are the hardest of all. A strap around the neck attached to the camera, or a piece of thick cord, will enable these light cameras to be held much more steadily as then they can be pressed down as well as against the chest. Always use the wire-release if there is one, as it minimises the inevitable jar of pressing the shutter. The lens on all Graflex cameras (except the latest model) comes out by pushing the lens-board upward and outward; many owners do not know this and therefore try to clean the back of the lens through the camera, which is difficult.

In concluding this series of brief articles for the assistance of the amateur photographer, we repeat what we said in the first article—that no attempt has been made to go deeply into the subject nor have technical explanations and masses of formulae been thrown at the reader. But sufficient information and tips have been supplied to help the amateur very considerably if he will but use them, and if a few beginners have been helped over the stiles and new vistas of possibilities shown to the more advanced workers, then our labours have indeed been worth while.

MAKING HISTORY

THE NEW Columbia Grafonola and "NEW PROCESS" Records are making history.

For the first time, Master Musicians have recognised the significance of the development and pay notable tribute to the New COLUMBIA as the greatest gramophone advance yet.

Sir Henry J. Wood indicated the magnitude of the achievement when he said: "I consider this instrument the greatest contribution to the advancement of music since the original invention of the gramophone itself."

NOTES AND NEWS

Mr. G. K. Chesterton is said to be writing a series of intimate biographies of historical characters. Savonarola, William Cobbett, Robert Louis Stevenson, and Napoleon Bonaparte are among the titles.

We are to have a new history of the University of Oxford, and it will, in some ways, be fuller than anything which has gone before it. The writer is Sir Charles Edward Mallet of Balliol College, who has long been preparing his material. He has had access to manuscripts treasured in the University archives and to printed material which has scarcely been drawn upon. There will be three volumes of the history, and Methuen hopes to publish two of them in the autumn.

Mr. Arnold Bennett, as has been mentioned here, is to give us another story of "Riceyman Steps." Since he wrote the volume so entitled, the corner of Clerkenwell with which it deals has become almost a place of pilgrimage. His new story is sure to bring other pilgrims, but it is not a full novel, and so it will appear in a volume with other stories. The maid of all work was a lovable figure in "Riceyman Steps," and Mr. Bennett continues her history in happier surroundings.

We have from time to time had glimpses of what life is in the French Foreign Legion, which includes men of all nations. There will be a fuller glimpse in a personal book entitled "Memoirs of the Foreign Legion," which Mr. Martin Secker announces. It has been edited by Mr. D. H. Lawrence the novelist, and we are told that the author himself took his life in Malta in the autumn of 1920. His passport showed him to be an American citizen, but, by circumstances and temperament, he probably belonged to the band of cosmopolitan wanderers who are to be found in every large European city.

Mr. Seymour Hicks is known to his friends as a story-teller and as a gatherer of good stories. We shall have a bunch of them in a book which he has prepared and to which he has given the title, "Chestnuts Re-Roasted." The book is something more than a collection of humorous stories and brilliant repartee, for Mr. Hicks writes with a personal touch of romance concerning many of the greatest wits that have moved in London life. He knew Sir William Gilbert, Charles Brookfield, Frederick Burnand, Sir Herbert Tree and many another worthy man. He expects that most of his readers will find some of their own chestnuts in his pages, but they will also find others which they have missed.

In one of Mr. D. B. W. Lewis's amusing articles recently there was an imaginary letter from a London theatrical manager with a Jewish name, declining with thanks a play called "Love's Labour's Lost," submitted by William Shakespeare. In a more serious mood Mr. St. John Ervine, in "The Organized Theatre" (Allen and Unwin, 7s. 6d.), pictures the dramatist setting out from Stratford to-day with the MS. of "Hamlet" in his pocket, and being thrown out of the London theatres by unappreciative managers. If Mr. Ervine seems unduly pessimistic about the theatre and the public taste he at any rate does something more than merely abuse the present state of things. He puts forward practical proposals which may make things easier for a young Shakespeare "coming up to one of the universities with the seeds of immortality in his head."

Years ago Joseph Pulitzer, the proprietor of the "New York World," used to go to Europe in his gorgeous yacht. He was accompanied by five secretaries, whom he constantly kept busy, for he was a man, even when he became blind, of immense energy, as we shall discover in a life of him which Mr. Don C. Seitz has written. It opens dramatically, for it does so with Pulitzer, then a lad of 18, jumping from a European sailing ship into Boston Harbour, in order to avoid the red tape which might have kept him out of America as an undesirable immigrant.

RECORDS OF DARING

"MOUNTAIN-CLIMBING." By Francis A. Collins. John Long. 10s. 6d.

The epic nature of the recent attempts to scale Mount Everest, and their historical significance, will be more completely realised when one has read this succinct and absorbing history of mountaineering. To the ancient mind, the mountains were places of awe and revelation, for the mediæval they held terror and tales of fiery dragons. Petrarch, who climbed Mount Ventoux (6,432 feet), in Provence, seems to have been the first to show an appreciation of high scenery that reads as curiously modern. Mr. Collins describes the conquest of the Alps, of Ararat, where no remnants of the Ark, as legend told, were found, of Alaskan ranges, of Mount Cook, the Andes, and the Mountains of the Moon, so long clouded in mystery. This record of endurance, danger, failure and ultimate triumph is as inspiring as that of Arctic exploration, and less widely known. There are still virgin peaks among the Canadian Rockies that no human being has scaled, yet must their mystery yield eventually to mortal daring. The book is illustrated with unusual action photographs taken at great altitudes.

ROBERT SURTEES

"ROBERT SMITH SURTEES." By himself and E. D. Cuming. London: Wm. Blackwood and Sons. Pp. xi. 339. 15s. net.

The creator of "Jorrocks" died 60 years ago, but this is the first detailed account of his life and work. It is an excellent example of a sporting biography, and Mr. Cuming is to be congratulated on the thoroughness and ability with which he has discharged a difficult but evidently congenial task. Surtees left behind him a scanty and unrevised autobiographical sketch. Mr. Cuming uses this as a nucleus and builds round it a well-written and well-documented study of the sportsman, author, and farming expert. For, though hunting was the passion of Surtees's life, he was much more than a mere sportsman. He was an observant, sensible man with a real literary gift, and a grasp of rural politics which was rare among the squires and farmers of his time. He held sound, though unpopular, views on the importance of land drainage (the farmer disliked having "the sap taken out of his land"), and, though a Protectionist, was as well aware as Disraeli that Protection was dead and damned, and had the courage to say so at a meeting of a North Country agricultural society in 1850. His audience interrupted him and cried "No, no," but Surtees stuck to his guns and told them they were just as likely to get the moon as Protection.

MEDICAL ANECDOTES

"AS A DOCTOR SEES IT." By B. Liber. Critic and Guide Co. 2 dols. 50 cents.

Persons in search of light, amusing holiday reading will do well to avoid this book, which is a collection of short anecdotes and sketches from an American doctor's notebook. Here is a typical specimen: It is called "Feet and Boxes":

> I examine the patient's legs, which are covered with ulcerations—This is nothing, doctor. You know I am a driver, and it often happens that the clerks, when they are in a hurry, throw boxes and packages on my feet, especially if there is no more room on the wagon. Of course, my shin-bones get hurt every day and are always sore. They never heal. But this is nothing, and I would not have come to you for such a trifle. I meant to tell you that I have a cold.

Here is another:

> The mother takes her little girl of three to the large stores to buy her Christmas presents. The stores are crowded, the air is unbearably hot and stuffy and poisonous. For hours the child is dragged hither and thither. As soon as they reach home she becomes ill and within a few days, when the toys are delivered a day or two before Christmas, she is dead.

And so it goes on. In one section of the book, entitled "Poisoned Pleasure," the doctor is a frank propagandist, describing the awful efforts of poor women to escape bearing the children they do not want. So, too, a great many of his sketches are a terrible indictment of our industrial system, and Dr. Liber's genial and optimistic countrymen, who apparently see everything through rose-coloured spectacles, would do well to read these awful little tales. In the end he leaves us very much depressed indeed, though he also contrives to create for us the impression of an all-wise and all-merciful medical practitioner. He would like to hint, we imagine, that though conditions are bad they are not entirely impossible while there is a Dr. Liber still with us.

A STRANGE COMPANY

Rirsky-Korsakoy Tells the Story of His Life

"MY MUSICAL LIFE." By N. A. Rimsky-Korsakoy. Translated from the Russian by J. A. Joffe, and edited with an introduction by Carl Van Vechten. Martin Secker. 26s.

Rimsky-Korsakov's autobiography, translated by J. A. Joffe and edited with an introduction by Carl Van Vechten, is an invaluable storehouse of facts for all who wish to know the truth about Russian composers, their compositions and Russian musical life at the end of last century.

It is, in the author's own words, very "artlessly" written; in fact, so naively that no definite picture of the writer himself emerges. We get a much more definite idea of others—of Musorgski, untaught and despising education, of Borodin sharing his meals with his cats like a character in Dickens, and of the partly fascinating, partly repellent, personality of Balakirev, whose influence seems to have been very much greater than is generally supposed. Another thing that strikes one with tragic force is the number of promising young men mentioned in passing, who came to nothing and are dismissed with the brief comment: "He went to the dogs" (or to the bad, or to the devil, as the case might be) "through drink."

The men who made Russian music at the end of last century were a strange company. They seem to have been a very friendly and cheerful body of men leading most irregular lives, who occupied their spare time in composition and in orchestrating each other's works in a manner resembling that of the legendary folk who gained a precarious livelihood by taking in each other's washing; and time is showing how precarious is the tenure of life of much of their music. So casual were they in their way of working—starting on operas before the librettos were fully sketched, tearing them up and patching them up again—that it is a wonder any coherent work ever resulted.

The question of Rimsky-Korsakov's re-orchestration of "Boris Godonov" still gives rise to much controversy. Both sides will find ammunition "aplenty," as the translators like to say, in the full statements of facts which this book contains.

The translator has done his work well, but he has a great fondness for peculiar phrases, like "bow instruments" and "passages which are stricken out," and he prefers "to con" or "to scan," despising "to read." Personally, I find his way of transcribing Russian names rather trying, and I cannot see the advantage of writing "Alyeksandr" instead of "Alexander," or "Pyetyerhoff" instead of the more homely "Peterhof," in spite of philological arguments in their favour.—"Daily News."

MORE INDIAN STUDIES

"INDIA: A BIRD'S EYE VIEW." By the Earl of Ronaldshay. Constable. 18s.

"INDIAN PROBLEMS.' By Bishop Whitehead. Constable. 12s.

These two books, both excellent, impress me first of all as illustrations of the immense distance that has been travelled by the English mind in India during the past two decades. Those of us whose first acquaintance with the country dates back to the Curzon epoch can realize, perhaps better than any other observers, what it means for present-day Indian problems to be discussed, as they are here, with broad understanding by a Conservative ex-Governor of Bengal and a prelate who presided over the Madras diocese for more than 20 years.

Lord Ronaldshay permits himself a very wide range. The great Indian ages and buildings, the north-west frontier, the village and the jungle, religion, public health, and the new industrialism—these and many other subjects are treated by him in a volume that is unusually well packed. In the last, and by no means the least interesting, section of the book the tremendous question of Indian pessimism is reviewed, in relation not only to the Hindu tradition, but also to such hideous physical factors as malaria and the hookworm.

Lord Ronaldshay has little to say about the political and social conflicts of the day; Bishop Whitehead, on the contrary, is mostly taken up with them, and he has an excellent chapter on Gandhi. His survey of the outlook for the Christian Church and its social enterprises in India is valuable and challenging; but I note one interesting omission. Bishop Whitehead was at one time a leading advocate of the policy of concentrating missionary effort on the lower castes and outcastes, to the neglect of the higher classes. It may well be that circumstances rather than policy must decide that. The Bishop is surely right in linking the storm over the Ilbert Bill 40 years ago with the action of General Dyer and the recent Kenya decision as the boundaries of the crucial period in the relations between England and India. His general conclusion is cautious, and not particularly hopeful. "No more Amritsars," Clemenceau said to him at Bangalore: "you cannot rule India like that."—"Daily News."

THE CO-OPTIMISTS

Putting An End to Abnormal Unemployment

"IS UNEMPLOYMENT INEVITABLE?" Macmillan. 8s. 6d.

It is a good sign that the authors of "The Third Winter of Unemployment" should have given their new book a far more hopeful title. The very word "unemployment" has begun to sound have a dirge in our ears; the school of thinkers who follow Mr. Maynard Keynes have told us that it was indeed the sign of doom, and that our industrial day was done.

The committee of Mark Tapleys under Mr. W. T. Layton's chairmanship do not share that view, and they give chapter and verse, figures and arguments, to show that we may hope to return to a period of industrial activity where the present nightmare of unemployment will have given place to the small amount of normal unemployment due to such causes as changes in the seasons or the fashions.

The bogey of unemployment is not so terrible as he appears when his real nature is examined. The evil could be checkmated in two moves. By raising emigration to the normal figure and the school-leaving age to 16, the immediate problem could be solved at once. The moves may be impossible, but the fact indicates how much more effective than all our palliatives is the operation of the forces that cause or remove unemployment. The factor of the rate of growth of the population is in itself so decisive that Professor Bowley's arguments lead to the conclusion that if no change occurs in the birth-rate the problem 15 years hence may be an insufficiency of labour.

The other main subject dealt with by the committee is our ancient enemy, the trade cycle. Professor Badley and Mr. Stuart, two members of the committee, carried out an investigation which shows our powers of self-help.

Britain Not Going to the Dogs.

They find that all that would have been necessary to smooth out the trade waves of a decade before the war would have been the redistribution of 65 out of a total capital expenditure of 340 million pounds by public authorities. "If we had only known——" we say, and doubtless we shall say the same ten years hence unless the general causes at the root of unemployment, so ably laid bare in this book, can be understood and turned to our advantage.

The confident attitude of the authors extends to the future. England has found enough coal deposits they say to make it what it was when the cry of exhaustion of our stocks was first raised 30 years ago. Great Britain is far from going to the dogs. Tariffs cannot close doors against her. There are still vast expanses of the world to be filled up by good customers, the maritime trade of the world, which has been our life-blood, will probably increase, and if we will use them we have the technique, the managing skill and the labour power to secure an increasing share. Agriculture is the black spot, and we must cease to rely on cereal farming. The final conclusion, one which should nerve every employer and every working man, is that the abnormal unemployment of the last few years is neither chronic nor inevitable.

A FINE NOVEL

"BELLS OF HEAVEN." By the Rev. J. B. Hunt. (Melrose. 7/6 net.)

This novel by the Rev. Jasper Benjamin Hunt, one of two written in the last years of a comparatively young life, contains some fine situations, and might, with a sterner regard to the demands of art, have been made a great one. A tender young girl, Miriam Fash with no knowledge of the world, shielded by stern parents, who cherish her as their one priceless pearl—the father of sterling rugged character, the mother with an amusing faculty for quoting Scripture most incongruously—is home from mid-week "meeting" in the Black Country Grimville. In her room, where alone her artistic instincts are allowed any sort of expression—in its own ridiculous way a very pretty room—gazing at the evening gloom without, and seized by unutterable fear within, she utters a low wail. The twilight combines the terrors of the day and those of the night, and she prays for a miracle. Can it come? There seems to be only one way out of the consequences of an hour of madness at Barmouth during the summer meeting of the narrow little community. Then follows a discussion with her parents concerning the suit of Joseph Remnant, a snub-nosed, haless snob, who yet is highly acceptable at meeting. Miriam, to the astonishment of her parents, is not obedient, and again seeking her room, falls with a thud to the floor. She is put to bed, and at that moment, while the mother is attending to the unconscious girl, a motor-car is heard along the road, and the man of the world, the handsome interloper at the Barmouth meetings, makes application for the hand of Miriam. He explains that he is a soldier, ordered to sail for duty in two days' time. He has the desire—though quite ignorant of Miriam's condition—to marry the beautiful girl with whom he has fallen passionately in love. The father—more tragically ignorant—spurns him from the gate. "Dear as she is to me, the light, the hope of my declining years, I would rather see her stretched a corpse upon the bed where she is lying sick in yonder house than joined in marriage to such an one as you." The betrayer's following letter to Miriam offering marriage is also intercepted, and her miracle comes to her. She sees it in the chance of marrying Joseph within a week, before he, the confidential servant of his firm, sets out on foreign business.

What would a master do with such a situation? We know what Hardy did with a similar one: his bishop was avenged. Is it conceivable that Miriam, who made herself beloved wherever she went, by all sorts of different natures, who as ministering angel in Grimville was untouched by any filth or obscenity, and was looked upon as a saint of God, should make joyful expiation in subjecting herself to attend upon every want of the gluttonous, coarse, oily, hypocritical scoundrel of a Joseph? That she should even be ready to give up her wonder child Gabriel? That may be so; but when the brute exercises his brutality not only upon her but upon Gabriel, there seems a certain inevitableness that the angel of light should herself exterminate the brute. Whether the Bells of Heaven ring out upon that, or upon another solution of Miriam's problem, we shall leave readers to discover for themselves. But there is one thing they must not do: they must not read the last chapter of this absorbing novel first.—"Daily Telegraph."

THE WOMAN'S PAGE

"FIRST DAY OF SCHOOL"

New Duties, New Contacts, New Possibilities

By Elizabeth Pepys.

What made a sober tree seem such a rover—
Or made the staid and stalwart apple-trees
That stood so long knee-deep in velvet peace,
Turn all their fruit to little worlds of flame,
And burn the trembling orchard there below?
What lit the heart of every golden-glow—
Oh, why was nothing weary, dull, or tame?
Beauty it was, and keen, compassionate mirth
That drives the vast and energetic earth.

—Louis Untermeyer, in "Autumn Landscapes."

"Mummy, when may I go to school so as to know some nice new children?" This query voiced by one of our Youngest Set the other day on hearing her kindergarten-age sister and schoolboy brother exchanging speculations as to teachers and pals brought back much of the excited feeling that pervaded the nursery during the early days of September when we, too, were looking forward to scholastic adventures. Indeed, the desire to know "nice new children" extends far beyond nursery days, and has been known to form the motive for extending one's field of learning as far as the University. But whether genuine scholarship or simply a craving for social intercourse sets the childish heart to beating faster, certain it is that in youth's bright calendar one of the red letter days was that magical first day of school. The Long Holidays were undoubtedly a more legitimate occasion for rejoicing but after all, summer was over and it wasn't too bad to be getting back to old friends, with the prospect of meeting exciting new ones. Even the teachers, although we affected indifference or superiority to their appeal, drew us back. We were curious about the new ones, kindly disposed towards our favourites, and riotously united in projects for the discomfiting of our enemies.

The Significance of Autumn.

Beyond all this, too, we dimly sensed the prickly, tingling stimulus of autumn, the awakening of energy in response to crisper nights and shortening days, the snap and vigour of impending frosts. We did not sentimentalize about the melancholy days. We were up and ready for any rag. And so even yet, whether summer has meant leisure and the storing up of surplus spirits to be dissipated in autumn or simply the usual routine considerably slowed down, we are equally glad to apply ourselves to more serious business. Summer, with all its charms, is not the best of times to start any thing, except flirtations. Autumn, cool and inspiriting is the time for new ventures and beckoning undertakings.

The shops feel this new thrill of life. Their novel fabrics and new styles are but a prosaic expression of the fresh energies possessing the world. Art, drama, music begin their yearly cycles. Every one of us starts out on something of a new career. The gallant pledges of last January are remembered, sometimes re-attempted. The study courses, the athletic sports, the rigid diet, all the tonic processes which wilted in the summer's heat begin to reassert their claims. Our initiatives, our consciences, our intellects which have been summering deep down in the sub-cellar of our consciousness reawaken. Spring may be the time for young men's fancies and sprouting gardens; but autumn, autumn is the time to begin our schooling, old or young.

A PLEA FOR THE USEFUL CLICHES

The Handy Men of Life

By Elizabeth Pepys.

If we had to invent a new greeting for every acquaintance met on the way to the office, the world's work would never be done. If one were obliged to ask a sincere and original question instead of the time-honoured "How do you do?" or to give a truthful answer thereto, what a deal of unwelcome information would be forthcoming!

No, molds are useful and almost necessary to regulate the form of conversation. Stereotypes may not be as artistic as hand-lettering but they are far more available for the ordinary intercourse of life. Click-clack, and the thing is said, the idea has been put across. The expression may not have been strikingly original; but it was at least understandable. If one has a well-trained typewriter which will rattle off almost of its own volition: "Among the distinguished guests who thronged the hospitable halls of our well-known and dearly beloved fellow-citizens Mr. and Mrs. Obadiah Smith, we noted &c &c" not only does it save you much trouble but the Smiths and their ilk, who do their best to fill the social columns feel that they are all being handled alike and no discrimination shown.

Appropriate Adjectives.

Then in the case of "chaotic" China, what other adjective but the classic example given could be used? People have grown to expect it and feel lonesome if a synonym is used instead. How many times a day do we all solemnly assert: "China will never be thoroughly pacified without universal disarmament?" Any other formula might spoil that delightful unanimity of expression.

Again, "as has been said and so truly said." in referring to the noble part borne by women's organizations in any "undertaking for the public good" it is all but necessary to refer to the "efficient support generously given by our women's organizations, without which the project could hardly have been carried through." That phrase crowns all our "devoted efforts," it is the standard and well recognized laurel wreath that repays us for "sleepless nights and days of toil." Without it we should feel that our struggles had been "love's labour lost."

Of course one may strive to be original, to hew out some utterly new way of saying the same old thing; but the attempt usually shows the pains of creation. Moreover, having coined a phrase, the temptation to use it constantly is well nigh irresistible and then you have the same old cliché again. The well-worn phrase is like the well-worn boot—not precisely elegant, but very, very comfortable. The accepted formula has passed through thousands of lips, has gained its popularity by certain merits of its own and innovations must show reason for their introduction.

In the age-hallowed method of reports of company meeting for example, how could one improve upon the customary ritual? The annual general meeting of the Whatsitname Pepper and Salt Co. was held at the Company's offices, 999 Cankong Road, on Monday, at 11.45. Mr. Blank presided and was supported by Messrs Red, White and Blue. (directors); there were 9,222 shares represented. The Chairman said: (to considerable extent). Soandso proposed and another seconded, ad lib. The following resolutions were also carried. The meeting finally closes with a vote of thanks to the Chairman, and there you are. Every thing has been recorded with decorum, with no strain upon the reporter's vocabulary.

Should one open with a bang; or even with another cliché transferred to a new field such as "It gives us pleasure to record"; or "In the cozy little offices of Whatsitname Pepper & Salt Co. four of our most respected taipans were gathered together,"; or "Matters of vital and far-reaching importance were discussed by leading business men of the community," what advantage would be gained? In this field of reporting at least, we may feel that the cliché is a fixture.

THE NUMBER ONE BOY SAYS

Transcribed by Elizabeth Pepys

The Number One Boy says that summer would not be so bad if one didn't have to work. It isn't the heat, it's the activity that he objects to. Sleep—that is what summer was made for, not bustling about. Leave hibernating to bears, bats or boa-constrictors, but let him sleep in summer.

He cannot understand why Master and Missy and all the children don't sleep when they could enjoy themselves that way just as well as not. If they only would there would be less of this irritating bell-ringing and life would be pleasanter all around.

THREE-QUARTER LENGTH COATS VERY POPULAR

Sleep is a great thing for the disposition, the Boy says, and what a pity it is that foreigners don't know this. If the Boy could not nap at home while his employers were jazzing he says he would never be able to smile so suavely as he pours out cold drinks for them on their return.

Another thing that no reasonable Boy could wish to fathom is the inexplicable folly of the foreigners who play golf or tennis in the broiling sun to get hot and then fling themselves into chairs in front of electric fans and toss off iced drinks to get cool again. Queer people, the foreigners, the Boy says.

PARIS SPEAKING

Quite the Latest Thing Out

Friends in France tell us that the newest thing in fur coats is plaids, obtained by using different shades of the same fur or the dyed and natural fur in combination. Many fur coats were sold even during August, as prices are better and workrooms are not rushed. Sable, of course heads the list in desirability, while mink and Persian lamb come next, with ermine and chinchilla for evening. Leopard, trimmed with red fox is likely to be very popular.

The white haired woman emphasizes the bluish tint of her hair by adding a bit of bluing to the shampoo water, and then selecting blue-mauve scarves in the same shade to wear with white evening dresses.

Banama and "tourterelle" (a new grey) add variety to day time hosiery, outclassing the redder notes of beige, while nude and apricot are still good form for evening, together, of course with the flesh-coloured stocking. Honey coloured satin slippers are popular at the moment for dancing.

The straight and narrow, severely plain outline continues the only style at present, and the trend seems toward brown or black and white costumes for the autumn. Envelope bags of red or green leather give a jaunty note of contrast.

Bracelets, one only, worn to complete a costume, are now studded with every manner of precious and semi-precious stones, and many family heirlooms are being reset for this purpose. Must of these are slender affairs, but a handsome cuff-effect of emeralds and brilliants worn by the Principessa Odescalchi covers the forearm.

The Coster Kerchief has arrived in Shanghai, not from Paris but from London, where it has been extremely popular, and has just made its appearance on the street. This particular kerchief was folded in a triangle, drawn about the shoulders and tied with a loose knot at the V-shaped neck.

ADVICE FOR THE SHINGLE-MINDED

DON'T forget that the test of one's bob is the back of the neck.

DON'T fail to make the most of a widow's peak fore or aft.

DON'T wear the hair shingled unless you have a well-shaped head—then try to make the lines of the head resemble a boy's as much as possible.

DON'T under any circumstances have the hair clipped on the neck. If the hair-line extends very far down, wear the bob low or renounce it altogether; otherwise the head looks like that of a man with the much despised round shave.

DON'T wear the hair straight back unless the brow is good looking, and never part the hair in the middle unless you definitely are a beauty of the classical type. And don't wear a barrette o a Dutch cut. You are grown up!

DON'T copy your best friend's bob—she may be a Leonora Hughes and you a Gloria Swanson. Study your own face. Consider the eyes gazing at the nape of your neck at theatres or church and don't add yet another haphazard cut to the many unsightly ones of to-day.—"Vogue."

THE OLD LADY SHOWS HER VERSES

Into my office, in the distant corner newspaper, recently tripped an old lady. She is not one of those flowerlike retiring old ladies (so seldom seen in this 20th century); she is very "active" in a number of organizations, serving on countless committees in her little country town not far distant. In her hand was a small parcel.

It turned out to be a present which she was bringing to me, all done up in tissue paper and lavender ribbons; just what might be expected from a woman of her venerable years. Before handing over the gift, the dear old soul explained that it was a book she had lately read; a volume of poetry containing at least a hundred verses. It seemed she loved poetry and had always read a great deal, and, if I would pardon her apparent conceit, knew herself to be something of a judge in that line.

A Literary Find.

This poem, however, was altogether a different matter. Even the name of the author was unknown to her and, in fact, it had a decidedly foreign sound. She had been skeptical always of all importations. Then, too, its metre and its morals were confusing, although there was certainly an undeniable fascination about the thing.

Knowing me to be a bit of an intruder into the reviewer's column, my elderly caller urged me to accept the strange little volume still enwrapped in its spotless whiteness. There was one condition attached, a kind of string as it were; I was to read it carefully and give her my candid opinion. Many of the "verses" she thought quite "pretty," but then, she admitted with a deprecating smile, she was no real critic.

If the entire book proved to be absolutely worthless in my judgment, I was so to inform the good lady with equal candor, but she would appreciate it if I would refrain from revealing her lack of discernment to the members of her social, historical, and philanthropic world.

I was becoming nervous. What vacuous bunkum or decadent translation was to be placed within reach of my spotless hands, later to cast its vitiating influence on my unbesmirched brain?

Is it Possible?

Then the insidious or meaningless thing was passed to me. With fingers well nigh trembling with excitement and curiosity I found myself untying the lavender ribbons and withdrawing the issue paper. There, to my astonishment, lay a little limp-leather book about four inches long by two and a half wide. It was bound in dark brown and the inner sides of the back were of bright green moire silk. On its right side it bore in bold and gilded lettering the name of our old familiar friend which we meet anew with unfailing regularity the 25th day of each December; the "Rubaiyat" of our quotable and companionable Omar!—Vera Palmer, "The Bookman."

HELPFUL HINTS

To Use Old Baked Potatoes

Many people who relish freshly baked potatoes, "hot and hot" from the oven, will yet eat them only under protest, if at all, when they are served, at a later meal, creamed, or Lyonnaise. These epicures assert that in the latter forms, even with parsley and onion to disguise the flavour, the strong, even rank, taste acquired by standing in their skins spoils them for a discriminating palate. The flavour, it is asserted, can be detected even in hash, unless it is highly seasoned. That these fastidious ones are not imagining the condition is evident to anyone who will take a sniff at the napkin in which baked potatoes have been wrapped to keep them hot.

If, however, the insides are removed from the skins of those left over before they have a chance to cool entirely, and the soft part is packed in a bowl that can be covered closely, the potatoes can be used without any of the strong odor being perceptible. If mashed while still hot, they can be used for potato cakes or souffle; and if to the potatoes, either plain or mashed, be added a little butter, while they are still warm enough to melt it, they will not become hard and dry before they can be used.

Keeping the Hair Wavy..

No matter how straight one's hair may be, it can be successfully waved and kept in curl for at least two days by means of water waving. Hair that is treated in this way regularly finally assumes a pretty and natural wave.

To make the wave, first dampen the hair either with a little curling fluid of some kind or else dissolve a lump of sugar in half a pint of hot water and use it to moisten the hair. The best way to do this is to dip a comb with rather large teeth into the liquid and then pass it through the hair, dipping it again when necessary. The hair should be damp, but not wet. Now comb the hair straight back from the forehead and slip a comb into it from the front at the roots so that the teeth point toward the back. Then place another comb just behind the first comb with its teeth pointing toward those of the first comb, so that the teeth of the two combs meet like scissors, the hair being drawn into a loop in this way across the head, then pinch the loops of hair between them and pin them with invisible hairpins and combs and comb the hair out with a perfectly dry comb. A very natural-looking wave will be the result.

The combs most suitable for water waving are the small round combs used for keeping a child's hair back from the forehead.

MARSHAL LU YUNG-HSIANG

MARSHAL LU INTERVIEWED

Chekiang Left to Manage Chekiang: This Centre Best from Which to Direct the War

FULLY RESOLVED TO FIGHT ON: 35,000 NORTHERN TROOPS ENTIRELY LOYAL TO HIM

No Fear of Revolt in Army on Taihu Front

BY O. M. GREEN.

I interviewed Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang yesterday at his headquarters south of Shanghai. Inwardly, he was probably wishing me in Jericho. But no trace of impatience appeared in his manner, nor would it have been possible to imagine from look or word that, only the day before, he had suffered so cruel a blow as the revolt of Chêkiang and had been compelled to leave the province which had experienced five years of peace and beneficial government under him.

Except for the barricades which the French marines have set up at the bridges along the Siccawei creek, all the approaches to Marshal Lu's abode were outwardly as tranquil as if war had never been heard of. The sentries made no difficulty about letting us through until we got to the door of the Marshal's house. And here, at first, the guards, of whom there were ten or twelve, denied stoutly that he was anywhere near Shanghai, they supposed he was at Hangchow, had not heard of his leaving there, had no idea when he might be expected here.

We convinced them at last that our information was better than theirs, a secretary was fetched and presently we were shown into Marshal Lu's presence.

A Charming Personality.

To use a rather overworked but in this case quite appropriate phrase, Marshal Lu has a charming personality. Tall and broad, he has the easy, unrivalled courtesy of the ideal Chinese gentleman—whose dress, and not a uniform, he was wearing. His eyes are bright and twinkling and his whole expression denotes kindliness and humanity.

Of the reasons why he had had to leave Hangchow he would not talk much. He admitted that it was principally due to the Chêkiang provincial troops having split with his own Shantung troops and therefore he had decided to leave Chêkiang people to manage Chêkiang's affairs. Incidentally he said that General Sun Chuan-fang, the Fukienese invader, was still some hundreds of miles from Hangchow.

"What I may do in another day or two," said Marshal Lu as interpreted, "it is impossible to say. For the moment I have come here because it is the best place from which to direct the war."

"Then your Excellency means to fight on?"

"Most assuredly," was the emphatic answer.

The Loyal Troops.

I asked what Marshal Lu would now consider his front, would it be from Sungkiang to Liuho? He said that that definition would serve roughly, but that Sungkiang must be regarded more or less as a convenient expression. He went on to say that the troops on the Ihsing front west of the Taihu were entirely loyal to him, he had heard from them the day before. When I mentioned the Chinese press report that this army had thrown in its lot with the 1st and 2nd Divisions who ought to have marched against Sun Chuan-fang, both the Marshal and his secretary laughed unaffectedly. The General on the Lake front was wholly loyal to him, there were Shantung troops there and no fear of the army turning over.

Returning to the question of the Shanghai district, Marshal Lu said that he had two divisions and two brigades here, say in all 35,000 men, mostly of Shantung, his own province. He could absolutely rely on them, they were well equipped and would go on fighting, as he again said he meant to do.

I hazarded a question as to what would be the end, whether he won, or Marshal Chi of Nanking. But on this question he was evasive.

Marshal Lu said he did not think the revolt of Chêkiang would make any great difference to Marshal Chang Tso-lin, that the latter was very strong and always wholly independent of Peking, whose "illegal government" he had never recognized. But he added, in answer to a question, that he had not heard recently from Marshal Chang.

No Talk of Negotiation.

I asked him whether he had received any proposals for negotiation from Marshal Chi but he said there had been none.

Not from this quiet house, but from many parts of Shanghai the muttering of the guns would have been distinctly heard and the smoke of Liuho could be seen over the horizon. These are certainly no omens of negotiation. But Marshal Lu bears his troubles so that one would almost say he had none. Before these lines are in print, his policy may have changed and even, perhaps, there may be another hasty removal. But his last words were full of confidence. The war with Marshal Chi must be fought out.

SATURDAY.

FOREIGN AND CHINESE REPORTS OF CHEKIANG SUCCESS ON TAIHU

Marshal Chi Said to Be Calling in Troops to Guard Communications at Changchow: Chekiang Claiming Ihsing within Its Grasp

While there has been no fighting on the railway and Liuho fronts news of successes by Chêkiang come from west of the Taihu. The communiqué issued by Lunghua gives the details below.

A certain discount has always to be made in respect of such statements, but by trustworthy foreign reports the Chêkiang troops have undoubtedly pushed forward towards Ihing and from the same source it is learned that Kiangsu troops have lately been recalled from Quinsan to Changchow—which lies on the S. N. Rlwy. about 25 miles north of Ihing—owing to the threat which the Chêkiang forces may make to Marshal Chi's communications at that point.

In this connexion Mr. Rodney Gilbert's message to-day showing that Nanking is still confident of winning, but less confident of winning so quickly, appears to have special significance.

The following communiqué was issued by Lunghua on Friday afternoon:—

The situation along the Railway line is at present quiet. The Kiangsu troops made a few attacks on Liuho but were repulsed. Chêkiang advanced several li towards Liuho but this is not considered of much importance.

KIANGSU LESS BUOYANT

Quite Sure of Winning the War But Not So Quickly as Once Thought

FROM RODNEY GILBERT.

Nanking, Sept. 11.

Chinese officials returning from the fighting front are no longer inclined to think that the war can be won in two or three days, but they are still optimistic and report that Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan, who has his headquarters at K'unshan (Quinsan), is satisfied with the results up to date and is particularly pleased with the spirit shown by his men under the most trying conditions. While reports of the great advances made in the vicinity of Liuho, Huangtu and Nanziang are somewhat discounted by individual observers, there seems to be no doubt that the Chihli armies are slowly but surely pushing ahead and the fighting about Huangtu is said to be fiercer and more business-like than anything in China's modern history. It is impossible to get details of the casualties, but it is admitted that the 6th Division, which has been engaged for the most part with the Anfu troops from Fukien, lost 1,000 killed and there have been many casualties among officers.

The Fighting on the Lake

From a strategic point of view the fighting west of the Taihu, south of Ihing, is now recognized as exceedingly important and it is on this front that the Chihli commanders, Bei Bao-shan and Ch'en T'iao-yuan, are now claiming decisive victories in every encounter with General Lu's 4th Division. General Bei yesterday wired to Nanking that his troops had inflicted a severe defeat upon the Chêkiang troops south of Ihing and had made a material advance in the direction of Changhsing, their immediate objective. It is planned that when these troops reach Changhsing they shall be joined by the Anhui forces from Kuangteh, after which they will attempt to push on towards Hangchow. Many observers, both Chinese and foreign, believe that the war will be won in this quarter and it is said that if Marshal Chi did not regard the arsenal at Shanghai as his own particular prize in this struggle, he could end the war in Chêkiang by simply holding the present line from Liuho to the Taihu and by concentrating upon the Ihing front.

The troops under Marshal Chi on the eastern line have been stimulated to great efforts and to an utter disregard of danger and hardship by offers of cash prizes. Each town has its price. One hundred thousand dollars was offered for the taking of Huangtu. The Lunghua arsenal is said to have a similar price upon it, and the unit which takes Hangchow will be paid a million, while the commander on the western line who is responsible for the taking of the Chêkiang capital will almost certainly be Tuchun of the province. It is already assumed here that General Ch'en T'iao-yuan will win the war and be Governor of Chêkiang. General Bei Pao-shan is also a candidate, however, and both commanders in the Ihing territory are undoubtly spurred on now by the hope of winning high office.

Christian General Not Coming

In the general conduct of the campaign the Chihli leaders have had two serious disappointments. It was hoped that Feng Yu-hsiang's two mixed brigades would be behind the lines at Huangtu on the tenth or eleventh day of fighting and could be used in a grand drive against the exhausted Chêkiang troops which would end the war in a day. It now transpires that Chang Tso-lin's threats have been taken seriously in Peking and that the promised brigades are going to be held on the Peking-Mukden line. As things now stand the Chêkiang forces are all on the line so there are no reserves and there is no rest for the fighters. The Chihli army has sufficent reserves to permit of a system of relay fighting and while the men are badly worn out by the incessent struggle with mud and water they are fresher than the Chêkiang folk and it was hoped that with 12,000 newcomers from Peking it would be possible to stage an overwhelming assault. It would seem now that without reinforcements the Chihli army will simply settle down to an endurance test.

A Fukien Disappointment

Sun Ch'uan-fang's failure to give any material assistance has also been a disappointment. He has been asking for the Chêkiang appointment for a long while and it was fully intended that he should have the post, but of course on condition that he came in from the south with a large army and took it. Many apologies are being made for him here in official interviews; and inspired reports state that Sun is actually moving, but has been delayed by had roads, bad weather and what not. The truth, however, is confidentially whispered about. Sun has not left Yenping and will not leave. He refused to give any material assistance and the idea of appointing him Tuchun of Chêkiang is abandoned.

On the whole the situation is still decidedly favourable to Marshal Chi and little doubt is entertained here of eventual victory, but without further reinforcements the armies on the eastern section of the line cannot be expected to make as short work of it as was originally planned.

SEVEN AEROPLANES AT SOOCHOW

Daily Reconnaissances Over Quinsan and Taihu Fronts

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Soochow, Sept. 8.

Yesterday about 300 wounded were brought in from Quinsan, and 11 to-day. Many dead are reported from Quinsan

No more troops have been sent south (east of Taihu) to Pingwang during the last two weeks. There must be about 3,000 men there. The Grand Canal to Kashing is said to be blocked by driving piles. No fighting has been reported from there.

There are about six or seven aeroplanes in Soochow on the drill ground of the camp which is now empty, south of the city, They make daily flights, and some appear to go southeast for Quinsan. Two crashed last week. One was only slightly broken, but the other is a complete wreck. Neither of the Chinese aviators were hurt, however,

Fewer Troops for Local Front

There now seems to be little, or no movement of troops down the railway. Perhaps they are being sent from Changchow to Ihing.

Ten days ago the Chêkiang forces commandeered the new lake steamer Tai Wu (about 140 feet by 20 feet by 4½ feet) at Huchow. She will be of good service to them in transporting troops across the Taihu to Ihing, being able to make three or four round trips daily.

Conscription of coolies stopped practically the whole of last week, but it began again yesterday and is continuing to-day. The soldiers are now forcing each police district of the city to furnish a certain number of forced labourers.

Soochow city gates are closed daily at 7 p.m. The "North-China Daily News" does not arrive, therefore, until the third day.

NO TICKETS NOW TO SHANHAIKUAN

Shadow of the Mukden Warlord

Peking, Sept. 12.

The tourist agencies in Peking were instructed to-day not to sell tickets beyond Shanhaikuan, which is the centre of neutral territory in which no troops are stationed except foreign railway guards.

Up to the present tickets have been available, and ordinary traffic resulted in an exact exchange of rolling stock.

The present restriction is due to the fear that Chang Tso-lin may seize Chihli trains.—Reuter's Pacific Service

CHANG TSO-LIN'S ARMY ON MOVE

Three Divisions and 20 Mixed Brigades on the March for Shanhaikuan: Formidable Array of Guns and Aeroplanes

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Mukden, Sept. 11.

The main body of Marshal Chang Tso-lin's troops are about to move to the front. The commands are as follows:—

Commander-in-Chief, General Li Ching-ling; General Chang Hsueh-liang (Marshal Chang's son, well known as the "Young General") second in command; Generals Chang Tsou-hsiang of Kirin, Hsu Lan-chow, Wu Cheng-shen, and Chiang Teng-hsuan.

Already there are in position three Divisions and about 20 Mixed Brigades with General Li Ching-ling in command on the front line.

Martial law has been declared in Mukden under General Cheng Hsing.

The Liaoyang Regiment, considered the best in the Mukden Army, is on foot for Shanhaikuan 1,000 strong.

The Arsenal is working at full pressure turning out 500 shells for the field artillery per day. Marshal Chang has also four siege guns of 15 centimetres. He is also strong in aeroplanes. Two Handley-Page bombers with 500 lb. bombs are ready.

Fitters have been conscripted for the arsenal, the output increased and wages raised.

The Mukden party appear confident of their own power.

Coolies for transport have been conscripted and are continually on the move with stores and provisions.

Shrapnel tests were carried out yesterday in front of Marshal Chang.

No declaration of war had been issued up to noon to-day.

CHARACTER SKETCH OF THE MARSHAL AND HIS SON

That our correspondent writes strongly as a "pro-Chang Tso-lin" man, constitutes no breach of neutrality. All comers from Manchuria concur in the excellence of its governance. To appreciate Marshal Chang's work is not to disparage that of others. Not the least regrettable part of the present conflict is that there are men of so much merit on both sides.

Shanghai, Sept. 12.

A correspondent in the North who is at present on a visit to Shanghai has given as the result of personal interviews with the leading men in Mukden many interesting facts and opinions which during the present crisis will be of added interest to our readers.

To the people of Central and Southern China, Chang Tso-lin, he writes, though a name to conjure with, is still in a way a mysterious person whose place of birth is disputed and whose parentage is deprecated, but to those who have come into contact, and had either business or friendly relations, with him, it is easy to understand the present prosperous state of Manchuria.

Though not a scholar, his organizing powers have welded the people of the North into a firm and loyal body which goes to prove a strength of mind and personality, and a tenacity of purpose which should during the present fighting materially assist him to achieve his ambitions and to place himself in a position as a virtual Dictator of China.

Not a Military Despot.

Differing from other Chinese Generalissimos, his aims are not those of a military despot, but rather to achieve through the force of arms a reunited and peaceful China. Such a colossal undertaking could only be achieved by one outstanding man and the general opinion of the foreigners residing in far Northern China is that Chang Tso-lin, if properly supported, will, in the very near future, have the opportunity of opening up a new era in Chinese history by placing his country in a position which she should have reached centuries ago. His present firm but just administration in Manchuria has earned for him the love and respect of his people to whom poverty and distress, so common in Central and Southern China, is unknown. The simple fact that the lowest class of coolie from city or country is always the possesor of a few coppers is indicative of the prosperity of the entire province. It is not to be disputed that the common evils of the Far East exist in Manchuria. Banditry and opium trafficking are not unknown, but the firm measures taken to supress these evils should eventualy stamp out what are two of China's biggest curses.

A Vivid Personality.

A truer character picture could not have been painted of the Marshal than that seen at the recent wedding of his son. Though surrounded by men whose names are household words in China to-day, he obviously commanded their respect and though physically not an impressive man his personality stood out for even the blindest to see. A side of the Marshal very few people have seen, and which I have been fortunate enough to have had many opportunities to observe, is his love for his family and family life. Though the greater part of his days are spent in the fulfilling of his many duties, his keen interest in his family and domestic affairs is well known. Successes of great men in the past and present have been achieved by their ability to select capable offices for posts of responsibility. Outstanding in Manchuria to-day are the Tuchuns of Kirin and Heilunkiang, the Civil Governor Wang and the chief of staff Yang Yu-ting, all of whom go to prove that Chang-Tso-lin possesses the same key to success which has been used by many famous statesmen when building up great organizations.

A scarcely less impressive and interesting character than his father is the Marshal's second son, General Chang Hsueh-liang, well known to the foreigners in Manchuria as the "Young General," a title which does not belie him, he being but 28 years of age and commanding a division of the best troops in the North. The misinformed might be apt to surmise that such rapid promotion has come to him by virtue of his being the son of his father, but this is far from being the case. During the Chihli-Fengtien war of two years ago, the Young General showed considerable aptitude for military leadership and by absence of vain glory, his bravery and lack of thought concerning his personal comfort and safety, earned him the highest esteem and admiration of all the troops and staff who were fortunate enough to come in contact with him. It is no idle utterance to say that it was largely his tenacity, his perseverance in the face of overwhelming odds, that saved the Fengtien army at the Great Wall during the last stages of the late war.

A Trained Soldier

Unspoilt by Western education, but a scholar of no mean learning, the Young General has devoted his life to soldiering, the close study of military tactics, and the sympathetic command of his officers and men. No detail affecting the efficiency of his troops is too small for his personal consideration. He shares with his father the characteristic of being able to recognize ability in his officers, and to reward, with quick promotion those deserving. His duties are both numerous and arduous, but never too much for his untiring energy. Besides commanding one of the crack divisions, he is Director General of the Fengtien Aerodrome, the biggest and best equipped in China. The Chinese pilots receive from him every encouragement and he is always one of the first to take a seat in a machine, when some new "stunt" is to be tried.

The Young General is most popular with the foreign residents in Mukden. As an honorary member of the Club and an ardent supporter of it, he is often to be seen playing tennis with the few members who are equal to giving him a game. He is an excellent shot, a keen beginner at golf and fond of associating with foreigners by whom he is generally adjudged a sportsman and a gentleman.

CHINESE PRESS WAR NOTES

The Second Army Corps of Chêkiang are reported to have occupied most of the advantageous points outside Ihing, the fall of which is said to be imminent. The progress of the Chêkiang forces has been much assisted by three battalions of the 19th Division under General Yang Chun-pu refusing to fight and falling back upon the city without firing a shot. Ihing City is reported to have been pitilessly looted by the demoralized Kiangsu troops. It is feared that further looting will be committed prior to the evacuation of the City by the 19th Division.

Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan is said to have hurriedly left Quinsan for Changchow upon hearing of the mutiny of his troops at Ihing and Wusih; and, for fear that General Yang's troops might turn against himself by seizing Changchow, to have returned to Nanking.

General Bei Bao-shan is also reported to have left the front near Shanghai and returned to Haichow viâ Yangchow upon receipt of bad news from Kiangpei. This is said to explain the lull in fighting at Liuho, Huangtu and Kiating during the last two days.

Tuli of Anhui on the War-path

A correspondent writes from Anking on September 9 as follows:—

General Ma Lien-chia, Tuli of Anhui, left Anking together with his staff and a battalion of troops on board two steamers, the Anfung and the Lichi, at 8 p.m. on the 6th instant, and arrived at Wuhu the next morning. He will proceed to Hsuanchen in order to direct field operations. The districts under the Wuhu circuit, comprising Hsiuning, Chihchi, Kuangteh and Langchi (also called Chienping), all adjoin the Chêkiang territory. With the exception of Kuangteh and Langchi, all are hilly districts and easily held by defenders. The flat plain of Kuangteh and Langchi forms a splendid battlefield. Therefore, General Ma's plan is to launch his principal attacks upon Chêkiang from the vicinity of these two districts, although he has defined six districts, namely, Langchi, Hsuanchen, Ningkuo, Kuangteh, Tangtu and Chihchi, as the fighting area. The Chêkiang forces are also said to be massed on its border towns fronting Kuangteh and Langchi. A clash is soon expected.

In Anking, martial law has been proclaimed since the 3rd instant. Precautionary measures are being taken both on land and water.

MONDAY.

CHEKIANG MOVE ON QUINSAN

Double Attack from Anting Said to Be Going Well: Soldiers in Need of Clothes

While bad weather continues to hold up all fighting on the eastern front according to foreign information, Chêkiang Headquarters rather surprisingly announce an attack as having been started on Sunday morning at Anting and Kading which is stated to have gone well.

With all respect, it is difficult to believe that the fighting can have been very serious, not only because the state of the ground would impede movement, but because the mud would be continually choking rifles and guns.

It is a fact, however, that on Saturday the Red Cross received 28 wounded men and on Sunday 14.

An urgent appeal is being issued by the Chinese Red Cross for clothes for the soldiers in hospital. Their own have to be fumigated and, being uniforms, cannot be returned to the soldiers until the end of the fighting.

The casualties in the present warfare appear to be far in excess of those in recent Chinese wars. Our correspondents at Soochow and Nanking report their hospitals full and we know that the Red Cross here has been very busy.

On the west side of the Taihu, the Kiangsu commanders appears to have thrown in reinforcements and Chêkiang has not yet taken Ihsing. (This spelling, as that most in vogue will henceforward be used for Ihing and Nyishin.—Ed.)

Sunday's Chêkiang communiqué is as follows:—

Lunghua, Sept. 14.

This morning at about 8 a.m. Chêkiang troops started attacks from Anting and Kading simultaneously. Reports were received at noon to-day stating that the advance on both wings had been very successful. Troops from Anting are approaching Henli while on the other wing they have advanced towards Taichow. The object is to attack Quinsan from both flanks.

Serious fighting also took place between Sousan and Ihsing. Chêkiang troops were not successful in the taking of Ihsing as had been anticipated, the enemy having brought reinforcements from the other part of the line by boat from Wusih.

A telegram received from Mukden states that the troops of Chang Tso-lin had opened fire and expected to capture Tsaoyang, which is situated near Jehol. A further telegram stated that Tsaoyang was captured to-day.

No Change at Ihsing.

11 p.m.

During all yesterday on the Ihsing front, heavy artillery fire, concentrating on the Kiangsu lines, was met by a similar exchange of shots—heavy attacks but no great relative change in the positions of the armies. No information had come through as to the number of casualties, which it is thought are light, owing to the inability of the opposing forces to come together at close range, due to the muddy fields.

In the Kading sector, the Chêkiang men succeeded in driving back the Nanking troops for a slight gain which they managed to hold, while at Liuho, with the defenders still holding the village, no great changes took place.

The biggest movement of regiments took place on the Huangtu portion of the extended front, in a frontal attack, directed along the railway. Chêkiang advances, successful as they were for more than two miles toward Anting, failed ultimately in the main objective, for it was found impossible to hold the advanced lines, as the artillery could not be brought up and placed, nor could the infantry entrench themselves or form adequate defences before the Nanking forces returned, reinforced, to regain what they had lost. Casualties larger here probably than on the other sactors.

WAR PREPARATIONS ON THE YANGTZE

All the China Merchants' Steamers Delayed by Troop Carrying

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wuchang, Sept. 7.

The outbreak of fighting near Shanghai has already affected the sailing times of the China Merchants' Company's steamers. Those coming up-river are carrying thousands of Chinese refugees, who delay the steamer by their crowding off at the various ports. Those coming down are bringing troops. The Kiangwah, which was due coming up-river to Kiukiang at 4 p.m. yesterday, did not arrive until 8 p.m. The Kiangshun, which should have come down from Hankow and reached Kiukiang at 9 a.m. had not arrived and not been heard of at 9 p.m.

Reaching Wusueh after midnight, we could see even on the hulk the signs of warlike preparations. Two big republican flags adorned the front of the hulk. A smaller flag marked the temporary quarters of an officer, in front of which the defenders of (part of) their country stood with fixed bayonets. But Hankow is in sight, and it is time to pick up one's luggage and prepare to disembark.

NUMBERS OF WOUNDED ON KIANGSU SIDE

But Many Very Slight: Charges of Looting at the Front

From Our Own Correspondent.

Soochow, Sept. 9.

Our hope is that the S. N. R. may be clear within a few days. It seems certain that there is heavy fighting along the railway and at Liuho. It seems to be fairly certain that Marshal Chi is in person directing the fighting near Nanziang, which he hopes shortly to capture.

It is reported that troop trains carried Wu's picked troops to Quinsan last night, and many more troop trains are moving to the front to-day. One foreigner, who saw one these trains, said these were the most soldierly, and best equipped troops he had seen so far. It is also reported that General Feng's troops will pass through by train this evening and to-night. At any rate the Chêkiang forces will have their hands full within twelve hours.

This morning the three Soochow hospitals received by boat train—towed by launch—228 wounded from Liuho. It is estimated that 600 wounded have gone through by train to Nanking—perhaps some of these will be cared for at Wusih and Changchow. Soochow has received about 600 wounded in three days. The dead on the Kiangsu side are estimated at from 500 to 3,000, and the Chêkiang losses are said to be much heavier.

Conscription of workmen still continues, but less than yesterday.

Evidences of Looting.

Sept. 11.

It is reported that the S. N. R. will soon be open, so that some troops are being transferred to the Ihsing front, as the job at Shanghai is almost complete. (Is it?—Ed.).

Soochow received only 43 wounded yesterday, and 71 this morning. Both days these came from the Liuho front by launch tow. Only a small percentage are badly wounded. The 71 this morning are of the Second Division, and are the toughest crowd of robber-type soldiers that Soochow has so far cared for. Only about 10 of the 71 were badly wounded, many of the others having merely blistered feet, or slight wounds—possibly self-inflicted in order to give them a chance to retire to the rear. A large number of them had loot in their possession in money and small valuables. They arrived at 3 a.m., and it is reported that they got rid of a large amount of loot before they were examined by the Red Cross workers at 6 a.m. All loot found on them was taken from them, when they were examined. One Red Cross worker voted that these robbers be lined up against a wall and be shot. Even one of their officers had a sum of money in his possession—probably from the sale of loot, or this perhaps was his share of the loot. The hospitals have nearly reached their limit of wounded until the camp outside Chang-mên is prepared to received the convalescent and "walking" cases. This type of wounded is causing a good deal of trouble, because the promised guard, really to control these men, has not been forthcoming so far.

PEKING WAR NEWS

Victories Claimed for Kiangsu

Peking, Sept. 14.

Official bulletins claim that the Chêkiang forces at Liuho, Kiating and Huangtu on September 12 were defeated and suffered many casualties and that, owing to lack of reinforcements, they are being surrounded.

The defeat of the Kiangsu forces near Ihsing (Yishing) is not confirmed by these reports, which, on the contrary, state that Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan's forces have occupied a portion of Lanshan and have captured over 50 prisoners and a quantity of arms and ammunition.

The Ninth Division, which has been recruiting in Peking for transport work since September 9, has enrolled 3,000 recruits.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SKETCH MAP SHOWING THE POLITICAL DIVISIONS INTO WHICH CHINA IS RESOLVED AT THE PRESENT DAY.

In respect of the above map the reference to pro-Chihli or anti-Chihli means, of course, political party ascendency only. There is no evidence that the people of these provinces are interested in the dispute.

The Chihli Party to-day controls the heart of China, the valleys of the Yangtze and of the Yellow River. It controls the provinces of Chihli, Shantung, Honan, Anhui, Kiangsu, Kiangsi, Hupeh, Shensi, Szechuan and Fukien. The principale railways running through these provinces, are the Shanghai-Nanking Railway, the Tientsin-Pukow Railway, the Kinhan Railway, the Peking-Suiyuan Railway, the Lunghai Railway, Peking-Mukden Railway, Taoching Railway, Pienlo Railway, Shantung Railway. The estimated area of all provinces under the control of the Chihli Party is 814,285 sq. miles; the estimated population 273,480,797 (P.O. 1922).

A point must be made with regard to the provinces of Szechuan, Kiangsi and Fukien. Szechuan has only recently been unified under General Yang Sen and although apparently all is peaceful, its loyalty to the Chihli Party is not absolutely assured. Kiangsi is weak under an unimportant Tuchun and might well be the point of attack should Dr. Sun Yat-sen really enter the fray. Fukien is supposed to be absolutely under the domination of Marshal Wu Pei-fu, but its Tuchun, General Sun Chuan-fang, was disloyal to his previous master, General Wang Chan-yuan, Tuchun of Hupeh, and is said to harbour a grudge against his present overlord, who appointed another to the position in Hupeh which he coveted.

The opposition to the Chihli Party consists of the Manchurian Provinces, Fengtien, Kirin and Heilungkiang; Chêkiang and Kuangtung. The principal railways in this area are the Peking-Mukden line, Chinese Eastern Railway, Shanghai-Hangchow-Ningpo Railway, Kirin-Changchun Railway, South Manchuria Railway, Canton-Hankow Railway (Unfinished), Canton-Kowloon Railway, Canton-Samshui Railway. The total area of these provinces is 500,380 sq. miles; the total population 81,294,435.

Whether Kuangtung's participation in the present war really includes the will of the province or is a personal expedition on the part of Dr. Sun hardly admits of doubt. More information of General Chen Chiung-ming's attitude is necessary.

Hunan and Kansu are here placed within the Chihli Party sphere of influence, but Kansu is at present of no importance and the possibility of General Tan Yen-kai always effecting a shift in the political situation in Hunan is to be considered.

The neutral provinces, Shansi, Yunnan, Kueichow and Kuangsi are very important. Shansi will remain neutral, living its own life without regard for what goes on in other parts of China. Kuangsi is under the control for the moment of pro-Peking political parties. Yunnan and Kueichow are "dark horses."

THE WAR SEEN FROM THE KIANGSU SIDE

Brisk Fighting on the Ihsing Side: Fancy Tales of Chekiang Men Supplying Themselves with Rifles from Shanghai Constables

By H. L. Pearce.

General Headquarters,
Quinsan, Sept. 13.

There has been no important change on this front during the past 24 hours, and the severe fighting which has taken place for possession of Huangtu leaves the opposing forces practically as they were three days ago. Heavy rains which have fallen during the past two days have rendered difficult ground still more difficult to cover. Casualties have been numerous and use is being made of the waterways to bring in wounded men. There was only occasional artillery fire yesterday and during the night.

The official bulletin issued late last night states that on the Ihsing front, troops commanded by General Bei Bao-shan (the Right First army) drove back enemy forces at the village of Lanshansui, midway between Ihsing and Changhing. Some scores of men were killed, and a number of officers.

Chêkiang forces made determined efforts to advance on the Kading sector during the night of the 11th, but all attacks were repulsed by men of General Chu Hsi's Division. Kiangsu artillery did effective work in these engagements.

On the Liuho sector, a movement in co-operation with the naval force there is about to take place.

Fairy Tales of Chekiang.

A report has been received from Shanghai that the number of deserters from the Chêkiang army is increasing daily, and there are no troops available to fill the gaps. From the same source comes news also that the Chêkiang army is beginning to suffer from a lack of provisions and ammunition, and to such an extent in the case of the former that they have been compelled to collect rifles used by the Shanghai constabulary. In the event of defeat, it has been determined (the informers report) to destroy the arsenal at Kiangnan. (Correspondents at the front on this side have seen no evidence of these harrowing circumstances—Ed).

There is great activity on the line here, and this morning many troops left for the front. They will possibly strike from Quinsan in a new direction. We have had a visit from an enemy aeroplane, but the occasion was not one for general consternation, the visitor dropping a couple of ineffective bombs a mile or two beyond the city, and then returning.

There appears to be room for improvement in the organization of the medical service, and with this purpose Dr. F. A. Wilmot, of the University Hospital at Nanking is here to make investigations.

Incidentally, one observes the Red Cross flag put to curious uses. Some Chinese appear to have formed the idea that the flag is a protective emblem which may be used by all and sundry, quite innocently, of course. An amusing instance has occurred at Soochow, where the Electric Lighting Company, possibly with a view to saving their employees from mobilization, made all, or most, of them members of the Red Cross, paying their subscriptions and providing them with Red Cross uniforms. This morning, I noticed one of the men fixing Red Cross flags on electric lighting standards at Soochow railway station. Perhaps he was making non-combative assurance doubly sure.

Father Time Storm Bound.

I must mention a little tragedy of time which has occurred. All the clocks on the line are out of commission. The reason is that the Chinese whose burden it was, in happy days of peace, to run up and down the line and wind 'em up, was caught in Shanghai when the storm broke. Such is war.

WAR LONG PREPARED: LONG TO RUN

Kiangsu Wounded Grow Numerous: Sides Fairly Even Now But Kiangsu Has Reserves

From Our Own Correspondent.

Nanking, Sept. 11.

Among observers in Nanking two convictions are growing: one, that careful war plans were being made on the Kiangsu side some time before the actual outbreak of hostilities, and another, that the war will not be ended soon. It seems that China is in for a long drawn-out struggle, which will seriously affect transportation, business, education and progress and the happiness of the people.

The constant arrival of troops in Hsiakuan from up the river and from the north indicates that Chi certainly has the active backing of the Chihli Party generals. To-day 400 new Shantung recruits for the 6th Division passed through.

Word comes from Soochow that the hospitals there are overflowing. Changchow hospitals are preparing to receive wounded. About a hundred wounded have been sent back to Nanking and are now in the Military Hospital here. The Nanking University Hospital and the Red Cross Hospital at Hsiakuan are prepared to receive large numbers of wounded. Dr. Frank Wilmot, of the Nanking University Hospital, has been asked, through official channels, to proceed to the fighting area to organize the medical relief for the wounded. He leaves to-morrow, accompanied by a Chinese staff.

To-day's communiqué reports continuance of heavy fighting on the Ihsing front. An attack from 4 p.m. on the 8th to 8 a.m. on the 9th resulted in the wounding of the Chêkiang Colonel, Yang Shu-chih, a captain, five lieutenants and 70 soldiers. Minor successes are reported from skirmishes near Huangtu. At the Liuho River mouth, the Kiangsu fleet has been firing on Chêkiang positions. An enemy boat which tried to reconnoitre at night was driven back.

At present, official circles admit that the opposing forces are about evenly matched in strength. But Kiangsu has the reserves.

SHANTUNG AND CHIHLI TROOPS AT KASHING

Scattered Posts Called in to Swell Main Forces: Big Action Expected

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kashing, Sept. 11.

The appearance of scattered units of Shantung and Chihli troops from outposts in this territory indicate preparation for further fighting. These men are loyal to Marshal Lu, but do not seem to know what they are to fight for.

Local police recruits also show some effort at home defence; the new uniforms and other equipment give a smart appearance.

Many think that the Chêkiang forces will make a stubborn resistance at the fighting lines until some decisive factor emerges or prolongs the conflict.

The Chinese "man in the street" (when you can find one) agrees with Napoleon's dictum without knowing its origin, viz:—"That Providence is on the side of the big battalions."

The chess-board strategists predict eventual surrounding and overwhelming of the Chêkiang eastern front.

However, there are many who think that Marshal Lu is an able commander, that with ammunition and favourable positions maintained, he can win terms advantageous to his contentions.

In Chinese history, treachery has often done as much to decide an issue as real fighting. It may occur again.

Local markets continue to show slight improvement.

Sept. 12.

Stout resistance at the front, makes the situation more quiet in the rear of the Chêkiang forces in this action.

As the Chinese are born opportunists, the prolonged suspense gives a chance to try any one of seeming possibilities. Consequently, the market is timidly resuming.

A decision of some kind is expected to begin at the front.

MUKDEN ARMY GOING SOUTH

Endless Trains of Guns, Munitions and Stores

From Our Own Correspondent.

Mukden, Sept. 13.

Traffic has been entirely suspended on the Peking-Mukden line since the early morning and for the first time the Chinese station is completely in the possession of departing troops.

To-day train after train left, with guns, troops, ammunition, ponies, stores, equipment, machine guns, pack mules and food stuffs.

The troops bivouacked in the vicinity of the railway station and the public were denied admittance to this area.

There is artillery in plenty en route to the south and their equipment and uniforms seem to be well worn, and the ponies in good condition.

Capt. Mackenzie has been presented by Marshal Chang Tso-lin with a gold watch, suitably engraved, as a recognition of his services to the Aeronautical Corps.

The Mukden party evidently mean business.

CHANG NOT KEEN TO FIGHT

Notes on His Flying Force

A most competent observer, who has just left Mukden and who has to a more or less degree been in the actual confidence of the Marshal, vouches for the statement that Marshal Chang Tso-lin does not want war in any manner, shape or form in China at the present time. Pursuing the policy of agricultural development, which was elaborated after the disaster of 1922, the Mukden Tuchun has built up a powerful and vital kingdom of his own, which he does not at all desire to fritter away in battle.

There are playing upon him, however, powerful forces, according to this accredited information, urging him to action, and with the exception of a mere handful of his Military Cabinet, the whole of the latter are at one in wishing to attack Peking—it is even suggested that Brigadier General Chang, the son of the Marshal, is now, contrary to his former attitude, with those who want war.

The aviation corps, according to our informant, is not what it has been cracked up to be. In the aerodromes and hangars of Mukden armies there are exist some 50 or 60 machines but many are in various stages of repair and decay. Within the past month no less than three of the best flying machines there have plunged to earth. The Chinese aviators, however, were lucky and got off with slight injuries.

A fleet of no less than 18 Breguet planes, of 300 h.p., not dissimilar to the machine in which Capt. Doisy flew to Shanghai, are on the field in Mukden. But there is a lack of pilots to fly them. Chinese pilots are accustomed, according to our informant, to flying at 8,000 feet when they circle in bombing formations and this is, as every military man knows, at least seven times too high to utilize their bombs in the most effective manner. Even the most scientific range-finding instruments are valueless in ascertaining approximate distances from a mile and half in the air.

Marshal Chang has, however, men who will be of value in observation and actual fighting operations—they are Russians. They are eight in number and have seen flying service during the Great War on the German front. If the other camps do not find similar experts, Chang will have an undoubted advantage.

Mukden, Sept. 12.

The city is now under martial-law which was proclaimed on the 9th instant. The negotiable paper issued by Fengtien Provice has fallen in value, the present quotation being $190 for Y. 100. This is $60 cheaper than in the middle of last month.—Eastern News Agency.

Peking Also Moving Troops

Peking, Sept. 8.

It is announced that a part of the Ninth Division under General Tung Cheng-kuo will be shortly sent to Hsifengkow and arrangements are being made to transport supplies of rice from Paotingfu to Peiyuan for their needs. There are also signs of activity amongst the troops under Marshal Feng Yu-hsiang's command. Field guns and rifles were seen being transported this morning from the godowns at Sanchiatien to Marshal Feng's headquarters at Nanyuan and it is supposed that a part of these munitions will be allotted to the First Brigade, who are said to be under orders for the north.

The Government sent General Pao Kwei-ching, the newly appointed Director of the Chinese Eastern Railway, to Mukden this morning with a view to reaching an understanding with Marshal Chang in regard to the Kiangsu-Chêkiang situation and thereby averting a Chihli-Fengtien war.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

AUTUMN MANŒUVRES

Northern Explanation of the Mukden Army Move

Peking, Sept. 10.

A Mukden paper received in Peking to-day announces that Marshal Chang Tso-lin's autumn manœuvres are to begin on September 25 and that four Mixed Brigades are under orders to proceed to Chinchow. The preliminary arrangements for the manœuvres are said to have been entrusted to General Chang Hsiao-liang, the Marshal's son.

Marshal Hsiao Yao-nan is sending some of his troops to the help of Marshal Chi, according to reports from several sources. He has telegraphed to Peking that he has ordered General Wang Ju-chin, Commander-in-Chief of the Upper Yangtze, to go to Pukow with General Chin Yun-ao and furnish all possible assistance to the Kiangsu forces. The news that Marshal Hsiao's 4th Mixed Brigade is proceeding by river from Hankow to Nanking has already reached the headquarters of Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang at Hangchow.

No Chihli Men at Shanhaikuan.

Reuter's Agency has been requested by the Chinese Government to state that there is no truth in the report that Chihli troops have been moved to Shanhaikuan, Hsifengkow and other places in the north and that since the fighting in 1922 there has not been any movement of Government troops in Chihli and the neighbouring provinces.

The report that the Peking-Mukden railway inside Shanghaikuan was interrupted yesterday morning on account of the transportation of troops also is stated to be untrue.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

MARTIAL LAW IN PEKING

Peking, Sept. 12.

The Metropolitan Area has been placed under military control. A police announcement explains that the Legations as well as the many foreign residents in the area must be strictly protected and that plots against peace and order must be prevented. The schools have been notified that no political agitation will be permitted.

Martial law has been proclaimed in Mukden.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

The editors of several Peking news agencies who were arrested by the police for circulating alleged false news regarding the war situation have been handed over to the Peking garrison headquarters for trial.

GEN. KAO SAO HSIANG
One of the Chêkiang Command at Nanziang

TUESDAY.

FIGHTING RENEWED AT HUANGTU

Some Close Engagements and Much Gun-fire But Little Change of Position

A steady action appears to have been fought at Huangtu on Sunday afternoon, with somewhat indefinite results.

Kiangsu opened the engagement with shrapnel fire at about four o'clock, the shells dropping just behind Huangtu railway station. A pathway leading out of the station on the eastern side houses four 75 mm. field guns (i.e. about 3 in. guns), which were most probably the object of the Kiangsu fire. A number of the Kiangsu shells burst quite close to these guns, but failed to do any damage, burying themselves harmlessly in a paddy field at the back of the station. The Huangtu battery of guns, however, replied by firing shells straight along the railway, striking the embankment a mile or so higher up the line. This was probably done with the object of wrecking the line at that particular point and so making it impassable for trains.

About this time brisk machine-gun and rifle fire was exchanged, and kept up for about an hour. Wounded were coming in steadily to the station all the afternoon from the direction of Huangtu village, which is on the south side of the railway line. About two or three miles to the north of the lines crashes could be heard which gave the impression that two more field guns were in action at that point, and these would, of course, be in the hands of the Chêkiang troops. More machine-gun and rifle fire could be heard from the vicinity, and it would seem that the Kiangsu line takes a curve in that direction, bringing their front closer to the Chêkiang line in the north than in the south.

A Bayonet Charge.

Later.

Advices from the Huangtu sector state that an advance was made just outside of Huangtu village on Monday morning in which the Chêkiang forces attacked Kiangsu at the point of the bayonet and drove them back three li, holding the territory thus won throughout the day. Sunday night was characterized by heavy artillery fire, neither side doing much harm, though expending much powder and shell. On Monday just before noon Kiangsu artillery fired upon the sector between Huangtu and Kading to which Chêkiang replied with machine-gun rapid fire and an occasional big shell. To the right of the railway Gen. Lu's men began operations shortly afterwards but did not follow up with infantry.

Three or four wounded came into Shanghai Station from Huangtu during the day, casualties of the evening previous.

Official reports have it that 1,000 men at Lunghua were transferred to this sector during on Monday night while another 500 (not stated where from) were seen detraining at Shanghai North in splendid form, to be sent to Liuho.

A foreign observer who visited Huangtu on Sunday has it that 20 car loads of coffins arrived there during the day.

Midnight.

A report from Lunghua late on Monday night was to the effect that there was heavy fighting on three fronts, Huangtu, Liuho and Ihsing, but that the position was unchanged.

WAR AS SEEN FROM NANKING

How Nearly the Kiangsu Troops got Through at Huangtu Last Week: Sharp Fighting West of Taihu Lake

From Rodney Gilbert.

Nanking, Sept. 14.

Surprisingly little detailed news of the fighting in the vicinity of Shanghai is coming in here and at this writing General Bei Bao-shan, who commands the right column in the mountain south of Ihsing, claims sweeping victories and the capture of Chêkiang officers. The report of the fighting in the immediate vicinity of Shanghai, when the artillery firing was heard in the settlement, reached Nanking by way of the Shanghai papers before the local Government officers had heard of it. It is now announced that on the 9th a large force from the 6th Division went southward from the neighbourhood of Anting, passed to the south of Huangtu and forced the Chêkiang troops back to Chenju, which is virtually on the outskirts of Shanghai. Having achieved so much, the Kiangsu troops were faced with reinforcements brought from Liuho by motor lorries and were driven almost all the way back to the point near Anting from which they had started.

It is admitted here that Liuho has not been held and that the Kiangsu 4th Mixed Brigade, commanded by Wu Heng-tsan, and the new 2nd Division, commanded by Ma Yu-jen, are only holding their own west of Liuho. Before Kiating, General Chu Hsi, in command of the old 2nd Division, and Li Tien-chen, with the 3rd Mixed Brigade, are apparently making no effort to advance upon Kiating, but are trying to move southward on the west of the city. The Huangtu front is still bitterly contested but General Kung P'ang-to with the 6th Division, while claiming to have taken Huangtu several times, has not been able to hold it and is now between Anting and Huangtu. At Quinsan the 3rd Honan Mixed Brigade, an Anhui Mixed Regiment and a Hupeh Mixed Regiment were being held in reserve as late as the 11th and there is no news as yet of their having gone into action.

On the Taihu Front.

On the west of the Taihu, the Kiangsu forces claim to be advancing rapidly in three columns and to be forcing back General Chen Yao-shan and his 4th Division, though they are not yet within striking distance of Changhsing. General Bei Bao-shan is on the right with a Mixed Brigade now known as the 1st New Division. General Yang Ch'un-p'u is in the centre with a brigade now described as the 19th Division, and General Chen Tiao-yuan is on the left with the 5th Mixed Brigade.

These leaders are fighting in the hills in the vicinity of Hsiangshan and their reports are of the capture of various mountain passes which do not appear on the maps and cannot be identified. There seems to be little reason to doubt, however, that more progress is being made in the west than in the east where Marshal Chi has apparently done nothing to boast about for some days.

Official bulletins published here claim that the Chihli fleet which is lying off Liuho has had encounters every night with Chêkiang boats from the Huangpu and has driven the scouts back in each instance. These reports are obviously fiction since the foreign gunboats at Woosung report that no Chêkiang gunboat has left the river since the fighting commenced.

The Fukien Invader.

Admiral Tu Hsi-kuei, in an interview with the writer, claimed to have positive information that General Sun Chuan-fang left Yenping, in Fukien, on September 1, with a large force and was already over the Chêkiang border bound for Chüchow where he will join the Kiangsi forces. This is pleasant news for the Kiangsu commanders, who had come to believe that Sun Chuan-fang had not moved and would not move, but it will be disappointing to both General Bei and Chen if Sun Chuan-fang fights his way to Hangchow, because both are intent upon winning the Tuchunship.

According to the latest reports a fresh advance has now been made by the 6th Division due south from Anting in the direction of Sungkiang and it is claimed that Tsinpoo has already been taken.

THE FIGHT FOR IHSING

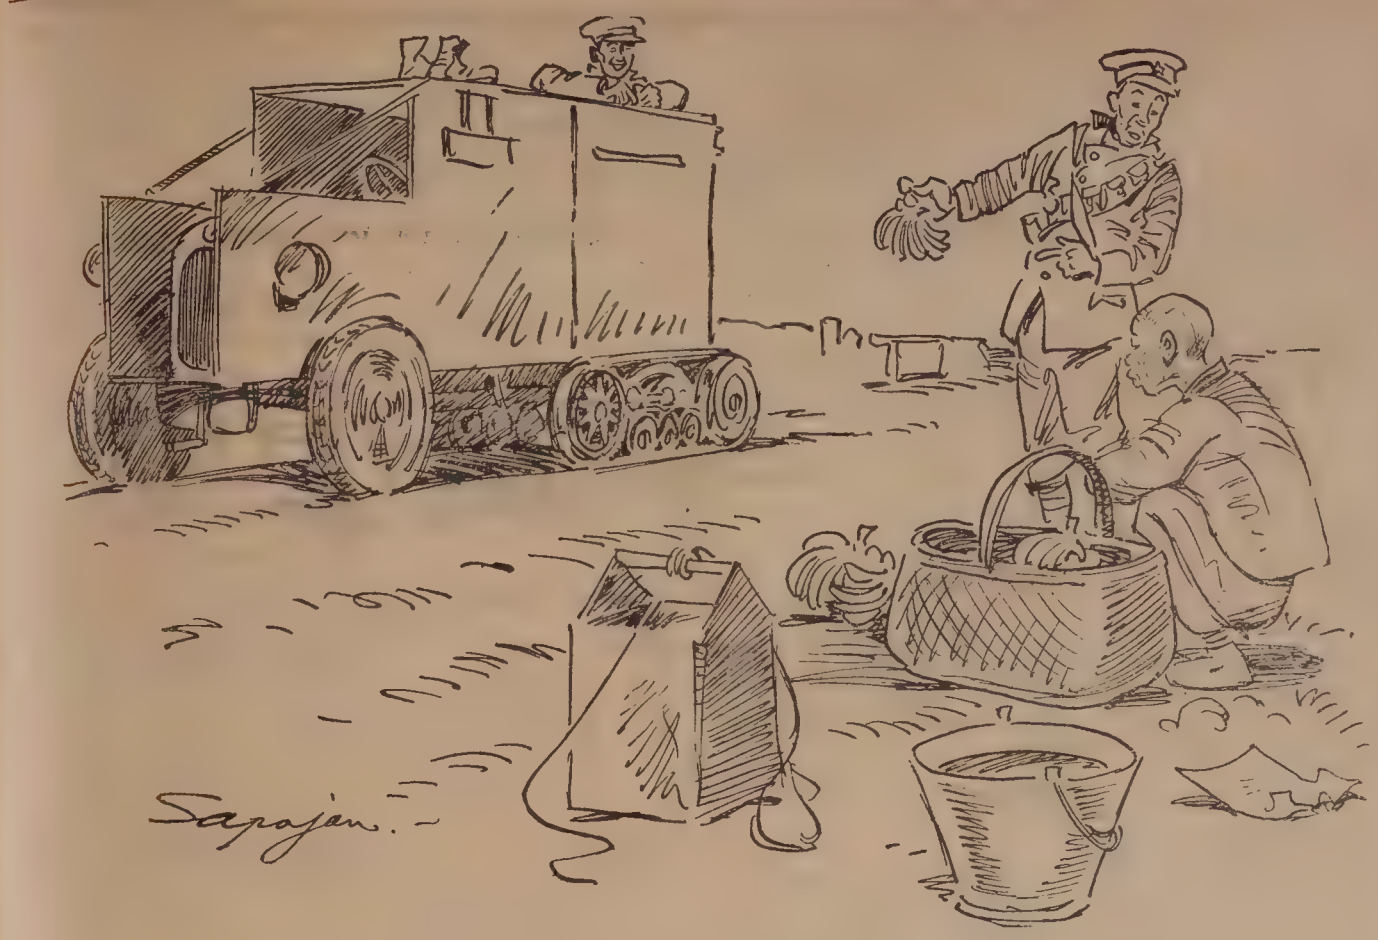
Naval Encounter on the Taihu

By Our Special Correspondent.

Nanking, Sept. 12.

According to information received in Nanking yesterday, there was a renewal of heavy fighting at Ihsing, on the Taihu side where the position is gradually developing into one of great importance. On the night of the 9th instant, a Chêkiang force attempted to take a strongly held village in the vicinity of Ihsing, but was driven back with considerable loss. The attack was renewed on the following night, but was again driven off and again with heavy casualties. The estimated losses of the Chêkiang force are perhaps exaggerated, but according to our information there is no doubt they were serious.

A "naval diversion," details of which are at present only meagre, has occurred on the Taihu lake. Pushing forward their enveloping movement, a Kiangsu force surprised a convoy of junks, said to have numbered 100, proceeding in a north-easterly direction across the lake. It was afterwards discovered that they carried 600 volunteers and were loaded with ammunition, and it is assumed their purpose was to raid the railway line at a point between Soochow and Chowhanghing. Kiangsu artillery opened fire, and the closely packed convoy presented a target of which the gunners took full advantage, 75 of the junks being sunk, the rest escaping. The number of lives lost is not reported, and although all possible rescues were effected, the casualty list in this little affair must have been heavy.



VOICE FROM THE ARMOURED CAR:—"YES, WE HAVE NO BANANAS"

IN THE OUTPOSTS OF HUANGTU

Fighting Renewed as the Sun Dries up the Fields in Railway Sector: Chicken and Tea with a Chekiang General

BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

Huangtu, Sept. 15.

According to all prognostications, heavy fighting was to be expected yesterday as soon as the sun came out to dry off the miry soil along the extended battle front from the Taihu Lake to Liuho. Anyone with nothing but the conventional idea of the Chinese soldier to guide him, would have been surprised by those we went with in the train from Shanghai to Nanziang. For the Chêkiang military, as typified by these, are entirely different. Not only one, but at least 50 per cent. of them were reading Chinese newspapers with reports of their own activities. One of them to my left spoke to me in quite good English.

The trip to Nanziang was made in a very few minutes and Chenju, the half-way point, quickly passed, seemed to be unaware that a war was being fought, though hardly gun fire sound away.

We had to wait at Nanziang the better part of an hour until the military train for Huangtu was made up and fully loaded with ammunition and nonchalant soldiery. Suddenly a shot rang out and we all ducked as the bullet ricocheted by our ears. What was it all about? Had the enemy slipped round the defences seven miles up the road and got within our lines—we hoped not. A slight moan came from one of the multitude of soldiers camped on the platform in various stages of dress and undress, some of them exemplifying the day of Excited Insects, and our attention was focussed upon one of them, trying to staunch the flow of blood from a wound in the upper ankle. We found out later that he had been extracting the bullet from the barrel of his automatic by drawing the slide back and, in some unexplained way, had pulled the trigger before completing the operation. His wound bound up with a dirty rag and a bit of paper, he was soon on the back of a comrade and on the way to hospital, the derision and wrath of an officer ringing in his ears.

The Artillery Tunes Up.

There had been no firing at all on this ever important sector since the night previous, we were informed by our interpreter who became engaged in conversation with various soldiers, but the train which we took from Nanziang had hardly reached the station house (with a single shell lodged in the walls) when a barrage became general. Machine-guns and rapid-fire Maxims filled the air with reports, sharpened by the use of smokeless powder, though the three guns, which were imbedded in the clay within 200 ft. of the station, did not join.

The country was amazingly dry after the week of intensive rain and, with the exception of the paddy fields, filled to their normal depth by water regulated at the dykes, was ready for an infantry charge, should either force decide to advance.

A Western commander would delight in this neighbourhood to make a night attack. Rice growing waist high, cotton to a height of 18 inches with creeks and ditches intersecting and netting the vicinity, afford splendid protection. But best of all from a military point of view is the splendid protection given by the small villages and scattered houses and clumps of trees, some of them covering several acres—here one man could approach a battery, as did heroes in the World War in their raids on machine gun nests and clean them out, and hold them until assistance arrived to complete the capture. Really a day attack under the covers as mentioned could be made with slight loss of life on either side's gun positions.

We walked on and on, leaving the station and moved in a westerly and southerly direction while the fire became more intense, with now and then the deep note of a trench mortar or a heavy gun, and as we passed immediately behind a Chêkiang battery, or series of batteries, they joined in the chorus, their sharp notes and rapidity of fire showing them to be Maxims. The whistle of the shells we heard plainly for several seconds.

After another half an hour we approached the village of Huangtu itself, and the sound of the cannonading increased as the return fire from Chêkiang on the Kiangsu batteries became more evident. The houses flanked the creek here, a waterway from 50 to 100-ft. wide in places, and as we overtook a group of coolies who were transporting small ammunition from the train to the village under escort of a corporal's guard, we noticed life in the main road of the town and a party of soldiers ready to leave for Shanghai, who had with them three wounded, carried on stretchers.

Lieutenant and General.

It was here, we met Lieut. Tan, aide-de-camp to Gen. Chuang Tse-ping, who had just returned from Shanghai with a bag full of money to pay the soldiers. He told us that not far from the further boundaries of the village a heavy infantry attack had taken place that morning.

We had some difficulty in making ourselves understood, and we could not use our interpreter very well, but the discovery that he knew some Russian established a medium. Lieut. Tan stated that he had spent several years in Russia and Siberia, Moscow, Petrograd and Vladivostok, and had a Russian wife in Harbin. He escorted me and the interpreter to Gen. Li Hu-ching's headquarters where we awaited the General's return from the front lines, something over a mile away.

Presently Gen. Li came in, a well groomed and well built man. Questioned as to his native province, he fulfilled expectation by admitting that he was a Shantungese, educated at the military college at Paotingfu. But 30 years of age, he seemed young indeed to have charge of that important sector, directly between Nanking and Lunghua, where the Kiangsu forces are pounding so hard now. But his eyes lighted up as he told us of the spirited attack his men had made that morning, as they drove back the enemy for three li in a bayonet charge.

Greeting us with a pleasant smile, but not forgetting military duties, Gen. Li asked to see our passes, and expressing his pleasure when he saw them, said that he would be glad to return the call in our Shanghai offices when peace times rolled round again—when this would be he would not venture an opinion, though he was extremely optimistic, as to the Chêkiang chances of ultimate victory.

The Inner Man.

The Chinese can be a perfect host on the battlefield as well as in his own home and after we had been seated for a few minutes we were asked if we were not hungry. After a six mile tramp and no breakfast, it may be imagined how we enjoyed the lovely chicken, hot tea and glass of three-star brandy to top off with, that he set before us. A toast to him and a final toast to the success of the Chêkiang forces (he did not like the brandy—made a face) and we were off on our long walk back to the station after we had been politely but firmly refused permission to visit the batteries in action not far off—it was too dangerous, the General said.

Under the shelter of the houses of the village we were not seen by Kiangsu snipers, but as we approached an open space we saw a party of soldiers duck to avoid the bullets as they scurried past. We waited until they had gone well along and then, thinking that all was safe, made the start. Hat in hand, with bended knees, a perfect skirmish position, we ran the hundred feet to the next house—the snipers saw us and got two bullets at us before we were by.

Half a mile further on after we had crossed a high bridge in an exposed position without being fired on, a bullet suddenly whistled between Lieut. Tan and myself into the creek alongside. Calmly he turned round and rolled up his sleeve, and showed the bandaged lower arm where he had been hit the week before on the same road.

Nothing further of import took place, and on arriving at Huangtu we crawled into the cab of the engine—the safest place on the train—and returned to Nanziang, where we took train for Shanghai.

WU PEI-FU'S TROOPS ON THE MOVE

Towards Shanhaikuan with Guns, Aeroplanes and Gas-Masks

Tientsin, Sept. 15.

The troops of Marshal Wu Pei-fu continue to move from Paotingfu to Shanhaikuan. They are fully equipped with artillery and aeroplanes, while a Tientsin firm has received instructions to manufacture gas masks.

It is reliably reported that the railway is cut on the Manchuria side of the Great Wall in order to prevent invasion by the Chihli troops.

All foreigners are returning from Peitaiho, and it is believed that hostilities may commence at any moment.

The Mukden reports of firing at Shanhaikuan are untrue.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

ENGINES AND CARS FERRIED OVER YANGTZE

Clever Work in Bringing Pukou Rolling Stock Across to Shanghai-Nanking Ry.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

Nanking, Sept. 12.

The railway service from Nanking to Soochow has been well maintained, four ordinary trains running daily, but it was rumoured a few days ago that the passenger service was to be suspended. Much credit is due to the staff for the manner in which the service has been maintained under conditions of very great difficulty, though of complete cordiality between the foreign officials and the military.

A piece of work by the Chinese of considerable military and engineering interest has been the method of transferring two engines and a large number of wagons across the river between Pukou and Nanking. Means had to be improvised, in the absence of a ferry and rails down to the water's edge, and ingenious use was made of great beams of wood upon which the rolling stock was transferred from the rails to a lighter, and so towed across. Often enough the lighter swung round perilously in the crossing, but, in the whole operation, only one coach was lost.

DEFENCE OF IHSING

Magistrate Said to Have Killed Himself Being Unable to Raise Funds

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wusih, Sept. 12, 1924.

The first group of wounded soldiers from the Ihsing front arrived in Wusih to-day. They report that the fighting at Ihsing commenced on September 6 and that the position of the lines remains unchanged. They claim to have killed or wounded 2,000 Chêkiang soldiers, but of course this statement cannot be taken as unqualified fact.

A rumour, so far unverified, has reached us that the Ihsing magistrate, having raised all he could of the money demanded of Ihsing for the support of the army, and finding it impossible to raise the full amount, has committed suicide. This item is given for what it is worth. It is impossible to know if it is true.

The people in general are more hopeful in Wusih that this city will escape looting entirely and their spirits have improved considerably since assuming this hopeful outlook.

THE FINE WORK DONE BY THE RAILWAYS

Armies and Civilians to Supply and Only a Single Track But All Well Done

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Kashing, Sept. 13.

Someone ought to say a good word for the Shanghai-Hangchow-Ningpo railway. To keep armies supplied near either terminus and serve the civilian population with a single track is no easy task.

The continued rains are threatening the maturing rice crop; impressed labour now taken from country districts delays gathering in the grain.

Conversations with junior officers at military headquarters to-day, indicate that Chêkiang commanders are on the alert, determined to fight and hope to win. Advantage of position, morale of men and plenty of ammunition make up somewhat for lack of numbers.

The Chêkiang people do not seem to care what party controls the province. This section has been safe and orderly under General Lu. Improvement in the police force suggests that the time may come when the Chinese will not need soldiers or military governors. This wretched war may help the people to wake up and find that they can protect themselves from themselves by themselves.

It was reported some days ago that a plucky Frenchman under a British flag selling American goods was molested by officious underlings. His remarks were so polite and so pungent (in Chinese idiom) that his audience melted away in a smoke screen.

A representative of the B. A. T. Company, in a properly registered motor-boat, was officiously urged to part with it under the necessities of war. He took his stand as a neutral, gained his point, kept his boat and goes undisturbed about his business.

PROTECTION OF JAPANESE RESIDENTS.

BATTLE EXPECTED AT HUANGTU

Marshal Chi's Apparent Determination to Force His Way Through to Shanghai: Busy Day of Preparation at Huangtu

Rash as it is to prophesy, all indications are that a determined battle is due on the Huangtu-Liuho front in the near future.

It is said, on what should be good authority, that Marshal Chi, of Kiangsu, is resolved to try to break through here in the hope of winning the war quickly by capturing the Shanghai district. Our special correspondent at Kiangsu Headquarters reports that fresh reinforcements from Marshal Wu Pei-fu, originally intended for west of the Taihu, have been deflected to Quinsan.

It is also said, on what should be good authority, that some of Marshal Chi's generals would prefer to make the Ihsing (west of Taihu) front the important front. Here, it is said, Marshal Lu proposes to make his chief effort.

If this theory be correct, each Marshal is acting on the defensive, where the other plans to make his most vigorous assault.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

Nanziang, Sept. 16.

An air of expectancy pervades officers and men alike, a feeling of something we-know-not-what, hangs round the bases and advance posts. Everyone in the Chêkiang camp is on the qui vive, for the big Kiangsu attack is expected at any moment. The men are confident that man for man they are better fighters than the invaders and that they could, if the terms were at all equal, drive them back with ease. But there appears no doubt that numbers are against them and possibly ammunition and supplies.

The staff officers, with one exception, yesterday spent the entire day on the actual front, inspecting the outer defences, and Gen. Chuang Tse-ping expressed himself as being well satisfied with the situation.

During all Monday night a heavy artillery fire was kept up by both the Chêkiang and Kiangsu batteries and the German guns spouted flames of fire occasioned by Chinese-made shells. From the point of view of the Chinese soldier the bombardment was really heavy, though a veteran of the European War would think little of it. The heavy 75 mm. guns at Huangtu Station, the heaviest on the front, fired under 20 times each, one of them 17 by actual count.

Gunners at this point told me that they had now elevated the guns and were firing at a range of 4,000 metres, which is twice the range of the previous week. The time fuses are set at nine seconds, and the gunners claim to have actually destroyed a Kiangsu gun post at this range. Scattered over this immediate vicinity are no less than 30 guns, most of them mountain guns, the 75's made by Krupp and the small ones by the Arsenal; shells for both types come from the Arsenal.

Warned Off from Huangtu

War correspondents were yesterday warned by Major Lin, who left Nanziang for the front lines where his car is located, that Gen. Chuang Tse-ping did not want them to come up to Huangtu because of the expected attack and the sniping fire round the station, but he permitted them to go at their own risk. There was rifle fire at Huangtu Station—the Kiangsu sharp-shooter had the range and if one even stood still for a moment a bullet would whizz over one's head, too close for comfort. These men are situated right along the tracks and have the big black bulk of the military train as a mark. To walk in the open was decidedly dangerous. Major Lin showed me, in his car, the point where a bullet had entered and crossed just above his stomach while he lay sleeping, to bury itself in the wall alongside the bed.

Reports received by field wire at the Nanziang headquarters indicated that most of the fighting had taken place on the right side of the tracks, while to all appearances it seemed that the advanced posts at Huangtu Station taken on Monday morning by a bayonet attack were still within the Chêkiang lines.

Plentiful Supplies

Coolies carried large quantities of arms and food supplies from the station to the village and other parties took more toward the Kading sector, shells for the 75's, belts of ammunition for the machine-guns and cases of clips for the rifles. Bread, baked at Nanziang, was carried also. Strange as it may seem, the morning train had attached to it a whole car full of straw shoes for the troops, which were seized on eagerly by the men when they arrived.

At a late hour last evening the armies held positions as follows:—from a point at Tsinpu, infantry holds the line running in a north-easterly direction to Kading, diagonally across the tracks at Huangtu. Heavy batteries at the station are flanked on either side by other lighter guns, those on the left about two miles in a direct line distant, those on the right somewhat nearer. The Chêkiang infantry is placed approximately one li (a third of a mile) in front of the batteries, the Nanking infantry two li further away and the Nanking guns another two li to the rear.

LUNGHUA REPORTS ATTACK

Midnight.

A communiqué issued late on Tuesday night by Lunghua reports a heavy attack by the Kiangsu forces on all fronts. Heavy artillery was used at Huangtu, Kiating, Liuho and Ihsing. According to this report Chêkiang has been able to hold its ground in spite of the large reinforcements Marshal Chi has received from Honan and Anhui.

According to a telegram received at Lunghua from Marshal Chang Tso-lin at 5 p.m. on Tuesday, his 2nd Army gained 25 miles after capturing Nanling which is in the general direction of Shanhaikuan. The Mukden armies are still outside the Wall but are occupying cities within Chihli province. The 1st and 2nd armies are concentrating on Shanhaikuan in preparation for a mass attack.

Insurance Risks

London, Sept. 16.

London marine insurance underwriters have notified a cancellation of war risk in open covers and policies which include voyages to Chinese ports. This is in accordance with the provision of a clause in the policies. Current war insurance to China is about one-eighth per cent. with institute of cargo clauses or one per cent. with a clause which extends cover for a month after arrival in warehouse.—Reuter.

WITH THE KIANGSU ARMY

Numerous and Well Equipped Force Spread from Quinsan to Liuho

BY H. L. PEARCE.

General Headquarters,
Quinsan, Sept. 15.

The official communqué issued last night was notable only for its brevity, merely stating that there was nothing new to report on the whole front. Despite the exceedingly stubborn fighting which has taken place—and the Chinese appear to be doing battle as never before, in foreign style—no appreciable advance has been made by either side on the Liuho-Tsingpu line, save at Liuho, where the Kiangsu forces have gone forward some eight li since hostitities opened. The line here runs diagonally across the village, and Chêkiang troops hold the major portion, their opponents having possession of about one-quarter on the south side. On this sector the Chêkiang troops have made effective use of land mines, and they have another temporary advantage in a big supply of hand grenades, of Chinese manufacture. The Kiangsu men are without these, but the deficiency is soon to be made up.

The Anting line remains as it was a few days ago, and there has been no change in the situation at Tsingpu; nor has there been striking development at Ihsing since the last Chêkiang attack was driven off. Numerous desertions are reported in this quarter.

A Solatium from Peking.

The troops are well provided for and appear to be in excellent spirits. To-day they were informed of the Presidential mandate asking them to remain loyal to the Central Government, the request being accompanied by a gift of wine, cigarettes and other luxuries, in quantity almost enough to fill a special train.

This morning, Marshal Chi had a long conference with Wong Tse-chen, who came down as a "special delegate" from the President.

Quinsan is full of troops and reinforcements are going forward to all points in the line. The canal to Liuho is crowded with boats conveying fresh troops to the front, and this morning the first contingent of Anhui men to arrive at Quinsan left by that route. All the men here have full and smart equipment, and stores are abundant.

Wu Pei-fu Troops.

Later.

At Wusih, at 11 p.m., two special trains passed through, conveying a big contingent of Wu Pei-fu's men to Quinsan. They were part of the 14th Division, and numbered certainly not less than 2,500, closely packed in freight wagons. They have come down from Pingliang. I had been officially informed at Quinsan earlier in the day that these troops were expected to arrive there in three or four days. It had been anticipated that they would be thrown on the Ihsing front, and their movement for Quinsan indicates that Marshal Chi is still determined on making a thrust directly for Shanghai. Very possibly Wu's men will be heard of at Nanziang or Tsingpu.

Neither side seems to have made any great headway in aviation, and it will be a long war which finds them with anything approaching an efficient organization. At present on both sides the fighting value of this arm of the service is negligible. Foreign pilots and mechanics are still being sought. During the past week, two machines have come to grief while manœuvring about Soochow, both accidents due to inexpert control. Yesterday, two more machines, of British manufacture but not of the latest construction, were sent down from the Government aerodome at Nanyuan.

Strange Tales of Shanghai.

Our intelligence department on the Shanghai side has not served up anything of a sensational character in its latest effort. It reports that General Ho Feng-lin has chartered two American ships lying in the Huangpu, for the purpose of carrying off the stock of ammunition at the Arsenal, in the event of a quick move being necessary. A note is also made of the recent floods in Shanghai having washed up a number of land-mines in the vicinity of the Arsenal.

From the same source comes a report of the death of General Yang Hua-chao, who was severely wounded at Liuho, and of Ho Feng-yu, brother of the Defence Commissioner, who was wounded in action. (Both these untrue.—Ed.).

Country People Suffering.

Among all the country folk suffering misfortunes of war behind the lines, those in the Liuho district have the worst tale to tell. There have been many casualties among those who have clung on to their little farms and an attempt is now being made to organize a relief force. By special request of the Civil Governor at Nanking, Drs. Price and Stewart on Saturday set out for Liuho, with a small staff of Chinese, forming the first unit of the American Red Cross in this field. They will range round the Liuho district and give all possible assistance to refugees and wounded among the civilian population, and will send in an early report as to what further assistance is required.

Misuse of Red Cross.

Whilst on this subject, I may mention that complaints are becoming more numerous as to misuse of the Red Cross. It is even alleged here that some representatives of the Society have disposed of Red Cross flags, "at $25 per," solely for display on the carriages of Chinese driving from the City to the railway station en route to Shanghai. Coming up on the train last night, I fell in with an enterprising Chinese reporter, in full Red Cross uniform. In addition to his professional card, he carried another, for presentation to military officials, describing him as a full fledged official of the Red Cross. The flag seems to cover a multitude of neutrals.

MARSHAL TUAN RE-ENTERS ARENA

Former Anfu Premier's Telegram to All Parties and Leaders on the Crimes of Peking and China's Suffering

The return of Marshal Tuan Chi to the political arena is matter of moment, perhaps as important to the belligerents as the winning of a battle. After the Anfu defeat, Marshal Tuan retired to Tientsin to study Buddhism. All political groups have attempted to influence him to leave his studies and accept his responsibilities as the senior ledder of all militarists in China. He has steadily refused. It has been known that even Wu Pei-fu at one time flirted with Tuan Chi-jui, suggesting the possibility of peace in China by Tuan accepting the Presidency while a prominent member of the Chihli Party, meaning Wu Pei-fu, would become Vice-President. Tuan would have none of it.

His support of Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang is not surprising. Lu is the last of the Anfu Tuchuns. In effect, Tuan remained a power, although most of his pupils, "Little Hsu," Chin Yung-peng and others were driven from public life, because Lu Yung-hsiang remained in Chêkiang. Lu has always been regarded as Tuan's man so that the ex-Premier's support of him was not unexpected.

The form of his circular telegram is, however, curious. Although he attacks Tsao Kun and his entourage, using classical terms for the vilest phrases, he sends the message to some of the most ardent supporters of the Chihli Party, actual participants in the present conflict. He includes such names as General Sun Chuan-fang who is reported to be moving against Chêkiang from Fukien and Admiral Tu Shih-kwei who is handling the Admiralty for Tsao Kun and is fully supporting Chi Hsieh-yuan. It is also to be noted that he includes all political parties, Tsen Chuan-hsuan of the Tsenhseuh-hui, Liang Chi-chao of the old Chin-putang, Sun Yat-sen of the Kuomin-tang, Tong Shao-yi of the independent Kuomintang, Kang Yu-wei of the reactionaries, Sun Hung-yi and Wu Ching-line of the Parliamentary Groups, etc. There seem to be no distinctions except that three important names are omitted, Wu Pei-fu, Chi Hsieh-yuan and Feng Yu-hsiang.

In Chinese political circles this fact is taken to indicate that Tuan has sent this wire as a feeler to determine what would happen if it were suggested that he would assume leadership of a new grouping of political personages. Tuan Chi-jui is respected even by his enemies. He is known to be honest personally. The military men would follow him, as their senior.

Marshal Tuan Chi-jui has despatched the following circular telegram to the chief personages in China. The address contains many prominent names including:—

Dr. Sun Yat-sen and his staff in Canton, Generals Chen Chiung-ming and Lin Hu at Swatow, Marshal Tang Chi-yao of Yunnan, Marshal Lu Yung-ting at Nanning, General Shun Hung-yin at Kueilin, General Liu Hsien-shih and Hsiong Keh-wu at Kueiyang, Generals Liu Tsen-hou, Liu I-chiu, Liu Siang and Yuan Tsu-min in Szechuan, General Chao Heng-ti of Changsha, General Sun Chuan-fang at Yenping, Messrs. Tsen Chuan-hsuan and Liang Chih-chao, Admiral Tu Hsi-kuei at Nanking, Messrs. Tong Shao-yi, Chang Ping-lin, Chang I-lin, Kang Yu-wei and Sung Hung-yi at Shanghai, Mr. Chang Chien of S. Tung-chow, Marshal Wang Shih-chen, Mr. Sun Pao-chi and Dr. C. T. Wang in Peking, Generals Chang Shao-tsen, Chin Yun-peng, Wang Chan-yuan and Chen Kuang-yuan and Mr. Wu Chin-lien, Speaker of the House of Representatives at Tientsin, the Two House of Parliament at Peking, M.P.'s at Shanghai, as well as all the Inspector-Generals, military and civil governors and defence commissioners of the provinces, all division and brigade commanders, all provincial assemblies, all general chambers of commerce, all educational associations and other legally constituted public bodies and the Press.

The message is as follows:—I have just read the telegrams successively circulated by Commanders-in-Chief Lu Yung-hsiang and Chang Tso-lin, in which they offer to devote their utmost strength to the rescue of the people thrown into distress by the increasing chaotic condition of our national affairs. How brave and how good is their utterance!

Iniquity on Iniquity.

The political iniquities committed in recent years have been such as we can neither bear to hear nor wish to see. Peking has become a dunghill. The Central Government has become a medium of corruption and bribery. They care neither about our nation nor about our people. They know not the meaning of politeness and righteousness, integrity and shame. Their only object is to appropriate everything by force; but they certainly lack the ability to retain what they have gained. Sycophants are ruining the government and indulging in immoral deeds without restraint. They have even robbed the nation to enrich themselves; they have felt no scruple, in order to get only a few hundred thousands in cash, to tolerate a national loss of millions, such as in the case of the German Issued Bonds. They maintain large military forces to keep themselves in office. Our nation and people have been reduced to such a poverty-stricken state that officers and clerks who stick to their duty day and night have not the wherewithal to support their families, while our soldiers and policemen who keep watch even in the inclement weather cannot even keep themselves from cold and hunger.

A nation need not fear any scarcity but inequality in distribution, from which the abusive practice of superiors and inferiors snatching profit the one from the other will at last exhaust the wealth of the nation. The non-payment of foreign obligations, when due, lowers national credit and invites scornful reproaches from our neighbours.

Military engagements continuing for several consecutive years have left scarcely any of our southern provinces undevastated. The fickleness of the weather has afflicted almost the whole of our central provinces with famine. How necessary for us now to assume a penitent mood and give our people some respite to recuperate. Yet, at this very moment of famine and suffering, four provinces have been ordered to attack Chêkiang, with the object of extirpating all those who hold views different from theirs, regardless in involving the innocent. For the sake of one's own exaltation and glory, crimes offensive to Heaven are being perpetrated. Whoever acts in such a perverse way cannot surely escape unscathed.

When the Worm Turns.

Now, that "the downtrodden when pressed to the extreme point will certainly rise again," is taught in the Book of Changes. "To punish the guilty and to rescue the people" is a principle expounded in the Book of Spring and Autumn. Those who have hitherto run errands and done other services for them might have been overawed by their power, or moved by friendship, or driven by cold and hunger. Moreover, as they are as stupid as they are cruel, several cases of loyal and trustworthy servants having been dismissed, just as the hounds were killed and eaten after a hunt, have been heard of.

Those who can read the portents of the times have long been disaffected. Those who hold far-sighted ambitions should rise to this occasion. Heroic and brave men in this country as well as my former colleagues will surely not lag behind when a benevolent and righteous deed is to be done. Let all rise at once, just as Liu Kun and Fan Pang did in ancient times, to save our people from destruction by fire and water.

I issue these views of mine in haste giving expression only to an infinitesimal part of what I want to say.

Signed:—TUAN CHI-JUI
9th day.

Despatched for Marshal Tuan at Lunghua by Ho Feng-lin, Seal, on September 15.

CHANG TSO-LIN AND PRESIDENT TSAO

Mukden, Sept. 16.

Marshal Chang Tso-lin this morning issued a proclamation announcing his intention to fight against President Tsao Kun himself and that he has decided to proceed to Chinchow, where he will assume the Command of all forces.

Marshal Chang Tso-lin's troops have crossed the frontier both at Chaoyang and Kaiaeu (?), and an early clash is expected.

Marshal Chang has telegraphed to President Tsao Kun an enumeration of Marshal Wu Pei-fu's crimes which must be brought to justice, and adds "as Your Excellency is surrounded by Wu Pei-fu's traitors, I will send aeroplanes to inquire about your health, and to ask if you are still at liberty."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

WU PEI-FU TROOPS FOR MARSHAL CHI

Persistent Reports of Chihli Forces Moving Towards the Great Wall

Peking, Sept. 12.

News from reliable foreign sources indicates that troops from Honan, Hupeh and Anhui are being sent through Nanking by rail to Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan's headquarters at Soochow.

Despite official denials, reports of troop movements in the North are still very persistent. One received from Lanchow this morning states that General Peng Shou-hsin is moving his 15th Division to Shanhaikuan and that troops of the 23rd and 26th Divisions are being sent up from Machang to relieve them. In response to demands from the south for aeroplanes, the Air Department has sent three "Vickers-Vimy" aeroplanes and a batch of pilots to Pukow.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHINESE RED CROSS EVER MORE BUSY

Very Severe Fighting During Past Week at Ihsing: 600 Cases at Changchow

The fighting on the Ihsing-Changhsing front during the past week was very severe, resulting in 600 wounded being brought to Changchow (on the S.-N. Railway), according to Dr. H. S. Chiao of the Red Cross unit at that city. 200 wounded soldiers were taken to the Red Cross hospital, the remainder being under the care of the military surgeons.

Dr. C. F. Neal and Dr. F. T. Chang report from Quinsan that 300 wounded are in the Red Cross hospital at that city. Red Cross units have now been established at Taichong and Anting to provide for the wounded brought to those centres. At Quinsan, the Red Cross has been required to care for refugees as well as wounded, particularly during a short period at the beginning of the war when there was some looting.

Two new Red Cross units were opened on Wednesday. St. Mary's Hospital has offered to accommodate 100 patients, according to Dr. New Way-sun, Field Director of the Chinese Red Cross. The Yatung Hospital at Nantao has also been placed at the disposal of the Red Cross.

One of the most serious problems facing the Red Cross comes of their regulation that once a wounded soldier is brought into one of their hospitals, he may not leave until the war is over. The Red Cross finds that that is the only way it can remain a strictly neutral organization, operating on both sides and within the foreign concessions. The result is that the hospitals are being filled with soldiers who may have to remain some time and for whom food, clothing and blankets will have to be provided. The Chêkiang military authorities are sending as many wounded as they can handle to the Woosung Naval Hospital, as there the rule of neutrality does not hold. As soon as a soldier recovers, he can be sent back to the front. The fact that so much attention is being paid to wounded soldiers indicates that this war is different from other Chinese conflicts in which fighting has been done mostly over the heads of the combatants.

A curious tale was brought in by one of the Red Cross surgeons from Nanziang. A conscripted ricsha coolie received a bullet in his neck. While the surgeons were examining him to locate the bullet, he excused himself and gently coughed it up.

FIELD KITCHEN AT NANZIANG

THURSDAY.

BATTLE THAT DID NOT COME OFF

With All Ready at Huangtu for a Big Encounter Kiangsu Attack Dies Away: Correspondents Not Allowed at the Front

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

Nanziang, Sept. 17.

The battle front at Huangtu yesterday was very quiet indeed, though the official communiqué as issued at Lunghua on Tuesday declared that a heavy bombardment had been begun by Kiangsu on all four sectors. Military observers in Shanghai in view of this declaration thought that the big push was under way and that yesterday would find the biggest battle of recent Chinese internecine warfare in full force. But such was not the case. At Nanziang, the rear post of the Chêkiang forces, matters were more quiet than usual, perhaps because all preparation for a defence had been completed. A few troops arrived from Shanghai and more returned to this port, but the exchange was normal and even, and indicated nothing unusual.

Two circumstances would lead one to think that great things are developing. The general staff were not at the Nanziang front, but had gone off to Lunghua and Liuho—Gen. Chuang Tse-ping left early yesterday morning for a visit to Liuho, where rumour has it that Kiangsu will attempt to execute a flank movement. He was expected back last evening. Gen. Yang Hua-chao, who, according to our Nanking correspondent, is thought to be dead by the Kiangsu forces, arrived in Shanghai yesterday morning on a special train and departed at 11 a.m. for Lunghua for military conference with Gen. Ho Feng-lin and Marshal Lu's son.

Huangtu Front Forbidden

The other reason for believing that the armies will be fighting soon lies in an edict of Gen Chuang to war correspondents—Thou shall not leave the railway platform at Huangtu. Yesterday morning at the Huangtu front Colonel Lin informed the foreigners, representing the Shanghai papers, that they would not be permitted to go to the lines under any circumstances except under escort provided by the General Staff. They are not to leave the platform. The reason given was simply that there was too much danger and the Chinese officials did not want any foreigner to be hurt in their war. This may be true, but on the other hand Nanking has been receiving information through the Shanghai press that it did not have from any other sources, and, with a big battle inevitable some day soon, local defence officers naturally wish to keep their secrets.

Supplies at Nanziang were being pushed to the various fronts, on the railway to Huangtu and by motor caterpillar trucks to Kading, while three or four mountain guns are siting on the platform and the roadway in readiness for the call when it comes. Two tractors and a Ford car were kept busy running a mile away to the steamlaunch which plies to Kading loaded with bombs, rifle ammunition and shells for the guns. The last load to leave consisted, by the way, of four large cases of a prominent brand of beer and a dozen cases of a still more favourite make of brandy The steamlaunches, about 50 ft. in length, are kept busy the entire day as military ferries and make many trips over the eight-mile waterway with supplies of all kinds. Others are commandeered at times.

The Motor Tractors

The tractors are rather interesting machines of local manufacture though nothing at all like the big ones of the world war upon which tanks were mounted and which did so much damage. The chassis are of Citroen make and have been surmounted with quarter-inch plate on the one and lighter material on the other. The first previously had a machine-gun on the top which has now been removed and the car is used for transportation. Unfortunately the tractors are not likely to stand up for any length of time for two reasons—the chauffeurs race the engines so much that they will probably burn out ere very long, while on the other hand the belting used on the wheels is of rubber only and cannot stand much hard wear and tear. The front wheels are of the usual style, but on the rear two smaller steel wheels, about 16 ins. in diameters, are placed in front of and behind four very small wheels, the six absorbing the rough spots in the road, and in the country if necessary.

Two bomb-throwers and 10 or 12 cases of bombs were among the cargo which arrived on the Shanghai train and were taken on to Huangtu—the shells are wicked-looking affairs with winged tails similar to the big aerial bombs now used in the West. Seeing these weapons of war so new to China, a military man observed that a good hand-grenade attack would be the easiset and most effective way of dislodging either of the entrenched forces.

On the early morning train 80 coolies recruited in Chapei were taken to the front, while on the return train a large supply of empty shells were despatched to Lunghua for refilling. A plentiful supply of shoes and flour and clean clothing arrived at Nanziang during the day.

Four Japanese camera men, representing the "Osaka Mainichi" journeyed to the front on the noon train, after they had had some difficulty with the soldiers at the North Station. They carried the Japanese flag as well as the emblem of their paper. The former excited the Chêkiang soldiers and the party was held up for some time, though no actual danage was done them. They were prevented at Nanziang from proceeding to Huangtu.

The Deserted Village

Nanziang presents a deserted appearance and with the exception of a few barber shops catering to the military and a tea shop and a secluded corner where several played mahjongg, there were no signs of life in the entire village. Red Cross stations, advantageously placed, contained but an occasional wounded man, while another dwelling, over the door of which were flying the American, the Chinese and the Red Cross flags, housed a Red Cross officer and his staff and a motley collection of children who were being cared for under the auspices of a Shanghai missionary society.

The air of tenseness, which characterized the Huangtu front for several days, seemed yesterday to have relaxed somewhat, though military discipline was maintained.

LUNGHUA COMMUNIQUE

Practically a Day of Rest

A communiqué issued at Lunghua last night stated that yesterday had practically been a day of rest. Neither side took the offensive and whatever shooting took place was desultory. The report that 2,000 men had come down from Mukden to reinforce the Chêkiang army was denied by Dr. Loh, General Ho Feng-lin's secretary. The naval engagement said to have taken place on Tuesday was a very minor affair, the Kiangsu ships firing a few shots which fell short and did no damage.

MARSHAL WU PEI-FU IN PEKING

Military Conference to Decide upon Plan of Operations Against Fengtien

Peking, Sept. 16.

The transportation northward of the greater part of Marshal Wu's 3rd Division was commenced yesterday and it is expected that they will be stationed in the vicinity of Peking.

The object of Marshal Wu's visit, it is reported, is to hold an important military conference in order to decide upon a definite plan of operations against the Fengtien troops. This move on the part of Marshal Wu, coupled with the despatch northward of the 3rd Division at Loyang, will, it is generally observed, go a long way towards encouraging and sending to the fronts the leaders of all the Chihli forces, who have so far maintained a somewhat negative attitude.—Eastern News Agency.

Hankow, Sept. 16.

An Ichang despatch says that the 5th Mixed Brigade of the Hupeh troops, some 1,000 men, arrived in Ichang from Szechuan on the 14th instant and will proceed to Nanking in a few days by way of Hankow.—Eastern News Agency.

Peking, Sept. 17.

Marshal Wu Pei-fu arrived in Peking at 3.30 this morning.

Gen. Feng's Preparations

In connexion with a press report to the effect that Gen. Feng Yu-hsiang declined the President's request to send his troops to Kiangsu and to Shanhaikuan, a communication to the press from the police authorities of Peking says that on the contrary Gen. Feng is attending to military preparations day and night and that more than half his troops have already been despatched to the front, while the remainder are ready to leave at a moment's notice.

Numerous high civil and military officials met Marshal Wu Pei-fu at the Station on his arrival. Marshal Wu drove to his temporary residence, and after resting for a few hours called on the President and was engaged in a conference at which General Wang Chen-ping and other local notable personages were present.

Tientsin, Sept. 17.

The 12th and 14th Mixed Brigades of the Chihli troops are now being transported to Langchow by rail. The 26th Division is also marching towards the same destination. It appears that the greater part of the Chihli troops are being concentrated in Luanchow. It is reported in Chinese circles here that Marshal Wu will, in the capacity of Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, remove his headquarters to either Fengtai or Langfang.—Eastern News Agency.

RACE FOR SHANHAIKUAN

Chang Tso-lin Believed to Have 50,000 Troops Near Border: 60,000 More Available

Peking, Sept. 13.

Owing to the report that Chihli troops would shortly be sent to Shanhaikuan most of the foreign detachments in that neutral territory received orders yesterday to be ready to withdraw at short notice.

The train service between Peking and Shanhaikuan is normal to-day, but there does not seem to be any regular connexion for passengers passing through that centre. Marshal Chang Tso-lin informed the foreign Consuls in Mukden yesterday that he did not intend to allow any more Fengtien trains to pass Shanhaikuan "because Peking had stopped the service from the south at that point." According to information reaching Peking, however, Mukden made the first default in this respect. A close inspection of passengers and foreign passports is being made near Shanhaikuan by both sides.

Marshal Chang Tso-lin is now supposed to have about 50,000 troops near the southern border of Fengtien, and it is estimated that he might place in the field another 60,000 men without running the risk of losing control in Manchuria. If he does march on Peking, he will probably be faced with at least an equal number of troops, including General Feng Yu-hsiang's 25,000 men, probably the most efficient fighting force in China.

The First Shots

Later.

Hearing a report that 5,000 Fengtien labourers were digging trenches about six miles beyond Shanhaikuan, the 15th Chihli Division on September 15 sent a party of scouts to investigate. On a moon-lit night the scouts went on warily until they were fired on in the quarter indicated. Shots were exchanged for a few minutes after which the scouts retired.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

JAPANESE JOURNALISTS DISAPPEARED

No Trace Since September 4: Said to Have Been Taken as Spies

The disappearance of two Japanese correspondents somewhere beyond Liuho is arousing great concern among local Japanese authorities. Mr. Furuichi, representing a local Japanese commercial newspaper, and Mr. Shikida, who was engaged locally by the "Osaka Mainichi" for war correspondence, left for Liuho in a hired car on September 4. The chauffeur waited for them several hours at Liuho, but they did not return and a heavy bombardment having started, he went on to Shanghai. Nothing more was heard of the Japanese newpapermen except a rumour that certain Japanese had been used by Kiangsu as spies and had succeeded in passing through the Chêkiang lines on the way to Quinsan.

Several days later, Mr. Yada, the Japanese Consul-General, was informed that a Kiangsu brigade commander had been captured by the Chêkiang troops and that in his pocket was found the card of a Japanese in lead pencil. It is believed that he had interviewed the brigade commander, who, growing suspicious, arrested him and his companion as Chêkiang spies. The difficulty in the situation is that thus far the men have not been located. Inquiries at Nanking officially made by the Japanese consul there were unsatisfactory, the Kiangsu Government promising to search for the men but denying that they know their whereabouts at the present time.

Both men probably carried only a small amount of money and no supplies. There is the possibility that stray bullets hit them as they were passing through the firing lines and that they are wounded or killed. There is no reason to believe, at present, that the Kiangsu authorities would not hand them over to the Japanese Consulate at Nanking, were they aware of their presence in a military prison.

HOW CHANG TSO-LIN STOLE A MARCH ON THE CHIHLI FACTION

Peking's Hope of Polishing off Chekiang Undisturbed: Frustrated by Mukden's Swift Move

At first, Chihli's movement of troops took place only during night time, and other war activities were indulged in secret. But nothing on such a large scale could have escaped the lynx-eyed spies of Fengtien who soon put their warlord at Mukden on his guard. Scouts were put on duty day and night by the Fengtien Army stationed west of Suichung and other precautions were taken against a surprise attack by the Chihli Army.

General Chang Hsueh-liang, popularly known as the Young General, proceeded to Chinchou on September 8 on a tour of inspection. General Li Chin-lin, accompanied by his adviser General Chih King-shun and Chief of Staff General Yang Yu-ting, returned to Suichung on September 9 after having inspected the military dispositions at the front. General Yang returned to Mukden the same day to submit a report to Marshal Chang Tso-lin. Apparently all details of the military programme have been satisfactorily carried out in the vicinity of Shanhaikuan.

The next important point to be inspected by the Commander-in-Chief Li would be Hsifengkou, and then Jehol. As soon as military arrangements at these places have been completed, fighting will probably begin.

Only a few days ago, Chang Tso-lin and Tsao Kun were fooling each other by an exchange of pacific sentiments and by sending mediators to and fro. It was the common belief that peace, at least in appearance, could be maintained for some time yet between Fengtien and Chihli. It came therefore quite as a surprise to all that both sides should have so quickly developed a hostile attitude. The change was effected not by magic but by a letter from Chang to Tsao.

Chihli Forestalled.

The Chihliites had planned to attack northeast after having crushed their foes in the southeast, thinking that Chang would sit on the fence in the meantime; that he would help Chêkiang to fight the Chihliites only if the Chêkiang Army were victorious; and that in the event of Chêkiang being defeated, he would mediate between the two warring parties. They never anticipated that Chang would actually intervene so soon on the side of Lu Yung-hsiang. To their dismay, Chang suddenly sent a letter, containing an ultimatum to the effect that unless all military activities against Chêkiang were stopped forthwith, it would be impossible for the Fengtien Army to avoid a conflict with the Chihliites. After consulting Wu Pei-fu of Loyang, the Chihli Party decided to accept the challenge, as they had gone too far to beat an honourable retreat.

When the Kiangsu-Chêkiang quarrel was approaching an acute stage, Chang Tso-lin despatched Mr. Liang Siu-fang to Tientsin to persuade Marshal Tuan Chi-jui to emerge from his retirement; but Tuan still counselled caution. However, as Chang was firmly of opinion that co-operation by all parties against Chihli was absolutely necessary, he sent Mr. Liang again to Tientsin the following day on the same errand, and General Hsu Lan-chou two days later with a letter in his own handwriting in which Chang sincerely submitted his views and earnestly requested Tuan to listen to him. At that interview, a delegate from Lu Yung-hsiang was also present who added his persuasive eloquence to that of General Hsu Lan-chou, to which Tuan yielded at last.

Marshal Tuan's Advice.

The same evening, a conference was held, principally to decide the place at which it would be most convenient and dependable for Marshal Tuan to direct the campaign. The upshot was that Fengtien was selected as preferable to Chêkiang which is accessible from too many sides; and since the fortune of war is always uncertain, Shanghai, though safe enough, is not considered a desirable place to live in, as it is under the control of foreigners and as no military measure could be openly taken by a Chinese therein. Besides, Fengtien has under its command the troops and resources of three provinces, being thus stronger than Chêkiang. If victorious, the power of the Central Government could be seized; and in the case of defeat, the geographical position of Manchuria would always enable one to hold out on the defensive.

This decision, arrived at a few days ago, was telegraphed to Mukden for approval, and Chang at once sent a reply warmly welcoming Marshal Tuan to Mukden. A portion of the Civil Governor's yamên at Mukden is being reserved for Tuan's accommodation. For all we know, Marshal Tuan may have already started on his way to Mukden by the time this appears in print.

TREACHERY IN CHEKIANG

1st and 2nd Divisions Join the Fukienese Invader and March on Hangchow: Marshal Lu Retreats to Lunghua

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Hangchow, Sept. 18.

The latest rumour last night was that, after a consultation with the chief of the gentry and the Chamber of Commerce, who advised him to leave, Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang said that he would. At 10 p.m., however, he was here, although some 20 boxes of his personal belongings had been carried out of his house to the railway-station.

I have just learned that his yamên is practically empty. It is thought that the Marshal has gone to Kashing or beyond, where Gen. Chen Loh-shen has been sent from Huchow.

Gen. Pan, who went to the Fukien border, has joined hands with the Fukienese invader Gen. Sun Chuan-fang, and the two are expected here in a couple of days, coming down the Chien Tang River.

Launches on the Chien Tang have ceased running.

5 p.m.

Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang and General Chang, the Civil Governor, left Hangchow at 3 p.m.

Marshal Lu's Announcement from Lunghua

A communiqué issued by Dr. Loh General Ho Feng-lin's secretary, at Lunghua announced that Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang had arrival at Lunghua at 7.30 p.m. on Thursday.

A statement was issued to the Chinese shortly after his arrival, which contained the following statements:

"Marshal Lu came to Shanghai personally to direct operations on the fronts.

"Before the war started Marshal Lu stated that he desired peace and would do everything possible to preserve the tranquillity of Chêkiang Province. He pledged himself to keep this promise and should war become inevitable, he would do everything possible to prevent the ravaging of Chêkiang. Now that enemy troops from both Fukien and Anhui have invaded Chêkiang, Marshal Lu has decided to leave Chêkiang affairs to the people of Chêkiang Province.

"Whether he returns to Hangchow or not depends upon the outcome of the war and the wishes of the Chêkiang people.

Lunghua issued a denial on Thursday night that Liuho has been captured by Kiangsu. They claimed that the fighting had been desultory and unimportant.

How Marshal Lu was Worsted

The Hangchow coup d'état, which forced Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang to leave his capital for Shanghai is reported to have been organized by Hsia Chao, (Hsia Ting-ho) Chief of the Constabulary of Chêkiang Province and known to be unfriendly to Marshal Lu. This is not the first time that an attempt has been made to eliminate Marshal Lu from Chêkiang. Every political crisis has affected his position in the province, finally resulting in his relinquishing the title of Tuchun and taking the lesser title of Director-General of the Reorganization of Chêkiang. The latter title makes him subservient to the will of Chêkiang in theory, rather than under the authority of the Ministry or War, as Tuchuns are supposed to be. But behind his change of title was an effort on the part of the Constabulary Chief to drive Marshal Lu, who is a Shantung man out of the province and to utilize the Provincial Autonomy Movement to make himself, a Chêkiang man, Civil Governor.

Provincial Troops Disaffected.

The 1st and 2nd Divisions of the Chêkiang Army are Provincial Troops and differ from Lu Yung-hsiang's army in that his men come from Shantung while the provincial divisions are manned entirely by natives of Chêkiang. It has been known for at least two years that these divisions have maintained representatives in Peking and have been in negotiation with the Chihli Party for the elimination of Marshal Lu, who is the last of the Anfu Tuchuns, and to place a Chêkiang general in his position. Altogether, these two divisions are said to number 14,000 troops and they were stationed on the Chêkiang-Fukien border. In addition to these troops, Hsiao Chao directly controls about 10,000 men of his own in the constabulary. None of these troops have ever been loyal to Marshal Lu. The Chêkiang Provincial Troops were sent to the Chêkiang-Fukien border because apparently they could not be trusted in the crucial position on the Ihsing, Huangtu or Liuho sectors. Instead, Marshal Lu used altogether outsiders, the two Fukien divisions under Chang Shih-ping and Yang Hua-chao.

The 1st and 2nd Chêkiang Provincial troops are now marching on Hangchow from the border. At the same time, the Fukien army under Sun Chuan-fang is moving into Chêkiang province, having fought a sham battle at Chuchow. The 4th Division, stationed at Changhsing, on the Taihu, is also reported to be moving in the direction of Sungkiang, although this has not been confirmed. Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan's Anhui troops at Kwangtehchow are moving into Chêkiang.

In Chinese financial circles in Shanghai it was suggested that one of the reasons for the coup d'état was the inability of Lu to obtain ample funds from Chang Tso-lin to carry on. Efforts were made to raise money in Shanghai and in all the large cities in Chêkiang. The merchants and bankers refused to lend Marshal Lu any money, saying that they were opposed to the war, which was bound to ruin their province. The approach of alien troops and the fear that they would ravage the province had much to do with the decision of the gentry and merchants to support Hsia Chao in his political manœuvre.

Marshal Chang Said to Be Remaining at Mukden

Mukden, Sept. 18.

Marshal Chang Tso-lin, who had decided to leave here for Chinchow to-day, postponed his departure for some reason of other.—Eastern News Agency.

Volunteers Mobilized

The Volunteers who have been standing by for the past few days were mobilized at 10 p.m. on Thursday and all the boundaries of the Settlement were amply manned. If leaderless troops from Huangtu and Liuho try to get into the Settlement, the defence forces are ready for them.

At midnight, however, all was quite quiet around the boundaries and there was no report either of fighting or anything untoward up the railway.

There has been another rush of refugees from Hangchow to Shanghai, in particular two trains full of Marshal Lu's subordinate officials and their families. His Staff are with him at Lunghua,, whither also all his papers have been removed from Hangchow.

Firing at Liuho

Later.

There were reports of heavy fighting at Liuho at 1 o'clock this morning Large numbers of wounded were brought to the Woosung Naval Hospital which had to send its surplus to the Red Cross Hospital in Shanghai.

It is doubtful, however, whether a serious action will now take place since Marshal Chi must be aware of what has happened in Hangchow and, with all the cards in the hands, he surely has more to gain by a humane attitude toward the Chêkiang soldiers.

KIANGSU NAVY AT LIUHO

Long-Range Firing: Small Effect: Chekiang Soldiers Well Entrenched

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

Liuho, Sept. 18.

All reports to the contrary, the Nanking navy is assisting the land forces at Liuho and shells fired by these ships from 75 mm. guns and also of a smaller calibre were picked by the soldiers, according to their story. The warships, two in number, are somewhat over 20 li distant from the village of Liuho and the shells are well spent when they reach the rear posts near the road to Shanghai. Up to the present the navy artillery has done no damage, while it is claimed that in the engagement two nights ago the sailors fired on their own troops during their attack and did some damage until it was ascertained that the supposed enemy was a friend.

No Serious Fighting.

Fighting on this sector has not been at all serious, according to the reports emanating from Colonel Chang, who has so efficiently defended this village against an army which out numbers his own very largely. Kiangsu batteries fired in vain at his defence, he stated, and no damage was done, but much powder wasted. Yesterday during the day an aeroplane flew over the lines for a period of perhaps 10 minutes and after dropping a few bombs which did no harm, retired to Nanking lines.

The Hangchow soldiers, infantry to the fore, are deeply entrenched several li from the village, the whole of which is now being held again by his men, according to Colonel Chang. Yesterday it was reported that Nanking made two attempts to advance their lines by means of engineering infantry, who crept forward, shovel in hand, to dig in, but the Liuho men noticed them and drove them back with rapid rifle and machine gun fire.

At 6 p.m. yesterday the bombardment began again in a rather desultory manner all on the Kiangsu side as Chêkiang are not wasting their ammunition.

Defences Towards Shanghai.

The Chêkiang lines have been slightly extended and bear round the village to the south to meet possible flank attacks, a company of men living in an old temple near the end of the road. Here have been mounted two light mountain guns which, however, are rarely brought into action. Further defences have been erected along the road to Shanghai and a fine-looking Krupp field gun of 75 mm. calibre has been placed about a mile from the turn in the road, the barrel pointing over the northern flank. In addition to these precautions a man stands watch at each bridge between Lotien and Liuho.

The Chêkiang machine guns are now placed within 400 metres of those of Kiangsu. Yesterday afternoon a call was sent in for more ammunition, that is from the front lines to the base in the village. More also is being sent from Lunghua, for yesterday morning more than 20 motor-cars were seen at Shanghai North waiting for the train from the Arsenal to transport the ammunition over the motor-road to the front.

Reliable reports yesterday were to the effect that the Chêkiang forces on this sector have spent no less than $20,000 for transport service in the two weeks that they have been fighting. This is for gasoline, oils and supplies and repairs. It is understood that several new tractors have been purchased and one of them was seen on the road yesterday.

Dum-dum Bullets.

Dum-dum bullets taken from the jacket pockets of a colonel of the Kiangsu army, are alleged by the Chêkiang soldiers to have been a portion of a great many found where the Northern soldiers have been stationed. Guns which are alleged to have fired the bullets are also in the hands of the troops from Hangchow. The bullets are nasty-looking things. One in my possession is of a calibre larger than a .45 Colt automatic and the nose is a solid bit of lead with a nick in the side. In addition to the single one handed to me I saw a whole bandolier full of them; they were old and the brass shells were well covered with verdegris. The soldiers who had these cartridges and gun were threatening their unknown foe with terrible vengeance, while one of them, pointing to his wrist and forearm, indicated more graphically than he could express in words, as he made signs with his fingers, that the path of the unethical missile would be large and likely to shatter his entire arm, while pointing to an ordinary bullet he narrowed the aperture between his fingers and smiled.

The gun which fires the shell is an old model of American make and looks like one of those guns that pioneers in their struggles on the plains of long ago called the Buffalo gun. The name on the barrel is undecipherable but the year of the model is easily distinguished as 1888.

ANOTHER PUNITIVE MANDATE

Subjugation of Marshal Chang Tso-lin and Suppression of Fengtien Revolt

Peking, Sept. 18.

A Presidential Mandate was issued this morning ordering the subjugation of Marshal Chang Tso-lin and the suppression of the Fengtien revolt.

The mandate quotes petitions from Marshal Wu Pei-fu and Marshal Wang Chen-ping saying that Fengtien troops have mobilized and have moved westward along five routes. "A Fengtien rebellion is thus apparent. Mukden has long plotted against the Government. Fengtien troops have destroyed the railway at Wanchiatun, while at Chaoyang they fired the first shots in the war between Chihli and Mukden, subsequently throwing pontoons across the Taling river. Two Fengtien brigades then attacked Chaoyang, which compelled the Chihli troops to take measures for defence.

Growing Difficulties.

"In recent years the State has been confronted by growing difficulties. The people are tired of disorder. Since my assumption of office my aim has been to secure permanent peace, but Lu Yung-hsiang broke the peace. The punitive mandate against him was intended to bring an end to the rebellion in the southeast. The three Manchurian provinces constitute the northern rampart of China. In 1922 Chang Tso-lin warred against the Government and was quickly defeated, after which the Government hoped that he would repent, but on the contrary he proves that his ambition has not abated. It now appears that Chang is taking advantage of the state of war in the southeast again to disturb the country. His circular telegram shows that he has perfected his plans to disturb the national peace. The Government cannot suffer this state of affairs to continue and is obliged to utilize the national resources to suppress Chang Tso-lin.

Property to Be Protected.

"The Commander-in-Chief and Vice-Commander-in-Chief are hereby instructed to suppress the Fengtien rebellion. In the areas which Government troops occupy or pass through, the lives and property of Chinese and foreigners must be efficiently protected. If the Fengtien troops surrender they will not be punished.

"Marshal Wu Pei-fu is hereby appointed Commander-in-Chief of the forces engaged in the suppression of the rebels and Marshal Wang Chen-ping Vice-Commander-in-Chief and, concurrently, Base Commandant. General Peng Show-hsin is appointed Commandant of the First (Eastern) Army; General Wang Huai-ching Commandant of the Second (Northern) Army, and Marshal Feng Yu-hsiang Commandant of the Third Army" (which is apparently intended to reinforce either front). "General Chang Fu-lai is appointed Commandant of Reinforcements; Admiral Wen Shou-teh Commander-in-Chief of the Navy and General Chen Shih-chi Commandant of Shantung and Chihli Coast Defence."

OUTPOSTS OF CHEKIANG CAVALRY AT HUANGTU

Shanhaikuan Bombed.

Later.

An official bulletin says that the Fengtien forces are entrenching at Chaoyangszu near Chaoyang. Marshal Chang has ordered Heilungkiang and Kirin provinces to send two brigades to Jehol, viâ Tannanfu (?).

Fengtien aeroplanes dropped eight bombs on Shanhaikuan at 8.30 this morning. No damage was done.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

KIANGSU LINE BEYOND IHSING

Personal Account of Position and Reply to Chekiang Claims of Victory: Kiangsu Plan of Huge United Attack

FROM RODNEY GILBERT.

Nanking, Sept. 17.

There is every evidence from all points along Marshal Chi's line that the present prevailing quiet, which is broken by little but Chêkiang's vociferous claims of victories in the Shanghai press, is only a lull that will be followed within a day or so by Kiangsu's vigorous resumption of the campaign at every point from Liuho on the Yangtze to Kuangteh on the Anhui border. A crushing offensive is being prepared which is designed to prevent Chêkiang from shifting troops from one salient to another to meet local attacks and which, one is almost forced to believe, will end the struggle in a victory for Chi Hsieh-yuan.

The writer has just returned from the Ihsing (alias Ihing) district at the urgent request of local officials who wished him to have ocular evidence of the relative positions on the line west of the Taihu so as to disprove the extravagant claims of the Chêkiang propagandists in Shanghai. There everything tended to prove that while the press was claiming victories, Marshal Lu's forces were steadily losing ground, that their material losses were heavy and were not being replaced by fresh troops and that while their resistance was desperate, often genuinely heroic, they had been pushed to a point in this hard mountain fighting where a determined offensive on the part of Generals Ch'en T'iao-yuan and Bei Bao-shan (alias Pai Pao-san, etc.) would land the Kiangsu armies in Changhsing and in possession of the easy lines of communication with Huchow and Hangchow. It is not pretended that the situation is the same throughout the lines east of the lake, but the situation on the west is in such striking contrast to the published reports that the latter must be discounted in all cases and Kiangsu's reserve strength is now so much greater that one cannot help putting faith in the success of an imminent offensive along the whole front.

Ihsing Never in Danger

The writer left Nanking on Monday in company with Mr. Wen Shih-tsen, the local Commissioner of Foreign Affairs, proceeded to Changchow by rail and that same night set out in a launch for Ihsing and the small town of Shushan (otherwise Chosan), 30 li or more further south, where Generals Yang Ch'un-p'u of the 19th Division and Ch'en T'iao-yuan of the 5th Division, have had their permanent base from the beginning and from which they have first defended the mountain passes further south against Chêkiang's attacks and have since launched their counter attacks, which have driven their assailants well through the mountains through country in which troop movements of any sort were difficult and have now paused on the eve of a victory by order of Marshal Chi to await the general attack before proceeding further.

The general tranquillity of the country, the quiet of unlooted Ihsing and the obvious security in Shushan were in themselves evidence that this district has never been fought over and that the Chêkiang troops have at no time emerged from the mountains which rise as a formidable barrier another 30 li south of Shushan. In the latter town the writer not only had an opportunity to talk at length with Generals Yang and Ch'en and their officers but was able also to pick up evidence from reliable foreign sources which fully confirmed their accounts of the present relative positions.

Chekiang's Heroic Bravery

The present Kiangsu line begins on a mountain known locally as Lanshan, at the village of Lanyu near the lake front and some distance south of Wuhsikou (alias Wuchekow). Here the Kiangsu troops with of the 19th Division occupy eminences on the still more southerly Hsiangshan now held by about 250 Chêkiang troops of the 4th Division. From this point the line runs southwest through Chientaotsui, a most important point commanding the old imperial highway to Hangchow, to Liang Sheng T'u Ti Miao, on the Chêkiang frontier itself. It was from these two latter points the Chêkiang troops launched their offensive against Kiangsu, it was at these points that they put up their sturdiest resistance against Ch'en T'iao-yuan's bandit fighter from Hsuchow and sustained losses of considerably more than a thousand men and it is from these points that General Ch'en now commands the highways into Chêkiang, along which he is ready to pour his own troops, the 19th Division and an Anhui Mixed Brigade whenever the word is given for a general offensive. Between all of the points the Kiangsu line occupies the commanding ridges, supported liberally by machine-guns and with artillery at some points, and upon these mountains, covered with pine forests and giant bamboo growth, they have been having desperate hand-to-hand fights for nearly two weeks, gaining foot by foot, with an enemy whose equipment, reckless courage, adroitness and initiative they admire in the most liberal terms.

At the present writing the Chêkiang forces are facing this line, General Bei Bao-shan's column further west and the two Anhui Mixed Brigades at Kuangteh, with the remnants of three regiments of the 4th Division and two battalions of Yang Hua-chao's Fukien troops. All others have been removed now to the eastwards and the remaining units are now under orders, as was discovered from a dead colonel's note book, to abandon the offensive, defend their positions and attempt to prevent General Ch'en from penetrating to Changhsing, whence communications with the rest of the province are easy.

General Bei Bao-shan with his 1st Division is making an independent advance through very difficult mountain country, using Lihyang as his permanent base and Changchu (mapped as Changche) as his present base. His advance line is near the Chêkiang border south of this latter city, but the writer found it difficult to get detailed information of his present positions although it was claimed in Shushan that he was in touch with the Anhui forces from Kuangteh.

Desperate Fighting

Everyone with whom the writer came in contact, including foreigners, testified that the fighting on the front had been not only picturesque but remarkably well fought on both sides. Local bandits, taking advantage of the situation, have appeared as additional opponents at times and have done some damage before their presence was discovered. One band of men from the Chêkiang lines, attacked the Kiangsu machine-gun positions with pathetic heroism, armed with swords, spears, flails, and other antique weapons in a spirit of sheer bravado. Generals lead their soldiers to the attack and the loss among officers on both sides has been very heavy. The writer found General Ch'en recovering from a state of complete exhaustion in which he had returned from a sojourn at the front the previous night.

At the time of my visit there had been no fighting at any point on the front for two days. The Kiangsu troops are under orders not to advance except in conjunction with Marshal Chi's own troops on the east and the Chêkiang forces are ordered to conserve their strength now for defence, so both were satisfied to arrange a three day truce to give the Red Cross an opportunity to bury the dead and bring in wounded. The latter were not numerous at Shushan and the Kiangsu leaders admit total losses of a few hundred only. Sanitary and hospital arrangements as well as the provisioning of the troops have, as is usual in Chinese warfare, been poor on this western front as they are known to be equally poor on the east.

Biggest Work on East?

So far as can be learned here no further reinforcements are expected from other provinces. Approximately 15,000 men have arrived from Hupeh, Honan, Anhui and Shantung and are being stationed behind Marshal Chi's line at various points in anticipation of the grand assault which may come at any hour now. There is much speculation upon the form which this will take and of course plans are very strictly guarded, but there is some reason to believe that a great deal of force is being concentrated behind Liuho, Huangtu and Tsingpu and that the heaviest fighting will be in the vicinity of these towns.

A VISIT TO THE TAIHU FRONT

With the Chekiang Army Now Striving to Force Its Way to Thsing

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Changshing, Chê., Sept. 13.

Your correspondent was able to get through to Huchow from Kashing, good fortune having sent a launch there for fuel oil—the supplies at Huchow having been exhausted.

A walk through tthe streets of Kashing on Thursday, September 11, before leaving had failed to produce sight of a single soldier. Nor did we encounter any signs of military activity en route to Huchow. The small towns and villages through the country seemed to have about one half the usual number of people on the streets. We took the route through Wootsung and Saungling in order to avoid having to pass the Kiangsu lines at Pingwang. The canals which are usually dotted with many farm-boats, house-boats, village packets and launches were deserted except for an occasional small packet plying between villages. The fields along the route just ready for the rice harvest showed very few labourers at work. After a dull trip we arrived at Huchow at 2.30.

Hospitals Everywhere.

At Huchow we found a launch which was going to the front and arranged passage. It was to leave at 8 o'clock. The intervening time was spent in a visit to the Red Cross headquarters, the new union hospital and a trip about the city. The local Red Cross Society shows great activity. It has numerous departments and has taken over the commercial school buildings to house their offices. About 100 people are devoting their entire time to further this organization. This number including those sent out on active service at Changshing, (also, in some maps, Dzangshing), the organizers of small branch societies in the surrounding towns and villages and the officers at headquarters. About 40 men in uniform have been sent to the front —a doctor and corps of first aid men—stretcher bearers, and a burial squad. They have made arrangements with the local hospital to take care of about 200 wounded soldiers. However, up to this writing none have been sent back from the lines to Huchow.

At the hospital the superintendent, Dr. C. D. Leach, stated that they were prepared to take care of 200 soldiers in the new building just opened last June. A large building matshed 100' by 50' has been built to accommodate refugees in the hospital compound in case of need. The hospital has an old building which can house another 100 wounded who are to be sent there if the new building cannot hold them all.

Less Panic Under the Guns

He stated that the people had been in the greatest panic when the war talk had started and about 40 per cent. had left town. Since the fighting has actually begun conditions have quieted down considerably and those who remain are trying to go about business as usual.

A trip about the city showed many business houses closed. The main streets marked by the absence of the usual jostling crowds, and by the presence of extra police on duty.

Inquiries gained the information that there are practically no soldiers in reserve in Huchow, all have been sent to Changshing. The flying field will take some weeks of preparation before it can be used, some canals through it remain unfilled and the ground is a gluey mass of mud. As most of the troops going to the front on this sector pass by the city outside the walls, little is known by the residents of any movements which may take place.

The local Christian community was panic-stricken in the early days of the warscare and wanted to take possession of the mission compounds as refuges from looters and bandits as well as the dreaded soldiers. So far the missionaries have persuaded them to wait until there is actual danger. Preparations have been made to feed the refugees should they come, however, and stacks of rice bags stored in the churches against the time of need.

Yet More Wounded

At 8 o'clock, Thursday night your correspondent embarked for Changshing which was reached just after 1 o'clock on Friday morning. The rest of the night was spent at a Chinese inn. We were too tired to be fastidious and were soon asleep.

After breakfast brought in from a restaurant on the street the base hospital was visited. It is housed in a series of school buildings,—Chinese houses about in courtyards and passages. The operating room is at the entrance, the principal's desk doing service as a table. The wounded were sleeping on the floor, side by side on straw scattered loosely about. Within the other rooms long planks had been stretched on trellis and covered with straw, and the wounded soldiers put in as close as they could get together, one row against each wall with narrow aisle between. The chief surgeon stated there were over 200 wounded in this hospital and about 100 in two other similar places in Changshing. Those needing operation were to be sent on to Huchow, 30 being ready to go as soon as boats could be obtained for transportation.

The Tents of Israel

At 9 o'clock we left for the front, about 14 miles away. We went by launch to Kaipu (or Chipo) a little fishing village on the edge of the Great Lake. Here were assembled a fleet of boats of all kinds house-boats, cargo boats, water-police boats and a canal gunboat. Three miles down the coast of the lake another gunboat was anchored about 700 yards offshore. Our pass was inspected by the sentry at the landing who ushered us into the presence of the officer in charge of the station. After inspection we were permitted to pass with a warning regarding the danger. After a walk of three miles along a stone-covered country path, which is the main line of communications of the right wing of this sector, we were halted by an army Red Cross man, who said that headquarters had telephoned to warn us that there might be danger ahead. After convincing the station of our desire to be careful and that we knew of the danger we went on, following the field telephone wire down the road. We passed occasional ammunition dumps and wayside stations, donkey and cable trains loaded with supplies.

In another two miles we were again stopped, this time urgently, we had rounded the point of a hill which runs down to the edge of the lake. One mile ahead we could see the tents of the Chêkiang forces just on the lee side of a long ridge which began in high hills on the left and ran down to the lake on the right, a little further we came to an advanced dressing post and Red Cross station, located in a temple. About 200 stretcher-bearer coolies and soldiers were crowded in, squatting and gambling or lying down in the straw on the dirty floor.

A Day of Recuperation.

The medical officer advised us not to go any further; we were already in range of the Kiangsu artillery, though there had not been any shelling that day. As they had been commanded to halt us we had to be content with looking at the trenches on the top of the hill through field glasses. The tents appeared to be 200 feet from the top but no soldiers were visible. An occasional rifle shot echoed through the valley, otherwise no sound proclaimed that grim war stalked abroad.

The officer stated that it was a quiet day as both sides had fought hard for three days and were now bringing up more ammunition and supplies, and consolidating their positions generally. According to him the Chêkiang forces had assaulted the position of the Kiangsu troops beginning on September 8, and finally had pushed on a distance of some three miles. They had captured a 70 millimetre field gun, the standard of the 3rd regiment 73rd Division of the Kiangsu Army. The gun was proudly exhibited as the officer described the brave charge of the Chekiang soldiers. Other trophies were two land mines and a box of hand grenades.

The officer described a gross misuse of the Red Cross flag. He claimed that a detachment of Kiangsu men had advanced under cover of the Red Cross flag and had then set up a machine-gun and operated it although wearing Red Cross insignia. Since then the Chêkiang Red Cross workers, stretcher bearers, etc., had been fired on repeatedly and several killed.

A Naval Engagement.

The Chêkiang men stated that a naval battle had been fought off shore in the lake on the preceding day, two Kiangsu gunboats being sunk and the Chêkiang boats remaining—practically uninjured. In proof of their statement a gunboat was pointed out standing by about a third of a mile from the beach.

A General Tsoong had disappeared with 50 men during the preceding days—fighting. It was hoped that he had become separated from Chêkiang forces and was lost in the hills but nothing had been heard from him for over 24 hours.

A general advance was expected to be made along the whole sector soon. The soldiers seemed well supplied with ammunition and other equipment, except their shoes were of cloth with grass sandals. All seemed in cheerful spirits, even the drafted coolies who were guarded by soldiers with fixed bayonets.

Fighting on Anhui Border.

Sept. 13.

Information has been received here that fighting began at Szean on the Anhui border on the night of September 11. Troops and cannon have been rushed to that point viâ Huchow.

It is reported that slight advances have been made by the Chêkiang forces in the west Taihu sector in the direction of Nihshing. The enemy is slowly being pushed back. Casualties have been few and the moral of the men is fine.

Thirty-two wounded have been received at Huchow.

SAPAJOU'S MILITARY STUDIES.

HARDEST FIGHTING WITHIN RECOLLECTION

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Kashing, Chê., Sept. 16.

A sick or wounded soldier from the fighting front returns occasionally to the hospital here for treatment. Some of them say it has been the hardest fighting of their experience. The number of killed and wounded seems to be exaggerated.

One feature of Chinese warfare now current is reporting the death or disappearance of well known officers. It is embarrassing to renew the acquaintance of a man who has been dead for a week after being several times killed.

Chêkiang troops now move rapidly over railway and waterways. A few foreigners and some Chinese visited Haining to see the Hangchow Bore to-day. The tidal wave was not unusually large. Farmers in quiet districts busy gathering rice crop. Labour scarce.

THE POWERS AND CHINA

U.S. Policy: Defence of Foreign Life and Property But No Intervention

London, Sept. 12.

The diplomatic correspondent to the "Daily Telegraph" says that the United States Government has decided to cooperate in the defence of American and other foreign life and property in China, but no intervention of a forcible character is contemplated, for which the sanction of Congress is requisite.—Reuter.

Moscow, Sept. 12.

According to the Rosta News Agency M. Edo Fimmen, a Dutch trade unionist and one of the members of the Second International, in a speech at a public meeting to-day declared that the transport workers of the world would do their utmost to prevent the Powers from interfering in the internal affairs of China.—Reuter.

Baron Hayashi's Views.

London, Sept. 13.

Baron Hayashi, the Japanese Ambassador, interviewed by a representative of the "Sunday Times" on the position in China, and asked how the Powers could intervene unless prepared to spend a lot of money, which America and Japan are certainly not prepared to do, thinks that little is possible at the present time beyond protecting nationals' lives and property. He suggests the establishment of small military guards on the principal railways, either Chinese or foreign, or perhaps Chinese under an international body of officers.

It will be time for the Powers to intervene usefully, says Baron Hayashi, and offer combined assistance, when a definite decision has been reached in the struggle, or all the claimants are exhausted. Japanese statesmen to-day recognize their predecessors' mistake in refusing to support Yuan Shih-kai, as the British were so prepared to do.

The Japanese Ambassador testified to General Chang Tso-lin's military and commercial ability.—Reuter.

PEKING'S NEW CABINET

Issue of Presidential Mandate of Appointment: Only Two New Members

Peking, Sept. 15

A mandate issued at 4 o'clock this morning appoints the following as the new Cabinet:—

Dr. W. W. Yen, Premier and Minister of the Interior.

Dr. Wellington Koo, Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Wang Ko-ming, Minister of Finance.

General Lu Chin, Minister for War.

Admiral Li Ting-hsin, Minister for the Navy.

Mr. Chang Kuo-kan, Minister of Justice.

Mr. Huang-fu, Minister of Education.

Mr. Kao Ling-wei, Minister of Agriculture and Commerce.

Admiral Wu Yu-lin, Minister of Communications.

The new members consist of Kao Ling-wei, a former Premier, and Mr. Huang-fu, who, as Minister for Foreign Affairs, in February, 1923, agreed to settle the Gold Francs question on a basis of gold payment.

The members of the recent Cabinet not included are Mr. Cheng Ko and Dr. Wang Chung-huai. The latter's portfolio was only nominal, owing to his absence abroad.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

RUSSIAN LEGATION HANDED OVER TO SOVIET

Peking, Sept. 12.

M. Karahan, the Soviet Amabassador, having declared that his Government is still a protocol Power, the Russian Legation was, this morning, handed over by the Netherlands Legation.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SINO-RUSSIAN AGREEMENT

Peking, Sept. 11.

The official Gazette announces that the Ministry of the Interior has established a special commission to study in detail portions of the Sino-Russian Agreement which concern that Ministry.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

A Peking Japanese news agency circulated a story last week to the effect that Marshal Wu Pei-fu, disguised as a coolie, paid a secret visit to Peking. While in the capital and in this humble disguise he took part in an important military conference at the Presidency!

THE Asiatic News Agency of Peking says it is reported that, in case of the renewal of the Chihli-Mukden civil war, the Soviet troops will seize the Chinese Eastern Railway by force. Owing to his difficulty in arriving at any compromise with the Mukden Tuchun over the future administration of the railway, Gen. Pao Kuei-ching, former Minister of War, has intimated his non-acceptance of the offer of the presidency of the line. According to Chinese commercial reports losses will be enormous this year unless the various questions are settled as soon as possible.

CHINA'S FIGHTING CAPACITY

Sept. 15.

WE wonder who the optimist was who first propounded the pleasing fable that the Chinese are a nation of pacifists. Whoever he was his characterization, though contradicted by the records of history and the facts of experience, is still believed in by the majority of mankind and is assiduously propagated by that mass of unthinking humanity who, in the words of a once famous orator, are "indebted to their memory for their wit and to their imagination for their facts." Chinese history is a record of wars as sanguinary as those of the most pugnacious nations of the West. Every schoolboy knows the stirring tales of "the fighting states" and even the country yokel is familiar with the names of the great warriors of that epoch for he sees them portrayed on the stage or hears their fame told in story and song by the strolling storyteller in the village teashops. About this time (200 A.D.) lived Kwan Yu who, more than a thousand years afterwards, was canonized as the god of war. After winning fame as the Chinese beau idéal of knightly chivalry he was beheaded by Sun Chuan, who became King of Wu (Kiangsu) and was the first ruler who made Nanking his capital. Kwan Yu's picture may be seen in many of the shops on our streets and in the homes of the people. He appears a bronzed and bearded hero, guarded by a savage-looking warrior who stands behind him with a gigantic sword in his hand. It would not be fair to saddle the Chinese with the atrocities committed by the Mongol hordes at the beginning of the 13th century, but those who are inclined to belittle the fighting capacity of the Chinese should remember that Genghis Khan and the other founders of the Yuan dynasty carved out an Empire and conducted campaigns in comparison with which the achievements of Alexander and Caesar were trivial and their conquests almost parochial.

The prevalence of banditry in China is no new thing. Rob Roys and Robin Hoods abound in Chinese legend and authentic history contains records of men of this class who seized the throne and ruled the country wisely and well. Han Kao-tsu, the first ruler of the Han dynasty, is a case in point. His fame is such that to this day every Chinese is "a son of Han" though it is nearly two thousand years since the bandit chief became an Emperor. Chu Hung-wu, who overcame the Tartar dynasty and founded that of the Ming, in 1368, had a similar origin and he is gratefully remembered by his countrymen because he delivered them from the yoke of the hated outlander. The mid-autumn festival, celebrated two days ago, commemorates his great achievement. It is held on the 15th day of the 8th month, when the harvest moon is at the full. Legend says that the moon cakes, which are at this festival sent by friends to each other, were used to convey notices for a rising when the Tartar garrisons were massacred, simultaneously, in village and city. Moon cakes are still eaten at this festival as they were in Judea in the days of Jeremiah the prophet (Jer. 7: 19). Judging by the advertisements in the shop windows a good trade is done and modern China is in no danger of forgetting the exploits of the brave days of old.

The northern Chinese is usually credited with being a better soldier than men of the south but the clan fights of southern China are notorious for their bitterness and implacability. They have been carried across the Pacific and contribute a lurid chapter to the early history of California. It is true that in more recent years the Chinese soldier has rarely distinguished himself in battle, but there are two facts that explain, if they do not excuse, apparent pusillanimity. First, he is recruited from the lowest stratum of the people, and is always underpaid as well as untrained. Second, in his encounters with foreign foes, he has invariably borne inferior weapons to those with which his opponents were armed. This inferiority is less marked now than in times past and must be regarded as a diminishing quantity. If China has an army of a million men under arms, as many good judges believe, three quarters of the host may be regarded as negligible. But that leaves a quarter of a million well fed, well drilled and well equipped troops with which an enemy would have to reckon. This may be a matter of gratulation to the Chinese but it has its sinister side. It means that war to-day is infinitely more deadly and exacts a heavier toll both in men's lives and the costs of armaments than the struggles of the past. The possession of a powerful army is, as the Kaiser discovered ten years ago, a strong temptation to make war. The present war illustrates this. The question in dispute is no more difficult of adjustment than, say, the Ulster boundary question. Yet the opposing factions have rushed into war and other military chieftains, north and south, have hastened to blow the trumpet for battle. How much blood must be shed, how much treasure wasted and how much misery inflicted on the people before counsels of peace prevail no one can foretell but it is impossible, in view of these facts, still to credit the Chinese people with a pacific temperament.

DR. SUN AND THE SAFETY OF CANTON

Sept. 15.

IT is most charitable to believe that Dr. Sun Yat-sen was not in full possession of his faculties when he wrote the manifesto which is published on the opposite page. We have often heard him accused of being deliberately anti-British, but we have never hitherto seen any convincing evidence of it and, considering what he owes to Great Britain and to British friends, we should not like to believe he was. Yet the manifesto is as much calculated as it could well be to stir up hatred against the British. It alleges a Fascisti movement in Canton supported by British imperialism, it rakes up all sorts of slander of imaginary British atrocity in India and elsewhere and it speaks of the just action of H. M. S. Cockchafer at Wanhsien in obtaining retribution for the murder of the American citizen Mr. Hawley as designed to satisfy British imperial frightfulness. Precisely how British imperialism, so-called, is gratified by punishing the murder of a member of another nation, Dr. Sun does not apparently stop to think. Of course, the facts were in his possession, but facts evidently do not suit his present mood. The ugliest part of the manifesto and of the telegram to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald is that both suppress essential facts to deceive readers and present Great Britain in the blackest guise.

What is the truth? The Canton Merchants Volunteers, whose organization was formed in order to protect the city from depredation by Dr. Sun's mercenaries, imported arms from Europe, having first obtained a permit to do so from Dr. Sun's Government. When the arms arrived he seized and still holds them. This, coming on the top of months of illegal taxation and perquisition of all kinds, and combining with a fresh attempt by Dr. Sun to force worthless paper on the city, roused the merchants to rebel and they declared a general strike. There appears no reason to doubt that Dr. Sun did intend to bombard the suburb of Saikuan, though we are told that many of his generals withstood him. To call Saikuan a centre of Fascist rebellion, or to attempt to draw distinctions between it and Canton generally in respect of defencelessness, is an insincere paltering with terms. Nobody knew better than Dr. Sun that the merchants were wholly without arms. The British Consul-General first informed, the Civil Governor by word of mouth that measures would be taken if foreign property were injured; then, apparently, as the full brutality of the project became known, a more direct warning was given, in which, we are glad to see. Hongkong supported the Consul. For this humane intervention the Speaker of the Provincial Assembly at Canton has sent public thanks to the Diplomatic Body.

We have said that Dr. Sun cannot have been master of himself when he wrote the manifesto, but it is none the less a very pernicious document. We print to-day translations of two most violent anti-foreign leaflets which have been distributed in the streets of Nanchang, capital of Kiangsi, and Peking itself. Probably there are more of which we have not heard and we may be sure that their authors will seize cagerly on Dr. Sun's manifesto, with still more perversion of the facts than he himself has committed. We may believe that the people who work up propaganda of this kind are not more than one in a thousand. But in moments of popular excitement, the violent minority easily gains the lead and we cannot leave out of account the added influence of Moscow's agents to make whatever trouble they can. In such a crisis the interests of foreigners and of the overwhelming mass of orderly and respectable Chinese are one and while we detest the mad fury of Dr. Sun's manifesto, we may welcome it for the example it has given that Great Britain does not shrink from action on behalf of defenceless citizens of China—an example we are sure will be marked elsewhere.

A sword of gold and silver which is to be given to the Prince Regent as a gift felicitating his marriage in January has been received by the Peruvian Minister to Japan from the President of the Peru Republic.

CHINESE AND THE TREATIES

Sept. 16.

FROM one who has long been intimate with China and Chinese thought we have received a letter that bears so acutely on the present situation, that portions of it must be quoted.

The largely justified, intense pride of race and sense of superiority to their neighbours of the Chinese has in no wise been shaken (he writes) and the Greek "hubris"—insolence, in the classic sense, though the modern use of the word hardly conveys the right shade of meaning—is what would be the residuum of braising and pounding any Chinese in a mortar.

In Chinese history any pact or treaty with an opponent was always thought of as a temporary expedient, a breathing space, and never as binding if its terms could be successfully evaded. The treaties with foreign Powers are no exception in Chinese eyes. Dislike of and a feeling of restraint and annoyance at the presence of foreigners in China has in no way abated and foreign-educated students do not lose it through being petted and made much of in foreign lands. They learn our tricks and our language; but their racial instinct—and instinct is race memory, in my view—remains the same.

There is much in the two letters we publish to-day from Chinese readers which amply bears out our correspondent's observations.

The longer we all live among the Chinese, the more we are brought to realize that there is solid foundation for their pride of race. Their culture is, in important respects, in advance of that of the West; their ideal of the "superior man" fulfils the highest meanings of the word gentleman; and we cannot have any dealings with Chinese without perceiving that they make a real effort to live up to that ideal. However angry he may be with you internally, a Chinese rarely forgets his manners and at all times he responds quickly to courtesy in others. But these qualities have their inevitable defects. We are all of us more alive to the mote in another's eye than to the beam in our own and the Chinese are certainly no exception, while their inability to realize other people's points of view is illustrated in the letters from our Chinese readers to-day. One of them says, for instance, that no Power would dream of demanding to put its guards on trains in the United States because one train has been held up and rifled by robbers. The answer to this is obvious. Everybody knows that not only the United States Government but every policeman in the country will burn to catch those robbers, to do justice and make reparation. These are matters of pride with a Government which respects itself. Again, we may say without boasting, that in a British court of justice a foreigner is likely to get more rather than less his due, because judge and jury alike feel it so much a matter of pride that there shall be no tittle of complaint against their impartiality. But can a Chinese say that his Government and officials take the same nice view of what belongs to their prestige? The fact that not only the Lincheng outrage has remained utterly unrequited and unrecompensed, but that, since it, no fewer than nine foreigners have been killed and thirty-five captured by brigands and all equally unavenged, ought surely to prick the Chinese pride of race sharply. Yet it seems wholly indifferent to such disgraces. And the foreigner's complaint is directed as much against this indifference as at the outrages themselves. We admit that in other countries foreigners are liable to be injured occasionally. But in all civilized lands, when this happens, redress is given. It is not in China.

Discussion by Home newspapers of what the attitude of the Powers shall be towards the present war, with injudicious references to the possibility of intervention, all cabled back to this part of the world, have further inflamed the noisiest section of Chinese already embittered against the foreigner by the consciousness of their own shortcomings. It is human nature to hate the sight of those whom one has injured unjustly, because it makes one ashamed. So with some of the more violent of Young China in their attitude to foreigners. Now, as is said in the footnote to one letter to-day, we cannot think of any responsible foreigner (apart from mere club talk which means nothing) who asks for intervention. There are no grounds for it and in the absence of a responsible government it would be futile. But we do ask that the Powers shall adequately guard the Treaty ports (as they appear ready to do) and insist, whether in war or in peace, on adequate respect for Treaty rights (as they have not been doing at all: hence many of the troubles of China). Unfortunately the foreign Ministers in Peking, leading a shut-in existence which blinds them to the real facts of life in China and further misled by the normal prejudices of the official mind, are disposed to take the view that the treaties are out of date and insistance by foreigners upon their provisions equally so. This makes life easier for the Diplomatic Body but it does not improve matters for their nationals or indeed for China. In the present mood of the extreme nationalist agitators, to take a strong stand on the treaties is tantamount to taking advantage of China's misfortunes. But hysterical talk of this kind must resolutely be faced. There has been enough of the weak diplomacy which Sir John Jordan recently castigated in a Home paper and it has brought us all, Chinese and foreigners alike, to a sorry pass. The converse is not a gunboat policy, no slicing of the melon, no taking advantage of other people's misfortunes, but merely to insist on the fulfilment of those treaties which exist only because Chinese officialdom has shown that, without them, it will not accord those ordinary rights and liberties which in every civilized country are regarded as a matter of course.

THE AGE OF NOISE

Sept. 17.

THIS old earth of ours has passed through many epochs styled by various names. The one in which we are at present living would be more correctly defined by a philosopher than by a geologist. It ought to be called the age of noise. Wherever human beings congregate in any numbers to-day, there is noise, our ears are assailed by the roar of the trams, the shrieks of locomotive whistles, the infernal hoots of the motor horn and the thousand and one varieties of din that go to make up our modern civilization. Many people, indeed, do not care to live in the country, the quiet of the rural districts makes them feel uncomfortable and they rush away at the earliest opportunity to the haunts of hubbub.

But noise in its physical sense is not the only sort before which we bow down and worship. There is noise in its metaphorical sense which we also adore. Blatancy in all sorts of forms parades itself before us. In fact we appear to have reached such a pitch that the measure of public attention any person or thing can gain is chiefly due to the "noise" with which they are introduced, rather than to their value in themselves.

There is room in our present day society for a "social engineer." The man in charge of machinery takes prompt measures when he hears a shrieking bearing. The "social engineer" would likewise be empowered to take means to deal with shrieking journals, shrieking politicians and shrieking advertisements. There is a decay of stillness in all walks of life and we are to-day in danger of confusing "noise," auditory or optical, with efficiency and honesty. We listen to the man who makes his voice heard the farthest and try to believe he is dropping pearls of wisdom. Journalism of a certain type drags its readers through a world of headlines. Advertising, though a necessity nowadays and itself a wholesome adjunct to modern business, often tends to sacrifice stateliness to glare, blare, and "stunts."

Literature and art are feeling the effects of this modern craze for noise.

There is a distinct tendency to seek after the bizarre. The disciples of these movements of course attempt to disguise their follies under the titles of "modern spirit," "self-expression" and the like, but the fact remains that many of the devotees of these so-called "schools" are merely making a noise, either literal or metaphorical, in order to force for themselves a recognition that, as far as the merits of their work is concerned, is wholly undeserved.

One of the greatest needs of the present age is quiet. Through lack of it we miss much of the real joy of life, though things have come to such a pass that it would be extremely difficult to convince many people of the fact. The mid-Victorians may have been somewhat stodgy persons, but they were wiser than we are to-day in that they knew the value of quiet, and in this era were begun many of those movements for the benefit of humanity to which we now owe so much.

THE NEUTRALITY OF SHANGHAI

Sept. 17.

WE wrote strongly a week ago of the iniquities of the military press gang, which was then terrorizing the districts round Shanghai. It is therefore the more incumbent upon us now to call attention to the many evidences that the Chêkiang and Kiangsu commanders are doing their utmost to conduct the war as humanely as possible. It has been asserted more than once by both sides that coolies impressed for transport work are being paid. From general appearance this seems quite likely to be true. At any rate, the fear of the press gangs has largely died down. One correspondent reported, ten days ago, that houses in Quinsan had been looted. Against this, our special correspondent at Kiangsu General Headquarters tells us to-day that special arrangements are being made for the relief of the country folk at Liuho, who are said to have suffered more than any others through the fighting. Also, one of our staff, visiting Huangtu ten days ago bore witness to the respect that was being paid to property in farm houses and cottages deserted by their owners. Tribute should be paid (especially by a newspaper with correspondents in the field) to the courtesy of the officers on both sides towards foreigners visiting the camps, notwithstanding that one may imagine that the presence of such visitors is often most unwelcome. No doubt there have been instances of ill behaviour by the soldiers towards the people among whom they pass. Such are inevitable in war time. But at the beginning of hostilities both Marshal Chi and Marshal Lu announced with great earnestness that they would do their best to conduct the war with the least possible inconvenience both to their fellow countrymen and to foreigners; and it is but fair to recognize the pains that have been taken by their subordinates on both sides to make their promises good.

Such conduct, however, welcome as it is, naturally tends to make the already complicated path of neutrality still more difficult. To vary the words of an old song, Shanghai might almost say

"How happy could I be with either
If t'other were rather less nice."

In order to be perfectly neutral, it is of great importance to know whether we are to regard the present commotion as a war or a rebellion. The insurance companies have had no difficulty in deciding that it is war, and the ordinary person is not likely to disagree with them. But how do the Powers regard it? The balance of opinion is quite clearly that they wish to remain absolutely neutral. Does this mean that they regard Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang as a belligerent or a rebel? Inasmuch as they have recognized the Government in Peking as the one legitimate government of China, there would appear to be only one answer to this question. On the other hand, Marshal Lu, and with him others controlling not much less than half China, have never for one moment acknowledged the legality of the Government of President Tsao Kun. Looking at the matter quite dispassionately, therefore, it seems hard if they are to be regarded as rebels by outside peoples, who indeed have no interest in one side more than in the other, and are making it plain that they do not desire to be involved.

The question is one of considerable importance to Shanghai, as instances frequently arise on which it has a very distinct bearing. For example, one party or the other may have, stored in a Shanghai godown, property which is of military value. Supposing it wishes to remove this property, and the opposing party protests to the Shanghai authorities on the ground that to hand over supplies of military value to his opponent is a breach of neutrality, how is the point to be decided? If one party is a legal belligerent and the other is not, then the one appears entitled to get what it wants out of Shanghai, and the other is entitled to nothing. But to take this line, is certainly to be unneutral; it would not accord at all with what we believe to be the general sense of fitness; and furthermore, in view of the general circumstances of China and conditions of the country, it appears to be straining the recognition accorded to Peking a year ago unduly far. In all circumstances, it appears most desirable that the Diplomatic Body should give some ruling which would let us know where we stand.

SOME smart work on the H.A.L. str. Muensterland brought the str. Kweichow safely out of a difficult situation. The Kweichow, with a broken rudder, was sighted about 120 miles off Tsingtao. There was a heavy sea running and it was very difficult to get a line across, this eventually being managed by putting out a boat. The Kweichow has been towed into Shanghai for repairs.

TACKING AGAINST THE WIND

Sept. 18.

RECENTLY we drew attention to the close parallel between the ancient and modern civil wars of the Chinese, the war between Wu (Kiangsu) and Yueh (Chêkiang) in the time of Confucius, 2,500 years ago, being similar to the present war between the same provinces. It almost seems as if the pessimists are right when they say the world is constantly changing, passing from one extreme to another, but never advancing, like a sailing ship tacking against a strong wind but making little or no actual headway. And in modern China the prospect of being able completely to abolish internal strife and war seems as hopeless to-day as it was felt to be by Confucius in his time. It is narrated that one day the great sage ascended a sacred hill and, sighing deeply, said to the three disciples who were with him:—

"Standing on an elevation like this, one looks over, as it were, the whole world; and alas! alas! as I do so I cannot help being struck with the sad fact that, of the myriads who live in it, there is scarcely one man to be found who is not devising some means by which he may best injure, or even, if occasion served, destroy his neighbour. That in itself is sad enough. But there is something still sadder. It is to be so helpless and incapable, that even when we would wish to do so, we can neither find remedies for existing evils, nor some way of warding off those which are to come."

Turning to his disciples, who being younger were more hopeful, Confucius said, "You, my friends, have doubtless thought over this matter; let me have then your counsel with regard to it, each one speaking in his turn." After a few minutes reflexion the martial-minded Tsze-loo was the first to answer.

"As for me, I think I could manage it easily, if I were placed at the head of a great army. But even then, I would not be precipitate. Before taking the field, I would see that my troops were thoroughly organized and disciplined and commanded by competent officers; then, when all was ready, I would lead them against the enemy, with clang of gongs and many-coloured standards glittering in the sunlight. The victory assured, I would cut off the heads of the vanquished leaders, and expose them publicly as a warning to evildoers. Then—if I were king—I would return to my capital, and there, with the assistance of these my two companions, take such measures as would cause the existing laws to be respected, and the ancient usages to be revived."

It is hard not to agree with Tsze-loo in thinking that the decapitation of turbulent unscrupulous leaders responsible for civil war would straighten matters out considerably, and probably there will not be much dissent when we say that if some—we do not say all—of China's present leaders were to "pass on," they would not be greatly missed; at least there would be no profound and widespread lamentation over their departure. But the policy of "off with their heads" usually fails because successors of the defunct officials may be just as bad. Moreover, an empire or state held together by ruthless military force, by a policy of blood and iron, cannot in the nature of things last permanently. "You speak like a soldier," was Confucius' comment on the speech of Tsze-loo.

"On my part," said the second disciple, Tsze-kung, "I should act quite differently. For instance, in the case of two rival states about to commence hostilities, I should wait for such a time as the two hostile armies were drawn up facing each other. Then, clad in mourning robes, I should throw myself between them. I should supplicate the generals to proclaim silence, and, as soon as I was able to obtain a hearing, I should set before them in moving terms all the horrors of war, and the blessings of peace; I should dilate upon the ignominy of defeat, the agonies of a lingering death, the miseries brought upon bereft wives and helpless children. Moved by my words, they would doubtless lay down their arms; and then—if I were a king—I would make Tsze-loo my war minister."

The Chinese are strangely susceptible to emotional appeals, especially if reinforced by material considerations, but emotion by itself accomplishes nothing. "Tsze-kung," said Confucius, "You are an orator." All the Chinese are orators. No wonder Tsze-kung thought it would be necessary to supplicate the generals to keep silence.

The third disciple, Yen-hwui, remained silent for a time. After a few prefatory remarks he went on;

"We would begin by separating the evil from the good, by banishing sycophants and ill-doers, and filling their places with men of probity and purity of life. It would be their care, not only to instruct the people in their several duties, but to see that they put into practice all that they had been taught. Having accomplished this, we need have no fear of enemies. We should be able to disband our armies, level our fortifications, use the stones of our ramparts for building, sow grain in the ditches, and turn our weapons—for which there would be no further use—into tools for our labourers. Military science, under these circumstances, would not be required; and as there would be no longer any field upon which Tsze-loo could display his great valour, I would advise him to transfer all his energies to civil life, and to be exact and untiring in the performance of all its duties. As for Tsze-kung, I fear his eloquence would be out of place, and perhaps he will allow me to suggest that it might be better for him to exemplify by his works that which he would seek to impress upon others by his words. Such, Sir, are my ideas with regard to this subject. Should they be erroneous, I humbly supplicate my master that I may be enlightened."

After the fashion of reformers in general, Yen-hwui made his fellow disciples uncomfortable by his assumption of superior wisdom and virtue, and by his unpleasant remarks concerning their speeches. And he does not solve the problem himself. The men of probity and purity of life who can suitably fill high public office are not easily found and for a successful statesman other qualities are necessary besides probity and purity. Further, while it is comparatively easy to give moral instruction to the people—no nation has ever had so much of it as the Chinese—the tremendous difficulty is to induce them to put into practice all they have been taught. That is the difficulty with us all. "You speak like a sage, Yen-hwui," was the sole response of Confucius.

To-day if leading Chinese were asked the question put to his disciples by Confucius, how would they answer it? Are they any wiser than the sages of old? But pessimism cannot be allowed to have the last word. Despite his discouragement Confucius builded better than he knew. As a public officer he made good use of his opportunities. He inaugurated many useful reforms; caused laws to be respected; ameliorated the condition of the people; developed the power of the State, and in a short time effected a great change in the moral condition of society. Most important of all, his teachings have profoundly influenced the Chinese for twenty-five centuries, and have held them together while other nations have risen, flourished, and decayed. The Chinese are now in close contact with a form of civilization to which they are unaccustomed and are finding it extremely difficult to adapt themselves to the changed and changing conditions. In time, when they tack in another direction against the wind, no doubt they will find remedies for existing evils and a way to ward off those which threaten to come.

A FORTNIGHT OF HOSTILITIES

Sept. 19.

WITH the sensational news received last night that the Chêkiang General had gone over to the Fukien invader, that the two are momentarily expected in Hangchow and that Marshal Lu has left his capital for Lunghua (presumably) it is evident that the war may collapse speedily in East China. Everything depends on the attitude of General Hsia, the new civil governor of Hangchow, but if Sun Chuan-fang gets into the Chêkiang capital, it must be said that the chances of defending the western front look slender, even if Marshal Lu can continue to hold the eastern, and with it Lunghua and Woosung. Sun Chuan-fang is said frankly to desire the Tuchunship of Chêkiang. So do others, very near to Marshal Chi of Kiangsu. If the carcase is not absolutely on the table, the eagles are already gathered together, presaging possibilities of further discord. What follows was written before the news of Marshal Lu's departure and may stand as merely a record of the general position.

At the end of the first two weeks of fighting—to be exact sixteen days since the first shots were exchanged—it may be of interest to try to sum up the general position and results. The latter, in a military sense, are practically nil. Much ammunition has been burned: some thousands of men killed and wounded—the casualties indeed have been far beyond what previous Chinese wars have shown; but little material change in the two armies' original position. It is extraordinary that this should be so. We are safe, we think, in assuming that Kiangsu outnumbers Chêkiang and has the larger equipment, without counting that Marshal Chi has received reinforcements from the North and from up the Yangtze of 8,000 men at a moderate estimate. (In this we are taking only those troops that are testified to by foreigners). Since the fighting began it may well be that Chêkiang have fought so well that Kiangsu could not get through; or that Marshal Chi is still waiting to accumulate such an overwhelming mass of men and guns that he may hope to win through to finish the war in a single battle, as Mr. Rodney Gilbert tells us to-day is the Kiangsu Marshal's design. But there remains always the great mystery why he did not strike sooner. He was in considerable force at Quinsan certainly some days before Marshal Lu had got troops up the line to Huangtu. What was there to prevent Marshal Chi from marching straight through to Shanghai?

The Kiangsu line on the eastern, that is the Shanghai-Nanking Railway, front runs practically north and south, from Liuho on the Yangtze, through Kading, Anting (on the S. N. R.) to Tsinpu. The latter place is fifteen or twenty miles north of Sungkiang. Westwards, and about twenty-five miles north of Kashing, Kiangsu also hold Pingwang, to the southeast of the Taihu. What with hills and chains of lakes we must suppose the country is too difficult for any attempt by Kiangsu, from Tsinpu or Pingwang, to get astride Marshal Lu's communications on the Shanghai-Hangchow line. But the vital importance of this railway to Chêkiang and of the

S. N. R. to Kiangsu gives great interest to the operations on the west side of the lake. Here we would refer our readers to the letters by Mr. Rodney Gilbert and our Huchow correspondent (writing from Changhsing) on page 11, to get the position as seen from either side. From Mr. Gilbert's account, the Kiangsu authorities are quite explicit as to what they mean to do.

But in any case with the advent of Marshal Chang Tso-lin, even if Chêkiang be vanquished, the war is not over. There is a great deal of inner history to be written in respect of the North which it would be most interesting to read. Marshal Chang certainly told the foreign Consuls in Mukden on Sunday, September 7, that he was bound to come in and on the same day his manifesto, denouncing the "crimes" of President Tsao et al., was published in Shanghai. Yet Peking never got that manifesto and for some days after Marshal Chang's army had begun to move south, the capital thought or affected to think that he was merely bent on army manœuvres. It is only when Marshal Chang writes to the President that he is "sending aeroplanes to inquire into Your Excellency's health" that Marshal Wu Pei-fu is summoned in a hurry to Peking. Nevertheless we may believe that Peking is ready for Marshal Chang along the sea front, by Shanhaikuan and the Great Wall. And we may also shrewdly suspect that Marshal Chang's attitude in this region will be defensive and his real attack will be somewhere else altogether.

The position of Dr. Sun Yat-sen is rather piteous, though, however much one may respect him personally, one has little patience or sympathy to waste on him politically. He claims Marshal Chang Tso-lin and Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang as his allies. At last the moment has come when he might move northwards in the name of the Constitution and in concert with a powerful combination. And behold he is stuck as a fly to a flypaper. He has no funds nor possibility of raising them and Canton, whence he should draw his strength, is at last effectively antagonistic to him, outraged by his intolerable taxation, his unjustifiable treatment of the volunteers, his Bolshevik army. One does not think that Canton will play much part in the present struggle.

THE CHINESE APPEAL TO MARSHAL LU

Sept. 20.

A MEETING of the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce is to take place at noon to-day to discuss the situation in Shanghai as a result of the retirement of Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang from Hangchow and the presence of the Marshal in Lunghua. The Chamber in the past has been sympathetic with Marshal Lu and although it claimed neutrality during the war, it is not difficult to understand that, with Chêkiang men predominant among the members, the private sympathies would be with Marshal Lu. The change in the situation, however, requires that some steps be taken to save the city, not only the foreign concessions, but Chapei in particular, which is in danger of being looted by what might become a retreating, leaderless army. It is known that the Kiangsu attitude is that as long as Marshal Lu is at Lunghua and as long as he maintains armed forces at the front, they must fight in spite of the fact that his departure from Hangchow practically wins them the war. In fighting at Liuho and Huangtu, they are endangering Shanghai.

Marshal Lu's sympathizers are suggesting a fight to the bitter end in the hope that before Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan can reach Lunghua, Marshal Chang Tso-lin will act. On the other hand, large numbers of merchants, bankers and others feel that the war ought to end now and that it is as harmful to China as it is inhumane to continue a useless struggle. It is therefore being noised about in Chinese circles that an effort will be made within the next twenty-four hours, to convince Marshal Lu that he has been defeated and that the patriotic course to take is to announce his defeat and to recall his troops, notifying Kiangsu that the war is over.

The problem then arises what is to become of the 30,000 troops now engaged in the vicinity of Shanghai. In peace as well as in war, these defeated troops are a menace to Shanghai. Should Marshal Chi win his war without further fighting, he ought to assume responsibility for their return to Shantung, whence they came. Should the war continue, Marshal Chi will of course do nothing for these troops and they will be driven on to the borders of the Settlement by the invading army. This, in the view of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce, is a calamity which will harm the Chinese more than the foreigners, who can look after themselves. It is, therefore, believed that Marshal Lu will listen to reason and not continue a war which can only smirch his excellent reputation among the people of this war. If the war ended to-day and the Chêkiang troops, especially the two Fukien divisions, were handled satisfactorily, no mischief could be possibly done to the outskirts of Shanghai. If this does not happen, one need only point to the example of Liuho. It is for the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce to show its capacity for statesmanship at this moment and to act.

FALSE PROPHETS

Sept. 20.

FOREIGN residents in China have learnt to put up with a good deal of misinformed and often ridiculous comment on China's affairs in Western papers, because they can do nothing else. But the combined ignorance and malice of Mr. Bertrand Russell's article in the "New Leader," reported in yesterday's telegrams is really too much. While it is possible now that the fighting in the neighbourhood of Shanghai may collapse, at the time when Mr. Russell was writing there was every reason to believe that, instead of its being "of little importance" as he magisterially asserts, it was of the very greatest importance. He says that "all decent Chinese despise the Tuchuns:" no doubt there are and have been vicious examples among the Tuchuns, but to speak as Mr. Russell does, is not only a gross libel on a number of men much more deserving of respect than their opinionated critic, but is untrue in fact. No Chinese despises Lu Yung-hsiang and Chi Hsieh-yuan, Chang Tso-lin and Wu Pei-fu nor are they deserving of any such feeling, however much one may be against them politically. Again Mr. Russell says that the Tuchuns "give excuses for interference in Chinese affairs by the Powers and for the extorting of concessions in return for support." This is nothing else than a deliberate attempt to rouse the worst section in China against the foreigner. Nobody yet has shown any sign of interference in the present war in China: the United States Government have distinctly stated that they will not interfere; Japan is dead against interference; Great Britain announces that there is no possible question of intervention; and we certainly need not think that anybody else will take a different line. As for concessions extorted "in return for support" we challenge Mr. Russell to point to one single example of such a thing since the Republic began.

Mr. Russell, we are told, "pays a warm tribute to Dr. Sun Yat-sen as the pioneer of the Republicanism in China and the proletariat's friend." We agree with Mr. Russell to this extent that we believe Dr. Sun Yat-sen to be entirely free from sordid desires to put money in his pocket, and personally to be sincerely convinced of the doctrines he preaches. But none the less it is difficult not to think that the Republicanism he pioneers is essentially "Sun Yat-senism." The record of his doings in the past few years suggests very strongly that he can believe in no system of Government other than that of his own conception and that any difference of opinion he dismisses as flat blasphemy. There is no character in modern China more difficult to judge fairly than Dr. Sun Yat-sen. While we respect him as a man, the plain fact is that he has been nothing but a cause of strife and unhappiness to his fellow-countrymen; and as for Mr. Russell's flowery description of him as "the proletariat's friend" we need only point to the state of Canton and Kuangtung under his administration.

As for Mr. Russell himself, it is true that, unlike some commentators on Far Eastern politics, he has actually been in this country. But it is as well to remember the facts of that visit. He came here with strong prejudices in favour of Bolshevism. He consorted almost exclusively with men of revolutionary disposition. If he saw any of the more solid and respectable elements of the Chinese people, subsequent events suggest that he only did so in order to prove, at their expense, the immense superiority of Mr. Bertrand Russell and everything he thinks. There have been many false foreign guides to China, but assuredly none more dangerous than this one, who seeks every opportunity to involve his own country in ruin and, if allowed his own way, would certainly do the like by China.

THE Hankow press reports that the Ministry of Communications has tendered an apology to the representatives of local schools who received a beating when applying for funds. The Minister has now remitted $20,000 to Wuchang with the request that the representatives shall be withdrawn from the Capital. On receipt of this news the educational staffs in Wuchang met at the Yellow Crane Tower and decided that the remittance should be refused and that their original demand should be further urged upon the Ministry.

IN the course of a telegram to Gen. Tang Chi-yao of Yunnan on September 11, Dr. Sun Yat-sen said:—"To-day I held a Military Council which were unanimously of the opinion that as your Excellency had rendered conspicuous services to the Republic, an exalted title should be conferred on you so as to facilitate military operations. We have therefore nominated your Excellency to be Deputy Generalissimo which post, I hope, you will at once assume." On the same day, another telegram was sent to General Tang Chi-yao, containing a proposal to appoint him Commander-in-Chief of the united Army of Szechuan, Yunnan and Kueichow, and expecting him to declare war and lead an expedition against Peking as soon as possible.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

Unnecessary Strikes

One of the salient features about the industrial troubles which have been so much in evidence in the United Kingdom since the war is the number of strikes which have been unpopular with the majority of the strikers, and which have in the end proved to have been as unnecessary as harmful. There is no doubt that to the great majority of thinking workers a strike is an instrument that is to be used only when all other means of obtaining the required end have failed, and it is the extremists, both in the ranks of the men and among their leaders, who have been responsible for practically all of the numerous strikes of the last few years which have been neither just nor fruitful. It is significant that among the unions with a reputation for intelligent leadership (the Seamen's Union, for instance) and a capacity for broad intelligence, resort to the extreme measure of striking is seldom adopted, it being preferred to strive for more real co-operation between all concerned, with a more equitable distribution of the fruits of the industry, rather than waste hundreds of thousands of pounds without any real benefit to those involved. A striking example of this feeling is to be found in the 42nd annual report of the Ship-constructors' and Shipwrights' Association, in which, among much other reasoned expression of opinion and policy, there is the following! We cannot give up the right to strike, but it should be the last means resorted to and not in the way it is now being adopted in many cases, before negotiations have been concluded or provisions of agreements carried out. This disregard of procedure and the running of disputes by those who are in no way responsible, either financially or otherwise, cannot too strongly be condemned, as no executive of any union desirous of maintaining the rules of their organization could support such interference, or countenance the methods which have been adopted in many of these disputes." Such honest and logical reasoning as this strikes the vital point of most of the labour troubles which have occurred during the last few years, and unless the principles adopted by the Ship-constructors' Association are more widely embraced by British Labour, the ultimate and inevitable outcome will be widespread indiscipline, followed by utter disintegration, if not something worse.

Just a Query

In these days of civil warfare and stern hand-to-hand fighting one's thoughts almost naturally revert to the trams. When the fares last were increased and attention was drawn to the very handsome additional profit made in the following week as compared with the corresponding week in the previous year, the reply came that the larger receipts were not a consequence of the increased fares but of the greater mileage run. If so, what can be the explanation with regard to last week's statistics, which show that the distance covered, 115,111 miles, was 1,619 miles less than in the corresponding week of 1923, whilst the gross receipts were $8,400 higher and the effective receipts roughly $1,000 higher? That, however, is by the way and what one would like to know still more is why in one week the car mileage was so much less. Of course, the great storm on Tuesday badly dislocated the service for a few hours, though there was not a total stoppage, and some cars still were out of action on Wednesday (the last day of the statistics). Probably also the mileage has been affected by the track relaying operations which still are in progress, but additional services have been put on since a year ago, notably the Kiangse Road railless route, so there should be gains to set against the losses. In view of the overcrowding regulations which at last are being enforced (although they are no more than elaborations of rules framed in the beginning but always ignored) there is all the more reason why the tram services should be expedited, which in the official language means more car miles run, but, as has been pointed out, one can go to a stopping point near a terminus on a 9-minute route and watch many trams pass on the way out but wait for as much as half-an-hour for one to return. No wonder the cars all are filled to their utmost capacity and people complain that the abolition of one evil has produced another. Municipal tramway services have been outstanding successes in many great cities.

American Shipbuilding.

Many thinking persons in the United States are deploring the manner in which most of the great American shipyards — shipyards whose output in the latter days of the war was of such great assistance to the Allied cause—are now being allowed to languish and, in many cases, pass utterly out of existence. When the great efforts of America but a few years ago are considered, it appears more than strange that the shipyards of the country, which in a very short space of time transformed the U. S. to the second shipbuilding and shipowning nation of the world, are now being permitted to pass wholesale out of existence. A writer in an American shipping journal takes a particularly gloomy view of the situation and is very bitter at what he considers the general apathy in a matter which is of such moment to a great manufacturing and exporting country such as the United States. He states that "the American shipbuilding industry is not as well off as the brewers." As the writer signs himself "Old Scotch" one can imagine him as possibly being equally sympathetic towards both industries. He goes on to say that "the worst part of their period of sackcloth and ashes is that no one seems to care a rap. . . The ravages of time, the corrosion of the elements, and the insatiate demands of disappearing capital, are co-operating to bring matters to a crisis at no distant date . . . The shipyards owners and the workers are not the only ones interested in this grave problem. Our very national life will be intensely affected if these fine shipyards. . . are allowed to go to scrap. A nation such as ours, situated geographically on what is practically an island, must have means of communication with other portions of the world, both for sustenance and defence. . . . The means of large trade must always be on the water. We cannot depend on other fellows to build our ships for defence and commerce. . . American shipbuilders have stood the terrible setbacks as long as they are humanly able. No sane man would think it proper, even in these days of peace on earth, to allow all our means for manufacturing high explosives and instruments of war to lapse completely. Why, therefore, should the thinking men who are giving expression to their views in the public press, sit supinely by and witness the gradual but sure disintegration of our shipbuilding facilities, one of the greatest factors for national prosperity as well as safety, without warning the public of what it will mean to their future interests?" The declining output from American yards can be noted month by month, and while the general slump in shipbuilding doubtless accounts for some of it, there is no doubt that —possibly for reasons beyond control—an industry which could be of incalculable benefit to the country is being allowed to wane and die.

The Arming of China

Locking the stable door after the horse has bolted ever has been a feature of international politics and always will be unless there occurs a change almost beyond the imagination at the present time. When we read of the Belgian Ambassador in London solemnly requesting the gallant little country's big ally to allow its distracted subjects in Shanghai to find shelter on British cruisers, it can be understood how small is the chance of really pressing questions receiving the consideration they call for. For years the Government in Hongkong and the Customs and international police at China ports have been doing their utmost to put a stop to gun-running and they have stuck to their task, although they must have been convinced from the beginning that they could not gain more than a one-hundredth part of success. In

Shanghai almost more than anywhere else we knew the later effects of gun-running and many have been the demands, appeals, almost prayers for help from the other end. What, for instance, could be done in the case of ships flying the flags of lesser Powers, coming out here with full cargoes of arms and ammunition and everything certified as in order by the home government? The armed brigands have had their fling and still are practically unchecked. Now it is again the turn of the armies of the Provinces, but on a much larger scale than ever before. As a consequence we get the following message from London:—

The "Daily Telegraph," referring to the reported arming of the conflicting Chinese forces by different Powers with political motives comingled with commercial considerations, urges the League of Nations immediately to attend to this matter and to endeavour to seek the termination of these abuses by requesting all Governments to veto the sale of armaments in China just now.

If only that had been done long ago! The League may call an emergency meeting and pass a resolution, but the mischief has been done.

The Art of Scrounging

The British Army, in war as in peace, is nothing if not independent and original, and even in song and speech it has its own special possessions, some of them unused and probably unappreciated by the less enlightened civilian population. Such happy terms as "cushy," "swinging the lead" and "scrounging," are essentially army property, appealing only to the army. It is more than probable that the pedantic person would hotly deny that the word scrounge is legitimate and, strictly speaking, he would be correct, for in the best circles it is never uttered. Its etymology is as remote—and probably as disreputable—as the ancestry of a meandering doggie of Nantao; the practice of its meaning is in direct contravention of the cardinal precept of the Tenth Commandment; and yet, withal, it is a charming, delicious word, thought of nowadays mostly in reminiscence and not with malice aforethought. Gone are the days—let us hope for ever—when, if the battalion had casualties among its mules and wagons G.S. and there was an urgent necessity of completing establishment in those items, the second-in-command (or maybe the old man himself) gently, subtly, cunningly and indefinably let it be known if the necessary quota of wagons G.S. and the mules to pull them with possibly a couple of spares, were to stray to the battalion transport lines in the stillness of the night, no questions would be asked and the gift would be accepted and appreciated as though from Heaven. Scrounging is not a qualification or an accomplishment so much as an art; and the expert scrounger, like the genius of letters or poetry or politics or the law, is born, and not made. And the strangest thing about scrounging is that while, in peace time, it would rightly be looked on askance and the scrounger roundly and rightly condemned, in time of war it is an accomplishment that has full freedom and acclaim. Business men who had donned the uniform and who, in commercial life, were meticulous as regards the property of others, were attacked by the fever of scrounging, which has an illimitable scope in permitting the scrounger to scrounge from another unit anything that was needed, from shovels to rum, with the inviolable exception of arms and ammunition. In fact, the army code had it that the worst offence—apart from the one mentioned—that a scrounger could commit was to be caught in the act! The present conflict betwen Chêkiang and Kiangsu would provide excellent material for a comparison between the scrounging abilities of the Chinese and the British soldier. The son of Cathay, especially if he come from Shanghai, has an excellent groundwork for practising the art, but in this matter at least, and with no feeling of national predjudice, we would put our money on Mr. Atkins.

The Joss City

When we consider the narrowness of most of Shanghai's streets, the constant stream of all manner of traffic that is moving in all directions, the vast number of Chinese who seem always to be about, and the calm, casual manner in which most of them disregard even the most elementary principles of safety, it is remarkable that the number of fatal accidents in Shanghai, particularly those to do with motor vehicles, is comparatively so small. It seems strange, for instance, that in the United States, where (as in Shanghai) they have pavements for people to walk upon and where, as not in Shanghai) the people do try to walk upon them as much as possible, there should be such an enormous number of fatal accidents. The extent of these accidents may be gathered from a statement by a New York traffic magistrate who, a few weeks ago, remarked that the battlefields of France had proved safer than the highways of America, for whereas in 18 months the United States lost 48,000 killed in France, in a corresponding period in the United States 96,000 people were killed by motor-cars alone! Even allowing for the fact that in the United States one person in 10 (or even less) owns either a motor-car or a Ford, such a death roll is stupendous. It cannot be claimed that the average driver of a car in Shanghai is any more skilled in avoiding accidents than the average driver in America; and it is obvious that in America, with the proportion of pedestrians per motor-car so small, the danger to the pedestrians should be appreciably more than in Shanghai, with a much wider proportion. Considering, however, the manner in which the average Chinese pedestrian in Shanghai courts sudden death, the chances of the street walker in Shanghai meeting with such an end would appear to be approximately level with those of the pedestrian in America. That they are not, in practice, is obvious. There must be some explanation. Is it that that good joss which, we are led to understand, the Chinese have so much faith in when it comes to dodging motor-cars, actually does exist, and that so far as extermination by motor-car is concerned, Shanghai is something of a Joss City?

China's New Terror

It is not the adoption of every new thing from the West that can be hailed with joy in China and referred to as a sign of progress. The country being so badly off as regards roads and railways, the organization of postal and commercial aviation lines might have been regarded as a general benefit, but when it comes to bombing aeroplanes the question arises as to whether it is going to be a repetition of the case of the installation of more and worse devils in the place of a few driven out. In its August report, the United States Department of Commerce (office of the Commercial Attaché, Peking) states:—

According to a Mukden despatch, the largest hangar in Asia is rapidly nearing completion. This is built of reinforced concrete, 750 ft. long, 85 ft. broad, and will house 50 of the big bombing type aeroplanes. The erecting engineer is a Russian with war experience. The hangar is being built at a contract price of $100,000. It is reported that Marshal Chang Tso-lin has recently made, arrangements with American authorities for sending a group of nine students to America to study aeronautics. This group was to leave about August 1. In this connexion it is interesting to note that General Wu Pei-fu has obtained permission of the French Government to send eight students to France to study military and aeronautical sciences there.

When Chinese armies fight the actual damage amongst the contestants never is very great, the ravaging of the countryside by victors and defeated alike and the murder and conscription of peaceable and industrious country people being the worst feature. Even though there are some aeroplanes with the rival provincial armies now, they have done very little, but if the warlords are going to concentrate on the training of young officers in the best Western aviation schools things will be different. The poor, ignorant coolies, made soldiers in five minutes and incompetent to do more than fire a rifle from the hip, and lacking the courage and enthusiasm for a just cause to go in for a bayonet charge, do very little damage, but even one bombing aeroplane, properly handled, will play sad havoc, and the possession of several of them will give the ambitious war-makers a greater sense of power than ever.

Sunday Sports

The clergyman at Home who has challenged anyone to show him a Bible text prohibiting Sunday games has not produced a very sound argument in support of his case because, as has been pointed out, the Jews of old, so far as historical records show, were not strongly addicted to athletic pastimes, and even amongst the pleasure-loving and athletic Romans, Greeks and other ancient peoples organized games were not so much an attraction as individual feats of strength and skill. Or, to take a more modern example, in the period when the English first secured their reputation as a sporting nation, it was really field sports, riding and boxing that got them the honour. Football had very little hold on the people and even cricket was not so generally played as many may think. The vicar, indeed, treads on dangerous ground when he asks for such evidence, for although the need for approval or otherwise did not exist when the Bible was written, he will find in the early chapters of English history that Kings and Parliaments, more keen then than they can be now on the enforcement of religious observance, passed many laws forbidding Sunday games. A very good case can be made out in favour of Sunday games working in such an argument and a great many clergymen already have subscribed to the submission that Sunday games are advisable and quite in acord with the Christian religion and can be played without interference therewith. His name and benefice have been forgotten for the moment, but ever there will remain the example of the clergyman somewhere on the upper reaches of the Thames, who invited sportmen to come to early service at his church on Sundays, and to come in their flannels or Norfolk suits, and to bring with them their fishing rods, lunch-baskets, bats, golf sticks, or whatever they would need. The porch and grounds of his church looked like a sporting outfitter's store, but the church every Sunday was filled with an earnest, interested and steady congregation. There can be nothing but admiration for one like Harry Kingman, who refuses to play baseball on Sunday because he personally does not think it right, but we have not heard of him forcing his opinions on others.

Miss Christina Kolontai, the first woman Soviet Ambassador to Norway, presented her credentials to the Norwegian King at Christiania on September 9. She was escorted to the court in a Royal carriage. Norwegian Communists protested against the alleged luxury displayed by the proletarian envoy.

Canterbury Cemetery, where Joseph Conrad was laid to rest, is picturesquely situated "without the city walls." As a member of the Roman Catholic faith, he could not be buried in one of the many ancient churchyards (and notably that of St. Martin's where King Ethelbert was baptised by Augustine), which are still in use, but his remains passed through the venerable streets of the Metropolitical city—the "Mother of England"—and he lies within sight of the Stour meadows and the Kentish hopgardens that he loved so well, and within sound of the "cruel Canterbury bells," which his great contemporary in modern romance, Rudyard Kipling, tells us drove the mourning fairies away from Dymchurch.

The Prince of Wales laughed at the Archdruid's promise that any poem he would at any time submit to the Eisteddfod "would be duly and truly considered." And, indeed, it is a long time since any of the royal line has taken to poetry. It would be almost lèse-majesté to connect the word with Queen Victoria or any of the Georges (the first two of whom did not know enough English). Charles II. might have come under suspicion, but probably any offering of his Muse was suppressed as unfit for publication. James I. wrote widely and tediously of theology and politics and tobacco, but seems to have thought poetry too frivolous a pursuit for his argumentative pen. But with the Tudors we reach a freer air, and Henry VIII. was as unabashed a poet as he was a musician. Even Elizabeth, woman of affairs as she was, did not disdain the lyre, though her biographer is unkind enough to dismiss her few attempts at English verse as "worthless." But for a royal poet whose poems are worthy of a better epithet, we have to go back to James I. of Scotland, whose "Kingis Quair" ranks with the minor classics.

NEWS FROM THE OUTPORTS

DISTORTED VIEWS OF CHINESE AFFAIRS

Mr. Bertrand Russell's Praise for Dr. Sun Yat-sen and Attack on Tuchuns

London, Sept. 17.

"The fighting going on in the neighbourhood of Shanghai is of little importance," asserts Mr. Bertrand Russell in an article in the "New Leader," in which he attacks the British policy in China. He declared that the rivalries among the Chinese Tuchuns—whom all decent Chinese despise—give excuses for interference in Chinese affairs by the Powers and for the extorting of concessions in return for support. The only exception to the rule that the Tuchuns are merely ambitious brigands, Mr. Russell affirms, is Dr. Sun Yat-sen, to whom the writer pays a warm tribute as the pioneer of Republicanism in China and the proletariat's friend.

After commenting that the restoration of Weihaiwei to China is long overdue, Mr. Russell says that he does not think that Labour's policy will ever be adequately carried out until a certain number of men sympathizing with it are placed in important official posts both at the Foreign Office and in the Diplomatic service. In conclusion, Mr. Russell declares that, unless a special effort is made to check the information derived from British banks, merchants and officials, the British Government are bound to serve the interests of capitalism in China.—Reuter.

KUOMINTANG AND COMMUNISM

Shameen, Sept. 16.

A fierce controversy within the Kuomintang Party has resulted in a split in the Party. Many members have left for Shanghai and Mr. Sun Fo has resigned the post of Mayor of Canton. Sentiment is growing, especially among the returned students, against the Communistic tendency. Mr. Ma Soo, in a declaration, says: "It is desirable to retain the friendship of Russia, but not to accept everything Russian in as much as Communism is entirely unsuited to China."

Mr. Hu Han-min has been requested to succeed Mr. Liao Chung-kai as Governor of Kuangtung and General Li Fuh-lin, the bandit suppression commander, has been offered the position of acting Mayor of Canton; but it is probable that neither will accept before a final settlement of the Merchant Volunteer disagreement is reached.

With Dr. Sun Yat-sen at Shaokuan there are about 10,000 troops under the command of Gen. Wu Te-chen, the former Chief of the Canton Police.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHINA'S HUGE PRODUCTION OF OPIUM

Refreshing Common-Sense Advice to League of Nations Opium Committee

London, Sept. 16.

In a letter to the "Times," Sir Frank Swettenham, dealing with Sir John Jordan's proposal for the gradual reduction of the export of opium from India, and of the consumption in the Far Eastern territories of the Powers, at the rate of 10 per cent. a year for ten years, says that if this advice were accepted and enforced it would put an end to the production of prepared opium in India and its consumption in the Straits Settlements, the Malay States and Hongkong, "but what about China which is producing 15,000 tons of opium yearly, or nine-tenths of the world's production? If Sir John Jordan's suggestion were accepted and enforced what is to prevent China from producing a few more tons to replace it? Is not the Opium Advisory Committee straining at gnats while swallowing a camel?"—Reuter.

GREAT ACTIVITY AT THE TAIHU

Soldiers, Stores, Motor-Bicycles, All Sorts of Stuff on the Road to Ihsing

From Our Own Correspondent.

Huchow, Chê., Sept. 14.

There is great activity outside the south gate of this city to-day. A train of passenger barges are passing through on the way to the Taihu sector. Seven barges and a half-dozen cargo boats loaded with coolies prepared to work or fight as the case may be. Coolies old and young, well dressed and ragged, one-eyed, some of them, fine specimens of physical manhood, others, but all cheerful and laughing, as if bent on a picnic. These coolies were recruited in Shanghai and were transshipped to Hangchow and thence towed to Huchow. The men say they have been en route a week in all. None are armed and, untrained as they are, they constitute cannon fodder of the fresh and green variety. Their boats have stopped for the evening meal beneath the walls of the Huchow Union Hospital whose wards are already crowded and jammed with the wrecks from the battle field to which they are so blithely going. Laughingly they go to burn their lives out on the altar of ambition of men whom they know not, apparently satisfied with a bowl of rice and no comforts of life in return.

Two contingents of Red Cross workers from Hangchow gaily flying numerous flags and spick and span in new uniforms are also on their way to the front. A group of 100 including 20 doctors from the Provincial medical school and from private practice in Hangchow, make up the Chêkiang Red Cross Society Field Corps. They have a fleet of seven houseboats. The unit from the Church Missionary Society Medical School and Hospital is made up of two doctors, four medical students five nurses, two administrators and eight stretcher bearers. This unit is regularly affiliated with the Chinese Red Cross Society.

Another military group on the way to the front is the company of soldiers which has been on duty at Mokanshan. They are quartered in a local temple and are going to Szean near the Anhui border.

Two foreigners have just returned from the Taihu sector. They had spent the night of September 12 at the front beyond Kaipu which is on the edge of the lake. There was very little fighting that night and the next day up to noon. Yesterday they were back at Dzangshing and report very little fighting from the other portions of this front. At general headquarters great quantities of military supplies are being unloaded, many boatloads of shells, machine guns and rifles. Among them was noticed an armoured automobile and two motor-cycles. Having been over the country hunting, one of the men was much puzzled to know how this stuff could be put to use, as the roads are but rocky paths.

Wounded Pouring in.

The wounded continue to pour into Huchow. Already 150 have come, 100 being sent to the Huchow Union Hospital and 50 to a local hospital in charge of foreign-trained Chinese doctors. As the boats arrive about 10 o'clock at night, the doctors and nurses are feeling the strain of the emergency, as the men have to be attended to at once, many requiring serious operations. These soldiers bear up bravely under the most awful wounds and take their discomforts and maimed condition as part of the game. The thought of approaching death worries only the occasional, and a stoical outlook characterizes the great majority, who apparently want to get back to the front.

The engagement is announced between the Rt. Rev. H. Moule, D.D., Bishop in Western China, and Miss Dorothy Martin, of the West China C.M.S. Mission.

DR. SUN'S ANTI-BRITISH TIRADE

British "Imperialism" Denounced Because British Counsul Threatens Action if Defenceless City of Canton is Bombarded

The following Manifesto has been issued by Dr. Sun Yat-sen as President of the Government at Canton and Head of the Kuomintang:

From the moment that the Compradore of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation at Canton openly began his rebellion against my Government, I had reasons to suspect that his antinational movement was supported by British Imperialism. I have been reluctant, however, to believe this in view of the accession to power of the Labour Party in England which, in its conferences and programmes, repeatedly expressed its sympathy with exploited peoples. And I still had hope that this Labour Government, now that power was in their hand, would prove their professions by at least abandoning the old gunboat policy which, in the past, has heaped disaster and humiliation on China and would inaugurate in this country that era of international honesty which is reputed to be a principle inspiring the political thought of British Labour. On August 29, the British Consul-General addressed a despatch to my Government, stating that the Consular Body in Shameen "protested against the barbarity of firing upon a defenceless city" and concluding with this menacing note which is tantamount to a declaration of war: "I am now in receipt of a message from the Senior British Naval Officer, stating that he has received orders from the Commodore in Hongkong that, in the event of the Chinese Authorities firing upon the City, immediate action is to be taken against them by all British Naval Forces available." My Government repudiates the suggestion that it could be guilty of "the barbarity of firing upon a defenceless city," since the only section of Canton against which Government might be compelled to take action is the suburb of Saikuan which is the armed stronghold of the Chan Lim-pak rebels. But this infamous suggestion coming as it does from a body which includes the authors of the Singapore massacre and the Amritsar and other atrocities in Egypt and Ireland, is typical of Imperialist hypocrisy. And even in my own country, I need but refer to the latest British outrage at Wanhsien where the bombardment of a defenceless city by British Naval Forces was only averted by the sacrifice of two of my countrymen who were summarily decapitated without trial, in order to satisfy Imperialist frightfulness. Is it because such outrages on a weak and disunited country are perpetrated with impunity, that here in Canton waters the British Navy again threatens to fire upon the authorities of another Chinese city?

But I see a further and more sinister meaning in this challenge of Imperialist England. Reading it in the light of the diplomatic and moral support and of the millions of the Reorganization and other loans which the Imperialist Powers have for upwards of 12 years consistently given to the Counter-Revolution, it is impossible to view this act of Imperialism as other than a calculated attempt to destroy the Kuomintang Government of which I am the head. For here is open rebellion against this Government, directed by a trusted agent of the most powerful engine of British Imperialism in China, and a so-called British Labour Government threatens to shoot down the Chinese authorities in Canton should they take the only form of action which would enable them effectively to cope with a movement aiming at their own overthrow. And what is this Kuomintang Government that Imperialism wants to destroy? It is the only ruling body in the country which strives to preserve the spirit of the Revolution from utter extinction. It is the sole centre of resistance to the Counter-Revolution. Therefore British guns are trained on it. There was a time when the order of the day was the overthrow of the Manchu conqueror. The time is come when that order of the day shall be the overthrow of Imperialist intervention in China—the principal obstacle to the completion of the historic work of the Revolution.

SUN YAT-SEN.

Canton, Sept. 1, 1924.

Dr. Sun's Telegram To Prime Minister of Great Britain.

Right Honourable Ramsay Macdonald, London.

The Canton compradore of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation has been organizing a body of so-called Chinese Fascisti, whose aim has now been revealed to be the overthrow of my Government. This was to be carried out when the rebels could be effectively armed with arms and ammunition imported from Europe on board the steamer Hav. The Hav arrived in Canton on August 10, and was immediately seized by my Government. Since then, a state of rebellion has existed in Canton in the guise of a strike engineered by the rebels and other counter-revolutionaries. At a moment when I was deciding on necessary measures to cope with the rebellion, the British Consul-General sent a letter to my Government, containing the following:—"I am now in receipt a message from the Senior British Naval Officer, stating that he has received orders from the Commodore in Hongkong that, in the event of the Chinese Authorities firing upon the City, immediate action is to be taken against them by all British Naval Forces available." In view of the diplomatic and financial support which successive British Governments have consistently given to the Counter-Revolution in China and of the fact that my Government is to-day the sole centre of resistance to that Counter-Revolution, I am forced to conclude that the real object of this ultimatum is the destruction of my Government. I have to protest in the strongest terms against this latest act of Imperialist intervention in the internal affairs of China.

SUN YAT-SEN.

British Consul's Despatch.

H.B.M. Consulate-General, Canton, August 29, 1924.

Sir,—Having heard yesterday from several sources that the Chinese Authorities contemplated opening fire on the city of Canton, particularly on the suburb of Saikuan, the Senior Consul yesterday made a verbal protest to the Civil Governor, as under:

(1) "That in the event of foreign persons or property being injured, they would hold the government responsible;

(2) That they protested against the barbarity of firing on a defenceless city;

(3) That in the event of injury to foreign person or property they would take whatever measures they deemed desirable."

I am now in receipt of a message from the Senior British Naval Officer, stating that he has received orders from the Commodore in Hongkong that, in the event of the Chinese Authorities firing upon the city, immediate action is to be taken against them by all British Naval Forces available.

BERTRAM GILES,
H. B. M. Consul-General.

A COUNTER-BLAST

Canton Residents' Appreciation

A counter-blast to Dr. Sun Yat-sen's recent manifesto accusing "British Imperialism" of a desire to overthrow his Government is forthcoming in a telegram which has been despatched to the Diplomatic Corps in Peking by Mr. Chung Shing, the Speaker of the Kuangtung Provincial Assembly, expressing appreciation, on behalf of the people of the Province, at the Consular warning given to Dr. Sun against his proposed bombardment of the city. The telegram reads as follows:

"Dean, Diplomatic Corps, Peking.—Kindly request colleagues convey to their respective Home Government following: The people of Kuangtung deeply appreciate the action of the Consular Corps in Canton warning Dr. Sun Yat-sen against his intended bombardment of their defenceless capital. Dr. Sun Yat-sen's Kuomintang Government irregularly constituted has never been recognized at Home or abroad. Its recent work of devastation and oppression were akin to that of pirates and bandits in South China, against whom the British and naval authorities, especially at the request of Consular representatives of the Governments the interests of which were being affected, have been justified in taking all necessary steps.—CHUNG SHING, Speaker, Kuangtung Provincial Assembly.

ANTI-FOREIGN DISPLAY IN PEKING

Violent Handbills Distributed Throughout the Capital

Peking, Sept. 8.

Apparently as part of the "Humiliation Day" programme in Peking, handbills containing the following were distributed in the vicinity of the Chienmên and throughout the Legation Quarter by Chinese in a motor-car:—

"To Foreigners.

"We Chinese citizens apply to you foreign diplomats and citizens and warn you that the Chinese people cannot tolerate any further act of violence and insults of your Governments.

"Our patience has come to an end. Woe to you if you will not awake in time and not (sic) give up predatory treaties which strangle China. To-day the Chinese people protest against the protocol of 1901 as a source of violence and insults to China. We demand:—

Obedience to our laws.

Retrocession of concessions at Shanghai, Tientsin and other places.

Restoration of Customs houses.

Stop robbing our customs revenues.

Don't strangle with your customs tariff our young industry.

Remove your troops from Peking. If you are not thieves and robbers what reason have you to fear the Chinese people?

"Don't interfere with our internal politics and struggles that are going on China. This is our own affair. If you don't like it go away from our country. We don't keep you in China by force; think it over before it is too late.

"English, Japanese, American, French robbers and bandits be careful, the time of redress is near.

"Either stop the policy of violence and give up the treaty of 1901 or the high walls of the Legation Quarter and the troops will not keep you safe.

"Since the Legation Quarter is a part of our city it must be governed by our laws. We cannot tolerate any Chinese being looked upon as a defenceless dog in the Legation Quarter."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

ABNORMAL RAINFALL IN KIANGSI

But Harvests Unscathed: No Military Activity Is Reported

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Kanchow, Ki., Aug. 29.

After the floods in the late spring there has been a certain amount of suffering in this district, but the harvest on the whole has not suffered, although it is later this year on account of the abnormal rainfall.

The summer continues to be a quiet one, in spite of the many rumours which have been current. The latest rumour is that Northern troops are to advance against Kuangtung.

The city continues to harbour only 6,000 who have, on the whole, behaved very well, and have assiduously drilled.

The Taoyin has been superseded in this district, the former, office holder having been transferred to Kian. The Kian Taoyin has been brought here. So far there is no mention of abolishing this office for this district.

The Commander-in-Chief of the Northern Army in Southern Kiangsi has established his headquarters here.

REACTIONS OF WAR

Taku Bar Endangered by Want of Dredging

Tientsin, Sept. 18.

With the stoppage of trains Tientsin will soon be faced with a shortage of coal. The serious and worst aspect is that the Haiho Conservancy Board and the shipping lines will soon be unable to obtain bunkering. It is believed that they will have to cease dredging at Taku Bar with the result that the river will be silted up preventing the entrance of steamers.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

TACHIENLU PURGED OF EVIL

The Annual Offensive against the Forces of Darkness: Devil Dances the Event of the Season in Tibetan Society: Incoherence of the Ritual

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Tachienlu, Sze., Aug. 2.

Tachienlu this morning, it is supposed, is quite free from devils, demons and evil spirits. Yesterday they were enticed into a lump of tsamba and butter and shot into oblivion at the river side. Freedom from wicked spirits is no mean blessing and the people of Tachienlu, Man, Han, and Fan, should be very grateful to the assiduous lamas for helping them to get rid of such pestilent individuals. Devils, dragons, and demons are not easily moved, nor are they easily persuaded to give up their nefarious work. The lamas however have a way all their own and year by year Tachienlu gets a regular clean up, the evil spirits apparently being sent about their business.

Different religions use different means of getting rid of different spirits. Some people use prayer, others use gunpowder, the lama ingeniously uses the "Devil Dance." The lama believes that arrayed against him and therefore against all people, are diabolical sorcerers, scheming necromancers, common swindlers, artful jugglers, expert conjurers and a whole host of fortune tellers. And they are all scheming to destroy the lamas peace of mind, his accumulation of merit, his prospect of paradise, his hope of Nirvana.

The visitor to this border town has only to see a "Devil Dance" to realize how real and potent is the spirit world in the mind of every lama. During the devil dance a lama was waiking somewhat gingerly round the temple courtyard when suddenly and mysteriously he espied an evil spirit in the horn of a yak which was lying uselessly on the stone slabs. He pounced precipitiously on this simple, harmless, yak horn and forthwith expelled the demon. How it got there and why it was there and how he knew it was there and how he drove it from there no one seems to know.

Daily and hourly the lama finds himself, or thinks he does, fighting the whole pantheon of dark force inhabitating the goblin world, the ghost world, the demon world and the spirit world. They follow him when he walks, they disturb him when he prays, haunt him when he reads. The lama aims at getting good, doing good, and being good and in this three-fold exercise he finds a hard struggle for existence. He pronounces endless charms, he recites interminable incantations, he repeats numberless formulas, he prays harder and faster and oftener than any other human being and yet the devil world still torments him, harrasses him, allures him, defies him. He prays eating, sleeping and playing. He repeats protective prayers, defensive prayers, aggressive prayers. Nothing however is so officacious and so satisfying and so remunerative and so entertaining as the devil dance. This apparently is the master-move, the summum bonum, in dealing with the forces of the spirit world.

An "Exorcism Assembly."

The devil dance is simply this—the interpretation depends entirely on whether we use the inductive or deductive method. No two men receive the same impression; no two lamas give the same explanation; no two temples perform the same incantation. Europeans call the performance a devil dance, Chinese call it an exorcism assembly, the Tibetans call it a religious dance performed by monks; the populace regard it as play-acting with a religious significance. What it really is, however, history has obscured, tradition has obliterated, and custom has abused.

This year the devil dance was held on the tenth of the seventh moon, Padma Sambhava's birthday, and at the Red sect temple, just outside Tachienlu. This religious festival is now becoming one of the most popular holiday seasons on the Tibetan frontier. For days before the dance, elaborate preparations are made to feed and accommodate the large concourse of people. Temporary booths, open air tea-shops, and a large variety of restaurants cover the open space in front of the temple. The Tibetans erect their tents near the lamasery and live there while the performance lasts. What to the lama is apparently a life and death struggle—evil versus good—is to the ordinary population of this border town a time for nice dressing and fine feasting. The Tibetan ladies with their Tibetan husbands and their servants turn out in all their finery—silk embroidery and gold ornaments of every discription. Chinese ladies and their husbands and families are there in large numbers in their finest silks and satins. The wealthy families in the city pay from 20 to 50 rupees for a box and this includes tsamba and butter and sweets, while the show lasts. Facing the temple courtyard on which the dance takes place there are 100 boxes, or in other words, the domiciles of the lamas. A huge awning stretches across the courtyard, protecting the dancers, the band, the attendants and the large audience occupying the pit.

On the morning of the tenth, Padma Sambhava's birthday, the dance begins by a kind of religious opening ceremony; then follows the sweeping of the courtyard and the show begins. For two solid days the lamas dance themselves tired, the band blows itself tired, and the onlookers gaze themselves tired. The music is quite weird and uninteresting and to the monotonous drone of pipe and drum the lamas masquerade for hours round the temple courtyard. One reason why the show is called a devil dance is the fact that the lamas who perform are dressed in every synonym for hideous, impish, demonical sillyness. Some masks give the impression of a weird, uncanny, lunatic performing from sheer pleasure.

Bait to Entrap Devils.

The interpretation or explanation of this two days dancing is not widely known nor are the lamas very clear about its signification. Padma Sambhava when he came to Tibet from India is supposed to have driven a great many devils from the Roof of the World. When he did so, how did he do it? Did he dance them out, decoy them out, push them out? Are the devils driven out every year the same devils or are they new and quite modern? What is the relation between the dancing devils and the spirit world? The simplest explanation we can get hold of is this—the lamas dance in every evil, distorted, weird guise they can think of, and while dancing, by some mysterious magic art, they are able to "hook" any daring spirit bold enough to show its face within the temple courtyard. As the "hook" must be free to "hook" more devils a contrivance, made of tsamba and butter-called by the Tibetans a "Linga," that is an image; is placed in the temple courtyard. At the close of the dance, when all the demons, devils, ghosts, goblins, have been "hooked" grabbed and stowed away in this image of tsamba and butter, the lamas carry it to the river side and there it is blown into oblivion.

Eaten by Hungry Beggars.

The last and final act is a terrific scramble by all the local beggars to get the biggest share of the tsamba and the butter. The lamas throw the image away and the beggars grab and eat it thereby consuming a great many devils.

Another interpretation is this: the dance is merely a performance to ensure good luck, good harvests, good weather-freedom from war, pestilence and famine. The dance in some way is connected with appeasing or destroying the evil spirits who cause and bring misfortune and disaster.

This year the British Consul and several other European visitors to the border witnessed the dance.

JAPAN AND THE WAR IN CHINA

Press Strongly Advocating a Policy of Neutrality and Non-Interference

Tokyo, Sept. 14.

Despite the fact that there are now signs of the disturbances in China extending in scope more rapidly than ever, public opinion in this country lays stress upon the necessity of maintaining the policy of non-interference in China's domestic affairs. In this connexion, the "Jiji" writes:—

"While the Lincheng incident revealed China's anarchical state and disorder, the present warfare exposes the actual condition of chaos prevailing in that country. China is thus, as it were, seeking of her own accord to run such risks as to incur intervention by the Powers in her internal affairs. So long as the interests of any foreign Power are not affected by the present Kiangsu-Chêkiang war, it is by no means improbable that unlooked for results would ensue, of great importance from the international point of view, if any Power were so rash as to support one party to the detriment of the other in China. It is devoutly hoped that the Powers will be strictly cautious of actions that tend to further the chaotic conditions in China and will adhere to their policy of non-interference." The Tokyo "Asahi" says in part:—

"The United States has already declared her non-interference in China's domestic affairs and there is no doubt that Great Britain will adopt the same attitude. Japan, too, as a result of the recent Cabinet meeting, has definitely decided for non-interference and all the political parties also are reported to have agreed to the decision of the Government. It is to be hoped that with non-interfernece in view, Japan, Great Britain, the United States, and France may arrive at a thorough understanding in full agreement. It is also to be hoped that the Governments and peoples of the different Powers will entertain no unjust suspicions of the actions of others and will be on their guard against speech and conduct calculated to discredit others."—Eastern News Agency.

DESTITUTE CIVILIANS IN WAR AREA

Special Organization of Relief by Kiangsu with American Red Cross Aid

From Our Own Correspondent.

Nanking, Sept. 13.

Six hundred wounded have arrived in Nanking. There are said to be 300 in Quinsan where Dr. Frank Wilmot of Nanking is assisting the Army Medical Corps and several hundred at Soochow and Changchow.

The Kiangsu civil authorities have requested the foreigners and Chinese church of Nanking to help in organizing relief for wounded and destitute civilians in the fighting area. It has been decided to do this work under the name of the American Red Cross and the first unit, consisting of two Americans (Dr. Warren Stuart and Mr. Frank Price) and four Chinese, is leaving to-day for the eastern front. Pitiful appeals are coming back from towns and villages near the fighting line.

Mr. Sam J. Mills is proceeding to Shanghai to consult with organizations there regarding similar relief work for civilians in the war zone, on the other side of the fighting line. The work will be absolutely neutral in character.

Marshal Chi's headquarters are reported from many sources to be in Quinsan.

A Rush of War Brides

An interesting effect of the war in Nanking has been the hurrying up of marriages. According to Chinese reports there were 800 war brides yesterday, the responsibility for whose safety now rests on husbands instead of parents.

ANTI-RED FEELING IN SIBERIA

Increasing Public Anger with Soviet: Private Trading Barely Possible

A gentleman who has lately returned from Siberia, in a statement to a representative of the "North-China Daily News," paints a very unpleasant picture of conditions in that part of Soviet Russia. "The country is exceedingly unhappy," he said. "The people are dissatisfied with conditions and are creating disturbances. An unfortunate method they have of showing their annoyance is to wreck the trains of the Trans-Siberian Railway. This is being done at the rate of two a week and the authorities cannot stop it. The crops of Eastern Siberia show a fairly good quality, although it is reported that they show a deficit of approximately 1,000,000 poods as compared with last year.

"In spite of the new Economic Policy reforms, private enterprise has been entirely eliminated, hitting particularly hard the Chinese traders, thousands of whom have been forced to close their shops and leave the country. The policy of State capitalism is being put to the test and the Government is fostering co-operative societies and is undertaking trading operations on its own, to grapple with smuggling, which is on the increase.

"Robbery and murder are rampant, particularly on the highways leading to and from the goldfields."

ANTI-FOREIGNISM IN KIANGSI

Propaganda from Peking: An Extraordinary Circular: A Day of Humiliation

From Our Own Correspondent.

Nanchang, Ki., Sept. 7.

In view of the foreign pressure with regard to the Sino-Russian Conference, some "intellectual" person in Peking advocated that September 7 be made a day of national humiliation, with anti-foreign intent. The movement is spreading widely in China and the young students are naturally the leaders everywhere. In Nanchang to-day there would have been a parade, had it not been prevented by the officials. There was therefore only a distribution of circulars intended to instil in the minds of the lower classes a bad impression as to the high-handed action of the foreigners.

The following is a translation of the circular:—

"To-day is a very sad and shameful day in the history of China. Brothers, you should realize the savageness of the imperialism of Britain, the United States, Japan and France towards our nation. Since the Opium War they have continued to oppress our country, have robbed us of our money, and have forced us to make unequal treaties. Under the Nanking Treaty we paid an indemnity of Tls. 2,000,000 and five ports were opened to foreign trade. Under the Tientsin Treaty Tls. 4,000,000 were paid, and this was followed by the Treaty of Peking. As a result of the Sino-Japanese war we paid even more (Tls. 400,000,000) and Liukiu and Taiwan were cut off from our map. In 1900, the eight Powers were allied in ruining our capital and robbing us of our treasure under the pretext of punishing the Boxers, who were stated to have slain a number of their missionaries. But, in fact, they were far more savage than those Boxers and killed our people just like killing chickens, without paying a single cash. In consequence of this, we were forced to enter into a Treaty by which we paid an indemnity of Tls. 400,000,000 and the foreign soldiers were allowed to remain within our capital, Peking. The following list summarizes their robberies from us:—Authority to control the Custom House, authority to build railways, authority to control our postal administration; freedom to establish educational institutions, churches and wireless station, to station soldiers here, to enjoy extraterritoriality and to dwell within our ports.

"These are only some of the mischievous things done in the past, but there are, in addition, many other acts towards China which have been committed without giving proper indemnity and without proper solution. They are: the affairs of June 1 and September 1, the occupation of Weihaiwei, the Liyuyuan, Liukwiyuan, Tienchoushou, Yehhuchen and Chiabonmen affairs.

"Now, brothers! Is our nation going to be oppressed for ever by them? Are out people unable to save our nation? We should awaken and we must succeed. For this purpose we set this day of national humiliation to arouse us to stand up and fight against imperialism and annul the irreciprocal treaties and regain our territory."

DR. SUN'S DEPARTURE FOR SHAOKUAN

Mid-Autumn Festival Tided Over by Pacific Measures: Second Strike Postponed

Canton, Sept. 14.

Prior to his departure for Shaokuan, Dr. Sun Yat-sen officially appointed Mr. Hu Han-min as Civil Governor of Kuangtung, invested with the functions of the Generallissimo pro tem.; Mr. Liao Chung-kai as Secretary of Finance and concurrently Superintendent of the Board of Military Stores in addition to the post of Chief of the Bureau of Financial Affairs of Kuangtung; General Li Fu-lin as Mayor of Canton pro tem.; and Mr. Li Lang-ju, leader of the Merchants' Volunteer Corps, as Acting Director of the Peace Preservation Bureau of Canton.

Later.

Dr. Sun Yat-sen's departure for Shaokuan and the scheme he has announced for the relief of Chinese merchants at large, coupled with Mr. Liao Chung-kai's declaration that Communism would not be put in force by the Canton Government and that arms and ammunition would be returned unconditionally to the Merchants' Volunteer Corps, have to all appearance brought about favourable results. And the plan for a second general strike is reported to have been postponed for the time being with the result that the mid-autumn festival has been tided over apparently without any trouble.—Eastern News Agency.

ICHANG'S BEGGAR PROBLEM

Nearing Solution: Noble Efforts to Reclaim Mendicants

From Our Own Correspondent.

Ichang, Sept. 9.

At the beginning of this year the local officials made an attempt to clear the streets of male beggars. Many were a bit doubtful that any permanent good would come of the move. They expected to see them all back on the street in a short time. The scheme, however, has not failed and from that time I have rarely seen a beggar except one or two old blind men and a few women. The scheme is a very praiseworthy one. It is likely to result in a good proportion of the men becoming useful members of the community. They are taught carpentry, boot making, tailoring, etc., and quite a squad of them are scavengers on the streets.

The China Merchants S.N. Co. have been unfortunate in the extra ship which they had chartered for the run between here and Hankow. She is the Kiang Ching, and went badly ashore on her first trip up. She is manned entirely by a Chinese crew. The company is said to be going to try and dig her out and re-launch her. It will be a big job, as she is well out of the river in a paddy field, and unfortunately for her the river is falling.

According to a Peking news agency, a cable has been received in the Capital stating that the public announcement of the engagement of Miss Catherine Schurman to Dr. Gavin Miller has just been made in New York City. Miss Schurman is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Schurman of New York City and the niece of the American Minister. It was during her stay at the Legation last year that Miss Schurman met her fiancé who was a member of the staff of the Peking Union Medical College Hospital.

THE MOST PICTURESQUE MONGOL

Foreigners' Surprise Visit to Mongol Headman near Chalantung: A People Living with Nature

Confronted by a band of armed and villainous looking Mongols, just round the bend in the road and halted by a sharp guttural cry, a party of American and British tourists, riding Mongolian ponies, reined in shortly and stopped as quickly as possible. Business-like weapons were pointed at them.

The guide, a short and wiry, Russian, with fierce bristling moustache, moved forward and held overhead a blue enamel tea kettle. Exchanging guttural phrases with the chief of the Mongols, the latter made it clear that they were friends and not the well known and heartily-feared Hunghutzes, of whom every child and even the dogs are warned to beware of. The two groups then approached each other and made friends by means of the guide, who, acting as interpreter, introduced various members in a mélange of Chinese, Russian, Mongolian and a smattering of English.

The visitors, as they explained, had left the watering place of the North, Chalantun—a resort built by the Chinese Eastern Railway on the main line between Manchouli and Harbin, some 11 hours distant from the latter city—early that morning for a trip to the village where they now were. Having heard, while living in those clean and comfortable bungalows at Chalantun, of the chief's prowess, they had throught to visit him and bring him gifts.

Cigarettes given to the chief and to his various followers were cardially appreciated, and an invitation was extended to go inside his modest dwelling. He would provide hot water for preparing breakfast.

The house, one of many similar structures, held not only the chief and his family, but also several of his numerous wives, whom he brought out fondly for inspection by the visitors, while a whole flock of children, offsprings a whole various females of the establishment, cavorted and played round at his command.

The barbarian explained through the Russian guide and interpreter, that he was head of the several small villages which they could see, and held soverighty over 200 dwellers in the immediate vicinity. There was a communal life to a great extent and when meat was needed, he sent out huntsmen into the neighbouring hills or into the valley, through which flowed a crystal clear stream, and if the goddess of the chase beamed on them, they would bring back several deer or a stag, while the stream and others near by provided then plenty of fish. That day, however, visitors noticed, luck had not been with the natives, for a party of hunters returning over the hilltops failed to show anything worth while. Their collection of weapons was interesting. Of all the variety of the rifles, none of them appeared to be of a 20th century make.

The water being hot and breakfast well under way, seats were taken on the earthen floor, covered with skins. During the meal a survey of the interior was made. The inside dimensions were not more than 18 ft. by 15 ft. The roof was thatched but not without a few holes, and, while the party were eating, they could see the birds bring food to their young, who dwelt in four nests hung within and under the roof, the parents flying about the faces and shoulders of the inhabitants, displaying no fear whatever.

Vessels, of the most primitive origin, served for containers of liquids, or were used to gather the few stray vegetables. Villagers had made them by very hard labour, first selecting the proper slippery bark tree, from which the covering was carefully slipped off probably after a wetting and pounding, shaped and the skin sewed and tied round to make the whole water proof. The wash basin from which the guests washed was nothing else but a cross section of a broad tree, nicely burnt and cut out to form a receptacle. Strangest of all perhaps, was the chimney running from the ground up the wall, to a point just above the eves. This too was but a tree trunk, hollowed. For a hook to gather the long grass and straw a many-pronged fork, naturally grow and selected from an ordinary tree served very well. Two-wheeled carts, with wheels twice the diameter of those of a Peking cart really showed a few indications of a slight knowledge of mechanics. The stove within the house ran entirely round the room with the exception of the opening made by the door. Being merely an intense radiating system, clayed over and made airtight, this most necessary adjunct to the home for the long seven-months winter, formed a warm spot for all to snuggle up against during the, zero and worse, weather.

After a well enjoyed meal, a few lessons in geography and philology were exchanged by host and guests, and after he had told them of the best places to hunt and fish in the vicinity of his home and between there and Chalantun, he ascertained that several of the party had come from America. Was America a big place, was it as large as Chalantun, and had the people in America heard that he was chief of the Solons out in the wilds of Manchuria. It was carefully explained to him that the United States was much larger than all of the vicinity, larger than from Harbin to Shanghai. They were sorry, but the Americans did not know of him. Well, where were Harbin and Shanghai, why didn't the British and Americans speak a different language, he and the Russians did? Not to be confusing, further discussions along these lines were avoided, but when it came to taking a picture of the old chieftain, he was all for it but became a little jealous, when Noah, so-called by the guests because of his age and skin garments, which appeared to have grown to him, was also requested to be in the setting—perhaps Noah had been a former but now vanquished chieftain.

Having been informed that one of the party had some knowledge, of medicine, he immediately had brought forward all the sick children and other people. One of the younger was deformed and others appeared to be suffering from a form of swelling skin to goitre. Told that no medical supplies were with the party, he was then informed that good doctors could be had at Chalantun (where one is in attendance for the wants of the summer visitors) and it was suggested that he secure assistance at that place.

A gift of Chinese wine to the chief, which was then drunk from the common vessel, and with goodbyes and well-wishes said, the visitors made their way along their 20-mile ride over the mountains and through numerous valleys to headquarters—Chalantun.

MINES AND BARRICADE IN GRAND CANAL

Strong Defences Established by Both Sides to Guard the Water Ways

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kashing, Sept. 14.

A trip to the border of Kiangsu and Chêkiang at Wangkangchin (also spelt Wangchiangching and Hwankonking) was made to-day. The Colonel in command was courteous, declaring that Chêkiang would fight to the utmost any effort of Kiangsu to use the Grand Canal as a line of attack on Kashing to the railway. They have retained a number of the most efficient soldiers from Anhui, Shantung and Chihli to manipulate the field guns in position. A small fleet of steam launches, barges and police boats are ready to dash into Kiangsu or bring up reinforcements.

A small force here can check an army, as shallow lakes on either side prevent a flank movement. The nearest Kiangsu troops are at Pingmang (locally Bin-Bang) 10 miles north on the Grand Canal. Local residents say that this famous water-way has been barricaded by Kiangsu driving piles across the channel, while Chêkiang has laid mines in advance of the trenches. Small canals on either side at right angles to the main canal, with low-lying ricefields, would impede a marching army.

Chêkiang has materials at hand to block the channel against a fleet of iron-clads. Arrangements are crude, but probably effective.

BEE-KEEPING IN CHINA

Experiments in Anhui Town: Great Possibilities of Developing Industry

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Yingchowfu, An., Aug. 28.

Are the readers of "North-China Daily News" interested in bees, especially the Chinese variety? Three times within the last four years a swarm of bees has come to us. The first occasion was during the first week of October, 1920. They settled on a tree in one of the mission courtyards in Chengyangkuan and were captured by the gate keeper. They made honey enough, comb and all, after that date, to carry them through the winter; but they perished during the great flood of 1921 when for three months we were surrounded by water for miles on every side.

The second time was during the summer of 1923, when I was in an out-station. A swarm settled on a tree just over my wall and was captured by the gatekeeper. Half naked as the Chinese working man usually is in summer time, he climbed the tree, sat on the branch beside the bees, held his hat over them until they had all climbed up into it; then he came down very carefully with his hat and the bees in one hand, walked all the way round from the front gate and to the back courtyard where a Chinese bushel basket had been prepared for them. In front of this the hat was deposited and the bees speedily transferred themselves to the basket. Then a lid with three perforations, for their ingress and egress, was securely fastened on, cracks and crevices were plastered up with mud and a rain proof cover was being prepared; but the bees did not appreciate what was being done for them, and left the next day but one. They proved themselves to be very docile creatures seeing that the gatekeeper could capture them in that simple manner without being stung, for they carry daggers in their hip pockets that they know well how to use on occasion.

The Same Docility.

The third occasion was during the month of June of the present year, when a swarm settled in a Chinese date tree in the courtyard of my house in Yingchowfu, and was captured by a carpenter working on the premises at the time. The swarm was captured by the same method and housed in a similar bushel basket. The bees at once settled down to business and it was interesting of a morning to watch them tumbling over each other, going in and out, the ingoing ones being well loaded with wax material. On Sunday, August 10, they swarmed; i.e. sent out a fresh colony. It being Sunday morning a company of interested spectators was soon on the ground, all eager to help but very few apparently knowing what to do, though all knew what to say. However, the same carpenter was soon up the tree holding his hat over them and they were transferring themselves to the hat. Had there been but the one man all would have been well, but there were present the proverbial too many cooks who spoil the broth. One said spray them and another smoke them. We allowed the Chinese to attend to the matter in their own way and soon one was up the tree with a jug of water which he sprayed over them, using his mouth as a sprayer, and another was up on an adjacent roof with a bundle of dry aromatic herbs, used for smoking mosquitos, in his hand, alight, treating them with smoke. Another had constructed a sort of a brush of twigs and was trying to sweep stragglers toward the hat. With all this fussing no one was stung but an officious yard coolie who was standing down below shouting up orders to those in the tree.

But at last this nagging proved too much for even Chinese bee patience, and when most of the bees were already in the hat or festooned on its rim, they suddenly picked themselves up, as at a word of command, filled the air for a shot time, and again settled down, but this time over the wall in a neighbour's courtyard, on a timber of a mat shade. Here they were speedily captured by the neighbour in a hat, without smoking or spraying. Apparently when a man captures a swarm of bees in his own premises it belongs to him, regardless of where it may have come from. The neighbour kept this one. Throughout the whole process the same remarkable docility was displayed by the bees, in their forebearing to sting those who were annoying, or any of the spectators except the yard coolie.

Eight days later our swarm sent off a second colony. There was no skilled hand present to capture it, until, wearied no doubt with the crude efforts of amateurs, it left and went we know not where. But they displayed the same docile good temper, and left without drawing their daggers on any of those who were unskilfully trying to capture them. Thus we lost two strong colonies, the first because of too much assistance in capturing them, and the second from lack of such assistance.

Chinese Apiarists.

Bees are one of the undeveloped resources of China. Scientifically handled they are capable of adding both sweetness and profit to Chinese life and business. Present methods are crude and wasteful. Honey is cut out of the hives in the autumn after the frost numbs the bees. Many bees drop to their death with the honey and there is always a possibility of the queen being among them.

I have seen great vicissitudes in the Chinese honey industry, such as it is. There is a market town 100 li from here where before the famine of 1910-11-12 honey was sold in quantities aggregating several tons in a season, buyers coming every year hundreds of li to load up with it. During those famine years the industry was almost completely wiped out, and only during the last three years or so has it definitely recovered.

LINK BETWEEN KANSU AND THE COAST

Russian Engineer Building Motor Road from Lanchowfu to Shensi Railhead

FORM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Lanchow, Kan., Aug. 23.

One of the main items of news is that the route of the new motor-road has been planned and work begun on it. The road is to run from Lanchow through Anting and Tonquei to Tsinchow, than into Shensi, and on by Lungchow to Sianfu, where is will join the motor-road from Sianfu to the railhead at Shanchow.

The difficulties of the task are immense. Several mountains have to be negotiated, and many streams crossed. The whole route is through loess soil, and the washouts that are sure to occur will interfere greatly with the value of the road through the summer months. It is unlikely that the road will be metalled, and carters and muleteers will try to use it wherever it appears straighter or more level, than the highways whose route the new road is to follow. But we may hope that all these difficulties will be overcome, and if so, that Lanchow will come to be within easy reach of the coast within a few months time.

The work is under the capable administration of Colonel Ranchner (formerly a Colonel of Russian engineers) who will see the work done if at all possible.

The city roads are in the charge of an enterprising young Kansu officer, named Wei. It has become evident that a steam roller is needed, but who will tackle the job of bringing an engine weighing seven or eight tons to this point, still a month's journey from the railhead? Undoubtedly, the newly made streets are an improvement on the old, if only the improvement can be made permanent.

It is the birthday of the Governor in a few days time, but he has decided not to celebrate it, as the summer is so dry and hot and crops are poor. Wheat has soared to the price of Tls. 58, or about 300 per cent. the price two years ago. The opium this year was more plentifully sown than last year, but has not proved so good an investment. Prices are bad, and the "opium fine," now euphemistically known as a "land tax" presses heavily. In some places those who refuse to grow opium are compelled to pay a "lazy tax." What a thought for the perplexed Chancellors of Europe! Workmen who work are fined for making so much money: workmen who slack, are fined for not working hard enough!

THE BOLSHEVISTS OF DR. SUN

Canton, Sept. 8.

Dr. Sun Yat-sen has definitely refused to release the arms and ammunitions seized on August 11, and has delegated ex-Governor Hu Han-min and Mr. Wang Ching-wei, two leading "Bolshevists" now in Canton, to act on his behalf in the arms question, thus relieving Generals Fan She-shang and Liang Heng-chao, of the Yunnanese army, from further interest in the matter.

The compositors and printers, attached to the Canton newspaper offices, went on strike on September 8, upon failure of the publishers to agree to their demand for an increase of wage from 35 to 50 per cent. There were no Canton newspapers published on September 9.

Governor Liao Chung-hoi, on September 6, advised a delegation of Canton newspapermen to support Dr. Sun's northern expedition

It has been reported that the declaration of war by Dr. Sun's Government will be made against Peking on September 14, and that Dr. Sun himself will arrive at Shiukuan a few days earlier. Shiukuan is on the northern terminal of the Kuangtung section of the Canton-Hankow Railway.

Dr. Sun has issued an order repealing the tax on mahjongg playing in the restaurants of Canton and vicinity. Simultaneously, he has issued an order forbidding further impressment of coolies for military service.

At the call of the Kuomintang, the cadets of the military Academy of the "Red Army" at Whampoa and other communistic organizations met at the Public Garden, Canton, on September 7 and passed the following resolutions:—

"That the 1901 Protocol made between China and several other Powers after the Boxer trouble should be repealed" and

"The Northern Expedition against Peking is endorsed."

It appears from complaints heard from several factions of the Kuomintang in Canton that not all of the officials and policemen now on service are wholly in favour of Bolshevism. The Canton policemen, who were ordered by their chief on September 7 to distribute circulars attacking foreigners and merchants, did not do so of their own free will, as they afterwards told their friends.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SALE OF ARMAMENTS IN CHINA.

League of Nations Urged to Prevent Abuses.

London, Sept. 15.

The "Daily Telegraph," referring to the reported arming of the conflicting Chinese forces by different Powers with political motives comingled with commercial considerations, urges the League of Nations immediately to attend to this matter and to endeavour to seek the termination of these abuses by requesting all Governments to veto the sale of armaments in China just now.—Reuter.

AVIATION FATALITY IN KOREA

Phyongyang, Korea, Sept. 13.

Lieutenant Moriwaki and Sergeant Ebina were killed in an aeroplane accident to-day.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

ARRANGEMENTS are being made by the Peking Tram Car Co. to extend its lines from Hsichihmen to the Summer Palace, from Pochenmen to Patachu, and from Tehshengmen to Jehol. Branch lines will also be constructed as far as Nanyuan and Tunghsien. It is learned that the tram service in Peking will start at the beginning of October.

MR. SCHERER'S APPEAL

Sentence of Seven Years' Imprisonment Reduced.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Mukden, Sept. 16.

I have just been informed that the sentence on Mr. Scherer has been reduced to three years and two months. Details have not yet been published, but probably extenuating circumstances, not referred to in the first trial, have now been taken into consideration. The text of the judgment is not yet ready, but will be delivered within a few days or a week.

*Mr. E. Scherer, a German citizen, was sentenced to seven years hard labour for allegedly causing the death of a Chinese child.—Ed.

C.M.S. HOSPITAL WAR WORK

Red Cross Unit for Ishing Front: Hangchow Hospital as Base Hospital.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Hangchow, Sept. 13.

The first Red Cross Unit, numbering 23, left to-day for the Huchow (Ihing) front. The unit organized by the C.M.S. Hospital. Doctors, assistants and nurses are among the best qualified members of its staff, and it is felt that they will succeed in rendering adequate help. Dr. Duncan Main has been asked to send another unit, but whether he can do so without weakening his present forces is not yet apparent.

At present not a few refugees have sought admission to the Hospital, complaining of nervousness and "cold feet." They are for the most part being accommodated in offices and students quarters. Ample room is reserved for the civilian population and those most severely wounded at the front. The hospital is prepared to deal with 200 casualties in addition to its other work.

Appeal for Medical Stores

Once again this splendid institution is the succourer of many. Bandages, cotton wool, gauze, lint, old linen, beef-tea, condensed milk and medical supplies of all kinds, especially sheets, are urgently needed to cope with the present increased demand. If the British Women's Association appeal is over subscribed it will no doubt direct some of its overflow into interior channels. It may interest your readers to know that during the Great War the C.M.S. Hospital sent, in addition to two foreign doctors, five Chinese doctors, eight nurses, and two interpreters to France.

An inch an hour rainfall has been quite common lately: very few roofs have been rain-proof. If the weather does not clear up soon we shall have floods and further distress.

Hangchow Buoyant

The City is quiet and so are the people and they appear very hopeful.

Marshal Lu was quite well pleased with his visit to the front. He will probably soon be paying a visit to the Huchow front to encourage his men who all seem to be loyal and keen in spite of the weather. If the last few days have not damped their ardour I am sure nothing will.

Mr. H. F. Handley Derry, H.M. Consulate Ningpo, left yesterday for Ningpo by way of Shanghai.

TOKYO'S MAYORALTY

Tokyo, Sept. 16.

Mr. Junnosuke Inouye, ex-Governor of the Bank of Japan and former Finance Minister, is the final choice of the Tokyo Municipal Assembly for the mayoralty. Formal offer of the post will be made to Mr. Inouye to-day.

The vacancy has been caused by the resignation of Mr. Nagata following rejection by the Assembly on September 5 of a candidate recommended by him for the post of Director of the Electricity Bureau. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

Tokyo, Sept. 17.

Mr. Junnosuke Inouye has to-day declined the mayoralty of Tokyo.

DR. SUN'S NORTHERN EXPEDITION

Confession of Wrong-doing by Kuomintang to Conciliate the Cantonese

Shameen, Sept. 13.

Dr. Sun Yat-sen left at 10 this morning, accompanied by his wife, in an armoured train with over a thousand troops. He will remain in Shaokuan for a week or 10 days, after which time he will move between Canton and Shaokuan until the mobilization is complete.

Dr. Sun Yat-sen in a manifesto admits that Kuangtung under the Kuangtung to co-operate with the agreeable taxes and the oppression of disorderly, unthinking generals and unscrupulous officials, who have been enriching themselves under the pretext of raising money for the Government.

They have rendered the people's lives and property unsafe, the manifesto goes on to say, and therefore the merchants, especially, gradually lost faith in the revolutionary Government. The course of action adopted by the revolution is unsound, and is clearly due to the indifference of the people towards national affairs. He calls on the people of Kuangtung to cooperate with the revolutionary government, and promises the following:—(1) to despatch various troops northward as soon as possible. (2) To reorganize the Canton Municipality for self-government, the people to elect a new mayor. (3) All miscellaneous taxes to be cancelled, and taxation to be decided and regulated by the newly elected officials.

It is reliably reported that Mr. Sun Fo, the son of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, will soon leave on a mission to Mukden.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Canton, Sept. 15.

The discussion continues as to the necessity for the Canton Government effecting a thorough understanding with Gen. Chen Chiung-ming.

The mission of Tan Mo-hsin and Shih Ching-yang, who recently visited here, is apparently to establish an offensive and defensive alliance between Gen. Tang Chi-yao of Yunnan and Dr. Sun Yat-sen in conformity with the former's will, so that the troops under the command of Dr. Sun and Gen. Tang may be enabled to advance toward the subjugation of the Chihli faction. On the other hand, the delegates of Gen. Tang appear to be busily engaged in an effort to bring about peace between Gen. Chen Chiung-ming and Dr. Sun Yat-sen with a view to inducing Gen. Chen to invade Fukien at this juncture.

Interviewed to-day by a representative of the Eastern News Agency, Mr. Shih Ching-yang stated that Dr. Sun having already agreed to Gen. Tang's proposal to come to terms with Gen. Chen Chiung-ming, an agreement had been concluded between Dr. Sun and General Tang and that Mr. Tan Mo-hsin was on his way to Haifeng to meet Gen. Chen. Mr. Shih expressed the belief that a compromise between Dr. Sun and Gen. Chen was possible and emphasized the fact that a golden opportunity had arrived for all the provinces in the south-west, including Yunnan, Kuangtung, Kueichow, and Szechuan, to dash forward towards their common goal, viz., the overthrow of the Chihli faction.

Later.

The troops under the command of Gen. Chu Pei-teh left here for Shaokuan yesterday morning and four brigades of the Honan troops under the command of Gen. Fan Chung-shiu also left for the same destination this morning.—Eastern News Agency.

NEGOTIATIONS for the purchase of Russian oils have been in progress between the Nippon Sekiyu (Petroleum) Kaisha and the Soviet authorities in Vladivostok (says the "Japan Chronicle"). In the matter of prices the negotiations have, however, come to a deadlock, and as the Russian side has to wait for the instructions of the Moscow Government on each occasion, no noticeable progress towards an amicable settlement is anticipated. Several days ago the company despatched one of its staff to Moscow to open direct negotiations with the Government there.

FROM MIENCHOW TO BEHLUTING

A Pleasant Holiday Trip through Interesting Country

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Mienchow, Sze., Aug. 23.

Not long ago our family went for a holiday, and an account of our journey may be of interest. Mienchow to Behluting is four long days away, but we did it in five. On the first day we stayed at Lokiang, 90 li away. Here the C.M.S. has an outstation.

Who does not know that pleasant feeling of freedom that comes over one as one leaves the cares of work behind and takes to the road? Making for the southwest we soon pass the temple of the Eastern Peak (Tong Yuh Miao). For a time we pass along a now rarely used road, the remains of the road which went to the city when it stood farther northwest. Part of that road may still be seen on the river bed. Beautiful canals almost like rivers abound. The rice looks green and fresh, and here and there a path with winding witchery lures one up and away to where the "good folk" hide. I am no geologist, but a little observation reveals what a good time a geologist might have studying the mixed formation of the higher ground that follows us on our left until, at last unable to escape, we are compelled to ascend it after leaving Tsao-kopu.

This place, which was full of soldiers, is 30 li from Mienchow, and a long 30 li on is Kinshanpu; the country between is hilly and rather wild in places, but a fair amount is under cultivation. Here also a large company of the tenth division were in charge for the Boxers, as I said in an earlier letter, were very bad a few weeks ago. The contrast between this market and its pre-Republican neatness and prosperity is very marked. But Kinshanpu was ever wild; even in Manchu days bandits would occasionally break out. We pass on from here to do our last 30 li to Lokiang. The country is a curious mixture of tilled land and virgin wild, so wild that it refuses to be tamed. There are two good specimens of the water-wheel on this road, the larger having a radius of from 15 to 20 feet.

From Lokiang to Mienchu is regarded as 70 li, except by chairmen, who are generally paid for 75, as the road is hilly for the first 25 li from Lokiang. This part of the road is very beautiful. After a walk of 30 li we reach Lioh Pin, a market much more dead than alive as far as business goes. The only thing the people seem to do is to gamble. The next 40 li is a long flat weary stretch that on a hot day is only to be endured. The surrounding country, however, is well cultivated for we are now at the northeast corner of the great Chêngtu plain. On this stretch, 25 li from Mienchu, is Long-hsin-ch'iao-chang, to give the market its full name as set up over the gate. Rice and tobacco grow here in large quantities. In the background to the north and west are the mountains stretching tier above tier in serried outline to the "Roof of the World"!

Mienchu, which must be carefully distinguished from Mienchow, is a large commercial centre sometimes called "Little Chêngtu" on account of its business. Under the Manchus it was part of the Mienchow Department. It is now chiefly noted for bandits, and has been held successively by soldiers and brigands for the last 10 years. There is an abundance of wealth there, but the times do not allow of its exploitation.

I was very interested to see on a temple wall about 10 li from the city a large poster of Yang Sen. It was in ordinary colloquial and could be read by a school-boy of four years standing.

The large hospital which Dr. Lechler is developing there under the C.M.S. is becoming a boon to the people.

From Mienchu to Shihfang is 50 li. This is an ancient city figuring in Three Kingdom Period history, and is south of Mienchu. The country is productive, but is at present feeling the drought. There are the usual uninteresting markets between it and Mienchu. There were of course the usual quantities of soldiers; China's idea of keeping peace. Continuing our journey southwards from Shihfang we reach after a distance of 70 li the city of Penhsien.

This road is even duller, and we are very glad to be quit of it. After Penhsien we strike across more west to Behluting. This road is much more interesting because it becomes more mountainous, and also because the large trade in lumber adds to the population. Here we come into the region of hills and valleys and boulder bestrewn rivers make the air sound with their music.

At the foot of the hills is a glass factory where you can buy fairly respectable table-glasses; there is also a large pottery in the district. Behluting, White Hare Mountain, is a West China holiday resort which has been developed by the foreign community of Chêngtu.

HEAT WAVE IN HONGKONG

Record Shade Temperatures for September: Three European Deaths

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Hongkong, Sept. 10.

Within a few days of my writing to you last month about the abnormally rainy weather here, there came a change, which was at first considered a welcome one, but has since become far more of a curse than a blessing.

To say that we are now praying for rain would not be an exaggeration, and a typhoon would be positively welcomed as a means of bringing a fall in the temperature. Everyone hoped that September would see the end of the really hot weather, but actually the beginning of this month ushered in the worst heat spell of the year, aggravated by days and nights when there has not been a breath of air stirring. Naturally, even the most robust of us are feeling the effects of this abnormal weather, and already three European deaths here can be put down to the very trying heat.

Last Saturday afternoon, a master mariner of some years standing on the China Coast passed away under tragic circumstances. He was Capt. W. Ross, who had latterly commanded vessels on the West River. Capt. Ross was observed to be in a state of collapse outside the Post Office, and was assisted indoors, where he muttered something about feeling the heat, and passed away soon afterwards. He was engaged in writing a book on his interesting experiences of sea life.

Death follows Chinese Dinner.

On Sunday morning, Mr. B. S. Corke, who had only been admitted to practise as a solicitor in the local courts as recently as last May, was found dead in bed, the cause of death being heart failure. He had attended the Magistracy the previous day, and had been to a Chinese dinner the same night. He returned in the early hours of Sunday morning, complaining of feeling unwell and died within the next few hours.

The third death from heart failure was that of Mr. D. Lewis, who had for some years been an employee of the Naval Yard. Feeling unwell during the week-end, he passed away on Monday afternoon, quite suddenly.

Temperature Records.

The local Observatory announces that the temperatures for the past week have been records for the month. On the 7th the shade reading was 93.2 Fahrenheit, which compares with the previous absolute maxima of 94 on September 6, 1895, and 93.9 on September 17, 1892.

The minimum reading two nights ago was recorded by the Observatory as 84.3, the highest on record for a Hongkong September. However, thermometers in many bedrooms in the Colony, at sea level, can easily beat that, and have been recording minimum readings as high as 86. Even on the Peak, bedroom temperatures have been recorded in the wee sma' 'oors as high as 82.

Soaking in the sea for whole afternoons has been the order, but even that has lost some of its attractiveness owing to the water being so warm. One effect of the heat has been a succession of glorious sunsets—glorious to those who can find enough energy to admire them.

KOREAN MASSACRE FORGOTTEN

Utter Absence of Official Sympathy for Koreans Murdered in Earthquake

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Tokyo, Sept. 3.

Immediately following the attempt on the life of Gen. Fukuda, who, it is thought, gave the orders to kill off every Socialist a year ago, the police drag net was thrown over the entire capital, for fear of a widespread plot existing. All the Socialist and Labour leaders were clapped behind prison walls. Citizens also grew alarmed and all night bands of members of Young Men's Associations kept watch, a grim remainder of earthquake days, when these very young men, organizing themselves into what was then known as Vigiliantes, murdered everyone who was an object of suspicion, chiefly Koreans, Chinese and Japanese labourers.

Although there have been elaborate outward manifestations of grief for Japan's "Day of Mourning"—as the anniversary of the earthquake has been dubbed—such as the wailing of syrens, the booming of temple bells, the burning of incense in various parts of the city and the lighting of torches on the rivers, not one word or deed has been performed to express regret for the shocking murder of Koreans. A subject people, perhaps, does not need tears or regrets, much less does it need compensation. A weak nation or a subject people cannot demand these, and, according to the view of officialdom, there's an end of the matter.

The people, however, seem to be thoroughly ashamed of the blame they must shoulder for responsibility in these killings, and it has been heartening to find two large metropolitan papers demanding that some amends be made.

Nothing of the sort, however, has been publicly done. Rachel is still mourning for her children and has neither been comforted nor compensated.

CLEARING UP KALGAN

Good Work by Local Authorities in Repairing Flood Damage: Reconstruction Plans

Peking, Sept. 9.

Straightening out the flood channel to the west of the Wu Ting Ho to carry the mountain torrents from the northwest directly into the main river below the city is one of the measures recommended to prevent a repetition of the disastrous flood of July 13 in Kalgan by Mr. O. J. Todd, engineer of the China International Famine Relief Commission.

Mr. Todd in his report to the Commission also recommended that the old stone bridge be replaced by a steel structure of two spans of 80 feet each, in order not to restrict the flow of any possible flood waters. A wall built from the east end of the bridge on the left bank of the river would also straighten the channel through the city.

On his recent inspection trip to Kalgan, Mr. Todd found that the Taoyin was doing splendid work with his soldiers and police in clearing up the débris and removing the sand and silt from the city streets. In some places this was eight or ten feet deep. An additional freshet on August 1 had carried boulders estimated to weigh 1,000 lb. one or two miles down from the foot hills into the main streets of the city.

So frequent are floods that in certain neighbourhoods the merchants keep on hand special planks, well fitted together to make a water tight compartment four feet high in front of their shops. They hold themselves ready at all times to put up these barricades and reinforce them with sand bags to save their stocks.

Mr. Todd confirms previous reports of the great loss of life and millions of property damage caused by the flood there this summer when the river suddenly broke through the dyke and swept over a flat area inhabited by about 5,000 people living in mud huts. It is estimated that 3,000 of these people were drowned or buried in the débris of their own houses. The old stone bridge served as a dam to the flood waters due to the silting up of the channel and the large proportion of space taken up by the piers and masonry work forming the arches.

The Commission sent $4,000 worth of grain to Kalgan. From among the refugees, 200 heads of families were recruited to do work in repairing the damage to the streets of the city. But the local authorities have handled the situation so well, bringing the military to the work of reconstruction, that the Commission at present are carrying on no further relief work there.

Mr. Todd's chief recommendation in regard to the situation in the Paotingfu region would be the granting of further funds on the part of the provincial government for the upkeep of the dykes. Chihli has appropriated $500 yearly for the upkeep of some 250 li of dykes in this region. Each district has raised further funds and contributed labour, but the provisions have been inadequate.

It was felt at the time of Mr. Todd's inspection trip that it would be necessary to make further investigations in late September or early October in order to ascertain what portion of the population would be able to return to their farms this year and what portion of the remaining population would be available for construction work. —China International Famine Relief Committee.

THE FLOODS IN CHINA

Latest Scheme for Aiding Provinces: $40,000 Loan for Hunan

Peking, Sept. 11.

The China International Famine Relief Commission has decided to grant a loan of $40,000 to the Hunan Committee of the Commission. The money is to be loaned out by the Hunan Committee to districts most seriously affected by the floods, about 20 in number, for the purchase of seed rice.

The loans to the hsien are to be guaranteed by the Provincial Assembly, the Hunan Chamber of Commerce and the Public Property Custodians of the various districts. The latter are officials elected by the people as trustees for all public property, such as the endowments of temples and the old examination halls. These endowments consist of fields and pawnshops for the most part, which properties thus become securities for the loans.

If this method of loan and guarantee works out satisfactorily, the scheme will be largely extended. The Hunan Committee has already asked for $200,000 on this basis.—China International Famine Relief Commission.

SEVERE TYPHOON IN SOUTH JAPAN

Serious Damage to Railways and Communications

Osaka, Sept. 12

A typhoon swept the south of Japan early this morning. The telegraphs and telephones between Nagasaki and Osaka were interrupted, but have now been partially restored. A third-class express was derailed near Hiroshima owing to a landslide caused by the heavy rains. Nine persons were killed and many injured. There was no serious damage to shipping.

The typhoon is now passing away.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

A WORLD IN ARMS

Tokyo, Sept. 14.

"Militarism, as well as a desire to consummate the national defence, characterize the nations of the world, and America pre-eminently so, in spite of the efforts of the League of Nations to inaugurate an era of peace," is the observation attributed in this morning's papers to General Wada, the head of the Imperial Japanese Military Mission which has just returned from America. General Wada urges the Japanese nation to face the problem of defence with greater seriousness, rather than be deluded by false and untimely ideas of peace.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

WUCHANG'S QUARREL WITH PEKING

Another Delegation Going North to Press for Educational Funds

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wuchang, Sept. 9

The teachers of Wuchang and the Hupeh provincial schools are still endeavouring to find some means of compelling the Government to pay up the large sum of arrears which is due for educational purposes from the taxes on rice and salt transported by the Hankow-Canton Railway in Hupeh.

Last Wednesday a big meeting was held in the hall of the Education Union, at which more than 150 were present. The whole affair was discussed, and it was decided to petition the Governor for assistance in the matter. Three requests were made, viz., that the whole body of teachers should be given free passes on the railway in order that they might proceed to Peking en masse; that the Governor would himself telegraph the Central Government asking them to give instructions to the Board of Communications to receive the delegation; third, that for the present the taxes raised in Hupeh by the Salt Bureau shall be detained locally. The answer to these requests was probably not all that the teachers desired. In the first place, Governor Hsiao suggested that, instead of the whole body of teachers proceeding to Peking, it would be better to select 10 representatives, the same as the number previously sent who received such insulting treatment. In answer to the second, the reply was that the yamên is already in telegraphic communication with the Board of Communications about the affair. The third was delayed for further consideration.

However, the teachers had to put the best face they could on the matter and proceeded to choose their 10 representatives. Two were chosen from each of the five associations which are united in this struggle, the five being the Provincial Educational Association, the Teachers' Union, the Schools Deliberative Association, the Private Schools' Union and the Primary Schools' Union.

The 10 delegates left for the north on Friday, their expenses being advanced out of the Lecture Fund for the coming winter. Their object is to secure the release of the former delegates, several of whom are still detained in Peking, to bring condign punishment upon Mr. Wu, the President of the Board of Communications, and his assistant, Mr. Li. They have vowed to sacrifice everything in the pursuit of this aim and not to return to Hupeh until it has been accomplished.

The outbreak of war in East China has led to many rumours. Fears have been abroad that all troops stationed in this province will be drafted down river, leaving Hupeh defenceless against the gangs of robbers. It is true that troops have been drafted from Wuchang, Wusih, Macheng, Lotien and other places where there are garrisons. But Governor Hsiao has issued a proclamation, promising that enough soldiers will be left in all places to secure the people against the brigands.

Coolies Protest against 'Buses

The motor-road from Hankow to Tsaitien up the Han River is now completed. A company is proposing to run a service of motor charabancs. The motors will start from the Ta Chih Men railway terminus, and run along the Peking Road at the back of the concessions and the Chinese Maloo to the bank of the Han. As this is the main route for ricshas in Hankow, the ricsha pullers are complaining that their living will be taken away. There are more than 1,000 ricshas plying along this route, and each of them is taken in four shifts per day and sometimes also a night shift. Consequently, it is estimated that over 5,000 men are affected. Their association has issued a proclamation, stating that many thousand families will be in danger of starvation of the new motor-buses are allowed to run between Ta Chih Men Station and Chiaokén, the north end of Hankow native city. The men say that if the 'buses run over their route, they will lay their own bodies on the road and be run over.

Silver.

The price came yesterday at 34⅞d. ready and forward, against 34 1/16d. ready and forward a week ago, the lowest point touched during the week being 34⅞d., ready and forward, last Saturday. India and China are reported to have both bought and sold. The Continent was also a buyer.

Bars in stock 2,622, including silver Yen 10 lakhs. Stocks of Sycee and Dollars amount to Tls. 394 lakhs and $439 lakhs, against Tls. 401½ lakhs and $445 lakhs last week and Tls. 224½ lakhs and $318½ lakhs on September 18, 1923.

Exchange.

Exchange left off last week with the official quotation for T.T. at 3/4½d. The highest point touched for interbank business during the week was T.T. 3/5⅛d. The market opened yesterday morning with banks selling T.T. 3/4 1/16d. and G.$76¼ to December. Speculators buying and a fairly heavy merchant demand caused rates to decline steadily. In the afternoon the official rate was dropped to T.T. 3/4⅛d., and at the close nothing better than 3/4⅛d. was obtainable, the market closing weak.

THE SILVER MARKET

Depression Caused by China's Heavy Sales: Sterling Dominating the Situation

Reporting from London on August 13, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

The market has been depressed by a considerable amount of selling on the part of China and of stale bulls. Without doubt the recent marked improvement in the value of sterling has strongly conduced to this result, though the movements of the price of silver may not have coincided day by day with the fluctuations of the U. S. exchange. The relation between gold and silver is of such great interest to speculators in China that no powerful movements in the gold value of the sterling exchange can occur without some repercussion in the business centres of the Far East. Hence it may be gathered that, for the time being, the sterling exchange with the United States dominates the silver market. To-day, the strong reaction of the U. S. exchange turned the market from sellers to buyers and the price rose from 33 13/16d. for cash delivery yesterday (the lowest quotation for that position since May 17 last) to 34 1/16d. The Continent has been the chief support during the week.

Apart from the vagaries of exchange the market appears to be inherently sound, as demand for the Far East promises to be good and competition is likely to arise from Continental Mints. Further, the bear account has now become very substantial.

The silver quotations to-day for cash and two months' delivery are respectively ⅛d. and 1/16d. below those fixed a week ago.

Holders Nervous.

In their London report of August 14 Messrs. Mocatta & Goldsmid state:—

Largely owing to the marked improvement in the value of sterling exchange on New York, the price of silver has declined rather rapidly during the past week and 33 13/16d. was reached on the 12th inst., against 34⅜d. a week ago. This rise in the exchange made several holders of silver nervous and there has been a good deal of reselling by bulls, in addition to sales by China and America, against which the Continent has been practically the only buyer. Yesterday, on Indian and China bears covering, there was a recovery to 34 1/16d., but this has not been maintained and the quotation to-day is not higher than 33 15/16d. So long as there is so much uncertainty with regard to the American exchange, we cannot look for much steadiness in the silver market, but with the continuance of Continental orders the undertone remains good and should there be any demand from India or China we think higher prices would be seen.

THE GOLD MARKET

Reporting from London on August 13, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

The Bank of England gold reserve against its note issue on the 6th instant amounted to £126,488,250, as compared with £126,487,985 on the previous Wednesday.

India is taking a good proportion of the supplies offering this week (about £700,000), and there is also some demand on the part of the Continent. The heavy fall in the price of gold owing to the improvement of the sterling exchange with America has led to a very substantial demand by India recently, both for shipment from Durban and London. Within a few weeks, about two and three quarter million pounds worth has been shipped and engaged for shipment from Durban, as well as about a million pounds from London. The Government of India has announced that £12,520,000 has been remitted to the Secretary of State for India from April 1 to July 31. Purchases of sterling in India amounted to £11,820,000, and sterling taken over by the Secretary of State in London to £700,000.

The Transvaal gold output for July is returned as 829,437 fine ounces, which compares with 773,053 fine ounces for June and 754,306 fine ounces for July, 1923, and is the second highest monthly total produced. The record high monthly output was that for March, 1912, namely 830,723 fine ounces. The output for May last —809,003 fine ounces—was the only other occasion when an amount over 800,000 fine ounces recorded.

CHINA RAILWAY EARNINGS

The earnings of the Chinese Government railways from January 1 until April 10 of the present year are shown below. Compared with the same period for last year, the results indicate that healthy increases have taken place in the earnings of most of the lines. The Canton-Kowloon line, which is one of the shortest, shows a great deficit, but the amounts are comparatively small. The greatest increases are on the Peking-Hankow, 51 per cent; the Peking-Mukden, 6 per cent; the Tientsin-Pukow, 25 per cent; and the Peking-Suiyuan, 17 per cent. The Lunghai Railway also shows a remarkable increase in view of the new territory which is being opened up.

HOW WAR IS HITTEN BUSINESS

China's Complicated Financial System Weakened by Republic and Blocked by War

BY GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY.

The unfavourable economic situation in the provinces of Central China, from Shanghai to Hankow is only aggravated by the present war. Ready money has not been available for commerce for some time past, since the financial fabric of the country has been unsound Shanghai is not always affected by conditions in interior China, because it is the repository for whatever liquid capital there is in the country and therefore does not always suffer from the same ills as affect interior points dependent entirely upon visible resources. Shanghai's profits often come from such invisible resources as insurance, brokerage, unearned increment on real estate, speculative investments, etc. In the interior, profits arise out of direct trade transaction, the returns on invisible resources usually finding their way out of the interior cities to the head offices, the centres of capital investment in Shanghai. This holds good with Chinese as well as foreign enterprise.

Reckless Finances.

The balance of trade has been against China. In 1922, the unfavourable balance was Hk. Tls. 290,157,000; in 1923, Hk. Taels 170,486,000. This unfavourable balance, the Government has done nothing to meet. In the past, the Chinese Government met its own needs and deficits by loans of huge sums, which almost in every case were dissipated without in any way being used to better the economic situation of the country. In addition to the unfavourable balance the country is faced with a debt of $304,409,592 for secured domestic loans and $992,684,575 for secured foreign obligations, and its normal revenues have been used, either as securities for indemnities or have been hypothecated for loans. The result is that what might be called the fixed capital of the nation is diminished to a point of economic instability.

No New Capital.

One method of handling such a situation would be to produce new capital, that is to develop the natural resources of the country, its mines, its waterways, its hydraulic power, its forests, agriculture, etc. China has made no serious effort to meet this situation. Practically nothing of importance has been done along these lines, since the founding of the Republic, although much has been planned and discussed. The few mines opened and improved by Chinese and foreigners have not even scratched the surface of possibilities and the effects of scientific farming and forestry are not yet visible. The result is that China's real wealth, that is, her natural resources, have not been mobilized to meet this untoward financial situation.

A Central Bank.

In most countries, a great impetus to trade in that it supplies ample liquid capital, is the depositing of government revenues in central banking institutions. The Bank of England, for instance, is a bank of deposit for the British government and its control of liquid capital stabilizes British financial operations. The Federal Reserve Bank in the United States serves the same end, although its methods are different. The Bank of England, on one hand, accepts government deposits and issues notes, while on the other hand, it discounts other banks' papers and in moments of crisis, it raises the interest rate and conserves the country's gold reserve to avoid a general panic. It is a banker's bank.

In China there is no such bank. The two government banks do not perform the functions for which they were designed. What might be termed a genuine government bank of deposit is altogther another institution, to which we need not refer in this article. Most of the revenue of the Chinese Government, however, is not available for deposits in a central bank, were there such a bank. Much of it goes into the payment of indemnities and loan services secured by the Customs and Salt revenues, and railway receipts. The land tax and likin, not being paid into the central treasury but witheld by militarists, are dissipated in such wars as the present one.

Shanghai's Position.

The country then is dependent upon Shanghai for its loose capital, which is distributed through an exceedingly complicated banking system, involving foreign banks, modern Chinese banks and old-fashioned native banks. The operations of all these banks, their inter-relationships, the method of transfer of money and the security behind each transaction cannot be discussed in this article, the purpose of which is to show how the war has affected the financial situation in Central China.

What is true of Hankow is largely true of other cities of Central China although to a smaller degree. Hankow is the distributing centre for products from Szechuan, Honan, Hupeh, Hunan and Shensi. It is not a city of deposits, the clients of the banks using the banks rather for the movements of crops than for running accounts. The native banks obtain their funds principally from Shanghai banks of various types and therefore the interest rate at Hankow is usually higher than it is at Shanghai. As soon as the Shanghai banks saw the war coming, they called in as much money as they could, thus saving the Shanghai market and preventing a panic from following the collapse of a few native banks. The call for funds left the native banks of places like Hankow without ready funds.

Panic Avoided.

These banks were unable to cover these withdrawals by calling in their own loans to merchants, for to do that would unsettle the Hankow market, throw large and important firms into bankruptcy and result in a general panic. They therefore stopped doing new business, did the best they could with their outstanding obligations and appealed to the foreign and modern Chinese banks to tide them over in the interests of trade. The appeal was to some extent successful, although there could be no encouragement for new transactions, since that would be dangerous in the circumstance.

An illustration of the difficulties arising from the inability of native banks to assist Chinese firms appears in the of unwillingness of compradores and other guarantors to guarantee accounts. No one can foretell what is liable to happen in even a short period during war time. This is one of the explanations for the closing down of various piece goods auctions. It is impossible to find a guarantee for accounts, and with an inadequate judicial system in China, the only basis for credit is the guarantor, whose word is acceptable, often because behind that word is a substantial cash securety, such as a compradore's deposit.

Provincial Funds.

To complicate the matter further, the various provincial governments interested in the war have been taking funds from native banks, chambers of commerce and guilds, for war purposes. Soldiers have to be paid in cash. As a rule, these armies are without budgets, each general receiving certain sums for his men, uniforms, food, etc. Provincial funds, municipal funds, taxes, etc. have all been taken from the banks in cash and have been made available for military purposes. This leaves the native banks still further denuded of liquid assets, although the amount thus withdrawn is probably not very large.

If War Continues.

If the war ends speedily, this situation will rapidly adjust itself, the Shanghai banks sending deposits to the native banks in the other cities. But should the war be prolonged, the problem will indeed become a difficult one. The crops will be brought in, that is, those not ruined by the war, and the native banks will be unable to finance the movement of those crops. Even should customers be found willing to purchase the produce, the Shanghai banks would be wary about sending out sycee to cover goods in interior places. With the war affecting the important distributing points, Shanghai, Hankow and Tientsin, so closely and with the principal arteries for transportation closed to commerce, as the Shanghai-Nanking Railway, the Tientsin Pukow Railway, the Kinhan Railway and the Lunghai Railway are now, and as the whole Yangtze will be shortly, business may have to stand still and wait for peace.

COMPANY MEETING

CATHAY TRUST, LIMITED

A special general meeting of shareholders in the Cathay Trust, Ld., was held at the offices of Messrs. Lowe, Bingham & Matthews, No. 7 Peking Road, on Monday afternoon, to receive the liquidators' statement and final accounts.

Mr. Eric M. Ross presided, and 73,865 shares were represented. The Chairman said that the meeting had been called in accordance with the Companies Ordinances. The liquidator's statement and final accounts, which had been in the hands of shareholders for some weeks, showed how the winding up had been conducted and the property of the Company disposed of. He would be pleased to answer any questions with reference thereto.

No questions were asked and the accounts were formally passed.

A further resolution was passed to the effect that: The liquidators be empowered to destroy all books and documents of the Company on the expiry of six months from the date of this meeting.

CLUB AND SOCIETIES

SHANGHAI FOOTBALL ASSOCIATION

The Annual Meeting

The annual meeting of the Shanghai Football Association was held in the Cathedral School on Thursday. Mr. R. Grimshaw took the chair. At the commencement of the meeting the chairman read a letter from Mr. John Prentice in which the latter apologized for his absence from the meeting owing to the condition of his eyesight. The Chairman wished Mr. Prentice a speedy recovery. The minutes of the previous year, it was then agreed, should be taken as read. The report of the previous year and the financial statement were also approved and the meeting then went on to consider the question of office bearers.

The chairman said that he had great pleasure in proposing Mr. John Prentice as president. This was seconded by Mr. F. S. Bridges, and the proposal was carried unanimously. With regard to the vice-president the Chairman stated that Mr. W. S. Campbell did not care to stand owing to his absence. Proposed for vice-presidency were the chairman, Brother Faust and Mr. Billings. The first two were elected.

Secretary's Heavy Work.

The chairman then commented on the tremendous amount of work involved in the office of the secretaryship. Mr. Bridges desired to give it up, but he did not think he would. He proposed that Mr. Bridges carry out the office for another 12 months. The secretary then stated that he had on mature consideration found he was constrained to give up office, partly on account of his business duties. He also went on to say that it was not so much the amount of work involved, the continual worry of telephone calls, etc., that made things difficult, but the lack of support from the individual clubs. He did not have the backing that he should. He asked the representatives of the separate clubs to support him in the question of replying to circulars, and the sending of fees. It was also proposed and agreed that the secretary should have a paid assistant. Mr. N. J. Hughes was then elected treasurer. Mr. Bridges finally agreed to remain in office.

As councillors were elected Messrs. Crookdake, Barnes and Billings.

The Private Ground.

With regard to the question of the private ground the secretary said the question had been taken up last year, but it had not got any further. The original suggestion was that of a minimum gate post charge. The chairman stated that this matter should be referred to the council. It was also pointed out that the new ground would permit play with Chinese teams. It would also enable them to have Chinese spectators and this would be a considerable source of revenue.

With regard to the proposal as to whether Chinese teams should be admitted to the League or the cup competitions, it was pointed out by the secretary that there was no rule against this. The difficulty had previously always been that they were not admitted to the ground. The consideration of the passing of the proposed rules to govern the School Football League met with general approval.

National Qualifications.

A proposal was made by Mr. A. H. Leslie seconded by Mr. N. J. Leslie that the Association rule No. 12 be deleted and that the following be substituted.—"in the International match the qualification to be by parentage and in the case where a player is born outside his native country he may, with the approval of the Association, play for the country in which he was born." This motion after much discussion was rejected.

A further proposal made by Mr. N. J. Hughes and seconded by Mr. A. H. Leslie was that the following additional rule be inserted as Rule No 10.—"That the winning club in the Second Division may be promoted to the First Division for the following season, and that this promotion may at the discretion of the Association be compulsory. This motion was carried.

With regard to the question of referees which had been reserved to the latter part of the meeting it was proposed by the secretary to call a meeting of all referees in Shanghai. This was carried unanimously. The meeting then closed. z

JEWISH RECREATION CLUB

The annual meeting of the above club was held on Tuesday, at the premises of the Shanghai Jewish Ahduth (by kind permission of the committee), with Mr. C. Fuxman as chairman.

After the report and accounts for the past year had been passed, it was decided to enter a team in the football Second League, although the club's position was last but one last season, as the team will be strengthened by several new members. Special efforts will be made to interest the members in various games, and football training is to commence within the next few days.

The following officers were elected:—Captain, C. Fuxman; vice-captain, A. S. Grimpel; hon. treasurer, D. Abraham; hon. secretaries, S. Feldman and H. Whitgob; committee, M. Chaikin and L. Feingold.

It is requested that all communications in connexion with the club be addressed to Mr. S. Feldman, c/o American Milk Products Corporation, 418 Glen Line Building.

A number of foreign women have been set upon by ricsha and donkey coolies at Peitaiho for refusing to pay more than the legal fare. The coolies ignore the official police tariff. It has been found that even when they have been paid considerably in excess of the legal fare, they adopt violent tactics towards foreign ladies who happen to be unaccompanied by a male escort. The worst instances of this extortion occur at hours preceding the departure of trains, says the "Peitaiho Post." Knowing the foreigners desire to be on time at the railway station, coolies calculate that they will be easy victims. Sometimes the latter cannot get a ricsha unless they first agree to pay 80 cents, which is 50 cents more than the official charge.

COMMENTING on the appointment of Mr. Edgar A. Bancroft as American Ambassador to Japan, the "New York Times" says: "While Mr. Bancroft has never held public office, he has been interested and active in public affairs. He recently gave notable service as Chairman of the Chicago Race Commission, consisting of six whites and six negroes, appointed by Governor Lowden to investigate the Chicago race riot. The report is an authoritative work on race prejudice and race relations. Perhaps it was this exhaustive study, which he directed, that recommended him, aside from his high personal qualifications, for an Ambassadorship in which a man is needed who will deal sympathetically with a people as different from ours as the East is from the West, and yet will do so with a clear comprehension of the problems involved."

SHANGHAI NEWS

FOREIGN RESIDENTS OF WOOSUNG

Appeal to Consular Body for Leave to Travel on Shanghai Road

The following letter has been sent to the British Consulate in Shanghai by the British population at Woosung:—

The under-signed Englishmen residing at Woosung Forts have the honour to appeal to you for protection in the following circumstances.

We are all respectable business and professional men going about our duties in a proper and legal manner and residing in a treaty port.

Three of us own small two-seater motor cars which we use to assist us in doing our various duties conveying us to and from Shanghai and also bringing back the necessary stores in food for our existence; the use of our cars is now made of much more importance to us owing to the dis-organized traffic of the Railway caused by the military interference with the service and if we go up by train we never know when we will get back so you will no doubt see how important it is to have a clear right of way to Woosung Forts.

On Saturday all motor cars proceeding to Woosung Forts were held up and the passengers compelled to walk the 2 or 3 miles to Woosung Forts; no restriction is made on cars proceeding from here to Shanghai. Police inform us they are acting on authority from Shanghai. Why hold up a poor inanimate thing like a motor car.

The passenger trains bring their passengers to Woosung Forts, they are not compelled to walk the distance, then why hold up other means of conveyance? the restriction appears to the writers to be very childish and absurd, One of the signatories has to bring ice and food for his guests at the Hotel and suffers probably more than any of us, as it prevents other guests visting his Hotel,which is his living. Others of us have to get to our offices at proper hours which we are not certain of doing except by our own cars and as they do not quit office till about 5 p.m. there is no other means of getting home except their cars as the last passenger train leaves Shanghai about 4 p.m. We will esteem it a great favour if you can get us passes for the three cars apologizing for having to trouble in this matter, but it is of such importance to us and does not inflict any disorganization of military or other schemes, is our only excuse for asking your official assistance.

HONGKONG & SHANGHAI BANK AND THE WAR

Rumour of Loan to Chinese Government Refuted.

Mr. K. S. Zee, secretary of the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce, sends us the following letter. It will be remembered that the Chamber had written to the Bank to inquire into the truth of the rumour—in point of fact unfounded—that it was making a loan to the Chinese Government for the financing of the present war.

The Chairman,
General Chamber of Commerce of Shanghai.

SIR,—I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter dated 3rd September and in reply I have to state that I have nothing more to add to the information I gave verbally to your Secretary, that I am wholly unaware of any such negotiations as those you mention.

As you are well aware, it has always been the aim of the Hongkong & Shanghai Banking Corporation to lend its assistance in all efforts designed for the advancement of China and the amelioration of the lot of her people, and I can safely assure you that a continuance of this policy may be relied upon.

Yours faithfully,
(Signed) A. B. LOWSON,
Acting Manager,
HONGKONG & SHANGHAI BANKING CORPORATION.

Shanghai, Sept. 4, 1924.

PROFITEERING IN CHINESE HOTELS

Exorbitant Prices Following on Influx of Refugees into Shanghai

The over-crowded condition of Chinese hotels and inns in the Settlements due to the invasion of refugees not only from Chapei and Nantao but also from cities along both railways, has led to an unwholesome profiteering in rates. Houses which have been vacant for months have been rented by Chinese, particularly from the Quinsan-Kading region, which have perhaps suffered more than any other places during this war. At Quinsan a fire broke out, which destroyed some of the finest houses in the place, including one which housed a renowned collection of blackwood furniture.

Chinese hotels and inns are said to be charging two and three times as much as during the pre-war times. A Chinese investigator on Saturday found that a room with two beds, one large and one small which cost usually $1.00 a day without food, now costs $2.50. Rooms which cost 70 cents a day now cost from $1.50 to $2.00 a day. The inns on Avenue Edward VII which usually charge about 85 cents a day including food now charge from $1.50 to 2.50 a day. In another hotel in the Settlement, the investigator found that a room which used to cost $1.20 a day now costs $3.20. These rates were quoted to the investigator, but he was not assured that he could get a room. In most cases he was told that most of the rooms were taken and that the clerk was uncertain as to when they would be vacated. He took this to mean that he would have to pay an additional sum to the clerk or offer a higher amount to get a room at all.

Chinese students in Shanghai are finding themselves in grave difficulties because of this increase in the price of rents in hotels and lodging houses. Those who do not live in school dormitories are finding that they are being told to vacate their premises so that the landlord can "make room for relatives who have come from the country." This is taken to indicate that refugees are offering any price for a room. In one house, a square room in back of the visiting hall of an ordinary Chinese house was found to have increased from $8.00 to $40.00 and an entire family had been lodged in the room.

Small Chinese inns where 30 cents a day was the usual charge have now increased their rates to approximately $1.00 a day, which is beyond the normal standard of living of most of the Chinese living in such places.

WAR RISKS IN POOTUNG AND SHANGHAI

Reduced from 3 to 1 Per Cent

At a meeting of representatives of leading British insurance companies and the American Asiatic Underwriters, held at Messrs. Jardine, Matheson's offices on the 10th instant, the question of war insurances was discussed.

Up to the time of this meeting rates had been quoted as high as 3 per cent. by companies writing war risks. It was decided to fix the basis rate for war risks inside the foreign settlements and in the Pootung wharf area at 1 per cent. for a period of three months.

The insurance market in unsteady.

STOKER Petty Officer Daniel Norton, the victim of Sunday night's drowning fatality, whose body was recovered from the Huangpu on Monday, was buried with full naval honours at Bubbling Well Cemetery on Tuesday. The funeral was attended by the Captain of H.M.S. Despatch, to which ship's company deceased belonged, and a large detachment from the cruiser. P.O. Norton was for 24 years in the Navy. He saw service throughout the Great War and received the Good Conduct Medal. He was unmarried.

BAD CHARACTERS EXPELLED

170 Gaolbirds Rounded up by Settlement Police and Put over the Boundary

The Shanghai Municipal Police on Wednesday rounded up a very large number of loafers, known bad characters, gaolbirds, and put them out of the Settlement. With the influx of the thousands of refugees who have come into Shanghai since the war began, the presence of these people was a serious menace to public order, and the Chinese community will sleep the sounder for their disappearance.

Altogether about 500 Chinese were taken to the police stations, and closely examined in order to be perfectly sure of their belonging to the criminal class.

The story, which appeared in certain Chinese newspapers yesterday, to the effect that the Municipal detectives were looking for tattooed members of secret societies was romantic but untrue. The police prefer their own finger-print system in determining whether a man has a criminal record.

Before the police went on their quest for dangerous individuals, they called in representatives of the Street Unions that they might realize exactly what was being done. These Chinese leaders expressed great satisfaction that speedy measures were being taken to safeguard the peace of the Settlement. When the arrested persons were being examined the representatives of the Street Unions were present and gave great assistance in identifying bad characters and weeding out doubtfuls.

The suspected loafers were taken to a go-down on Gordon Road last night where they were finally shroffed by experienced police officers. Some were permitted to go home. Some were detained for further examination. The worst types were taken to Markham Road Bridge and sent across into Chapei. These numbered in all about 170. What happened to them in Chapei is not known.

SUSPECTED ARSON IN PEKING ROAD

Office Premises Saved Just in Time

A fire which broke out on Wednesday night at the offices of Messrs. Reilly, Simmons & Milne, 25 Peking Road, is believed to have been deliberately caused by somebody in the building.

The outbreak occurred after office hours, at 8 o'clock in the evening. On their arrival, the Fire Brigade found dense clouds of smoke issuing from the ground floor. An entrance was made through one of the windows, into which a line of hose was worked and a fire in the centre back room dealt with. At the same time a second fire was discovered in an east room. Both outbreaks were quickly got under, but only just in time to save the wooden floors of the building.

An examination of the premises after the fire indicated that it had started in the desk and bookcase of Mr. Reilly, while another conflagration appeared to have originated in a store room at the foot of some empty packing cases. A cash box was found to have been forced open, but the money it contained had been removed during the day.

The police are making inquiries.

B. & S. STEAMER ADRIFT

Rudder Post Smashed in Heavy Seas: Towed to Shanghai by Str. Munsterland

The China Navigation Company's str. Kweichow arrived in Shanghai on Wednesday at the end of a towrope connecting with the stern of the German str. Munsterland. The Kweichow was bound from Hongkong to Tientsin and met with very heavy weather on the way up, resulting in her rudder post being smashed. For 36 hours she drifted helplessly, until the Munsterland hove in sight and gave her a tow, as far as the Fairway Buoy, Shanghai. She will most probably go into dock here for repairs.

S. M. C. EMERGENCY MEASURES

A Careful Watch over Food Supplies: No Shortage at Present

Modern warfare is as different to that of a generation ago as anything could be. There were times when everything connected with a war was given the widest publicity and even the opposing troops paraded within effective range of one another, performing evolutions with colours flying and bands playing. Nowadays we work more in secret and the practice extends even to neutrals not actively concerned in the fighting. From the little that has been made public of the special work of the Shanghai Municipal Council it might have been thought that not much more had been done than to mobilise the S.V.C. and the Police Reserve, secure the assistance of landing parties from the foreign men-o'-war and issue a few proclamations. Actually, however, the members of the Council and all the staff have been very busy, for, again contrary to the general opinion, the Council remains solely responsible for the government and protection of the Settlement, supreme even to the Consular Body, and Col. Gordon is Commandant of the entire defence force. Only in the event of the Settlement being attacked, or should there be imminent danger of an assault in force upon it, when the Council obviously would be at the end of its resources, would it retire in favour of the Consular Body or a military commander nominated by the Powers?

The Food Supply

Many emergency measures have been rendered necessary by reason of Shanghai's proximity to the theatre of war and to deal with these the Council has appointed sub-committees, who, as judged by what one has been able to find out of their work, have proved themselves capable of fully understanding the necessities of the case and of devising means to provide for the safety and daily wants of the inhabitants. The point that first occurs is the food supply and from inquiries made on Thursday there appear to be no particular difficulties in the way. The Council has the matter under close observation and has appointed a food, markets and dairy section of the Health Department which at all times is directly concerned with the maintenance of food supplies. It was stated inadvertently the other day that the chief source of the Settlement's beef supply was not in the fighting area, but this hardly was correct, since most of the fresh beef comes here from near Changchow and more particularly Tanyang. Suggestions have been made that the belligerents might be induced to allow cattle to be shipped westwards to Nanking and thence by water to Shanghai, but further investigation has shown that the difficulty is not so much one of transport, but, as is usual in China, when the soldiers are about, the country people lock up their cattle and scarcely venture forth from their houses, with the consequence that no cattle come to market.

Food Generally Abundant

These considerations do not apply with such force to sheep or goats, which are produced in vast numbers in the country to the south of Shanghai, whilst pigs, as is well known, are reared wherever there is a hovel substantial enough to shelter a family. To sum up, whilst undoubtedly there is a shortage of beef, and to a slight extent of mutton, food in general is as abundant as ever and vegetables and cereals are available in ample quantity. It would appear, indeed, that the advanced price in the case of rice is due less to a shortage of supplies than to the inevitable profiteering which, in China, as in other countries, is indulged in as and when the opportunity arises. A limiting factor so far as the profiteer is concerned lies in the insecurity of property beyond the boundaries of the foreign Settlements, which is the reason why the Settlements at the present time are fairly well gorged with stocks of rice. An assurance has been given that the Council is watching the situation with solicitude and is quite ready to put into force further emergency measures should such be necessary, but at the present time there is no cause to apprehend a serious shortage in the food supply.

Expelling the Rowdies

Another point is the protection of lives and property and in this connexion it will be noted that a Municipal notification has been issued informing the public of the measures taken in the last few days to round up bad characters. Recently there got about a mischievous rumour to the effect that every person who had been tatooed was to be arrested and handed over to the tender mercies of the Chinese authorities. For this strange story it can at lease be said that it had some foundation in fact, since it is well known to those whose business it is to attend to these matters that loafers and rowdies of certain classes are tatooed in a particular manner for the purpose of ready identification amongst themselves. This touching little custom at the present time is likely to work in a manner they hardly can have anticipated, though the Council's measures have nothing to do with the minor detail of tattooing. A plain uncoloured rogue is no more desirable than a tattooed one.

The Council has issued a notification to the numerous rowdies and loafers who have taken refuge in the foreign Settlements that their presence can be dispensed with and that, if they do not leave of their own accord, the police will put them out.

OBITUARY

Mr. Jack Raynes

Many friends in Shanghai will learn with sorrow that Mr. Jack Raynes, for many years a resident of Shanghai, and known to hundreds here simply as "Jack" by reason of his genial and winning personality, died suddenly on the N.Y.K. steamer Mashumo Maru, en route to Sydney, on September 9, and was buried at sea. Mr. Raynes, who was formerly proprietor of the Trocadero Café here, left Shanghai several months ago for a holiday in Japan, to regain his health. He had recently left there for Hongkong and was on his way to Australia in the hope that the climate there would be beneficial, when he succumbed.

Local theatrical circles, particularly, will miss him, for he has been prominently identified with the A.D.C. and the theatrical work of other groups and organization here almost from the time he came to the Far East, 11 years ago.

His introduction to Shanghai was as the conductor of the Ferris-Hartman company, an American theatrical organization which brought the first real jazz song to the East. "I Want To Be Way Down in Dixie," as played by the orchestra over which Mr. Raynes wielded the baton, won instant popularity in which company and conductor equally shared. For a few years afterwards, following the company's disbandment, Mr. Raynes remained in Shanghai as the conductor of the Carlton Band. He was the moving spirit behind the A.D.C.'s great hit, "The Belle of New York." This show ranks among the best the A.D.C. has given and its success was due in no small measure to Mr. Raynes who had appeared in the original company in New York. He was associated with Mr. Reginald Wingrove in the production of "The Three Twins," produced by the A.D.C. in 1921. In 1922 he put on "Tom Jones," and, in 1923, was responsible for much of the success of "Madame Sherry." Besides these productions he assisted with numerous vaudevilles of the A.D.C.

The S.V|C. Minstrel Shows and the Shriners' Minstrel Shows were his hobbies and these, too, he infused with much of his own vigour and personality so that they all stand as exceptional amateur theatrical achievements.

Mr. Raynes, although a Yorkshireman, a native of Leeds, spent much of his time in the States before coming to the Orient and he was popular in both the British and American communities here. As a mark of esteem and in appreciation of his services, he was elected to membership of the A.D.C. to which he gave the best of his talents as song-writer, conductor, and player.

Mr. Raynes is survived by his wife and small son who reside in Shanghai, and with whom deep sympathy will be felt.

A TRY TO COMMANDEER MOTOR-CARS

The press gang has apparently decided to move in higher circles than the ricsha coolie. On Tuesday some Chinese hired four cars from the Taylor Garage. When the cars left the garage, the chauffeurs were told to proceed to the North Station, two of the chauffeurs refused to go any further and returned to the garage. The other two took a chance and drove to the station. There the cars were impressed in the service of the Chêkiang army and sent to Liuho full of rifles. The manager of the Taylor Garage got his cars back with much difficulty after calling in the assistance of his consul. The Taylor Garage is situated in the International Settlement.

DR. Sun Yat-sen is said to have agreed to grant an amnesty to Gen. Chen Chiung-ming's followers if they will either surrender or invade Fukien. He has already recalled all his troops besieging Waichow, says the Chinese press.

SHANTUNG ROAD HOSPITAL

The Need of Help Accentuated by Present Crisis

The enormous amount of work which the staff of the Shantung Road Hospital has to deal with is illustrated by the statistics of last Monday. On that one day alone 642 patients sought help and treatment. Of this number 21 were injuries or accidents, 88 were employees in Municipal and other service, and 197 were women. Out of the total number 19 were detained in hospital for in-patient treatment, making the total number of in-patients on that day 161. Much though the staff would wish for the hospital to participate in Red Cross work, such a course is impossible without neglect of duty and injury toward the civilian population.

Some patients are afraid to visit hospitals at the present juncture outside the Settlement, and some hospitals inside the Settlement have already reduced their bed accommodation for civilians. The call on the hospital for help from civilians is thus greatly increased.

As more distressed and distracted refugees flock into the Settlement, this need for help will doubtless increase more and more.

Once again, as has so often been the case during its 81 years of service, this old institution stands as a refuge and blessing for the salvation of the people, in the centre of Shanghai's busy crowded population. Help in the way of funds and medical supplies is urgently needed to meet the present increased demands.

AMONG FRIENDS AND FINDING WORK

Repatriated Cossacks in Hailar: Grateful Thanks to Shanghai

The following are extracts from a letter to Mr. G. Peet, chairman of the repatriation sub-committee of the Refugee Relief Advisory Committee, from 135 Cossacks who were recently sent to Hailar. The letter, which was forwarded through Col. W. G. Kazakoff, speaks in grateful terms of the good work done by the committee for the refugees. It will be notice that the Cossacks, who received a warm welcome from relatives and friends in the Manchurian town, are convinced of the dangers of returning to the realms of the United Socialist Soviet Republics.

"Having reached Hailar and received a hearty welcome from our relatives and friends, among whom we have been able to find work, we are now in fairly easy circumstances, with prospects of still better conditions in the future.

"With the Chinese here our people have always lived on excellent neighbourly terms, therefore it can be easily understood why we prefer to settle again among them rather than risk the dangers of going into the U. S. S. R. In fact we are convinced that we cannot return to Russia until peace and good order have been re-established there.

"We members of the Transbaikalian and Amur Cossacks beg you to express our sincere gratitude to Mr. Peet, as well as to the members of his Committee, for their humanity and kindness to us whilst we were under their care. We further ask you to express our grateful thanks to the Shanghai Race Club and to its secretary, Mr. Olsen, for the generous financial aid which has saved so many Russians.

"As soon as order has been restored in Russia and we are able to return to Transbaikalia in peace and safety, the names of those who have so greatly helped us will be written in our History."

MR. W. H. Pinckard sailed last week in the Empress of Canada for Kobe, where he will meet his bride, Miss Fern Dow, now on her way from America. The marriage will be solemnized on Friday, and the honeymoon will be spent in Japan. On returning to Shanghai a fortnight or so later, the newly-married couple will reside temporarily at the Astor House Hotel.

GLENAMOY DOCKED AT LAST

Floated by Compressed Air: Now in International Dock

On Sunday the Glenamoy was successfully floated at last and taken into the Shanghai Dock & Engineering Co.'s International Dock.

The Glenamoy went ashore on Video Island last May. She was got off with great difficulty and brought into the Huangpu where she was beached at the New Engineering & Shipbuilding Co.'s works. This firm did the necessary repairs which enabled her to be floated by means of compressed air—the first ship in Shanghai to be floated in this way.

ROMANTIC MANCHURIA

A Visit to Chalantun on the C. E. Railway: Wonderful Growth of Little Known Holiday Resort: Civilization and Wonderful Scenery

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

Nestled high in the hills of northern Manchuria, lies a picturesque cluster of houses, formerly a military outpost, which to the casual passerby on the main line of the Chinese Eastern Railway would signify nothing at all. At the station as the train stops but for a moment, the usual and morbid crowd of interested villagers gaze, not open-mouthed, but casually at the train de luxe as it hesitates on its journey to Manchouli, the eastern terminus of the trans-Siberian Railway.

But just a short stretch from the Stanzia, there is life, for this is the Kurort of Manchuria, Chalantun, the summer home of a large number of Harbin residents, who make the trek annually to avoid the heat and heavy summers of the Russian metropolis. Large families may be seen on their way to and from the athletic fields, while the society lady in her up-to-the-minute riding habit gallops by on a fast Manchurian pony On old-fashioned carts with no springs and being pulled by slow looking horses (you would be surprised at the change) a whole dozen or more ladies, gentlemen and children idle past on their way to a fishing hole a few miles up the Yal River, where they anticipate to be able to entangle a few of the finny tribe—trout abounding in great numbers. Tennis clothes lend an air of sport to some who have never learned the game, while others, including the champion of China, have been seen on the courts. Then there is the ever-present bathing suit of all colours.

1,110 Feet Above Sea-Level

Chalantun is situated in the hills at an altitude of 1,110 feet with an ideal climate for a summer resort. It is such a lovely place that as the story goes, M. Ostroumoff, general manager of the C.E.R., while on one of his inspection trips some three years ago, stopped at the station, saw the beautiful Yal River and visualizing the immediate possibilities, dropped a hint to Dr. Chaplik, head of the medical bureau, who, not at all slow in realizing the value of the idea, began constructive operations at once. The result is that in this beautiful valley there now can be found hundreds of summer visitors.

The valley is from 3 to 5 miles long at this point and the mountain water, clear and cool rolls on its way to the sea, first through the Nonni, then the Sungari and finally the Amur River. Within a stone's throw of the railway tracks the hills loom up 500 feet higher than the surrounding country, while not many miles away another 1,000 feet in elevation may be scaled by the ambitious walker.

Four miles or more away the streams rush down the precipitous sides of the hills, rippling and tumbling in their anxiety to rejoin the bigger waters thousands of miles distant. Evidently the first growth timber in the immediate vicinity has been cut down, but rapid growing second growth trees are soaring into the heavens and provide shade and quiet resting places for the weary. Still further away, however, the primaeval forests of the ages are visible. It is an alluring spot for the adventurer who delights in the wilds of nature, a beautiful background for the efforts of man to add a few touches by way of flowers and promenades.

Next Door to Nature

Nomad tribes wander over the adjacent hills and the Mongols, though they might at one time have been ferocious, are now content to remain in their distant fastnesses. One of these tribes none the less has its rough and ready village but a few versts over the hills, which may be reached by means of ponies and a well beaten trail, which branches off from a travelled road. Here cultivation of the soil is rarely indulged in and bat a few vegetables are eaten, though the value of the earth for the crop would fill the heart of a Continental or American farmer with joy—grass growing waist high in the wilderness.

But Chalantun, itself, has been artistically laid out for the comfort and convenience of the visitor. The streets meet each other at right angles, they are covered with a gravel which prevents the rains from making them muddy or difficult to travel over. Sidewalks raised to a decent level above the roads are not paved but the water drains almost as soon as it falls and the walking is easy under foot.

Cozily placed, and comfortable, houses for accommodation of guests, parties taking as many rooms as desired, have been built facing the ways, while the intervening spaces (the squares are large) are filled with beautiful flower beds, good homeside flowers of variegated hues, bringing back to the mind the days of childhood. Shade trees conveniently placed line the curving and ever-circling paths, which wind among the flowars, and the shrubberies loom invitingly to the weary, longing for a cool nap in the shade.

The river banks in themselves afford a most delightful promenade, hedged as they are by intersecting paths and walks, not too far from the Kursaal and the Estralda, the meeting place of the "crowd." From path to path one may go by means of quaint white bridges, constructed of natural white-barked trees, over the stream or over its branches, sometimes dry sometimes filled, as the rainfall in the mountains affects the supply of water, which at times is great. A quarter of a mile to the south the main stream may be reached, the entire stroll through the concession of the Railway. Electric lights, placed by the hands of experts, provide just enough light at night to entice one to a stroll, even if the gorgeous moon is not up.

Swimming and Sun-Bathing

Sports of all sorts abound, but the king of them at Chalantun is swimming and all that goes with it, in Russia that includes sun bathing in one piece bathing costumes—when costumes are worn. An offshoot of the main river has been dammed and bridged by the officials and an ideal pool as a result has been formed, where the swiftly flowing water is always fresh and clean as the eternal sources from whence it springs. During the summer months the temperature ranges from 68°-75° Fahr., just a gracious warmth, not stifling hot as are the pools of Shanghai. Bathing tents, for individuals, line the beaches on both sides, while several shelters may house picnic parties, who care to come to the pool for the day and not return to the Kursaal, a few hundred yards away for the noon meal. Diving boards, boats in the pool, wafts and apparatus complete the equipment necessary for a splendid bit of recreation.

During the early and later parts of the season, the proper time for bathing is the noon hour, while in the middle of the summer morning and afternoon swims are indulged in to the satisfaction of all. An electric display in the water under the dam and a huge searchlight add to the evening pleasures of the bathing spot.

A bathing house to one side with individual compartments is patronized very much by both Russians and others for sun bathing under medical supervision, while along the banks of the river, Russian men and women avoid paying the fee and in nature's garb make full use of the browning sun to acquire a good brown coat, which to the European is a preventive of winter disease.

In some instances Americans or others not accustomed to such habits are lured to sights strange to their native shores. During the summer months two gentlemen, wearing their bathing costumes, strolled up the river bank, while the third, an elderly gentleman, returned to the cottage. It seems that the sun bathers do not entirely welcome foreigners to these secluded spots and the two had some difficulty in approaching, but as the third who returned said, "They have disguised themselves as Russians and every thing is fitting and proper." Visions of long-bearded and uncouth looking individuals loomed before his audience, but he seen dispelled these ideas, when he answered a query how they could possibly convert themselves into Russians—"Simply by removing their bathing suits, and do as the Romans do, when in Rome." To one who has been in Russia, this explanation seems perfectly lucid.

Chalantun enjoys a good electric system, good modern sanitation, a good and plentiful supply of clear water, which is reputed fit to drink from the taps and which everyone drinks without boiling, inter-house telephones, the beautiful parks, the Estralda, where the orchestra gives concerts, ice storage, a small theatre and good roads both inside and out.

Accommodation for several hundreds of guests is available in smaller cottages and two large buildings with clean and well-furnished rooms, though simply, will house to the limit of the demand. Built of brick the houses are cool in summer and keep out the cold in winter, though during that season only hunting parties use them at all.

The food at this mountain spot in incomparable. As stated by the Casino (Kursea), the establishment of the International Sleeping Car Company, the viands are clean, wholesome and appetizing to a degree not thought of in a city like Shanghai, where in the clubs and at the restaurants one often remarks on the sameness of the meals. Perhaps sameness might be experienced here also, after one has lived in Russia for a few years but, for the newcomer, it is all new and good. Such vegetables as cucumbers, tomatoes and lettuce which one would not think ofeating in Shanghai unless imported from America or Australia, one is able to sit down to at table and eat to heart's content, while watermelons, musk melons and the like are bought from the vendors on the road or at the market or eaten at the Casino with impunity. And milk, if one wishes to drink it fresh from the cow—there is no danger whatsoever—everybody does and experiences no ill effects.

What one would eat in the home lands, one eats at Chalantun. At the Casino, the waiters and musicians are white, with the exception of a few busboys. One thinks one is in Europe or in America for everything is looked after by people with whom one may feel friendly; one is confident that one's baggage and personal effects are not likely to be stolen. A foreign chef and linguists make it easy for the Anglo-Saxon to order his food and to enjoy it.

Golf Course Next Season

Prospects of a golf course over the hills and streams next season will prove a lure for the holiday maker.

Efficiency is the watchword of the establishment and the eagle eye of M. Ostroumoff, misses nothing. For instance, at the beginning of the season in May before the guests arrived, he visited the resort and noted that grass was not growing, where it had been thought it would naturally grow from the roots of the preceding season. Calling one or two of the chief men round him he said, according to the story. If grass is not growing here, to-morrow morning, and if flowers are not blooming along the paths, you shall be as the earth beneath your feet."

Grass and flowers, the result of all night work, were there the next morning.

Such is Chalantun.

FUNDS FOR FLOOD SUFFERERS

Peking Campaign to Raise $2,000,000

Peking, Sept. 12.

From October 4 to 8, various places of historical interest in Peking are to be thrown open to the general public on behalf of the National Flood Relief Drive, which is being conducted under the joint auspices of the China International Famine Relief Commission and the Chinese National Red Cross to raise $2,000,000 for flood sufferers.

A special garden party ticket, obtainable at the Famine Relief Comission headquarters and in various shops and other places throughout the city and costing only 50 cents, will admit the holder at any time during those five days to the Temple of Heaven, the Forbidden City, Pei Hai, the Lama Temple, General Park and the Historical Museum in the Forbidden City, which is seldom open to visitors. This is the museum housed in the buildings on top of the great gate immediately to the south of the part of the city usually open to the public.

In addition to this special ticket, individual tickets may be bought as usual at each of the places named. The proceeds during the garden party, however, are to go to the "drive," and the prices will be reduced as follows for the occasion. Admission to the Lama Temple will be 40 cents instead of 50; to the Forbidden City, 20 cents instead of 30 and to the Temple of Heaven, 10 cents instead of 30 coppers.—China International Famine Relief Commission.

MARTIAL LAW DECLARED AT CHEFOO

A Stopper on Supplies to Chang Tso-lin

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Chefoo, Sept. 15.

Martial law was declared here on the 11th instant. We are given to understand that this precaution has been taken in view of the possibility of Chang Tso-lin taking an active interest in the present civil war raging around Shanghai. A censorship of letters to and from the provinces of Chêkiang and Kiangsu has also been established. We cannot see what results martial law can bring to pass here except that up to the present it has caused inconvenience to the foreign community.

To-day's native papers state that merchants here have received instructions to cease shipment of merchandise to Chinchowfu on account of Chang Tso-lin's activities. Practically all business done between this port and Manchuria goes through Chinchowfu and therefore the amount of trade involved is fairly considerable.

The principal markets of Chefoo are at present very quiet and little or no business is being done. Pongees from the new cocoon crop have not yet arrived. Prices promise to be high whilst of course the advanced exchange will also have the effect of increasing costs. Nest to no business is being done in hairnets and what demand there is from the United States is for small sizes only.

The Races.

Chefoo had the second day of its autumn races on Saturday last. The second day was originally set for September 6 but owing to bad weather conditions on that date racing was impossible. The meeting, from a financial point of view, was not the success that was anticipated. The departure of the major part of the American Fleet at a date earlier than was expected had of course an adverse affect upon the "gate." The racing was very good and the finish of the "Champions" extremely exciting. This race was won by Christmas Morn, an old Shanghai race pony, with Villers up from Railton's Sandsnipe, Mrs. Railton up, by half a head The cash sweep was divided by two officers of the Fleet.

It is expected that the balance of the Fleet will leave here for Shanghai or Manila on or about September 24.

THE MERCHANT MIND AND "PATRIOTISM"

Apathetic Attitude of the Man Behind the Counter in Shanse Towards War

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Kiangchow, Sha., Sept. 6.

Following news of Bank failures in Shanghai and in sympathy with the consequent effect on Tientsin markets, business people are much agitated and the money shops are hurridely getting together as many lakhs of silver dollars as they can to send coastwards to meet emergencies at the Eighth Moon settlement. Sending dollars away at this season is a very unusual proceeding when as a rule funds are flowing in to purchase local produce far beyond the value of imports.

Rumours of civil war also are greatly disturbing local merchants. The sources of their information regarding remote provinces are not very dependable and the issues at stake quite incomprehensible to men whose interests and knowledge of affairs are self-centred and derived largely from hearsay rather than from study of current events in newspapers or journals.

The young nephew representing the firm at the coast is to the Shansi business man the oracle from whose letters he gets tips to avoid heavy losses, or to make larger profits and in case his relative may be misinformed, or tempted to disloyality, a little gossip may be useful to check up his information for the sake of safety. Patrotic interest in his country's welfare does not as yet distinguish "the man behind the counter," despite Governor Yen's noble efforts to inculcate these principles.

Confucian Sacrifices—Back to the Kowtow.

The Confucian sacrifices have been observed as usual and it is worthy of note that as regards attendance and participation, religious liberty is granted. That the cost of the ceremonial is paid out of public funds is of course unfair to adherents of other religions who have no opportunity to object. And as the Confucian cult is restricted to the scholar class other classes of the community might claim the right of "he who pays the piper calls the tune." One wonders what Confucius himself would have thought of a ceremonial for which others paid, but did not share in the spoils, as for example, the nice little portions of beef, pork and poultry which the privileged literati share on these occasions as their reward for rising before daylight.

It is interesting to note as indicative of the drift of the times, that after frequent changes since the Revolution, the form of worship has reverted to the kow-tow four times and the "tseh-yih" (elevation of clasped hands) eight times in the old Imperial style.

SOLDIERS WORSE THAN BANDITS

Depredations of Troops Sent to Suppress Anhui Brigands

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Yingchowfu, An., Aug. 28.

The reports of disorder in Liuanchow did not disturb us much, as we were told that these tufei, or rebels, were considerate for the people and did not rob, loot, or outrage. The common people have no doubt suffered much more at the hands of the soldiers who were sent to subdue the rebels than from the rebels themselves.

We are continually hearing stories of bandit outrages in the country. Early in July the village of Lintsih, 35 li to the northwest, was attacked and burned—that is the worst of these bandit outrages; what the bandits take is of little consequence compared with what they wantonly destroy. The burning of the homes usually involves the destruction of the family stores of grain. In Tsih, 90 li down the river from Yingchowfu, a lien chang, or captain, was killed, as well as some of the soldiers. All these bandits are local men, serving their apprenticeship and trying their hands.

HOW TO HELP CHINA

Permanent Education a Boon. The Tsinghua Experiment Disappointing

Some disappointment is expressed in certain quarters that the Bill dealing with the British share of the Boxer Indemnity has had to be held over till the autumn, but that disappointment is not shared by those who care either for the welfare of China or for British prestige in that country.

The Bill as brought in was a mere framework, and the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs asked the House upon presenting it for a blank cheque. The purposes of the Bill were not to be stated. As amended, it defines its purposes as being "educational or other"—a pointless concession—and arranges to set up a statutory Advisory Committee of 10 persons, which shall include at least one woman and at least one citizen of the Republic of China, and further requires the Foreign Secretary to consult this Committee before taking action. These amendments, good in their way, do not go nearly far enough. It is a noteworthy fact that members draw from all three political parties have put their names jointly to an amendment defining the purposes as "educational or cultural," thus bringing British, American and Japanese aims into line. From an Anglo-Chinese, as well as from a Chinese, point of view this is a matter of supreme importance. Pressed by both America and Japan in the Chinese markets, Great Britain cannot afford to take a lower line, even in name, than they.

Certain other amendments also are of importance: these are directed to the constitution of the statutory committee which, if already provisionally constituted, may be a misfit, should the main amendment be carried, as probably it will be. A committee arranged for "educational or other" ends ought not to be the same as that constituted for "educational or cultural" purposes. In the latter persons having knowledge and experience of educational and medical work would be essential, and the Chinese citizen to be appointed would have to be a scholar of repute whose selection would favourably impress Chinese opinion. Unless that condition were fulfilled, the presence of this citizen would do more harm than good to the purposes which the Committee will have been appointed to promote. A further interesting point is raised by an amendment that the Advisory Committee shall contain a Chinese woman.

Educational Aid.

There is only one way to help China permanently and radically. That is by education. To educate many Chinese on a broader system than that country now possesses, to colour that education with a tradition of service to the community, instead of merely to the family, and to infuse into it a desire for corporate well-being and voluntary service—to seek, in fact, that temper which has always informed the best educational tradition in England and steadily promotes the healthy development of our body politic—would be to confer on China an inestimable boon.

This would mean looking to the next generation for ultimate results, but there are no short cuts in education. This is especially true of China, as America has found in her generously conceived, but disappointing, experiment at Tsinghua College, in Peking, where, at the expense of that portion of the American quota of the indemnity which was remitted in 1908, 400 young Chinese boys drawn from influential families spend six years acquiring English and the elements of an American education before spending a further six years in America. What is wanted is not a new institution, but aid for as many existing institutions and activities, whether under Chinese or British management as the fund can afford, whether secondary, trade, or technical schools, and colleges and universities. Scholarships should be given to enable promising students to proceed to universities in the British Empire. Moreover, in London a Chinese institute and hostel should be established.

Co-operation

But if education be the field on which effort should centre in any attempt to advance Chinese well-being, the method to be adopted is equally important. That method is co-operation, which should be full and continuous, alike in formulating any general plan and in carrying it out in detail. It is for that reason that, while the Foreign Office deserve high praise for opening the Advisory Committee of Chinese, their actual appointments must be jealously watched.

For instance, it being assumed that as the indemnity is drawn from all China, so each province will participate in any British scheme for remission, co-operation would be indispensable in every provincial centre selected in China for administering the portion assigned to that province. Thus, Chinese and English should work together on education committees which might be formed by the Chinese and the British Chambers of Commerce at the center concerned, each Chamber contributing one-third of the members, the remaining third being partly ex officio and partly co-opted or nominated. Also, on each aided institution, whether university or school, under whatever management, British or Chinese, some admixture of both elements should similarly be regarded as indispensable.

In that way a process of mutual enlightenment would be set up, which, after a 20 years' run (that is, until the indemnity ceases in 1945), would lead to an increase of mutual respect and an enhanced consideration on each side for the other's national point of view. This would in turn doubtless lead, as in the case of America it has already led, to improved commercial and political relations.

The only word that remains to be said should also be the first in judging of any scheme of betterment: that word is finance. In the House, certain members at the second reading spoke of the magnitude of the sum involved—£400,000 a year. Of these critics, few could have had an idea that this represents only one-thirtieth of the total expenditure by London alone on its education: yet the London population of seven millions is not a 50th of the population of China. On the contrary, the sum is small in proportion to the size of China, so small that it would be necessary to select higher education alone for aid; and even in that field to select certain institutions only, assigning year by year to each local centre, with the definite sum allotted it, the duty of selecting and aiding these under conditions laid down by the Central Authority.

That authority would itself deal with central institutions, such as universities, and central activities, such as medical work, scholarships, and Chinese students. China could thus be helped to help herself; to nurture citizens animated by a disinterested regard for their own nation. If China learned to do this on a national scale she would not fail ultimately to take that high place which the world assigns to culture, industry, and ability when these qualities are combined with self-discipline.

NAVAL LAUNCHES COLLIDE AT YOKOSUKA

Several Casualties

Tokyo, Sept. 12.

Two launches belonging to the flagship Nagato collided at Yokosuka this morning. Both were sunk and many persons were drowned.

Later.

The collision, according to the Navy Department occurred this morning at the entrance to the harbour when a launch transferring more than a hundred men to the Nagato, from shore leave, collided with the Nagato's torpedo boat. The launch immediately sank. So far, there are no details, but it is believed that between 10 and 20 men were drowned.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

A report from London states that Mr. R. H. Clive, the British Consul-General in Munich, who was formerly Counseller of Legation and Chargé d'Affaires in Peking, has been appointed to Tangier as British Agent and Consul-General. During the tenure of his office in Munich Mr. Clive carried out an extensive and very delicate inquiry into the political conditions there in connexion with the late threatened monarchist revival, his report being regarded as a major document on the issue. The appointment to Tangier will not land Mr. and Mrs. Clive in green pastures and still waters.

ON GETTING DOWN FROM KULING

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wuchang, Sept. 7.

After having taken one's third joy-ride of the summer down "the hill" from Kuling, one heaves a sigh of relief. There will be no more such excitement—until next year. From first to last one is in the hands of the necessary but (generaly) harmless coolie. There is really a great deal to be said for these horny-shouldered sons of toil. Year by year, thousands of people are carried up and down the difficult mountain road. Some are stout and heavy and others are lean and light. Some are in feeble infancy, and others equally feeble with age or sickness. But never a one is dropped over a precipice; and, unless a chair breaks occasionally, they are not even let down upon the road. Tens of thousands of boxes and pieces of luggage are also carried up and down. But although they are sometimes a long time in arriving, never a piece is finally missing. The coolies go up and down the road, often twice, occasionally three times in the course of a day for four months on end. No man is strong enough to endure more than three or four successive years of such toil. But, apart from a row now and then over a question of wine money, there is very little trouble.

Cumsha Cumsha.

It is this wine money question which makes the bane of Kuling. They all want it. Chair bearers, baggage coolies, head coolies, motor drivers, boatmen, each demands his share. Generally, those get the most who deserve the least, as is often the case in this world of injustice. As a matter of fact, by the rules of the Traffic Department, no coolie is permitted to demand wine money and no traveller is bound to pay any. You are merely advised to give a few coppers as a concession to the weakness of human nature. The rates are all carefully fixed by printed regulations. But woe to the traveller who refuses wine money when it is asked for! His baggage will be delayed on the road; his chair will not be carried; his house will be besieged by a crowd of Chinese coolies transformed into screaming Dervishes. If he doesn't lose his money, he will lose his temper, and that is worse. Still so long as human nature remains what it is, there will be no way out of it. The labourer will always desire a little more than his fixed hire, so long as there is any hope of getting it. And there will always be those who think to exact a little better service by giving to labour more than its strict due, thereby compelling others to do the same. From the London railway porter and his tips to the Arab and his bakshush, the custom is world wide. Until socialism has succeeded in abolishing the distinction between employer and employed, it will always be so. And then, what worse evils shall we have to face?

The Elastic Luggage.

A curious thing happened when my express baggage was being weighed, Einstein's Theory might explain it; otherwise, the cause is obscure. Three boxes were put upon the scale together, and declared to weigh 55 catties, well under the limit for one express coolie's load. I was well pleased. But not so the coolie. He demanded a re-weigh. One box was put on again, and found to weigh 35 catties. The other two together, also weighed 35. Total, 70 catties, requiring two express coolies for their transport. When I inquired the cause—merely in idle curiosity—I was informed that the steelyard was "huai-liao" (spoiled). It was very neat, but I don't know how it was done.

Away we go, down the hill, in our chairs. We started with 20 coolies, but we soon had 22, because one of the chairs borne by six was declared to require eight, and would not move on until it got them. It isn't worth while fighting over such trifles, and after all, to be carried in a chair by eight men is as comfortable as being in bed, while to have only six, and they in a bad temper, may mean a bit of jolting. With all the coolies in a good humour, we go down at a rattling pace. The most objectionable habit they have, is to choose a dirty little village for their stopping place and dump down the chairs in the filthiest part of the street. After coming through miles of pure mountain air to be set down in front of a cesspool! But a little forethought and persuasion may avoid this inconvenience, and it is worth while to insist on being carried on 50 paces or so, and let the coolies go back for their tea.

There Came No Such Motors.

After the chairs, the motor. There are no such drivers as these on the road from Lien Hwa Tung to Kiukiang. They will break the speed limit over the bumpiest part of the straight, and swing round corners with a cool negligence that disdains to blow the horn. Only in the villages, where pigs and water buffloes are apt to monopoloze the road, do we have to slow down for a breathing space. Still, we get across the plain with whole necks as usual, and duly reward the motor man with 20 cents for not having kiled us.

After the motor, the boat. Earlier in the season, there were three boats; for the water had risen over the high road at the beginning and also over the wooden bridge in the middle of the lake, but not high enough for a boat to cross either obstruction. Since each boatman demanded the full fare he would have had for taking one the whole distance, and all the boatman were in league, it was an expensive business getting across the lake. But now, the water has sunk. It is possible for the motor to come right up to the old garage, and for the boat to pass under the bridge in the middle.

On one occasion, when passing under this same bridge, the water was at such a height that there was only just room for the boat to pass underneath, and for those passengers who were quick enough to duck their heads. We stooped, and under we went; but at the same time there was a ghastly sound like the crushing of a cocoanut. As soon as we had crossed, and were able to raise our eyes, we looked round to see whose head it was that had been reduced to pulp. But fortunately, it was only one of the rowlocks that had projected too high and been broken off.

The Pest House.

After the boat, the "Rest house." Some people call it the "pest house." It is not a very comfortable place. So built that it faces all the afternoon sun, and is carefully screened from all the cool breezes that blow on the Kiukiang bund, the building seems specially contrived to remind the Kuling holiday-makers of what they have been missing during the months of July and August. After sunset, the mosquitoes become unbearable, and if one has to wait late for a steamer, it is better to pick up the light luggage and take refuge on a seat on the bund, or on a hulk. Sooner or later, the steamer arrives with all its modern conveniences, and one is glad to get on board and enjoy the comforts of Western civilization, forgetting all about the perils and anxieties of the road, the shouting coolies, the flies and the heat.

PHILIPPINE FISHERIES

A Restrictive Measure

Manila, Sept. 12.

A bill has been introduced in the House of Representatives barring foreign fishermen from Philippine waters.

The bill is said to be aimed against the Japanese fishing industry in Manila Bay which has now become a virtual monopoly.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE str. Changsha on her last voyage upriver rescued the passengers of the China Merchants str. Kiangchang, which stranded on a paddy-field about a fortnight previously. The marooned passengers and crew were in a sorry plight, their provisions having given out and they were feeling the pangs of hunger. There were 250 passengers aboard the Kiangchang when it went ashore at a place about a mile above Sinhokow. At the time she was drawing about 10 feet of water.

AUTUMN IN KULING

Sunny Days and Cool, Starlight Nights: Kiangsi Tuchun's Mysterious Departure

FORM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Kuling, Sept. 6.

Tuchun Tsai of Kiangsi has spent five weeks of the summer upon the hill. The great man himself with his suite occupied three bungalows in the West Valley, surrounded by the tents of his retainers and body-guards. Both the coming and the going of so large a company proved a strain upon the resources of the traffic department. The lines of Macaulay provide an almost appropriate description:—

A mile around the city
The throng stopped up the ways;
A fearful sight it was to see
Through too long nights and days.

Not merely the fact that the large retinue which swarmed up the road for two days required a great many coolies for both chairs and baggage, but the complicating circumstance that a lot of coolies ran away to avoid being impressed into the service—made it very difficult for ordinary travellers to get up or down the mountain.

A good deal of mystery surrounded the departure from the hill of Governor Tsai. A week before he actually left, the native press of the province had announced his return to the Yamên in Nanchang. No one was allowed to know beforehand the exact date of his journey, and the actual event was practically unnoticed in the general turnout of secondary wives, generals and officers.

Before leaving the Tuchun entertained the members of the Kuling Council at a dinner in his bungalow, and made himself extremely affable.

Rush Down the Hill Begun.

The Kuling season is closing as it so often does, with the best weather of the summer. Just as the rush down the hill begins, and the houses in the valley are being left empty, Kuling puts on its most attractive aspect. Instead of the blazing days and sultry nights of August, there came days of genial warmth, and cool nights of brilliant starlight. Nevertheless, the missionary population of Kuling has to make a dash for the sun dried plains in order to re-open schools, make journeys to their out stations, and otherwise pick up again the dropped threads of their occupation. It is only the favoured permanent inhabitants, whose work lies in Kuling, who can linger on to enjoy the delightful weather of early autumn.

Tennis Champion's Third Victory.

The annual tennis tournament has been won, for the third year in succession, by Graham, who thereby makes himself possessor of the silver cup presented by Mr. Blackstone which has never before been retained by the tennis champion.

Graham's final match against Penfield was one of the most thrilling that has been played on the Kuling courts. The score after the first four sets was two all. In the final game, Graham appeared to have mastered his opponent, and contrived to reach the score of 5-love. After this Penfield revived, and won four games in succession. The next game had reached the score of 40-30 in favour of Graham when Penfield by unluckily missing an easy strike at the net lost the game, and thereby the tournament.

The excitement even surpassed the thrill of last year's final when Bradley won the first two sets against Graham, and the latter afterwards pulled the score round to 2 all, and then won the last set easily. There is no doubt, that Graham's great asset is his staying power, which enables him to recover even after a match is apparently lost, and to bring the score round again in his own favour when his opponent is beginning to get exhausted.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE MISSIONARY'S REJOINDER

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—The weekly arrival of your esteemed paper is a great event in many a mission station up country. When, as sometimes happens, it fails to come on the usual day, the postman is scowled at as if he had "done something!"

The lady of the house is no less keen to see the Woman's Page, than paterfamilias who waits to sink into the nearest chair to digest foreign telegrams and China's politics.

In recent months, zest has been added to our dependable recreation by the numerous references to missionaries, and criticisms in more or less general terms of their calling, methods, message and other aspects of their work.

It is good to see ourselves as others see us, and your correspondents, as well, perhaps, as the editor's pen itself, have given many of us a good laugh!

There is a juvenile hymn which says.

"If a smile you can renew,
As your journey you pursue,
Oh the good you all may do!
As the days are going by."

The smile has been renewed, the criticisms have been more enlightening, and we are (I hope all) flattered by the kind things that have been said. May you have your full reward. I hope the restraint which missionaries have exercised in not writing hundreds of letters in reply has duly impressed you.

And now, Sir, may I suggest a few points that strike one of the criticized in his hermit home far up country?

First, why are we singled out as a class and judged by the minority of "cranks" who make themselves conspicuous? We are as respectable, intelligent, and as loyal to our nationality and our supporters as our fellow citizens are in their various respective callings.

Take us man by man and compare us with official, commercial, military, naval, or any other fraternity and put intelligence against intelligence, ability with ability, and as regards education, physique, or other qualities—not excluded by religion—and the missionary body has nothing to fear! For every "keen wire" in other walks of life, the missionaries could put up their man too, and find failures and cranks among our critics to pair with our own.

How would it do to publish a few articles by missionaries on the "Commercial men in the Far East?" Such articles might be very informing, but would in all probability deal too much with the defects of the defectives! And that obvious injustice would not be overlooked. For we have all our human limitations!

In the ship's smoking room the perennial topic of "Those adjective missionaries" comes up and a familiar type of man takes the floor. "I am not," he observes, "a religious man myself, but I think missionaries ought to be, do or be done to, so-and-so."

With such a preface, quite frequently obviously superfluous, the intensely religious man and the religion he holds dearer than life are freely criticized. Why, at such times, is common sense laid aside? What would any of us say of a man who stated his conviction that operas and concerts should be abolished by act of Parliament, because he had never heard anything in music but a foolish noise.

Has the man devoid of artistic perception a right to say, "I am not a painter myself but I think Art Galleries are an insult to man's intelligence, for one picture is as good as another, etc." Who would put any value on such a remark! Hence a missionary can take with the proverbial grain of salt the criticisms of those in whom the religious sense is dull.

St. Paul's statement in 2 Corinthians II. 12. is an incontrovertible fact, proved by every attempt to disprove it. He says: "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him, neither can he know them." We accept this assertion of our conspicuous foolishness.

This may suggest the criticism again referred to in your recent article of Mr. Nathanial Peffer, that missionaries with blind bigotry fail to see the good in the native religions. This apparent neglect of my confreres and myself is due, may I say to the fact, often overlooked, that we study "Comparative religions" not from expurgated translations or tit bits in popular journals, but from intimate knowledge of "things as they are" amongst the people with whom we fraternize with the utmost intimacy, as well as from the original works.

If our fellow nationals do not understand us, our aims, or our work, let us pass at least as members of a respectable profession trying to do what Our Lord commanded "preach to every creature."

Every year at one or other of the London May meetings the Duke of Wellington's remark about missions is quoted "Look to your marching orders" he said. That is all we are trying to do. Go. Preach everywhere.

I do not understand why representatives of foreign firms rush round the country with letter files, sheaves of foolscap, elastic bands and other paraphernalia, nor have I inquired why there should be so many trademarks for similar goods sold by one big concern. These gentlemen are welcome to the best my humble house affords when they pass our way. Though I do not understand much about their various business, I take it for granted that they are obeying their chiefs' orders and know their own job. I leave it at that. "Same here" Sir! My job is Bibles, Tracts, Hymns, outwardly, and behind it sympathy, and cheer and hope to the weary and troubled souls one may with long patience get to know.

Not every one is our client, and moreover, there are many who do not need sugar or sewing machines, but each agent finds his own patrons!

Consul or drummer, journalist or missionary, we are "white men" and our common interests are many.

Why cut dead and curse the man in another line whose wares don't interest you? Let's play fair. Perhaps some day they may. The missionary is at your service then.

Enclosing my card.

I am, etc.,
EVANGELIST.

HAVE WE A BIBLE OF AUTHORITY?

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Mr. G. P. Bostick asks some questions which he would like some Modernist to answer. Without claiming to be either a Modernist or a Fundamentalist, but a cross between the two, may I still be permitted to attempt an answer to his questions, my only excuse being that in our generation there is an increasing number of people who think along the lines following.

Mr. Bostick asks: "Have we a Bible with any authority in its declarations and teachings? If we have such a book, whence came it?"

My answer would be that we do have such a book, the old and New Testaments—the Bible. Whence came it? From the hearts of men, illuminated by the light of God. And in proportion as the heart of a prophet or apostle was so illuminated, was his message divine; inspiration is not something absolute, but exists in degrees. We can speak of one prophet being more inspired than another, and his message bearing more the stamp of divine wisdom than another's merely because we know that all human beings are not equal in any of their faculties, and that they may not all be equal in their sensitiveness to divine inspiration is at least reasonable. But what is inspiration? Is it held by the Fundamentalists that God dictated the Bible word for word? Is not inspiration rather the communism between the divine spirit in man and the divine over-soul that we call God? If it be so, then Mr. Bostick's other question—whether the Bible be divinely inspired or man-made—is easily answered, for then we see that the the Bible is both divinely inspired and man-made, a possibility that seems to have occurred to neither the Fundamentalists nor the Modernists. The Bible is the result of inter-action between the human spirit and the divine spirit, and in some portions of it this inter-action is more apparent than in others, and in some portions, again, perhaps not at all apparent.

But should this view lead to despair? Should we say with Mr. Bostick that "if men are wrong in such a conception (that the Bible is divinely inspired) there is then absolutely nowhere to look for guidance for this life?" Not at all. "The Kingdom of Heaven," said Christ, "is within you." If so, Truth must also be within you; divine wisdom must be within you, and one may therefore look for guidance to the "still, small voice"—"the voice of the silence"—the sound of the hidden God—within.

Where was the "guidance for this life" before Moses came down from Mount Sinai? Was it not this "still, small voice?" Has it been stifled since then? If it has, it has been the hand of man himself that has done it, looking for ever without, and failing to turn within. But just as surely can this all but atrophied faculty of spiritual sensitiveness be restored to normal health and strength, by the practice of ever turning within, down deep into our own souls, whence the truth will manifest itself, more and more insistently as this practice grows on us. There is more than the surface meaning in the injunction: "Seek, and you shall find."

I am, etc.

SOPHIA.

Shanghai, Sept. 11. 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Following on the lines of "Sophia's" letter, I would like to be allowed to express my conviction that the solution of the controversy between "Fundamentalist" and "Modernist" lies in a clear apprehension of the seat of spiritual authority. This has been the crux since the Reformation. There are some who depend on the infallibility of the Pope, others who rest on the infallibility of the Bible, others again who only trust their own judgment. But the human mind was never made to be sustained by infallibles. We walk by faith, and prove the saying true, "Solvitur ambulando" —"He that doeth the Will shall know of the doctrine."

Yet we have authority, only we cannot say, "So here and so there" concerning it, as if it were something ready made. There is such a thing as the fallacy of simplification, the error of supposing that you get to the absolute truth by ignoring all that is not black or white. Earlier scientists, with Herbert Spencer for a spokesman, or Grant Allen, thought that Life began in sheer simplicity. Where is that simplicity now. So it is with authority, which is another sign of God in His world.

And if you cannot simplify Authority, neither can you externalize it. A. Labatier has dealt finely with that point in "Religion of Authority and of the Spirit," yet the title of his book is a false antithesis.

Are we not coming to see that Authority in spiritual things is a three-fold cord—the Inspiration of Scripture, the Communion of Saints, and the Indwelling of the Spirit? These three contribute vitally and none must be ignored in determining what is true or right. It would be easy to show, for history is our witness, that dependence on any one of thsee factors to the exclusion of the others leads to error, division and disaster. It was on this three-fold authority that the leaders of the Reformation acted, although they did not make their position explicit (perhaps "that they without us might not be made perfect"), but by stress of controversy it came to be a question of Bible versus Pope, with Socinians against both. The troubles of the Church to-day will not be solved until the Trinity in Authority, as well as the Trinity in Deity, is accepted and confessed.

FOREIGNERS AND THE WAR

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In reply to W.A.G.'s comments on my strictures upon the foreign sightseer who last Sunday took charge of a machine gun from a Chekiang soldier and emptied a belt of ammunition into the Kiangsu line, and in response to the demand for substantiation of my statement, I may state that the authority for such is the correspondent of the "Shanghai Times," whose report was published in that paper on Monday last, describing the incident as mentioned in my previous letter.

CHINESE AND FOREIGNER

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—After reading "Handi Twoem's" letter in your correspondence columns to-day, I absolutely fail to see why foreign residents in China should behave differently from the way in which foreigners are expected to behave in Europe and America.

First of all it must be borne in mind that China is the land of the Chinese and foreigners are guests whom the Chinese have allowed to come and live in their midst. All treaties to this effect have only been means to obtain such permission from China.

Secondly the chaotic internal conditions in China (whose historical significance only a few foreigners have hitherto grasped), like similar conditions that have existed at different times in other countries, furnish no just ground for foreigners to intervene and encroach upon the rights of the afflicted country. The fact that foreign trade is hampered by civil war or political unrest does not entitle foreigners, who have the choice to leave or to remain, to meddle with the internal affairs of a country.

While losses in life and property suffered by foreigners during times of civil warfare and commotion in China are much regretted by the whole Chinese nation, friendly powers should treat cases of this nature in the same way as they do in Europe or America. I venture to challenge any one to show me that in an area equal in size and population anywhere in Europe, foreigners have not suffered more both in number and intensity than they do in China. Yet no foreigners there have been foolish enough to advocate such things as extraterritoriality and allied institutions.

I agree with your correspondent that nations sometimes may be treated like individuals. In this sense I fail to see the difference of a moral kind between nations making war and individuals engaged in a fight. I do not see wherein the "Great War," which was waged for gain of one kind or another, causing sufferings not known in China and rendering the whole of Europe infinitely more unhappy than it was before, was more honourable than a war between selfish militarists in China who also claim that they are fighting for peace and justice. Europe is nearly as large as China; the fact that it is hopelessly divided in nationality and aspiration gives no justification to the European countries to make among themselves wars of an offensive or defensive nature.

As to the question of giving hospitality to refugees, it has little to do with the causes of suffering, but it does call forth the exercise of the native human instinct and chivalry or giving help to those who are in distress, which should be done among decent people without the despicable desire to take advantage of other people's misfortune.

If the majority of the people in Europe were not believers in the solution of problems by brutal force and were capable of forestalling dangers and effectively control the situation, the horrors of 1914 to 1918 and their consequences would have never occurred. A similar situation exists in China at least in this one respect, namely at present the Chinese people have not yet learned to control the situation in China and to direct their own affairs. We have yet to see whether peace, harmony and unity are first established here or in Europe.

Unity in Europe is hopeless, harmony very remote; consequently peace has never reigned throughout that continent at any time as it had done in China again and again. However, I would never consider it right for China, were she prosperous and powerful, to force herself upon a distracted country or continent at any time against the wishes of the native people.

I remember during the Sinn Fein revolt in Ireland soon after the outbreak of the "Great War," merciless fighting and bombardment took place in the Irish capital causing great alarm and losses to natives and foreigners alike; but I never thought that China in concert with other powers had any ground to intervene or to advocate extra-territoriality, because China's tea or silk trade was for the moment jeopardized or because a handful of Chinese in Dublin and the rest of Ireland were endangered. Even if China had plenty of super-dreadnoughts to spare, she had no business sending them there. I would rather that the Chinese would withdraw from that country than advocate such absurd things as the acquiring of concessions and extra-territorial rights, which would embitter patriotic Irishmen and the British people.

Not so very long ago in the Ruhr and other occupied territory on the Rhine there was such lawlessness and chaos that the people in these unhappy regions lived under much worse conditions than people in Shanghai at present, but no "great powers" attempted to interfere forcibly although trade which is life to certain nations was completely at a standstill, causing millions to be thrown out of work—a matter far more serious than a handful of foreigners in China suffering from the reports of unrest.

What would have happened, if foreign Powers advocated policing the railways of the United States on account of the train hold-up by bandits in Illinois on the night of June 12 last, supposing some foreigners were endangered and hurt? No one even thought of such a thing, because he knew it was absurd.

Strange it is to say that things which foreigners would not dare or expect to do in Europe and America they would do in China, and then say they are helping China.

When foreign countries forbid Chinese immigrants to enter, they say they are exercising their sovereign rights. When their nationals come to China, they want to maintain an "Open Door" policy, extra-territoriality, special or international settlements, leases of territory, etc. The control of the so-called international settlement is also international with China excluded as one of the nations in the world, so that the Chinese living in them have no votes in electing its governing body or being represented on it. Some foreigners will say these privileges enjoyed by foreigners are based on treaty rights, as if treaties are infallible documents of righteousness and jutice.

Now I am not one of those who advocate the exclusion of certain types of foreigners as Canada, Australia, the United States do with respect to Chinese immigrants, because I think it wrong for China to emulate others in meanness and selfishness. On the other hand I want China to do unto others as she would be done unto. But I wish our foreign guests to know their proper place in China and to cooperate with us as friends. I belong to those who believe firmly in the eventual triumph of international brotherhood and good will, and I consider all attempts to encroach upon the inalienable rights of other peoples as a menace to these precious objectives. In order to hasten the coming of a better day, causes for friction and distrust must be removed and it is this motive which has prompted me to request friendly foreigners to cooperate.

A CHINESE WHO LIVES OUTSIDE THE SETTLEMENT.

Shanghai, Sept. 14, 1924.

The above writer is entitled to reply but we deprecate further correspondence on this subject. This letter bristles with false assumptions, syllogisms and assertions—what serious-minded foreigner for instance expresses or feels "the despicable desire to take advantage" of China's misfortunes? But to answer these would only breed ill feeling. We will content ourselves with most cordially and wholeheartedly endorsing our correspondent's desire for "China to do unto others as she would be done unto." If only she really would!—Ed.

"CIVIL COMMOTION" OR WAR.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I would be much obliged if you would allow me a little space to reply to "Once Bitten" in the above connexion as I consider he does not fully appreciate the function of insurance companies.

As he correctly states, their aim is to collect adequate contributions from the community to indemnify the losses of a few. In order to calculate an adequate contribution, however, statistics have to be compiled from the experience of many companies over a period of years and naturally this varies according to the contingencies provided against. When "Once Bitten" obtained a "householder's" policy, he was charged a rate commensurate with the cover provided, and if he had read the conditions, he would have found that that against "War" was expressly excluded. The shade of difference between "Riot and Civil Commotion" and "Civil War" has been defined for some years, and if he had inquired from his insurers on making this proposal, they would have given him this information. Had he specially desired that cover, he would have been charged an extra premium—in all probability quite nominal, if it were before the commencement of hostilities—but now, with fighting within a few miles, he should not be surprised if such cover be refused.

With regard to "Once Bitten's" denouncement of insurance companies in general, I would inform him that in loss settlements they usually err on the generous side if only for advertisement sake.

Thanking you for the publication of this letter.

A CHINESE FALLACY

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I have heard many times of the Allies' reasons, that is, reasons as advanced by the Allies, for having gone to the Great War. I have also heard of reasons of the Central powers for having waged that war,—reason as plausible and as praiseworthy as those of the Allies. Which are we to believe? We believe none of them. We think that the purposes of the combatant Governments in that war (perhaps except those of the Government of the United States) are as base and wicked as those of the war fought over two thousand years ago between the states of Wu and Yueh as described in your leader of the 10th instant,—the greed for wealth and power. Only, in its modern form, we call it the desire for world domination and the struggle for world markets. We also think that the masses of the Allied and Central Powers each believe in the merits of the case as presented by their own government. That accounted for the heroic sacrifices made by all of them and for the fact that "every penny raised by Great Britain for the prosecution of the war was voted by Parliament, the duly elected representatives of the people, and with their fullest approval." (This remark is not intended as an insult to the intelligence of the British people, but rather as a compliment to their heart.)

Now let us go back to the present war in China. Does not the Government at Peking declare Marshal Lu a rebel and order Marshal Chi to march an army against him? Do not Marshal Lu and his allies, on the other hand, stand up for constitutional government and wage war against the illegal government in the North? Are not the purposes of both parties equally worthy and noble,—and as worthy and noble as those of the Allied and Central Powers? Only we do not believe them; we say that we do not believe them; and we do not attempt to induce others to believe them. The insincerity of the declarations of both parties to the present war is so transparent that no one could believe them. We Chinese are not good liars. We sometimes try to deceive others but we seldom deceive them. Our government cannot weave a story so ingeniously and after so many years of secret planning and designing that it would convince others. If it attempts anything at all, it turns out only shot silk,—every side of the fabric shows its own colours and the whole fabric is a contradiction in itself. Our people are frank or loose-tongued and soon point out to the world the different colours at variance. China will be a great Power, when her government knows how to concoct a convincing story and her people learn how to pretend to believe it.

VOLUNTEERS AND THE UNEMPLOYED.

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—With reference to the Volunteers question, which, seemingly is on the end of every young man's tongue at the present time and about which occasional paragraphs also make their appearance in your esteemed paper, I should like to mention that since the war cloud has overshadowed Shanghai I have been asked by no less than three members of the Shanghai Volunteer Corps questions such as, "Why don't you join up?" or, "The settlement is almost sure to want protection by-and-bye," etc. Now I am not a pessimist, far from it, and, Sir, it is really most amazing how these questions take me back to 1914 and a real war, when the greatest of all military organizers, namely, Lord Kitchener, was calling for volunteers and at every street corner you could not miss his portrait on large posters, which pointed at one from all directions as one approached it, headed by the simple words, "We want you!" or, "Your country needs you!" or similar words to that effect and he got them.

Personally, my actual war service spreads over a period of five years and 11 months, from the very first day England declared war on Germany until May, 1919, when I was demobilized, after serving at the Dardanelles, Italy, Austria, Egypt, etc., so you see, Sir, that I have actually seen war and in some of its most horrible forms and I am not a volunteer, not because I don't want to be. I firmly believe that every able man in Shanghai should join, and when I voiced my sentiments to my volunteer friends the obvious and expected answer came back at me like a round of .303 from a Maxim gun. "Well, why don't you join?" And then I had to tell them that I was one of the big army of unemployed Britishers that is in Shanghai to-day. The next question was, why don't you leave Shanghai? I told them that I would if I could only find a temporary situation that would enable me to raise sufficient money to pay my passage, and I know many Britishers who are situated the same as myself. I dare say that if some of the firms and departments were to dispense with the services of some of the Russians who have crept in and taken situations at greatly reduced salaries and employ Britishers instead, I have no doubt that the Volunteer Corps would increase rapidly in strength. I see that a temporary Corps has been suggested. Well, why not pay the men? It is obvious that a man who is wanted in the volunteers cannot look for work at the same time. Or perhaps better still, form a Russian Corps. (There's enough on the Bund). And let them protect the Settlement; I think that would be advantageous to everybody, especially if it could be arranged to keep them in the Chapei district.

Trusting that you can find space for publication.

I am, etc.,

UNEMPLOYED BRITISHER.

P.S. Excuse writing as I am writing under an oil lamp. The gentleman whom I am living with is also a Britisher and unemployed and cannot afford to have electricity laid on. This is not meant to appear as a frivolous remark but is a bare fact and can stand investigation.

MIRI NOT MERI

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS,"

SIR,—Miri (not Meri) is on the coast line of Sarawak (silent k) between Baraam Point and Bintula.

The mouth of the Miri River is about ten miles from Baraam Point and River, both are usually marked on maps.

Miri is also marked on up-to-date maps. The name Miri comes from Mérah which means red, the river being a dull red colour. At present there is in Shanghai an engineer who was one of a small party who put Miri on the map. His wife was the first lady to receive permission to reside in Miri and lived there for over three years. Miri used to be a health resort and a splendid place for game shooting.

A STUDY OF THE PUBLIC GARDENS

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Some time ago I lost my job, never mind why; I lost it and it has not been found since—neither has any other! Having been a true specimen of the Shanghai male species my bank account on the day of my freedom registered "zero," unless you want to count 65 cents large money—which are paid in small money—real money. To me the feeling of still having an account with one of Shanghai's leading banks is worth 65 cents, so I let them ride until with interest accrued I can buy a share in the local Tramways, understanding from your boosting given to this company that such would be a good and safe investment. But I am getting away from my subject.

Being now a "gentleman of leisure" I have given my time exclusively to the study of the Public Garden on the Bund, the one into which "foreigners only" may be admitted, meaning by that anything under the sun that cannot prove Chinese citizenship. And you would be surprised to know just how many varieties there are that come under the heading "foreigners only!" Why, it's a complete course in anthropology to spend just one whole day in that garden! I never had any idea that God's little Zoo was that large and had so many different animals. Sure, it's a shame they won't let the Chinese in—the collection would then be complete. But, to tell you the truth, if I were Chinese, I'd rather be on the side where it says: "Don't feed the animals" instead of in the cage with the sign: "Best-looking foreigner in captivity."

However, I am drifting again. You see, when a man is a gentleman at leisure he has plenty of time to think—sometimes sense, mostly non-sense. The latter is what I believe I indulge in more frequently anyway, and someone already has hinted that this was the reason I lost my job. Well, to get back: I have now studied the Public Garden and its surroundings for a matter of two months and I am familiar with the face of nearly every inhabitant, and with some of them I have even struck a personal acquaintance. Birds of a feather. . . . you know.

Do you realize, Sir, that there seems to be quite an epidemic here in Shanghai in losing one's job? Why, everyone I talked to did not have one, and, what's worse, all seemed to have come expressly to these blessed shores to lose one, as though it couldn't be got rid of in the States or Australia or Czecho-Slovakia just as easily! There must be something wrong with the climate out here and I have quit blaming myself for having lost mine and not being able to find it again. There is Charley and Tom and Bill whose jobs terminated on coming up the Huangpu, there is "Steve" and "Red" and "Bull" who somehow or other lost their ticket in "Hongkew more far," and there are Messrs. X. Y. & Z. who can tell you a lot about business conditions in China in general and the financial position of their former employers in particular. And there are hundreds of others whose story might also be interesting to listen to if one were only able to understand their lingo. And then, of course, there are the Russians!

Now, a distinct line should be drawn between the latter category and the former, the latter having come here without a job of their own free will, whereas the former were brought out here with a purpose, i.e., to perform work for which their training made them fit. If they are now out of work it is, as I hinted, not always their fault, but frequently the cause is to be found in circumstances which were beyond the control of either themselves or those who originally were responsible for their being deposited on these shores. The Russians are being looked after by some kind of a committee, the others—well, of course, they could go to their consuls and ask to be sent home, but a true "he-man" considers that next to begging and would sooner keep on looking, no, hunting for work which cannot be found, and pulling his belt a little tighter when the gun is shot off at noon. However, there are only so many holes to an average belt and a day might come that the innocent victim will punch a hole in his belt to make it fit tight around his neck——

Personally I have acquired a nice outdoor tan while studying Public Garden conditions and my friends congratulate me upon my appearance of health. I have lost some weight—undoubtedly superfluous—and feel fit as a fiddle, but it's raining to-day, and Tom and Bill and the rest of them, who were able to joke about their hard luck while the sun was shining, but who, I know, detest rain, keep coming into mind. They are not half so cheerful, especially since the first of the month, when they had to give up their rooms and make permanent quarters in the Great Outdoors.

Now, Sir, what I am driving at is this: Is there no way of getting work for men who know how to work, who want to work and are fit to work in the line in which they have been trained? Sure, business conditions are rotten, but there is no use in harping on that line of excuse when there is so much money left for things not at all consistent with the so-called bad times. I have always given Shanghai credit for being a charitable town, ready to help where help is needed, but what is wanted in this case is not charity, but an organization of employers to provide work for the unemployed members of this community who are their own nationals. With your help and that of the Chambers of Commerce the task should not be so difficult.

Is my letter too long for publication, and did I change the subject too often? Then just throw it into the editorial waste-paper basket, and I shall try some other time—when it is not raining—to write you some more cheerful lines regarding my studies of the Public Gardens alias "The Beach."

Enclosing my card,

I am, etc.,

A GENTLEMAN BEACHCOMBER.

TWO KINDS OF LABOUR VIEWS

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—It is about time someone made a protest in your columns against the Labour news and opinions which you serve up to the public of Shanghai.

Your Manchester correspondent is surely a member of either "The Primrose League" or else a hanger on at one of the new conservative workingmen's clubs, the heads of which are at home to-day, trying to gain the votes of the workers by supplying their dope, but are finding it a difficult job to lead any of the working people up the garden.

In your to-day's notes and comments, you give us two glowing examples of Trade Union respectability, and intelligent leadership. "The Seamen's Union" and the "Shipconstructors and Shipwrights Association." (When referring to "The Seamen's Union" I presume you mean that section led so nobly by Havelock Wilson, as I am certain that Mr. Shinwell's union and his leadership would never find grace in your columns) one has only to trace the doings of Mr. Wilson for the past 10 years to realize why the British sailor and fireman have about the worst living accommodation and conditions of any of the maritime nations. If you pursue the reports of the trade union congresses for the past five years, you shall be no longer ignorant of the measure of respect which Mr. Wilson occupies in the minds of class-conscious Labour in the British Isles. No, Sir, we have no further time for Labour Fakirs of his kidney, and thank goodness they are now getting the order of the boot.

I happen to have been closely associated with the "Shipwrights Society" and have come in contact with the respected head more than once, Mr. Alexander Wilkie, ex M.P. for Dundee, and friend of Winston Churchill (on his own admission) and it is said a man is known by the company he keeps. I have been present at a meeting of shipwrights—an extraordinary meeting, which forced Alex to come before the members and listen to an indictment against his administration of the societies' affairs and mismanagement of their financial interests, which amounted to branding him as a servant of the employers, and in trade unionism that means treachery. And, Sir, this happened in the district in which the first branch of the Society was formed, and the charge came from the men and sons of the men that had been first instrumental in putting him in the position he occupied. The direct charges against him being, that he invested their hard-earned contributions without the consent of the members and other delinquencies against Trade Union Law rather numerous to mention.

The heads of these two societies are about the two worst examples you could have put before the public as paragons of intelligence and respectability. The result of their leadership being the forming by the really intelligent and class-conscious members new societies altogether, because they no longer would allow their welfare to be in the hands of such men. Perhaps you will ask why the members did not vote them out; one has got to have a close knowledge of trade unions before that question can be answered, suffice to say, that I know of resolutions which have been sent to the head office and that they never got any further than Alex Wilkie's waste paper basket, and were never seen by the executive.

I ask you—where are these two Angels which you put before your readers to-day? What position do they occupy in the Labour Cabinet? What is their measure in the minds of really good socialists? Sir. Their names stink. The workers are gradually winnowing out the chaff.

I am not writing anything which has the communistic taint, the stimulating power in home labour circles is the "Independent Labour Party," and thank God for such a body. Evergreen memory, respect, and admiration to the life and work of Keir Hardie, who was instrumental in lighting the lamps in the life of the workers of Scotland. The Scottish insistance and perseverance of his great truth and example, is to-day bearing fruit, not only at home but wherever men look up with hope to that time, when all the people of this globe can live in peace and harmony.

Some time ago in one of your Labour correspondent's epistles, it was stated that he had been touring the I.L.P. branches of Manchester and that in at least one of them drink was for sale. I emphatically protest against that falsehood, and you are being deceived if you are paying money for such copy. But perhaps, that kind of copy is quite in keeping with your editorial policy, and may be part of the insidious propaganda against socialism generally which the Editors of the Capitalistic press are bound to publish if they wish to keep their positions under their present taskmasters.

Now, Sir, every sensible trade union leader and member of the rank and file know that the strike is the last resort, but you put the blame of the strikes at the door of the workers and their leaders, forgetting that in nearly all cases, it has been the employers' absolute refusal to submit to arbitration which has caused most of the Labour troubles since the war. I give the recent transport workers and miners disputes as an example.

Really, Sir, I do not think it is fair to voice such opinions as you do in your columns to an individual in touch with Labour circles at home, they are the merest drivel and for the sake of your paper you should try and rectify matters, remember, the world is getting more wise in these matters daily.

You can fool some of the people all the time. All the people, some of the time. But you can't fool all the people all the time.

I am, etc.,

ADZE.

Shanghai, Sept. 13, 1924.

There are two views of Labour questions in the Labour party as outside it. The above writer represents one; our Labour correspondent (who, by the way is a genuine working man) represents another. In due course he will perhaps write something in answer to the above letter. "Adze's" theories as to why we continue to publish our Home Labour correspondent's letters do not appear worth discussing.—Ed.

WU PEI-FU AND CHAO HENG-TI

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Writers on Chinese affairs seem constantly to make mistakes when they wander away from the small area immediately under their eyes. For instance, in your leader of September 5 you repeat the familiar, but entirely erroneous, statement that Wu P'ei-fu "has put in his own lieutenants as Tuchuns of Hupeh and Hunan." Nothing is further from the truth so far as Hunan is concerned. Chao Heng-ti by intrigue elbowed Tan Yen-k'ai out of the civil governorship of Hunan in 1920 and has held the post ever since, having been confirmed in it by the election held in 1922 under the provincial constitution.

Since 1920 Hunan has accepted no mandates from Peking or from anyone else and, although it is doubtless true that Wu P'ei-fu could have evicted Chao Heng-ti by force of arms at any time since 1921, the fact remains that he did not put Chao Heng-ti into office at Changsha.

Nor can Chao Heng-ti fairly be described as a lieutenant of Wu P'eifu. He fought against him from 1918-1920 and again in 1921. In 1923 Northern troops gave moral support to Chao Heng-ti in his struggle with Tan Yen-k'ai but they never took any active part in the fighting. Chao Heng-ti has never, therefore, fought on the same side as Wu P'ei-fu since the latter gained an independent command.

I might add that there has been no Tuchun of Hunan since Chang Ching-yao's flight in June, 1920. Chao Heng-ti is governor and he emphasizes the strictly unmilitary character of his office by never appearing in military uniform.

THE SCHERER CASE

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I have just read the result of the Scherer retrial, and while I am pleased at the reduction of the sentence. Still three years is far too long for a foreigner to languish in a Chinese prison under the insanitary conditions and the other sufferings a man must undergo. Cannot we foreigners do something to try and have his sentence still further reduced? If we all signed a monster petition, surely some notice would be taken. Is there not some German in our midst who will organize this? I shall willingly give my signature. I may say I am British, and I shall do my best to interest my acquaintances of all nationalities to sign, also. Now is the time to act. I consider it our duty, and a Christian-like act, to try and help this man.

On September 5 you were kind enough to publish a letter of mine re this subject.

THE COMING SOCCER SEASON

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Some time back, a suggestion was made in your columns that the two strongest clubs, the Recs. and the S.F.C., drop out from the First League for the coming season. I do not think this practicable and many disadvantages immediately present themselves to one. Our best players will not be playing every Saturday, the standard of football will thus suffer considerably and there will be less enthusiasm. When the Interport event arrives, will they be at their best?

Why not weaken these two clubs by taking a few players from both and forming another club that will include them? I would like to suggest that the Machine Gunners, (who have done so well in cricket) enter a team in our First League. I know of two of the Club's best, and two of the Recs' best, who belong to that unit, and, with the rest of the Emma Gees, they ought to render a very good account of themselves. Their entering would decidedly even up the strength of all clubs and one hopes that then we shall not hear so much of this talk of weaker clubs wanting to drop out altogether, and the writer feels sure that Shanghai football will benefit greatly by it.

LAW REPORTS

MAN WHO ANNEXED BRITISH FLAG

A Demand to be made Sergt.-Major of the Sikh Police: Sanity Questioned

Faroz Khan, who caused consternation at the British Consulate on Sunday by walking off with the big ensign which usually flies at the Consulate masthead, but which at the time was hung out to dry whilst a smaller one did duty, was charged before Mr. G. W. King in the Police Court, on Monday, with the theft of the colours. Evidence was given that the defendant, was arrested by a watchman whilst he was walking away with the flag.

Defendant—I did not steal the flag. I was going to return it. I do not need it.

The Magistrate—No, and you are not going to have it if you do.

Detective-Sergeant Forkin said that the defendant appeared to be mentally deficient and treated the matter as a joke. He imagined that he had a launch on the river which was short of a flag and he admitted having taken the Consulate colours in order to make up the deficiency. Witness detained him more for his own safety than anything else. Last Friday the man twice had to be ejected from the Central Police Station, where he endeavoured to gain admittance to Capt. Barrett's office. He said that he wanted to be made sergeant-major in the Sikh police. He was in the Hongkong police for two years and had been in Shanghai about two months, but nothing more was known of him and how he arrived here was a mystery. On the way to the court that morning he tried to run away.

The defendant was remanded for further inquiries and a medical examination.

A BAKERY ACCOUNT

Before Judge Purdy, in the U. S. Court for China, last Friday, Hall & Holtz, Ld., brought an action against C. Duffin in connexion with an account for the supply of 50,141 loaves of bread, pies, rolls, and cakes, at a cost of $5,487.16, of which $2,452.15 was unpaid.

Mr. E. O. Thomas, general manager of Messrs. Hall & Holtz, stated that the understanding with the defendant, as manager of the Sanitary Bakery, was that bread was to be baked and delivered for 10 cents per lb., the defendant to bear the expense of wrapping and delivery to the U. S. Naval ships in port. As a guarantee of payment a bill of sale was given to plaintiff by defendant for the special utensils necessary to bake this bread.

The defendant said that it was the understanding that the plaintiffs should wrap and deliver the bread, and that by failure to do so he had been put to large expense for wrapping and transportation. He also maintained that the balance charge against him was offset by the equipment held by Hall & Holtz but belonging to him.

The Judge said that it was inconceivable deliveries should have been made for some three months and that defendant should then claim the plaintiffs had failed to perform the contract. The wrapping claim, too, seemed like an afterthought, as no bill had been sent for the wrappe furnished by the defendant. Judgment was accordingly given for the plaintiffs for $2,442,15 ($10 having been later paid by the defendant) and interest at 8 per cent. per annum from June 23, 1924.

A police raid on 950 Woosung Road a few days ago, resulted in the appearance of a Chinese in the Mixed Court last Friday charged with importing arms and ammunition. Nine Mauser pistols and 1,000 rounds of ammunition were found in the house concealed in two boxes with false bottoms. The man told the Court that he was a carpenter and had made the boxes for an Indian. The Indian was responsible for the arms and ammunition, also, he having brought them to accused, later intending to import them to Hankow. Sentence of nine months' imprisonment was imposed.

U. S. SEAMEN'S CLAIM FOR WAGES

Story of Privations Endured While Stranded on the Beach at Shanghai

The hearing was resumed at the U. S. Commissioner's Court on Tuesday of the action brought by eight seaman, against the master and str. Owego for alleged arrears in wages.

Mr. Allen appeared for plaintiffs and Mr. Allman for the Owego.

Opening the case, Mr. Allen said the seamen had on March 5 signed articles not to exceed six months with an agreement to return to Seattle. On reaching Foochow they were paid one month's additional wages in addition to their ordinary pay and M. $130 to cover their passage home to Seattle. They were given to understand that on reaching Shanghai all arrangements had been made for them to travel on the Manila Maru. In Shanghai, however, they found that no accommodation was available in that vessel. At the shipping company's offices they were informed that accommodation should have been reserved before the vessel left Japan. They were unable to obtain any ship and had temporarily stayed at the Savoy Hotel until their funds had run low. Since then several of them had been in hospital, one with fever and another with pleurisy. Some of them had stayed at the Hanbury Institute.

S. Hughes, one of sailors, stated that he had been forced to accept the terms made, otherwise the captain had threatened to put him in irons. He did not agree to the settlement as it did not guarantee to get him back to the United States. He did not like the prospect of being stranded in Shanghai on the beach as it were. He had travelled from Foochow to Shanghai at his own expense. He did not see why he should travel as a coolie, partly for his own sake and for the sake of other foreigners who had their offices here and lived here permanently.

The other witnesses made similar statements. They did not know what would be the cost of returning to the States by an Empress boat. They estimated it at about double the amount given to them for their return passage.

The case was adjourned until next day.

The hearing was resumed on Wednesday.

Captain Cottle, master of the Owego giving evidence, stated that the American Consul in Foochow had been present when the men were discharged. There had been a misunderstanding about Hughes' statement that he was threatened with irons. The Consul had threatened Hughes with irons if he did not keep quiet. He was talking too much, and most of the men had been drinking. The mention of irons had nothing to do with the discharge. The Consul had had a talk with the men as to whether they should take money or should be provided with tickets. They came to the cabin and agreed to take the money. The question of transport had been settled between the men, the Consul and the agents.

Mr. Allan, for the plaintiffs, said that in the discussion there must have been some kind of talk about the Manila Maru. The majority of men had asked for tickets. The Consul had done his best but was in a difficult position.

The Judge stated that he doubted the authority of the Court to review an action taken by the Consul General.

Mr. Allan—The settlement was made to cover a period in the future, to get the men home. If they don't get there, it is not a settlement.

The Judge went on to say that he did not think such a thing would have happened in Shanghai. The consul here would have certainly given tickets. In Foochow the matter was different. If the settlement had been a fraudulent one, the Court would be able to step in. Mr. Allan had taken the view that the Consul had done his best. The men had accepted and the fact that things had not turned out quite as expected was quite beside the question. The men were of age and did not need to have guardians though, in the case of a settlement abroad in the case of seamen, it was made before the Consul to see that they got a square and fair deal.

Mr. Allan—This is a most unfair way of signing off seamen. The men were assured a passage.

The Judge—Neither you, nor I, nor anybody, could assure anyone of a ship. These things can't be assured. His Honour went on to say that they could not close their eyes to the fact that the seamen would rather have the money. One man who had received $100 gold had nothing left in four or five days. Seamen would rather have money and could always get jobs back home. Judgement was reserved.

IN the British Supreme Court, on Monday, pleadings were ordered in the case of the Secretary of State for India in Council v. Major C. M. Manners, a claim for Hk. $3,646.68, the difference between Indian and British army rates of pay drawn by defendant whilst technical recruiting officer in Shanghai. Mr. H. Lipson Ward appeared for plaintiff.

MRS. Myrtle E. Quelch sued Mr. H. Quelch in the British Supreme Court, on Monday, for Tls. 3,784, the equivalent of G. $2,800, due on 14 accounts. Defendant said that he thought Mrs. Quelch had re-married, but on Mr. M. Reader Harris, for plaintiff, stating that was the first he had heard of it, defendant withdrew the statement and judgment was entered for the amount claimed.

DAVIS CUP COMPETITION

Americans Retain Title in Challenge Round Against Australia

Philadelphia, Sept. 11.

The first two singles matches of the challenge round of the Davis Cup Competition were played here to-day, the holders winning both games.

W. T. Tilden (United States) defeated G. L. Patterson (Australia), 6-4, 6-2, 6-2.

Vincent Richards (United States) beat P. O'Hara Wood (Australia), 6-3, 6-2, 6-4.

Patterson took the lead, winning three games on brilliant service. Tilden then broke through and by masterly placings took the set. Tilden in the second set began a long-rance bombardment on his rival's backhand and won without being extended. Likewise the champion easily took the third set, Playing a back-court game, the American made a series of dazzling placings on the sidelines past Patterson's back-hand.

In the second match, Wood's pace and splendid placing was at first too much for Richards, but the latter soon found himself and by brisk volleying and severe serving won the set. He made few errors and played a careful driving game. The American took the second set through persistently coming to the net and swiftly rattling volley-shots past Wood. The Australian then rallied splendidly and pushed Richards to the utmost, but the American again won by terrific drives past his opponent.—Reuter's American Service.

Philadelphia, Sept. 12.

The United States, who have already secured both the first singles matches in the challenge round of the Davis Cup Competition against Australia, to-day ensured retaining the trophy by winning the doubles.

W. T. Tilden and W. M. Johnston beat G. L. Patterson and P. O'Hara Wood, 5-7, 6-3, 6-4, 6-1.

The weather was perfect. The only handicap was a strong cross-court wind. Patterson's dazzling drives and marvellous placing were much in evidence, but Tilden rose to even superior heights with cross-court shots and smashes.

The Americans throughout excelled in clean placing. Their tendency to net at the beginning of the match disappeared. They also shone at lobbing.

Sept. 13.

The "All Blacks" do not appear to compare with the 1905 side, which won a similar match by 55 points to 8. Devon County did remarkably well against the highly-trained and very fit New Zoalanders. There was no score in the first half-hour. The "All Blacks" led at the interval by 8 points to nil. Their backs were fast and clever, but they had difficulty with their seven-forward scrum formation.—Reuter.

INTERNATIONAL POLO

England Severely Defeated by United States at Meadowbrook

Meadowbrook, Sept. 13.

America defeated England to-day in the polo match by 16 to 5.

Later.

The Prince of Wales was present at the match. The Americans led throughout and overwhelmingly demonstrated their superiority. The British players were ineffective, apart from Mr. Lacey, the captain, who was outstandingly brilliant. He scored four of the five British goals notwithstanding the fact that he was handicapped by an injured shoulder.—Reuter's American Service.

New York, Sept. 13.

Considerable surprise has been manifested in polo circles by the unexpected departure, on the eve of the first match, of Viscount Wimborne, who boarded the Olympic at midnight and sailed at 5 o'clock in the morning. When questioned, the Viscount replied that he had nothing to say.

Second Test Match also Won by America: England's Improved Form

Meadowbrook, Sept. 16.

The second international polo test match to-day resulted in a victory for the United States over the British team by 14 goals to 5.

The Prince of Wales was among the 25,000 persons present.

The British players showed unexpectedly sound team work. They led at the end of the first chukker by two goals to one, but the Americans got into their stride in the second chukker and scored three goals. There was no scoring in the third, but at the end of the fourth the score stood at 8-2 in favour of the Americans. The British team started again in the second half with a brave attack and scored, but the American players continued to widen the margin to the end.—Reuter's American Service.

Rumours of Dissension in English Team.

The British team was yesterday announced by Mr. Lacey, the captain, as follows: Colonel Melville, Majors Atkinson and Hurndall, and Mr. Lacey; but to-day Major Phipps Hornby replaced Major Hurndall.

The dropping of Major Hurndall caused considerable surprise and revived the rumours of dissension in the team which were brought to a head by the departure of Viscount Wimborne, the chairman of the selection committee, on Saturday, just before the first test was played.

While the members of the team have always denied the existence of dissension, Major Hurndall is alleged to have said in the course of an interview with a New York paper that he did not mind being put off the team, but considered it high-handed procedure for the other members of the committee to change the team without consulting him. He is asserted to have cabled his views in regard to the matter to England and to be greatly put out over the whole business. Such things, Major Hurndall is alleged to have stated, had been proceeding ever since they started to practice for the international matches months ago, and many, including himself, blamed the numerous disagreements for the weakness of the team.—Reuter's American Service.

"STEAMERS threading the lanes of the alluring Pacific occasionally report the appearance of mysterious floating islands, a phenomenon which has stirred the imagination of man since the ancients wove the romantic story about the chaining down of the floating island of Delos," says a bulletin from the headquarters of the American National Geographic Society. "Within our own times a floating island 100 feet square, upon which trees 30 feet high were growing, drifted 1,000 miles out into the Atlantic, probably from the coast of the United States. "During July, 1892, this island, the tall trees of which made it visible for seven miles, was first seen about 250 miles south-east from Nantucket. By September it had drifted about six degrees farther north and 22 degrees farther east with the Gulf Stream, and it may have eventually landed on the coast of Europe.

Steam launches belonging to inland water transportation companies were seized at various places and the Shanghai-Nanking Railway Station was placed under military control. Business was brought virtually to a standstill. Chinese Government Bonds dropped suddenly in value and five local Chinese banks failed. Owing to the scare caused by military operations in the neighbourhood of Shanghai very large numbers of refugees, estimated at not less than 20,000, had sought refuge in the Settlement before the end of the month.

Four strikes involving 677 working people occurred during August. The price of rice at the end of the month averaged $15.00 per picul.

SOUTHERN RHODESIA

SOUTHERN Rhodesia which was inaugurated as the youngest self governing Colony of the British Empire on October 1, 1923, and which had previously for 33 years been ably administered by the British South Africa Company possesses one of the finest climates in the world with long hours of sunshine, breezy temperate days and cool nights. For those who wish to take up farming or ranching in order to make the most they can of their capital, energy and technical knowledge, or for those who wish to retire from strenuous business or professional life and make a home, Rhodesia offers many advantages unequalled elsewhere. The business, social, sporting, educational and medical facilities bear favourable comparison with those of other countries. Native labour is plentiful and when properly managed is cheap and efficient. Taxation is light. Good land in healthy surroundings and amidst fine scenery is plentiful and not expensive.

FOREIGN TELEGRAMS

GERMANY AND LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Berlin's Refusal to Enter Till "War Guilt" is Resolved

Berlin, Sept. 13.

An authoritative statement has been issued emphasizing that Germany cannot enter the League until the question of war guilt has been solved. The Covenant of the League of Nations, the statement declares, will have to be altered more favourably towards Germany before she enters the League, on the Council of which she must be allocated a permanent and not an elective seat.—Reuter.

Geneva, Sept. 12.

At a League Committee discussion to-day on the reduction of armaments, the consensus of opinion favoured settlement of disputes by arbitration supported by sanctions on the basis of the provisions of the Covenant.

Later.

The Financial Committee of the League of Nations to-day approved the Budget estimates of the International Labour Office for 1925, which total 7,105,000 Swiss francs. —Reuter.

Berlin, Sept. 13.

The authoritative announcement issued yesterday evening that Germany was unable to enter the League of Nations until the question of war guilt had been settled has created a sensation in the press. It is joyfully greeted by newspapers of the Right and denounced by the Democrats and the Socialists.

It is now announced that the statement emanated from Dr. Stresemann, and was his first act upon returning to Berlin.

A Cabinet crisis is considered certain.—Reuter.

Foreign Minister's Denial of Statement Regarding Terms of Entry.

Berlin, Sept. 15.

Dr. Stresemann, the Foreign Minister, denies that he was responsible for the statement with regard to Germany's conditions as to her entering the League of Nations. He declares that he has been misquoted. His view is that Germany's entry must not be made conditional on recognition by the German Government of Germany's alleged responsibility for the war. The Government, he says, holds the same views in this connexion as its predecessors.—Reuter.

Berlin, Sept. 16.

The Cabinet to-day did not discuss the question of the formal repudiation of Germany's war guilt, postponing the decision till President Ebert's return from holiday. It is officially announced that, after a long conversation between Herr Marx and Dr. Stresemann, no difference existed between them on the question.

Later.

Herr Marx's organ "Germania" says it is increasingly apparent that the repudiation of Germany's war guilt would aggravate the political situation, and therefore it may be taken for granted that the Cabinet on Thursday will shelve the question of formally notifying repudiation until a propitious moment arrives to revive the question.—Reuter.

Demand by Nationalists for Redemption of Promises by Government

Berlin, Sept. 17.

The Cabinet differences on the subject of proclaiming Germany's repudiation of her war guilt, have led the Nationalists to issue a manifesto demanding speedy redemption of the Government's promises made when the adoption of the Dawes Bills depended on the Nationalist votes, and also demanding that the Nationalists should share in the responsibility of the execution of the Bills and do their utmost to improve or revise the "impossible and unbearable stipulations of the London Pact" and threatening most vigorous opposition if the demands are not conceded.—Reuter.

GERMANY'S EFFORTS TO DISCHARGE DEBTS

Reduction in Freight and Coal Prices: Banking Rates Revised

Berlin, Sept. 13.

It is announced that in order to enable the German people to discharge their burdens under the London Agreement the Imperial Government on September 18 will reduce the freight rates on normal goods. live-stock and coal by 10 per cent. and the price of Silesia and Ruhr coal by at least the same amount.

The Reichsbank will raise its quota of discounts by 10 per cent. The currency of bills of exchange at the Reichsbank as regards ordinary trade bills will be restored within three months and the discounting of bank acceptances will be renewed. Banking unions will be urged to maintain normal provisions for credit through changes in rates of interest.

The bulk of the numerous regulations regarding foreign currencies will be abolished. The turnover tax will be reduced from October 1 to two per cent., and the Company and Security taxes will also be reduced from the same rate.—Reuter.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS' PENAL MEASURES

Conflicting Statements as to Proposed Utilization of British Fleet

London, Sept. 15.

With reference to the conflicting statements in the newspapers as regards the League of Nations utilizing the British Fleet in the event of a breach of the Covenant, Reuter's correspondent at Geneva says that the position has undergone no change since Sir Cecil Hurst's important statement to the Committee last week, when he explained the difficulties of such a course from a legal point of view; pointing out that there were two schools of thought with regard to the matter, namely, the Anglo-Saxon and the Continental, and stating that this point would have to be cleared up. Great Britain, if called upon to support penal measures against any country, might come into conflict with other nations trading on the seas, and consequently it was necessary to know exactly how the Permanent Court of International Justice would deal with such a case. The participation of the British Navy depended upon that.

The sub-committee dealing with the drafting of the protocol on this subject has entrusted the drawing up of the terms to Dr. Benes, who worked throughout yesterday and to-day. He repeatedly interviewed Lord Parmoor, with whom several members of the French Delegation also conferred. Lord Parmoor, interviewed by Reuter's correspondent, stated that no definite British proposal with regard to the utilization of the British Navy had been either made or withdrawn.—Reuter.

Proposal to Utilize Fleet to Enforce Arbitral Awards Not Yet Agreed To

Geneva, Sept. 17.

It must be emphasized that the peace protocol as regards the application of penalties for breaches of the Covenant of the League of Nations, the terms of which have unofficially leaked out, was only the first draft prepared by Dr. Benes with the object of conciliating the British and French views as regards penalties to enforce a decision of the Council of the League.

The matter is still in its earliest stage and there are points of difference which still remain to be settled. The British, for example, consider that the decision of the Council dealing with the infraction of the covenant should be unanimous, while the French consider a majority vote sufficient. The British emphasized that Britain was not likely to accept engagements to place all her forces at the disposal of the League of Nations.—Reuter.

London, Sept. 17.

The discussions at Geneva as regards the British obligations in the enforcement of arbitral awards has been given particular prominence by French newspapers, most of which confidently assume that Britain will undertake to co-operate in imposing sanctions on any aggressor not merely with her fleet, but with her air forces.

From inquiries in London, however, there is reason to believe that the people who count on the British Fleet being placed at the disposal of the League of Nations are likely to be very much disillusioned. The question has certainly been discussed, but it is emphasized that no definite and far-reaching proposal like that recorded in the French press has been either advanced or accepted. It is always possible, however, that the League of Nations, in the event of a dispute, might ask Britain to co-operate, by means of her fleet, in enforcing an economic blockade, but this is a very different matter from what has been suggested in certain interested quarters. Reuter.

Provision for Penalties.

Geneva, Sept. 17.

Dr. Benes, in a statement to journalists on the Peace Protocol, says that an agreement was been reached with regard to penalties and how they should come into operation and to what degree.

The majority of the penalties are as provided in the Covenant. The political independence of the aggressor State is not to be tampered with, but such State will have to pay the cost of war and the preparations therefor.

The holding of a conference is foreshadowed as regards disarmament.—Reuter.

POLITICAL MURDER IN ITALY

Leading Official of Fascisti Shot Dead in Revenge for the Late Matteotti

Rome, Sept. 12.

A workman named Coursi to-day fired four shots from a revolver at the deputy, Signor Casalini, the Under-Secretary of the Fascist Corporation, fatally wounding him in the head.

Coursi was arrested. He declared that he was a Communist and that he wanted to avenge Signor Matteotti.

Later.

The whole of Italy is horror-stricken at the crime, which has still further increased the tension of the nation's nerves.

The assailant, whose name is Giovanni Corvi, is a carpenter, and was formerly a porter at Signor Casalini's villa. He fired three shots. Signor Casalini was wounded in the forehead and temple, and sank in his seat on the tramcar against his 14-year old daughter murmuring: "They've killed me." Corvi threatened the conductor and passengers with his revolver and tried to escape, but was caught by passing carabiniers and soldiers who had difficulty in protecting him from the crowd, which threatened to lynch him. Corvi appeared to be unbalanced and bordering on insanity. He said that he had killed the deputy in order to avenge a "brother in idealism, Matteotti."

Signor Casalini was taken to hospital but expired on the operating table.

Later.

The Cabinet met to-day. They are taking measures to ensure public order. The whole of the press and the Directory of the Fascist Party are exhorting the nation to exercise restraint.

The poet-deputy, Signor Benelli, leader of the new Italic League, published an impassioned appeal to the whole nation to lay down arms and end martyrdom, terror and threats, which are stifling the nation's civilization.

Signor Casalini was a popular and important member of the Fascist Party. He leaves a widow and five children.—Reuter.

RISING IN THE HEDJAZ

Fanatical Sect Threatening Holy City of Mecca

London, Sept. 13.

Following a report that the Wahabis, a fanatical Moslem sect, have raided Hedjaz, captured the town of Taif 70 miles southeast of Mecca, destroyed tombs and massacred the population, Reuter's Cairo correspondent reports that the Egyptian Minister of Public Works has received a telegram from the Superintendent of the Egyptian hostel for poor pilgrims at Mecca asking for permission to transfer funds to Jeddah owing to the danger of Mecca falling into the hands of the Wahabis.

It appears that practically all of King Hussein's forces are concentrated in the region of Taif, leaving only a small police force at Mecca, and it is considered improbable that the tribes will rally to King Hussein in the event of an attack on Mecca. —Reuter.

HINDU-MOSLEM RIOT AT KOHAT

Massacre of Hindu Populace Stopped by Prompt Action of the Authorities

Simla, Sept. 14.

A General Staff communiqué detailing the part taken by the troops in suppressing the Hindu-Moslem disturbances in Kohat refers to the seriousness of the outbreak. It mentions that the troops were withdrawn on the evening of September 9 after the first incendiary fire had been controlled, but armed tribesmen from independent territory, attracted by the prospect of looting, entered the city late on the same night. They started a fresh fire, which required the whole of September 10 to extinguish. Three companies of infantry and two troops of cavalry were employed on September 11 restoring order.

The "Daily Telegraph's" Calcutta correspondent describes the outbreak as one of the worst of the recent tragic records of Hindu-Moslem animosity. Only the promptness of the authorities in calling out the troops prevented the massacre of the Hindu minority. The writer concludes:—"The flames of Hindu-Moslem animosity have already burst out in every part of India, and are now spreading over the frontier, threatening a conflagration the extent of which one fears to visualize."—Reuter.

Hindus Saved by British Raj

Simla, Sept. 15.

Mr. D. de S. Bray, the Foreign Secretary, in a statement to the Legislative Assembly to-day mentioned that 10 Moslems and 10 Hindus were killed, and 20 Moslems, eight Hindus and three police wounded during the disturbances at Kohat on September 9 and 10.

Mr. Bray explained that the outbreak was apparently due to the circulation of copies of an anti-Moslem, blasphemous poem on September 2, and the shooting of a Moslem boy by a Hindu on September 9, after which a Mohammedan crowd entered the city, when the Hindus retired to their roofs and fired indiscriminately, wounding three police and killing 10 and wounding 20 Moslems. The military arrived at noon. They fired in the air and helped the police to clear the bazaars, but on the morning of September 10 numbers of Moslems entered the city through holes in the walls intent on murder and looting. The Hindus, who lost 10 killed and eight wounded, insisted on leaving the city, and went to Punjab, with the exception of 300 who took refuge in cantonments.

Three hundred Moslems have been arrested. The damage by fire to Hindu quarters is estimated at 50 Lakhs. Practically all Hindu temples were rifled and the images broken.

The arrangements made by the authorities for preventing trans-frontier men from later approaching the city were successful. The Hindus are now being encouraged to return.—Reuter.

FLOODS IN THE PUNJAB

Simla, Sept. 12.

Serious floods have overwhelmed several parts of the Punjab. Two hundred villages in the Bharatpur State have been flooded and Bharatpur City is threatened. The Maharaja of Bharatpur and all his officials are working strenuously to minimize the damage and prevent distress.—Reuter.

THE LUCKNOW RIOTS

Hindus Terrorized by Moslems and Only Saved by British Guards

The military were called out.—Reuter.

London, Sept. 17.

According to a telegram received here to-day three Hindus and three Muslems died, and 53 persons, mostly Hindus, were injured as a result of the riot in Lucknow on September 14, caused by a rumour that a Hindu boy had forcibly been converted to Islam.

The telegram adds that many of the Hindus were so frightened that they abandoned their houses and migrated to safer quarters.

British and Indian troops are still patrolling the city where the curfew has been proclaimed, from the observance of which Europeans have been exempted.—Reuter.

BRITISH LABOUR AND THE SOVIET

Trade Unions' Agitation in Favour of Treaty

London, Sept. 12.

The General Council of the Trade-Union Congress and the Executive Committee of the Labour Party have jointly circularized affiliated Labour party organizations with regard to the Anglo-Russian Treaties, calling on "every active spirit in our ranks to let the man in the street and the woman in the home know the true facts of the case and so put the power of moral force behind the Labour Government to secure an overwhelming vote when Parliament is called upon to ratify its Russian policy."—Reuter.

Strong Opposition Being Worked up Against Ratification by Conservatives

London, Sept. 18.

Influential opposition is being mobilized against ratification of the Anglo-Russian treaties. Meetings of the Association of British Chambers of Commerce, presided over by Mr. Stanley Machin, and the Federation of British Industry, at which Sir Eric Geddes presided, have issued statements of strong denunciation, which condemn the Treaties as being opposed to the best interests of the country and its trade. Mr. Neville Chamberlain, speaking at Birmingham, similarly sharply criticized the Treaty.

On the contrary, Mr. J. R. Clynes, speaking at Manchester declared that the campaign against the loan was solely inspired by political hostility to the present Russian Government. He declared that the Labour Party had repeatedly recorded its detestation of the indefensible deeds of Russia. It had repudiated the Russian methods of Soviet rule, and had refused any kind of union with the Bolshevists, but the Labour Party wanted to hasten the peace of the world, and improve British trade.—Reuter.

FRANCE AND SOVIET

Commission in Paris to Study Resuming Relations

Paris, Sept. 12.

A commission of five members, including MM. Demonzie (Chairman), Fromageot and Noulens, the former Ambassador in Petrograd, is about to be constituted for the purpose of devising the best method of procedure in connexion with the resumption of relations between France and Soviet Russia.

The first sitting of the committee will probably take place early in October.—Reuter.

THE WAR IN MOROCCO

Improvement in Western Zone but Probable Reduction of Positions Held.

Gibraltar, Sept. 12.

It is reported from Tangier that the Riffs have captured all posts on the road from Tetuan to Sheshuan.

A force of 7,000 Riffs has invested Sheshuan, the water supply of which has been cut off. The Benin-Ouzmer hills dominating Tetuan from the south were captured on Wednesday. Five hundred enemy attacked Souk el Arba on September 10. There was severe fighting.—Reuter.

Evacuation by Spain of Six Positions on Wadlau Line

Madrid, Sept. 15.

An official communiqué announces the evacuation of six Spanish positions on the Wadlau line, including Cobbad Arsan.

A supply column for Kalaa has attained its objective after a brilliant bayonet charge.—Reuter.

London, Sept. 16.

The Spanish withdrawal from positions on the Wadlau line in Morocco seems to indicate that General Primo de Rivera has been able to execute his policy of establishing lines closer to the Spanish bases, to which the military party objected.

It is officially announced from Madrid that the situation in the Spanish zone is very much improved. The announcement denies rumours that part of the zone would be evacuated or that Spain would abandon any international pacts to which she had expressly agreed.

Sept. 17.

The Spanish Embassy in London reports that the situation in the western zone of Morocco continues to improve. In accordance with plan, the evacuation of the Lower Lau and Tiguisa has been effected without difficulty.—Reuter.

ANTI-SOVIET REVOLT IN GEORGIA

Rising Now General Throughout the Caucasus: Georgians' Claims of Success

Moscow, Sept. 13.

The Soviet Commissariat for Foreign Affairs in a communiqué to-day denies the seriousness of the situation in Georgia, which, it says, is greatly exagerated in the foreign press at the instigation of Russian émigrés and Menshevik refugees from Georgia in order to discredit the Soviet abroad and to nullify the Anglo-Soviet negotiation.—Reuter.

London, Sept. 16.

A Geneva despatch states that the Special Georgian Delegation at Geneva reports that the anti-Bolshevist rising is now general in the Caucasus. An important tunnel at Souran, on the Tiflis-Batum line, has been blown up. The Bolshevist troops are retreating in disorder. A provisional Georgian Government has been established at Kutais, and general mobilization has been decreed. The movement is regarded here as being more than a mere rising. It is considered as a "war of independence" on the part of Georgia and Azerbaijan.

A report from Paris states that it is believed that the Soviet troops command only the country around Batum and their only hope of re-occupying the interior would be to land reinforcements from Batum and attack from the mountainous region behind; but it is believed that the troops are not properly equipped for such an undertaking. The Georgians, by blowing up the Souran tunnel, cut the only railway giving access to the interior from Batum.

A Berlin message to the Georgian Legation states that three notorious members of the Cheka, Peters, a sailor named Pankratoff and a Chinese, Li, have been sent to Batum with unlimited powers to suppress the revolt in the most severe manner.

The Soviet Embassy in London declares that the Georgian reports of the revolution in Trans-Caucasia are absolutely untrue. The Caucasus generally is quiet. All that happened was a series of raids on small towns in East Georgia on August 29 by small bands of brigands led by dispossessed nobles or Tsarist officers, prepared by the so-called Georgian Independence Committee composed of ex-nobles, and financed from abroad. The bands were everywhere liquidated by local forces within 48 hours. The peasants and workers opposed the adventure, the leaders of which issued a manifesto on September 4 calling upon their supporters to lay down arms.—Reuter.

Georgians Losing Ground.

Later.

A message received here to-day from Trebizond says that the Georgian revolution is losing ground, but that the Azerbaijan movement has progressed.

The Georgians are being pushed back from Batum towards the interior by Bolshevik columns, who are burning all the villages, and executing numbers of persons suspected of being revolutionary sympathisers, including Bishop Nazari, who was ill.

Most of the 30,000 workers on the Baku oilfields in Azerbaijan have joined the movement, owing to the infinitesimal wages paid by the Russians. The peasants are also supporting the movement, owing to the poor prices paid for wheat.—Reuter.

Note.—Azerbaijan is a Transcaucasian Republic on the south-western shore of the Caspian Sea. The capital is Baku, the centre of the petroleum industry.—Reuter.

Moscow Disgusted at Finding the League of Nations' Eyes Upon It

Moscow, Sept. 17.

The press are very indignant at the resolution of the League of Nations on September 11 in regard to Georgia, according to which the British, French and Belgian delegates invited the Council to watch attentively events in Georgia, and to seize an opportunity to enable the country to return to a state of peace.

Mr. MacDonald and M. Herriot are blamed for influencing the League in this connexion.

The "Izvestia" describes their action as hostility towards the Soviet Republic, an interference in the internal affairs of Russia and an unheard of violation of international law. The paper insinuates that the resolution proves that western European Governments are interested in the preparations for the Georgian insurrection.

Mr. MacDonald is accused of violating the clause of the Anglo-Russian Treaty in regard to reciprocal non-intervention in the internal affairs of Soviet Russia.

The "Izvestia" asks what would Mr. MacDonald say if the Soviet Government demanded an inquiry into events in Mesopotamia, the Sudan, India and Ireland, and what would be M. Herriot's attitude if the Soviet demanded an inquiry in Indo-China and Morocco.

The "Pravda" says: "We might well ask Mr. MacDonald by what right a British cruiser is threatening to bombard Chinese ports."—Reuter.

COMMUNIST RISING IN LISBON

Government Said to Have the Situation in Hand

Lisbon, Sept. 12.

Another abortive attempt at a Communist revolution was made to-day.

Parties of Communists, including soldiers, attacked the Ministry of War, the telegraph station and the Custom house. The revolt failed, however, and the revolutionaries, including officers, sergeants and sailors, have been arrested.

The Government have the situation thoroughly in hand. The revolutionaries who occupied the Customs house have fled. Perfect order reigns.—Reuter.

A MILITARY RIOT IN HOLLAND

No Question of a Rebellion

London, Sept. 16.

A telegram from Amsterdam states that serious rows have occurred at Breda where 4,000 soldiers, concentrated for the annual military exercises, refused to go into camp because the fields where the tents had been pitched were rain soaked.

Fighting took place between the soldiers and the military police, and there were acts of serious insubordination. It is reported that a number of officers were severely treated.

Disorders also occurred at Utrecht.

The authorities declare that there is no question of organized rebellion.—Reuter.

The Hague, Sept. 16.

It is learned from an authoritative source that there were no disorders between the military and police at Breda.

What happened was that a few drunken and disorderly soldiers were arrested by the military police. The town was crowded with soldiers who had been called up for training, but except for these few arrests there has been no trouble.

There were two arrests at Utrecht where a few drunken soldiers threatened the military police.—Reuter.

ITALY AND EGYPT

Italians Concentrating Troops on Egyptian Frontier to Enforce Demands

London, Sept. 16.

The "Daily Telegraph" draws attention to a serious Italo-Egyptian situation, in a message from Cairo stating that the Italians are reported to be concentrating troops and aeroplanes in the proximity of the Egyptian frontier, which, coinciding with Italy's demand that the Egyptians evacuate Sollum and Jerabub, is regarded as indicating their intention to use force unless their demands are met.—Reuter.

Rome, Sept. 17.

The "Tribuna" learns authoritatively that the report that Italian troops are preparing to occupy Sollum is pure fabrication.—Reuter.

Reports by Egyptian Press as to Uneasy Situation on the Frontier

Cairo, Sept. 17.

In spite of the semi-official denial from Rome, the Egyptian press declares that the situation on the frontier has developed to a point justifying uneasiness. The Government last night requested the Under-Secretary of State for War to inform the former Ministers Fathy Pasha and Azmy Pasha of the developments and to ask them to come to Alexandria immediately for consultation.

Fathy Pasha and Azmy Pasha were presidents of commissions sent to the western frontier to confer, with the Italian military delegation with regard to the delimitation of the frontier during the Sarwat (?) and Ibrahim régimes.—Reuter.

Alexandria, Sept. 17.

The Government has issued a reassuring communiqué deprecating the alarmist press reports with regard to Italian action on the Western frontier and accepting the repeated Italian assurances that Italy does not intend to occupy Jarabub.—Reuter.

MR. MACDONALD'S MOTOR

Public Comment on Transfer of McVitie Shares to Premier

London, Sept. 12.

Comment has been excited by the fact that 30,000 £1 shares of Messrs. McVitie & Price, Ld., have been alloted to the Premier.

Interviewed in that connexion at Lossiemouth, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald explained that the capital was not his. He only technically owned the shares, which had been allotted to him for the endowment of a motor-car presented to him by Sir Alexander Grant, the managing director of McVitie & Price, which the Premier felt that he could not afford to keep if he went out of office. The shares at the Premier's death would revert to Sir Alexander Grant. Mr. MacDonald said that it was a family matter and had nothing to do with politics.

Sir Alexander Grant got his baronetcy for public services, including the gift of the National Library to Scotland.—Reuter.

Mr. Surley stated that the French reaction to the proposal was favourable.—Reuter's American Service.

DUTCH PARLIAMENT REASSEMBLED

Speech from Throne Devoted to Better Financial Outlook

The Hague, Sept. 16.

Parliament re-assembled to-day. The Queen in her speech hoped that they had seen the end of the economic crisis. A slight improvement in commerce, agriculture and industry was already perceptible, and there were good prospects of improvement of the country's finance. If the financial measures awaiting Parliament's sanction were approved, the budget would balance in 1925.

The Queen said that relations with foreign countries were most friendly. Bills would be introduced dealing with the Fleet, a tax on luxuries and with the reduction of certain direct taxes. A Bill would also be prepared providing workers with national health and accident insurance.

The financial situation in the Dutch Indies was improving, and the estimates for the Dutch Indies would be accompanied by proposals for certain alterations of the present fiscal régime.—Reuter.

A Professor's Claim that Is the Subject of an Official Inquiry

A semi-official statement in this connexion declares that what Professor Dimartino Fusco discovered were merely notes on the books and not the books themselves, but the inquiry is proceeding.

Later.

The Milan "Corriere della Sera" correspondent at Naples says that Professor Dimartino Fusco has made a statement to the Commission to the effect that he found an important document indicating that at a certain period, a Neapolitan scribe was entrusted with the task of transcription of the whole of Livy's History. These semi-official explanations are ridiculed in some sources, which claim that Mr. Wilber has been recalled because of inopportune speeches in which he attacked the Japanese and suggested a strong Navy for defensive purposes on the Pacific.

Later, the White House officially denied that the President had heard any criticism of Mr. Wilbur's speeches, and it was added that the President sent for the Secretary solely to consult him with regard to matters of domestic concern relating to the Navy.—Reuter's American Service.

SATURDAY'S TELEGRAMS

LEAGUE OF NATIONS PROPOSED PACT

All Signatories to Recognize Jurisdiction of Court of International Justice

Geneva, Sept. 18.

It transpires that the basis of the proposed pact, which the sub-committee is discussing, will be that all the signatories undertake to recognize the jurisdiction of the Court of International Justice and to submit all disputes, the settlement of which is not provided for under Articles 12, 13, and 15 of the Covenant, to the Council of the League of Nations, which will give its decision by a majority vote, but the procedure in regard to arbitration is still to be settled, and possibly, in view of objections by one delegation, a separate body, instead of the Council of the League of Nations, may be established as a court of arbitration.

The question of partial agreements or of so-called regional agreements between various States apparently led to considerable discussion yesterday, but finally the French proposal was agreed upon, namely, that so long as the Covenant is not universal partial agreements shall continue to exist, though coming within the scope of the general pact of mutual assistance, provided that they are registered and published by the League of Nations.

This proposal is subject to modification.

Budget Discussions

Later.

The Budget Committee of the League of Nations to-day by 16 votes to 15 rejected the Italian proposal to increase the vote for the health organization by Frs. 200,000. Great Britain, South Africa, New Zealand and India voted against, and Australia and Ireland voted for, the motion. The Canadian delegate was absent. The proposal of Brazil and Portugal to make an increase of Frs. 130,000, however, was adopted by 22 votes to 11. The present arrangements for the international exchange of health officers will be maintained.

The Committee also voted Frs. 200,000 for the settlement of refugees, with a rider added by Sir Henry Strakosch (South Africa) that the appropriation must disappear in 1926.

Institute of all the Highbrows.

Sept. 19.

A committee meeting was held to-day to discuss the proposed establishment of the International Institute of Intellectual Co-operation in Paris on the basis of the French offer of Château Vincennes as the Institute's headquarters, and an annual allowance of Frs. 1,000,000.

Mr. Charlton (Australia) vigorously opposed the proposal on the ground that the Institute would lose its essential international character if it were located in Paris. He urged its establishment in a neutral country.

Professor Gilbert Murray (Britain) agreed that the Institute would be liable to assume the character of the country of its establishment, but expressed the opinion that the committee could not reject the generous French offer.

The committee voted in favour of acceptance of the proposal, but note was taken of Mr. Charlton's objection.—Reuter.

FROM THE FOUR WINDS

LABOUR'S FIRST SESSION

Government Criticized by Own Left Wing: A Mild Reformist Policy: Premier's Leadership Unshakeable: Review of the Work of the Cabinet

From Our Labour Correspondent.

Manchester.

Labour has completed its first session in office. It supporters are now industriously attempting to convince the public that no Parliamentary session was ever so rich in constructive legislation. Its opponents are equally anxious to prove that the credit of the country was never brought so low. Liberal politicians pour scorn on its timidity. They declare that if they had been in office a much more advanced social policy would have been pursued and the world would have been pacified long ago. On the other hand the wilder Conservatives still affirm that the Labour Ministers are wolves in sheep's clothing, only waiting a favourable opportunity to exterminate the capitalist and confiscate everybody's property. Far more condemnatory than either of these traditional enemies of political Labour is Labour's own Left Wing. These irreconcilables declare that the Labour Government has handed the workers over, bound hand and foot, to their enemies. Not a principle has been upheld—not a promise fulfilled—not a Minister has proven trustworthy. Their press calls on the downtrodden proletariat to rise in their wrath and sweep away this monstrous Frankenstein, that their political blindness has created.

From these frantic outcries at each political extreme it is not difficult to discern the truth. The session has been neither exceptionally rich in good work nor exceptionally poor. Mr Ramsay MacDonald, on assuming office, declared that he would do his best to carry out the reforms promised in the last King's speech Mr. Baldwin had the privilege of reading in the House. He has fulfilled that promise to the best of his ability. No attempt has been made to oust the private manufacturer or capitalist. A mild reformist policy has been pursued. The deprivations of society's bottom dogs have been timidly alleviated by additional burdens on industry and the more affluent classes. Bold schemes of national work have been strictly tabooed. No remedy has been found for unemployment despite the very definite election promises. No more houses have been built than in the days of the defunct Unionist Government.

Mr. MacDonald is generally admitted to be a great success in his dual rôle of Premier and Foreign Secretary. Even his enemies admit that he has been a not unworthy ornament of these great offices. He stands out head and shoulders above all his followers. His outlook is by no means proletarian, but accords more with that of the more cultured upper middle classes. No one questions the dignity and skill with which he has carried on the delicate negotiations with the representatives of other countries during his first term of office. His leadership of the Party is unshaken. Any other leader would be unthinkable.

Mr. Philip Snowden, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, has lost ground with Labour and acquired it in the eyes of its political opponents. His Civil Service training has borne fruit in the caution with which he spends money and this commends him to economists of the older school. But the ease with which he has abandoned his fervent life-long advocacy of Socialism, and his readiness to bow the knee to a Capitalist Baal has saddened the zealots of the Independent Labour Party and it will not be their votes that will put him back in Parliament if there should be another General Election soon. The steady rise in the cost of living has long ago cooled the warm enthusiasm which greeted his celebrated "free breakfast table" Budget. Some of the tax remissions never reached the public. We have yet to find a picture house in an industrial neighbourhood that passed on the reduced entertainment tax to its working class patrons. And as tens of thousands of workers have their weekly wages paid on a sliding scale proportionate to the cost of living, these would not in any case have shared in the promised benefits.

Health Minister and Housing.

Mr. Wheatley, the Minister of Health, has become one of the most popular Ministers in the house, but his famed personal charm cuts little ice with the myriads of unfortunates who are still waiting in vain for the promised houses. By bribing the building employers and the operative builders he has got the promise of millions of houses. The Labour "Daily Herald" says that building them will "give employment on a vast scale." As Mr. Wheatley would only persuade the builders to accept a larger ratio of apprentices to journeymen and has been conspicuously unsuccessful in getting through any dilution scheme it would be interesting to know where all this employment is coming from. Mr. Wheatley was much more successful in dealing with the paltry minded enemies of a more humane treatment of the destitute poor in Popular and elsewhere. He was expected to prove the most Red member of the Cabinet but office has toned down his revolutionary ardour and he is now about as pink as his more orthodox colleagues.

Mr. Henderson has proven to be what is commonly called a "strong" Home Secretary. Few murderers have escaped hanging since he has been in power and no Minister has so conspicuously ignored the clamour of members of his own party. Further extensions of Factory Act legislation are promised by him during the next session but they are not of a very drastic character. His prestige, like Snowden's, has increased with the other political parties. With the rank and file of Labour he has lost ground to a certain extent although Labour workers admit his honesty of purpose and the absence of any demagogic elements in his character. Henderson never waved the Red Flag or pretended to be anything but a moderate trade union Labour member.

"The Honourable Jimmy."

Mr. J. H. Thomas was never a very popular Labour man with the Socialist element in the Party. The zest with which he has worn Court dress on every possible occasion and some impossible ones, and the whole-hearted manner in which he has fraternized with the "great" has spoilt his chances of getting votes from many moderate Labour voters in any future electoral contest. The "Honourable Jimmy's" boundless ambition to "get on" is unhappily overreaching itself. He has many times told the story of his early difficulty in persuading the porter at the Colonial Office that he was the Colonial Minister. After six months in his illustrous position the nation's sympathy with the discriminating but mistaken porter is more genuine than ever.

Mr. Sidney Webb is a disappointment in the Board of Trade. The older political parties were desperately anxious at the thought of what this intellectual paragon might have up his sleeve to make all their schemes to revive trade look foolish. Time has proved that they had nothing to be afraid of. The big head of the little man is incomparably stocked with statistics, but exceptionally empty of ideas.

There is little point in continuing the catalogue of mild successes and pitiful failures. Most of the remainder, Walsh in the War Office, Hartshorn the Postmaster General, other trade union nonentities are merely figure heads in the departments they nominally control. They say "yes" or "no" as the permanent officials who control them order. They have a curious resemblance to Mr. Baldwin's famous cabinet of titled nonentities.

Other claims made by Labour's supporters are that the Government has abolished the thrift qualification for old age pensions, and the gap in unemployment benefits. That they have through their Prevention of Evictions' Act mitigated some extent the extreme hardships working class tenants of houses have been subject to since the passing of the previous Government's Rent Act. And that they have passed an Agricultural Act which has greatly benefited rural workers. The best commentary on the last claim is that immediately after the passing of the Act Labour lost the first seat at a by-election in a rural constituency.

The Recognition of Russia.

Labour's recognition of Russia has been approved by the moderate element in both the Liberal and Conservative parties. Mr. Garvin has blessed it in the "Observer" and the "Daily News" and "Manchester Guardian" have also expressed their agreement. The Government have also surprised their opponents by the strong Imperial standpoint they have adopted in Eastern affairs. This has been the greatest surprise of all. Naturally agitators and sedition mongers must be greatly concerned at the metamorphosis of their old-time sympathizers Even the docile "Daily Herald" has been moved to denounce poor Pacifist Mr. Leach's apologia for dropping high explosives on rebellious tribesmen in Iraq.

As was to be expected the rift between the Left and Right wings of the Party is steadily widening as Socialism recedes into the background and "practical politics" takes its place. The Government is not much concerned at the venomous attacks made on it in the Communist "Workers' Weekly." This weekly outpouring of abuse defeats its own ends. Labour's supporters are still intelligent enough to be able to discriminate between stupidity and treachery. The most dreaded periodical is the "Labour Monthly" edited with great ability by Mr. Palme Dutt. This Left Wing organ has an uncanny knack of exposing the weak points of the Government and its ministers, and although its circulation is not large the more or less unanswerable comments it makes on the disparity between Labour's promises and performances makes it a dangerous weapon in the hands of a skilled heckler.

Disappointed Socialists.

It is questionable if Labour has any more adherents in the country now than it had six months ago. The steady stream of converts from the Liberal Party is discounted by the falling away of disappointed Socialist enthusiasts. The backbone of the Party was its huge army of unpaid and enthusiastic propagandists. The Government's poor record of performances has cooled the ardour of the least self-seeking of these and the residue, who are in the Party for what they can make out of it, find it more and more difficult to hide this fact. Labour's chief asset to-day, as it was last January, is the quarrels among its enemies and their apparent inability to realize that tactics are not a satisfactory permanent substitute for principles.

A NEW INDUSTRY IN GERMANY

Plague of Locusts with Good Results: Extraction of Oil for Motor Fuel

Bocholt, Germany, Aug. 11.

A plague of locusts has brought a new industry to this region where the insects have been gathered by the ton and oil extracted from their bodies. The locusts came over the frontier from Holland, by countless billions, and were caught by women and boys with great baskets.

The oil is intended for airplane motors, and is said to be particularly adaptable for winter flying, because it does not congeal in low temperatures. Good, fat locusts retailed at about one-fourth of a cent for a pound. After the insects passed through the oil extraction process the refuse was used as fertilizer.—Reuter.

THE LIGHT SIDE OF LIFE

The Bright Side of Athletics

From Our Own Correspondent

By the "bright side" of athletics I do not mean the fiascos of boxing matches or the bitings of combatants at the Olypmic Games or the usual unpleasant incidents when there is a cricket match at Sheffield or the mobbing of referees at football or the whims of professional billiard-players and the like—all these have their attractiveness but it is adventitious. I mean "bright side" when everyone sets out to be bright.

Thus we had in Belgium, a few days ago, a sort of international contest among waiters fired with keenness by the Olympic Games—a match between waiters carrying a tray filled with glasses charged to the brim over a stretch of ground and back with due observance en route of various little conditions. It drew a great crowd and was enjoyed by everybody. Now at the London Busmen's Sports this week there were two decidedly original events. One was a ticket-punching race for conductors and the other a race for conductors in which the competitors had to undo a parcel of buttons, fix them to their coats and scamper back to the winning post smoking a cigarette.

Now there is a great future for this sort of thing. Let me mention a few other novel contests which have been suggested as quite appropriate:—

Waitresses Race:

At the ring of a bell competitors move slowly to a row of marble-topped tables at each of which a ravenous customer is sitting. Having received an order for "Steam-and-kidney-pudding-and-I've-been-sitting-here-five-minutes-already-and-I've-got-to catch-a-train-so-hustle-up-please," they return to their starting-point with equal decorum, have a chat, read a page of "Dulcie's Dereliction" or "From Mill to Palace," knit one row purl and two plain and get back to the winning post. Any waitress arriving with chips and fish is disqualified.

Porters' Races

Competitors are given

(1) A hand truck laden with other people's belongings.

(2) Instructions to put them in the luggage van.

(3) Half an hour to do it.

The competitor who succeeds in undoing the most straps, damaging the most hinges, and putting the luggage in the wrong end of the wrong train 10 minutes after the right train has departed is declared the winner. (Tips are expressly barred.)

Waitresses' Races

Competitors are drawn up in their taxis at the starting point known as Ludgate Circus. Each taxi is boarded by a fare who, as he steps in, says "Law Courts". Flags are dropped and the taxis start. Any competitor who drives straight up Fleet Street is disqualified at once. The correct route in New Bridge Street, Blackfriars Bridge, Stamford Street, Waterloo Bridge (pace three miles an hour), Strand. The competitor who follows this route and gets a tip at the end of it is an easy winner and a marvel.

For Country Competition

These are, of course, more especially fitted for urban athletics—I doubt whether they could be fitly be transplanted to the purely agricultural districts. For these we should have to make other arrangements. Only the other day I noticed that a Vicar was adjudged first prize in his efforts to walk a greasy pole over a pool of water. If you can embark on a novelty of this kind in which the spiritual head of the village figures, I do not see why we cannot go further. Hence I have a few little ideas of my own for use at local sports meetings without any royalty for adoption:—

Non-stop Race for Town Visitors:

All the visitors in the place are started off on a walking match to the next village. The villagers are stationed along the route. Each competitor has to ask how much further he has to go. He is bound to walk as far as the longest estimate by the best intentioned informant. (In case this race, owing to the utter inability of all bucolic gentlemen to assess distances, is not finished in the daylight it can be continued next day.)

For Habitues of the Cat and Fiddle:

Start off all male adults at the Cat and Fiddle; one glass of beer provided over which each man in turn has to give his views on the weather. the hay crop, the largest local vegetable marrow and the vicar's last sermon; process to be repeated at every publichouse in the district; first man to reach home in a condition not reprobated by his wife to be the winner. Prize—more beer.

For Women Only:

Having collected all the members of the Mothers' Meeting the vicar will retail the latest piece of village scandal. First prize to the woman who gets it round first to the greatest number of houses. Time allowed—20 minutes.

If the Vicar can do the greasy pole business the Squire might fitly be called on to accomplish something needing display of dexterity in absorption of old port, while I am still hoping that some sports gathering may include among its features a prize for the small boy who can in the shortest space of time "touch" the greatest number of casual spectators for cigarette cards. We all have our own pet accomplishments and it is ridiculous to suppose that when called on suddenly to perform something quite outside our "beat" we can show the same measure of finish which would be forthcoming were we asked to display our normal skill in our daily avocations. You may think that with my various ideas I am a little before my time. I am not so sure. We all like to do our best if we do anything.

CALIGULAR'S GALLEYS

Plan to Raise the Ships of Nemi

A fresh attempt is about to be made to raise the remains of the two great Roman galleys that lie at the bottom of Lake Nemi, that most picturesque little sheet of water in the heart of the Alban hills, haunted for ever by the memory of the famous sanctuary and grove of Diana that once stood on its banks and the grim mystery of the rites there celebrated. The galleys, which were floating pleasure palaces of the type known as thalamegos, were built and launched on the lake by Caligula to form an occasional pleasant refuge from his strenuous life of crime in Rome. They were house-boats beyond our dreams, encrusted with marbles, ornamented with precious metals and scented woods and adorned with statuary: the sails were of the finest linen, and the hangings were woven with silver and gold. After the death of Caligula the galleys were apparently left to their fate. As time went on the timbers rotted away, water got into the holds, and the vessels finally keeled over and sank to the bottom of the lake, where their dark outlines can be faintly seen on very clear, still days.

These sunken galleys have always had a special fascination for adventurous minds. Over a hundred books and pamphlets have been written about them, and naval architects and engineers have made various attempts to hoist them up to the surface by the help of strange machines which have invariably given way at the critical moment. The last attack on the Nemi galleys was made by divers in 1895, under the direction of the Ministry of Public Instruction. All kinds of curious relics were brought up, including some beautifully modelled bronze heads of animals, but the galleys remained immovable, embedded in mud and stones and the clinging roots of aquatic plants. The new scheme—the only one that has a chance of success—is to draw off the water of the lake until the vessels are exposed to view.

The process will be difficult and costly, and Senator Corrado Ricci, until lately Director-General of Fine Arts, strongly urges that it should not be attempted until the pros and cons have been well taken into consideration and there is a reasonable prospect of carrying it through. Apart from all the valuable and interesting treasures that will certainly be found in the bed of the lake, there will be the satisfaction of setting eyes, after 19 centuries, on a genuine galley of Imperial Rome.

OUR SCOTTISH LETTER

Visit of American Scots: Tenacity of Scottish Accent and Idiom

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Edinburgh, Aug. 6.

A large body of American Scots, ailing from all parts of the United tates and Canada, have landed on e banks of the Clyde on a visit to hat they still think and speak of their homeland, some of them fter a lifetime's absence. It is a riking illustration of the clannish- ss of the Scot when abroad. That clan spirit 45 years ago was sponsible for the formation of the merican organization known as the der of Scottish Clans, under whose spices the voyage to the home untry was arranged. The associa- on was formed as a provident and iendly society for American-Scots. still provides sickness benefits, d makes provision, for widows and ildren. It also provides, less ecifically, for the permanence of ottish sentiment and tradition ongst those of Scottish descent. Some of the more aged members the party—the ages range from years to nine weeks—are living tnesses to the indestructibility of e Scottish tongue. The Royal ief of the Order, Mr. Duncan Mac- es, who belongs to Berwickshire, d who occupies the responsible sition of Chief Accountant of the ty of New York, might never have t this country so far as his way speaking the familiar Scots tongue concerned.

Perhaps the explanation of one of group of the second generation of ots may throw some light on this parent tenacity of the Scottish ent and idiom. "Father has been actising up all the Scots he knew," e innocently remarked. One of e oldest men of the party, a past rand Chief" of the Order in assachusetts, made no pretence at Scots tongue, he was making his t visit to Scotland, but was as rfervid in the national sentiment anyone born and bred in Scotland. is father's two brothers he boasts in family also come from Berwick- ire—helped to erect the Scott onument in Princes Street, Edin- rgh. The party includes repre- ntatives from "The Daughters of otia," and of the Masonic frater- ty and ladies of Lodges of the stern Star.

The Return of the Native.

If there is any exile on earth ecially constituted by Providence revisit his dear home-land with lat, it is the Scotsman. Certainly e Englishman cannot do it. He n't the apparatus. I'll swear at the saloons of the great Atlantic er night after night, on her way om New York to the Clyde, were ily animated; that the full rich asury of Scottish minstrelsy was nsacked; that eightsome reels pre- minated in the dancing pro- ammes; that intermittent bagpip- g came between patriotic speeches; at not for a moment was the rictly Caledonian nature of the grimage forgotten.

A Scotsman's life in any foreign untry is one long continued pre- ration for returning home for od. He never, or hardly ever, es come home for good—of course am not speaking for the Scot in e East, but for the Scot in merica, The Cape, and Australa- ia,—but he robs exile of half its pleasantness by regarding it as rely a transient experience which can terminate any day he likes. he has any apprehension at all, is that he may lose his accent, rget the national grips and pass- rds, and be taken for an ordinary nglish or American foreigner when gets back to the home town. This, ally, is why the Order of Scottish ans flourishes in the U. S. A. and y the Scoto-American if he has t, by right, a clan, a tartan, and slogan, will invent all three and art another branch of the Order r himself and his namesakes. No nglish exile could do that; all an nglishman abroad can do to uphold e nationality is to eat plum-pudd- g at Christmas, and have his ousers turned up or turned down the foot in sympathy with the evalent London fashion. That otland should have the bagipes, ans, tartans, an accent of her own, incomparable folk-song luscious th honest sentiment, romantic ditions, and a huge properation of knobbly scenery so inaccessible and so ordinarily dense with mist that most of us have seen only a faction of it, all helps to keep our hearts true to her even if we cannot afford to live here.

In America the Scot even feeds himself on stuff designed to maintain the "perfervidum ingenium Scotorum." He imports in increasing quantities, shortbread, oatmeal bannocks and haggis of native production. The pipes and the Highland costume of themselves are a tremendous help to the perfervidum in exile; no other nation in Europe retains in ordinary or official use a distinctive instrument and garb, which though both peculiar and antique, have an imperial cachet which keeps them out of the category of fantasy and theatricals. In them the Order of Scottish Clans has a regalia ready-made, and better than any other regalia in being adaptable to all social occasions, and consequently with the ideal Scottish quality of being economical.

The Lantern of the North.

The 700th centenary of Elgin Cathedral is being celebrated this week. It was in 1224 that the Pope empowered Bishop Andrew Meray to consecrate the Church of the Holy Trinity (probably built about 1130) as the Cathedral of Elgin. The Cathedral has a stormy existence. It was burned by the Wolf of Badenoch (the then Earl of Buchan) in 1390, and again in 1567 by order of the Regent Moray. The lead was stripped from its roof, sold to a Dutch firm, and lost at sea opposite Aberdeen. The work of disintegration proceeded until 1809 when the Town Council of Elgin took charge of what remained and restored the edifice as far as possible.

Holiday Money.

The Trades Holidays of the four principal Scottish cities have just closed, and the universal testimony is that the number of pleasure-seekers has been much greater than in previous years.

Where is the money coming from for all the holiday making in this present year of grace? This is one side of a very big problem. For since the war everybody seems to have more to spend on things that we did not before time consider among the necessities of life. Everybody seems to have more leisure and more means of passing it decoratively than even in the fat years before 1914. Yet we are told that as a nation we are poorer. Our trade has fallen off. Our oversea investments are greatly reduced. Our taxes are heavier. We have a million unemployed.

An obvious answer would be that our working folk are becoming less thrifty, and that less is being put by for the proverbial rainy day. We doubt that nevertheless, and the statistics of our Savings Banks and Savings securities support our optimism. The source from which our increased expenditure is defrayed is unquestionably a curious problem. But, whither it comes from, the money for more holidays is certainly being found. And the moralist can only be glad that it is being put to no worse purpose.

The Prince and Curling.

Curlers will be delighted to hear that the Prince of Wales has consented to become President of the Royal Caledonian Curling Club. Assuming that the Prince is able to attend a club dinner, he will be entertained with traditional "curlers' fare," that is, "beef and greens," and after the Royal toasts he or the chairman will give "Oor ain King, John" (Frost). The Prince may also witness a "curlers' court," an affair of mingled hilarity and ancient and solemn ritual, which is held when somebody is alleged to have transgressed the etiquette of the curlers' table.

Electric and Spiritual Power.

Much water will thunder down Corra Linn and the Falls of the Bruar before the various hydro-electric schemes now under discussion come into operation or fulfilment is given to the Apocalyptic visions of Mr. Lloyd George or Mr. Snowden. But even in Britain a great wind of words is eventually followed by a drizzle of deeds, and the mountain in labour does bring forth a mouse. What is being done abroad in the utilization of water-power must in the long run compel a similar movement in this country. Already lovers of natural scenery are contemplating ruefully the probable shrinkage or disappearance of some of the fine waterfalls in the country. Among these the Falls of Clyde are pre-eminent. With a good head of water, Corra Linn is probably the grandest scenical feature in the British Isles. It will not be much consolation for its disfigurement that the Falls of the Rhine, which inspired one of the great descriptive passages of Ruskin, have long been harnessed for utilitarian purposes. One result of the passing of the Lanark Hyrdro-Electric Bill is to lower the enthusiasm of many people for such schemes, and to breed a doubt whether all the power that can be got from the Falls of Clyde is worth the sacrifice of the spiritual inspiration that the mind derives from the spectacle of a great and beautiful waterfall. The superabundance of running water in the Highlands calls for utilization; but is it wise to sacrifice one of the few beauties of a mainly industrial region before we have done everything possible to make the best use of our native coal as a source of electrical and other power?

Cricket County Championship.

The short season of Scottish cricket is drawing to a close. We begin late; the season is against us as compared with the South; the weather also is often unfavourable—and then most clubs finish early. Many of our men are off on holiday while cricket is still in full swing on the sunnier side of the Cheviots. And when, late in July or in August, you read that Mr. So-and-So's team engaged a town or county club, you know that the matches are not included in official tables, but are in the truest sense played for "sport."

In the Scottish Counties Championship Competition, Perth defeated Forfar, 124 to 114; and Clackmannan gained a notable victory over Fife, 70 to 51. In the Western Union, Drumpellier, the Champions, were defeated by the West; Uddingston beat Poloc; and Clydesdale had the better of Ayr. Wet weather played havoc with the few matches in the East.

Athletics.

In an all-comers meeting the Rangers had a number of Olympic champions, E. H. Liddell had naturally the biggest ovation when he romped home a winner in the invitation quarter-mile. His time of 49 3-5 sec. is the best he has accomplished in Scotland in open competition, and but for the breeze, which was strong in the finishing straight, would have been even better. C. W. Oldfield, the South African, who was in receipt of five yards from Liddell, put in an exceedingly strong finish, but by the time his challenge was delivered the Edinburgh University flier had the issue safe.

One of the American newspapers just to hand, dealing with Eric Liddell's Olympic victory, refers to him as "a skinny little Scotsman who stole all the thunder"; it frankly acknowledges that Eric "captured an event which all but bore an American label, and he wiped from the record books a mark which America has held for the last dozen years." He is said to "violate all the approved rules for running," but to win with "an unyielding Scotch head and a stalwart Scotch heart."

SAN FRANCISCO'S FIRST CHINESE BABY

Returning to Shanghai to Start Packing Plant

Winnemucca, Nev., Aug. 27.

Kong Chung, 70 years old, having amassed a small fortune from a restaurant where he sold hams and bacon cured by himself, has sold out and is going to Shanghai to open a packing plant. He has arranged with exporters to have hogs shipped from the United States.

Chung says he was the first Chinese baby born in the City of San Francisco.—Reuter.

CAPT. Wanderwell and his sister have obtained permission from the Peking-Mukden Railway officials to use the railway track for their motor-cars which are supplied with appliances to enable them to run on the rails like motor-trolleys. The railway will be filmed as they go along. They are going to try and get all the way up to Mukden in this way and possibly Harbin.

BRITISH COLUMBIA LETTER

New Robert Dollar Manager

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Vancouver, B.C., Aug. 28.

Of interest to shipping and transportation men in the Orient, particularly China, is the announcement just made that Mr. Kenneth J. Burns, general manager in Vancouver for the Canadian Robert Dollar Company, has been appointed to the highly responsible position of Port Superintendent of Vancouver and head of the Vancouver Harbour Commission. Mr. Burns has accepted the terms of a contract which calls for a salary of $8,000 a year for five years. Mr. R. E. Beattie, who resigned on the grounds of poor health. The appointment of Mr. Burns, "Kenny," as he is popularly known among his friends, has given considerable satisfaction in shipping and commercial circles here generally, especially because of the fact that politics did not enter into the appointment. He was chosen on his merits as the best man obtainable for the post, and in accepting the offer made the condition that administration of port affairs must be kept entirely free of political influences. The new piers, elevators, terminal railway and other important undertakings of the Harbour Commission incidental to the boom in the grain shipping trade, from the Canadian prairies to the Pacific seaboard, will all come within the scope of Mr. Burns' administration, in addition to the fast increasing routine business of the port. Mr. Burns, besides being an expert in shipping, has had wide experience in railway transportation, having for many years been assistant general freight agent here for the Great Northern Railway Company. The appointment doubtless will be well received in Shanghai and other Chinese ports. Shipping men, exporters and importers and others engaged in diverse ways in trans-Pacific trade through Vancouver, the western gateway to Canada can rest assured that the new Port Superintendent, through his lengthy association with the Dollar steamship line's activities, has a masterly knowledge of the problems and intricacies of the trade and is able to deal with them quickly and adequately. The arrangement called for Mr. Burns assuming his new duties on September 1.

Famous Airmen Meet

Vancouver was the meeting place this week of two famous airmen on whom the eyes of the world were focussed, Major Stuart MacLaren and Major Frederick L. Martin, commanders of the British and American around-the-world flights. Both, as individuals, met with disaster, although the American flight is proceeding. Major MacLaren, after crossing the Pacific with his wrecked plane aboard the patrol cruiser Thiepval, and accompanied by his companions, was given a "royal" reception at Prince Rupert B.C. The party was given such a welcome that had the flight been successful the welcome could not have been more intensely enthusiastic. They were lauded for their "glorious failure." In Vancouver Major MacLaren and companions were met by some thousands of admirers. The airmen were guests of the Canadian Club at mid-day luncheon and were also entertained by the Canadian Air Force at a dinner, to which Major Frederick Martin came from the home of relatives at Bellingham, in Washington State. "I thought it would be in Tokyo that I would meet you," said Major Martin. "I thought so, too, but just knew we would meet somewhere," replied Major MacLaren. The British airman has left for Eastern Canada and the Eastern States.

Trans-Pacific Arrivals

Among recent arrivals in Vancouver bound to and from China and Japan was the Earl of Gosford who sailed on the Empress of Canada for China where he expects to stay four years looking after his extensive business interests. Dr. and Mrs. Woodman have arrived from Hongkong. Dr. Woodman recently retired from the government service there. Before her marriage, Mrs. Woodman was Miss Winnifred Philpot, of Island Hall, Parksville, Vancouver Island. They will settle there permanently. Mr. A. S. Geddes, representative in the Orient for the P. Burns Company, is here is connexion with the extension of the export of Canadian cattle across the Pacific. Dr. C. Forsyth retiring from practice in Hongkong, will live in future in Victoria, B.C. Mr. and Mrs. Duclos-Rauzy passed through here on their way from Saigon to Marseilles. Mr. W. Hashim, silk merchant, of Canton is on his way to New York. Mise Susie S. Kelsey, B.A., left to-day on the Empress of Russia for Kueiteh, Honan, where she will become a medical missionary in the hospital at which she had already taken special training. Miss F. M. Watts is returning to Honan. They are going out under the auspices of the Anglican Church Board. Others going out under the same direction are Miss Bryer, who has been field secretary for the Anglican Women's Auxiliary in Saskatchewan, and the Rev. John S. Davidson, son of Archdeacon Davidson. Miss Babe Houghton left on the Empress of Russia to-day for China to be married. She was the centre of some happy social events arranged by her friends here.

Also sailing on to-day's outward bound liner for the Orient were Major T. Tanaka and Lieut. T. Tokamaga, Japanese officers who sailed from the Kuerile Islands, Northern Japan, to British Columbia on board H.M.C.S. Thiepval. Major Tanaka, who is attached to the Japanese War Office, and Lieut. Tokamaga, of the Japanese navy, accompanied the Canadian ship to the northernmost tip of Japan, Hakodate, and then, there being no ship to return them south to Yokohama, they were obliged to return home by the 9,000 mile circuitous route of Alaska, British Columbia and the Pacific Ocean.

ISLAND ASKS FOR £500,000

The Desperate Plight of Lewis

When Mr. James Stewart, Under Secretary for Scotland, visits the island of Lewis the District Committee will ask him to favour a reconstruction scheme involving an expenditure of nearly £500,000.

The proposals include demands for State grants, as follow: For new fishing boats and gear, £298,000; harbours, £60,000; land reclamation, £80,000; road repairs, £30,000; afforestation, £20,000; technical education, £10,000; total £498,000.

The promoters of the scheme claim that its adoption would give new life to Lewis and obviate any further need of spoon-feeding.

The money asked for fishing needs would suffice to build 60 steam drifters and 80 motor-boats, and half could be given as a loan and half as a grant. Fishing is the staple industry, but has been at a standstill for years, owing to lack of gear.

There is a population of 30,000, and the conditions are deplorable. Many parts of the island were stricken by famine last winter, and a relief fund had to be started.

All attempts to capitalize industry have failed. Lord Leverhulme was forced to abandon all his plans to introduce factory work into the island.

Lewis is over-populated under present conditions, housing and sanitary arrangements are primitive, and tuberculosis is rampant.

The death-rate from this disease is higher in Lewis than in any town.

Hundreds of families live in houses in which animals shelter under the same roof. There are no trees, and the land is of poor quality.

But the people are strongly opposed to any scheme which would mean their removal from their island home.

The problem of reconstructing Lewis is difficult.

EIGHT years ago last Monday tanks were first used in the Great War. This arm, for which Mr. Winston Churchill was largely responsible, saved thousands of lives and broke the "impregnable" Hindenburg Line.

NO STANDING ROOM

A Vision of the Year 3000: Struggle of the Races for Expansion

If the human race continues to multiply at its present rate, standing room on the earth will be filled when the population reached 700 billion in the year 3000.

This is the prophecy made by Professor J. W. Gregory, F.R.S., President of the Geography Section, in his address on August 7 at the Toronto meeting of the British Association.

"From 1906 to 1910," he said, "the population of the world grew at the rate of doubling in 60 years. If this rate were maintained the 6,600 millions of people which it is calculated as the most that the world can feed would be in existence in 120 years.

"Even if the food supply were indefinitely multiplied by the precipitation of the nitrogen of the atmosphere as a constant rain of manna, standing room on the earth, exclusive of the remoter Arctic and Antarctic, would be all filled when the population numbered seven billion in the year 3000."

Black and White

Another notable passage in the address was when the Professor referred to the preponderance of the coloured peoples. "The struggle for expansion," he declared, "which was the ultimate motive of the World War of 1914-18, will inevitably be still more bitter and terrible if it become a struggle for existence between the white and coloured races."

Pointing out that the alternative to co-operation in the future was dark, and that Europe during the past 50 years might have taken on tasks beyond its power, the Professor reminded his hearers that the drain on 16th century Portugal's manhood by its vast colonial empire, halved the home population; land went out of cultivation, famine came, and negroes, introduced to till derelict farms, were absorbed into the nation.

The dilution of the Portuguese by negro blood was, he said, often regarded as one of the main causes of its fall from political, scientific, and intellectual pre-eminence. Had Europe been led into the same enterprising but disastrous error?

Transfer of Power

The Professor's summing-up was that the world would have a happier and brighter future if it could avoid the co-residence in mass of members of the different primary divisions of mankind. Individual association and contact should secure for each race the benefit of the intellectual, artistic, and moral talents of the others; while industrial co-operation should aid each nation to make the best uses of the land in its care.

The speaker said that, alike, in war and peace, the personal authority which the white man held in 1900 had undergone a momentous decline. Asia by improved industrial methods and Africa, relieved from the slave trade, might continue to advance in co-operation with the European race, instead of under its government. European control might be voluntarily withdrawn as sympathetic alliance replaced the older forms of servitude. If these developments took place the 20th century would be indeed a golden age.

FILMS IN SCHOOL

Stimulus of Mental Work by Children

"A strong prima-facie case has been established in support of the view that the cinematograph can be of real value as an adjunct to present educational methods; that properly used it may be of great assistance by way of illustration; and that it should accordingly be recognized as a part of the normal equipment of educational institutions."

This is the first of the general conclusions reached by the committee, presided over by Lord Gorell, which was appointed by the Imperial Education Conference last year. The committee included Sir Sidney Low, Mr. E. V. Lucas, and Sir Oswald Stoll.

The committee state that the cinematograph is specially adapted to help in the teaching of nature study, geography, science, and scientific and industrial processes. As to history, further investigation is considered advisable as to the type of film which could be made scholastically useful and practicable. The committee agree that some types of prose and poetry can by its means be made more stimulating.

"There is little reason to fear that mental effort by children will be cursed by a proper use of the cinematograph," say the committee. "Nearly all the direct evidence indicates that mental effort is stimulated by the presentation of the subject in a living form.

"We do not suggest that it should be employed where a simple experiment in the class-room, or the use of the ordinary lantern slide, would be equally effective."

THE MIGHTY FALLEN

New Hues in the "Almanach De Gotha"

The "Almanach de Gotha," which has ceased to appear in the German edition, is now on sale in its French form for 1924. There is something particularly melancholy for the German aristocracy in the present "Gotha." If proper pride refuses to see anything in the inclusion of the reigning families of Ethiopia and Asia but a lamentable anxiety on the part of the publishers to find new customers to replace the old, it is very annoying for German ladies of noble birth to find these newly included royalties so very casual about dates. Neither looks nor cosmetics availed anything in circles where the "Almanach" betrayed the year of one's birth with merciless exactness; the plentiful rows of asterisks that mark the family chronicle of the present rulers of Egypt would never have been tolerated in the days before the revolution.

The shyness some of these black and brown monarchs appear to feel about revealing the very name of their legitimate wife has been emulated by one or two of the lesser houses of Germany. One of the many Heinrichs of Reuss has not given the name of his present princess, and the address of the pair in Berlin is in a very second-rate suburban neighbourhood. The brutal frankness with which divorces plentifully sprinkle the pages has been echoed in cases where, in exotic climes, the simple "abdiqué" of so many crowned heads is elaborated into a detailed "exclus par son père de la succession au trône."

Of the new arrivals, Ras Tafari, poor as to other details, is the only personage whose children are catalogued as a, b, c, and d. Casualness as to the number, birthplace, and age of children is, in fact, the chief characteristic of the new "Gotha," which one may imagine from henceforward adorning the boudoirs of dusky queens and forming the subject of bitter envy and heartburning in up-to-date harems and zenanas.

As one glances down the old-time houses, what strikes one as, perhaps, the greatest tragedy of all is the compression of the Romanow holocaust into one line of general introduction to the family. Comparing the relative destinies of the deposed reigning houses of Central Europe, one generalization is possible even as regards so vast a page of history as this small red volume compresses. In some families divorce has proved the natural outlet for one member after member in their altered attitude towards the world; in others the convent and the monastery have claimed a corresponding number.—"The Observer."

A remark made about Mr. Conrad that he was the least "bookish" of the novelists is true in one sense, but not, of course, in that of his not being widely read. He had, in fact, the talent that belongs to genius of "getting to know" whatever was being done in his own art of writing—and what interested him most in that was anything new in method. In earlier days, when he was reading in our literature for knowledge, he had great prescience in "spotting" the best sources; as, for example, when for the proper "feel" of a particular English society he made a close study of the works of Whyte Melville. He could not, of course, have made a better choice.

BIG MERGER OF GERMAN SHIPPING COMPANIES

Far-reaching Agreement as to Near Eastern Lines: The Pooling of Interests

Hamburg, Aug. 11.

The shipping companies of Germany have effected a pooling of interests that will be of far-reaching importance to shippers everywhere. The new arrangement practically eliminates competition between German concerns, and substitutes therefor a close co-ordination of entire German shipping industry.

The most far-reaching arrangement is that covering the lines doing business with the Orient. The German Levant line and the German Orient line have merged. The Levant line, in turn, represents a merger of the German Levant line, the Bremen Aro line and the Bremen Atlas line. All of the shares of the Levant line were in the hands of the Hamburg-America line. Before the German Orient line, which is a Stettin and Hamburg concern, was ready also to merge, it insisted upon receiving 50 per cent. of the shares of the Levant line. This was conceded, whereupon the entire Oriental service was combined in one concern. This means that freight rates can be offered that will successfully underbid, it is claimed, those of other countries.

The combination of shipping companies doing business in the near East is regarded as but a first step in the direction of actually putting all German shipping under "one hat."

By pooling interests the German lines hope to make it possible to throw their tonnage in whatever direction business is best, without having to keep up established schedules merely for the sake of prestige.—Reuter.

CANADA'S EXPENDITURE ON GOOD ROADS

Enormous Revenue from Foreign Tourists: Automobilist Traffic Trebled in Three Years

Ottawa, Ont., Aug. 14.

Canada has spent $191,000,000 in building good roads in the last five years, according to John B. Harkin, Dominion Commissioner of Parks.

"The Dominion has received $118,000,000 in revenue from foreign tourist traffic in the same period," Mr. Harkin said, in an address before the Ottawa Rotary Club. "This represented a large yield on the capital expenditure on roads. Automobile tourist traffic from the United States has trebled in the last three years. In 1921 American cars entering Canada numbered 617,387; in 1922 they totalled 966,329 and in 1923 they numbered 1,942,387.

"Improvement of highways has been a big factor in the development of Canada's tourist trade. The Dominion knows that it is not spending money on roads, but merely investing it. It is an investment that will return a dollar for every cent put into it. Under plans adopted by the provinces in co-operation with the Federal Government, Canada will soon have a system of transcontinental highways second to none.

"Road building activity has been especially pronounced in the prairie provinces of Western Canada where land settlement has been heavy in recent years. Farmers know that with good roads the market channels for crops will always be open. Good roads mean general prosperity. They save farmers millions of dollars in hauling costs annually.—Reuter's American Service.

ENGLAND'S first shot in the Great War followed hard upon the declaration of hostilities, and stood to the credit of the British Navy. Admiralty records show that the first British shell was fired from one of the guns of H.M.S. Lance on August 5, at 11 o'clock in the morning, when the Lance, Landrail, and Amphion sighted the German mine-layer Koniger Luise, and attacked her, sinking her at noon. The gun is preserved in the Imperial War Museum.

THE GOVERNMENT IN CHINA

Mr. Tong Shao-yi's Principles Elaborated: The Disparities of the Sons of Han

BY GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY.

Mr. Tong Shao-yi, in his interview regarding the organization of government in China, made his ideas perfectly clear. In recording the interview, however, I have apparently not been clear, as your leading article would indicate. For there seems to be a confusion as to Mr. Tong's ideas concerning provincial autonomy.

In the first place, Mr. Tong believes in a Republican form of government. He sees no need for a re-establishment of a monarchy. I am sure that Mr. Tong would oppose such a programme, as he opposed Yuan Shih-kai's effort to make himself an Emperor.

Nor was it Mr. Tong's suggestion that the representatives of the provinces be chosen by lot. They would naturally be the select men of the province, suitably chosen by the proper political organizations of the province, the Provincial Assembly.

Mr. Tong's point about the lots was simply this. At the present time, the major political struggle in China is as to who should be the President. This struggle impedes the reconstruction of the country, in that, it substitutes a personal for a national issue. Furthermore, the Presidency is controlled by the so-called Metropolitan Provinces, the incumbent being put into office and kept in power by a military cabal. When they weary of him, the militarists drive him out, as was done to Hsu Hsih-chang and Li Yuan-hung. All this is wasteful and keeps the country in chaos. After all, why not make the President a figurehead, a sort of social secretary for the nation, a giver of receptions to the Diplomatic Corps and the ladies of Legation Street. The Presidency then could be held by anyone, by a native of Yunnan or Kwangsi or Kansu or Sinkiang.

President's Limited Powers

The President would have some power, as much as any other administrator. As a member of the Administrative Council, he would be responsible to his own province for his votes and actions in the council. He would not have more or less power than any other member of the Council. His choice by lot would simply mean that since it is necessary that one man preside at the meetings of the Administrative Council and that one man be designated from among the members of the Council to perform the social duties of the Council, that man would be selected by lot

Huc, whose observations in China 70 years ago were as true to-day, wrote:

"These characteristics are remarkable in the face, the language, the manners, the ideas, and certain national prejudices; but they are distinguished by such varieties of shade, such well-defined differences, that it is easy to tell whether you are dealing with the men of the north, east, or west. In passing from one province to another, you become aware of these modifications; the language changes by degrees till it is no longer intelligible; the dress alters in form so much that you can distinguish a citizen of Canton from one of Peking by it alone. Each province has customs peculiarly its own, even it important matters, in the imposition of taxes, the nature of contracts, and the constuction of houses. There exist also particular privileges and laws which the government dare not abalish, and which the functionaries are forced to respect; there reign everywhere rights of established custom which destroy that civil and administrative unity that Europeans have been pleased to attribute to this colossal empire.

"As much difference might be pointed out between the eighteen provinces as between the various states of Europe: a Chinese who passes from one to the other finds himself in a strange country amidst a people whose habits are unknown to him, where every one is struck with the peculiarity of his face, language, and manners. There is nothing surprising in this when it is considered that the Chinese Empire is composed of a number of kingdoms, often separated under the dominion of various princes, and ruled by distinct legislation. These nations, though more than once untited, have never combined so closely but that an observing eye could detect the different elements composing the vast whole."

Unless one recognizes these differences, it is impossible to understand the 12 years of warfare since the Battle of Wuchang. China is in reality a League of Independent States. A Cantonese is a Cantonese; a Ningpo man, a Ningpo man. One cannot foist upon China the British Constitution, as Kang Yu-wei would do, nor the American Constitution as the young men at Nanking tried to do. China must evolve her own form of government in harmony with the psychological characteristics of the people and their governmental genius.

Analogy from Europe

Students of government will remember that at about the same time that the Anglo-Saxon Council in England was becoming a Parliament, the Frankish Council developed into the Estates General. Parliament as early as John began its career of controlling the King; it gained control over the taxes of the country and therefore over the whole financial system. In France, however, the king was authorized to collect a specific tax for the raising of a standing army and for the suppression of troops. He therefore controlled certain revenues without the consent of the Estates General and he had a standing army to assist him. In both, he was independent of Parliament; while the English kings from John to Edward I became more and more dependent upon the will of Parliament. In France, the Estates-General became unimportant; in England, Parliament became the power.

Is it not remarkable that two people as akin as the Anglo-Normans of England and the Frankish-Normans of France should develop so differently? Yet, many factors entered into that difference, geographical, religious, traditional, the outcome of wars, the tenure of land, etc.

Bringing the situation back to China, one is faced with exactly the same problem, namely, that although many nations appear to be alike, each is different, and what may be true in one, may be altogether false in another. To reason about China's form of government altogether on the basis of analogies with other countries and without regard for the peculiarities of this particular country is what has led to all the troubles in the land, from the beginning of the era of reform until to-day.

Other Like Thinkers

Mr. Tong Shao-yi is not alone in his advocacy of provincial federation. The Lushan Conference which General Wu Pei-fu once seemed to favour, was planned for this purpose. Provincial autonomy movements have developed at various times. Actually, in all the political functionings of the Chinese people the emphasis is on the hsien and the province and not on the nation. Even in the present war, provincial affiliations have overcome political affiliations, as Mr. Chang Chien's telegram regarding the geographical features of the war indicate. A Chinese official in Peking has lost face by counter-signing the punitive expedition mandate, because it involves warfare against his native city. His political affiliations and principles do not save him; his nativity alone matters.

In presenting Mr. Tong Shao-yi's point of view, your correspondent realized the importance of Mr. Tong's 60 years of experience in China, his service as an officer in so many different parts of China including Manchuria and his keen association with progressive movements. An experience such as his is bound to result in fruitful conclusions.

THE British Registrar-General states in his quarterly returns, just issued, that the lowest marriage rate ever recorded was that in the first quarter of this year. There were 29,711 fewer marriages than in the last quarter of 1923. In the first quarter of the year 1921 there were 76,158 marriages; 1922, 50,382; 1923, 53,281; and 1924, 46,995. The births registered in the second quarter ending June 28, were 187,157—the lowest recorded in any second quarter except during the war. Male babies were in the proportion of 1,047 to 1.000 females, but 1,000 males died to each 1,000 females.

GRAMOPHONE NOTES

Some of the Latest Issues

By MARCATO.

No word of praise is too high for the "new process" record of the Columbia Co. It certainly is what it claims to be—without scratch, and in a record with plenty of volume practically no surface sound can be detected at all. Latest Home reproductions from the Robinson Piano Co. are of an exceptionally high order, and reflect extreme credit on the Columbia's present-day policy.

London on a damp, foggy, November day....London with its coster barrows and flaming market torches ...its slums and unemployed.... would not appear to offer a very inviting background for a symphonic work, but to the Londoner these and other associations possess an element of romanticism of much emotional depth, and Vaughan Williams in his "London Symphony" has cleverly infused his music with the very spirit of these scenes. His success too, by the way, is not at the expense of a collection of folk-songs and dances, as might be imagined. In the four movements of which the Symphony is composed, one is allowed to drift into the region of pleasant recollection.... Old Father Thames....Big Ben with its mighty tones——Temple....the cheerless Embankment at night.... the gay and careless Strand....none are forgotten. The work is veritably a "Symphony by a Londoner," and as such holds great and deserved popularity with folks at Home, for its appeal in the familiar scenes it portrajures up is irresistible. There are four parts in all, recorded on two double sided records, and executed under the direction of Sir Henry J. Wood.

Another excellent recording is of the first two movements of one of Beethoven's Sonatas, that in G. Major, Op. 49 No. 2, a production of the composer's early youth. The interpretation is delightful although Murdoch, the pianist, must have found it simple enough work.

"The Planets" Suite for large orchestra, by Gustav Holst, is too great a work to be dismissed in a few words of comment. It is a masterpiece and has been acclaimed everywhere as such. The seven movements are named after the planets, Mars, Venus Mercury, Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus, Neptune. Holst tells us that the work was suggested by the astrological significance of the planets and has no connexion with the deities of classical mythology bearing the same names. There is no programme, and the only guide to the music, if one is sought, is to be found in the subtitles to each piece. For instance, Saturn is "The Bringer of Old Age," Neptune—"The Mystic," and so on. The whole of the movements are complete on seven double sided records by the Queen's Hall Orchestra, and represent a great achievement from a recording point of view.

A recording of note is Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" on four double sided records by the same orchestra. This work is obtainable also on H.M.V. records by the Royal Albert Hall Orchestra under the baton of Albert Coates. Both sets are really first rate, and there is little to choose between the two.

One of the most delightful records in existence is of two Aubades by Lalo, played by the Queen's Hall Orchestra. They are lovely musical fragments and the tone of the strings and wind is unusually fine. They may be played over repeatedly without losing their charm.

Rimsky Korsakoff is represented by the Introduction and Wedding March from his opera, "Le Coq D'or." The Introduction is principally concerned with the leit-motive of the Golden Cockerel, so popularly known in the "Hymn to the Sun" excerpt.

Pathe "Actuelle."

A point in favour of the New Pathe "Actuelle" double sided record is its extremely reasonable price. It should also be remembered that it is possible to use it with any make of needleplaying machine. Some of the latest dance records to hand include many favourite melodies adapted to jazz methods. "Oh, Sarah," and "Hinky Pinky, Parlay Voo" would be prime favourites amongst extra tters. The latter has a distinct Flanders flavour about it. Two good waltzes are "When you're many miles from Home," and "Goodnight Moonlight." A further foxtrot of note is "Bagdad." Admirers of the ballet order are this month regaled with two selections by Frank Sterling in true McCormack style. The songs are "I wonder if she's waiting," and "Noreen."

Victrola.

The selections from the latest supplement sent for review are nothing if not varied. There are two violin records to choose from, one by Renee Chemet, and the other by Elman. Sitting in judgment on these particular reproductions, one cannot but admire the caressing and sympathetic tone of the former in Lieurance's "By the Waters of Minnetonka" in comparison to the metallic hardness of Elman's "Albumblatt." His "Gondoliera" on the reverse side is much more acceptable, but does not eclipse the appeal of Chemet's 'singing' tone. Her other solo is, by the way, a little composition by Thome. Galli-Curci's contributions are from two of Massent's operas, "Manon" and "Don Cesar de Bazan." They are both excellent examples of coloratura art and this singer, as usual, achieves some brilliant work. In "The Song of the Swan," an arrangement of Saint-Saens' "Le Cygne," Gigli seems rather out of place. He is much more at home with "Paquita," a serenade of Spanish type. Hulda Lashanska does very well in two high-grade ballads, "Bird of Love Divine," and "Love Came Calling." The first will be recognized a favourite of old Werrenrath also has two songs to his credit, full of the 'hearty' flavour one usually associates with old-time 'ale' songs. Their titles are "Brown October Ale," and "Stein Song." The most deserving of the new records include two songs by Jeritza, one by Schumann, and the other by Brahms. The first mentioned is "Widmung" (Dedication), and that by Brahms, "Dein blaues Auge" (So clear thine eyes). Both are rendered in spirited style. Jose Mardones, also, has a fragment from Donitzetti's "Lucrezia Borgia," and one from an opera by Ferrari, "Pipele." This artist's fine voice is given full justice, and is not dissimilar in timbre to that of Titta Ruffo.

Dance Decords.

The big batch of Victor dance records just received is up to usual standard. The tendency now seems to be toward a less jazzy and more melodic outline than formerly, although most of the examples submitted are still crowded with the quaintest and weirdest effects, some pleasant, some otherwise. Special attention is paid to maintaining rhythm, whilst the scoring in many instances, one must ungrudgingly admit, is very clever. If one has to make a choice among the fox-trots, a star might be placed against "Lovely Little Wallflow'r" and "Worryin' Blues," "To-Night's the Night," "Blackin' Blues," and "Ukulele Blues," "There's no one just like you" and "Why don't my dreams come true," and certainly a double star against "Maytime" and "Plain Jane."

MISS Rosita Forbes, who has been travelling in America, has made the discovery that Americans are over-civilized and, although they are great tourists, at heart they are not real travellers for they hate discomfort and simplicity. Their ideas run along Pullman car lines and every kind of labour-saving device. Travel has not the educating effect it is reputed to have for the reason that the American globe trotter perambulates from one international hotel to another, having features more or less alike the world over. Miss Forbes goes on: "There is a great fallacy in the American worship of conducted travel, for nothing is more obvious to the observant Briton abroad than the fact that the typical Western tourist, while seeming to be omnivorous in his appetite for information in tabloid form, is really little touched by the atmosphere or the character of the people amongst whom he travels. For one thing travel amongst a certain class of wealthy Americans is merely a cachet to social distinction in America and is hardly an end in itself and the idea of getting into contact with alien peoples, tongues and ideals is altogether foreign to the confirmed globetrotter. It is a deplorable fact that with all our increased facilities for locomotion the traveller of to-day is more frequently than not a dull fellow when he is not a guidebook gramophone."

IMPRESSIONS OF CHINA

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY.

Kading

In ancient times when a province rebelled, natives of that province, attached to the Imperial Court, offered themselves for punishment. They assumed responsibility for the acts of their people. They hoped that in offering themselves, their lives, their careers, their expectation of Imperial favour, they would mitigate the sufferings of their tribesmen and neighbours. No Chinese statesman, in times when morals were morals, would have countersigned a mandate for a punitive expedition against his home city. That has happened in this war and therefore China is where she is.

Shantung and Chihli

They are called Fukien troops, Chêkiang troops, Kiangsu troops. They are fighting to defend Chêkiang against Kiangsu or Kiangsu against Chêkiang. But these men of Shantung and Chihli have only scant interest in Kiangsu and Chêkiang. Their soul is in that wide, hard country, the plains of North China, subject alike to drought and flood, either in famine or verging thereon. They hope to fight for a competence to rebuild the family shack or perhaps to marry off a son. These men were forced out of their villages by the surplus population of the plains. Some took to the hills and became good-natured bandits, others to the armies to become good-natured soldiers. Now, they are fighting each other. But should one ask them why? they cannot answer.

Modernization

Two great improvements in the art of warfare were made during the Great War: the use of poison gas and press propaganda. One was ungallantly destructive of the human body; the other, of human intelligence. Chemical warfare was the masterpiece of frightfulness; war propaganda, the masterpiece of stupidity. In the course of her modernization, "China has learned the arts of press propaganda. Both sides in this great war hand out communiqués which tell nonothing and mean nothing and only confuse this mind. To obtain the truth, one has to ferret beneath the surface and in difficult places. For the process of modernization has driven men to fear to speak the truth. Perhaps that is why there is a war between Kiangsu and Chêkiang.

On the Liuho Road

Farmer women bringing in their crops, the water buffalo placidly gazing at the sky, a little boy riding his back. Farmer men carrying vegetables to the city. The postman making his rounds on a bicycle. A villager smokes a cigarette and philosophizes on the peacefulness of nature. A motor lorry carrying wounded soldiers rushes madly to the city. Its siren shrieks, its wheels squeak, its body crashes noisily onward. Then silence. The sun sets and tomorrow one must gather the cotton bolls.

BATHS

By "ARCH PETER."

There are many kinds of baths. Every one knows that.

Even the youngest child is well acquainted with a swimming bath. Often too, he can, at a very tender age, give excellent exhibitions of how it is done—or a sort of "Series of lessons of swimming without swallowing the bath water."

Travelling Home from Shanghai per steamer was a scramble this last spring—at least as regards the bath. But, having duly waited one's turn in a queue, one did eventually bathe.

Arrived, and staying a few days in a London hotel, one found everything necessary to cleanse and refresh the travel-stained visitor. Two baths a day almost sufficed to clear the pores of the grime and soot of beloved London Town—three would have made for real cleanliness. But three baths a day in a London hotel are only for the taipan, not for the poor stenographer home on short leave.

Then came "home"—the truly really home. "Home" is criticized by old-fashioned, outside members of the family because the present occupants, retired from India, on buying the house, had spent what money was left in adding two up-to-date modern bathrooms to the venerable relic of the Elizabethan age that had previously served.

Did the Elizabethans bathe one wonders?

The two extra and up-to-date bathrooms were considered by the old-fashioned members to show a tendancy to "swank"; but as one of them was devoted to the use of "Mummie's Girl" when she thought fit to waken up, "Mummie's Girl" was very happy there.

Then came Great Aunt Belinda's invitation: couched in Great Aunt's most cordial old-fashioned courteous style: to stay with her in Cornwall. Great Aunt Belinda's house is charming. It has that old-world spell about it that only a dear old English house, with tiny diamond shaped windows set in ivy covered walls, and planted in the middle of a delightful "jungle" garden, ever has.

But not a sign of a bath. I washed in patches in my room; and went down to dinner with the uncomfortable feeling that the patches had not over-lapped.

Next morning the bath arrived.

It was carried into my room. It resembled a large shallow milk basin with a lip to it: and the bottom of it was just covered with cold water. Two jugs of hot water were placed conveniently near.

I will draw a veil over the performances and gymnastics of the next half hour.

Suffice it to say that everything within a radius of several feet was thoroughly splashed and wet. But I, in extraordinary fashion, somehow remained dry, with flecks of dried soap adhering to my person. Just two tiny drops of water and a soap bubble remained in that dreadful bath.

After four days everyone remarked how sunburned I was.

On the fifth day I could stand the sunburn no longer, so journeyed up to London Town again—"important appointment with my Dentist dearest Aunt Belinda"—and spent the day getting clean.

Back in Cornwall by the end of the 10th day I was very well sun burned again. Then I remembered two school friends living at Bath—conveniently near to Cornwall—and fled to them. They took it in turns to scrub me.

After that experience I hugged my truly really home for the rest of my holiday in England. There one was sure of one's daily bath.

I returned to Shanghai—delightful, dirty, noisy, snobby Shanghai—on the Kaisar-I-Hind, and the stewards nicknamed me "The Mermaid."

People sympathize with me for my return in hot weather. They needn't, I am glad it is hot. I splash in my early morning "shower"; wallow in the bath after that early morning ride; and indulge in a cold dip before tiffin.

At 5 o'clock is it tea, or mahjongg, or even tennis that appeals to me? Do I accept Mr. Montague Longshanks invitation to be tead on the French Club Terrace and driven by him round the Rubicon in his new two-seater before dinner?

By no manner of means. I leave office and come home to bathe. I dine and go out to swim. I retire for the night with wet hair and water still singing in my ears. And on waking next morning my first call is:—

"Amah catchee barff"!

THE engagement is announced of Yvonne Marion Lowe, second daughter of the late Mr. A. D. Lowe, of Shanghai and Stamford, and Mrs. Ingram, of Penang, to John Godfrey Allan, of Malakoff Estate, son of Mr. and Mrs. Allan, of Edinburgh.

NOTES BY THE WAY

By the death of Lady Colvin, which occurred at 35 Palace Gardens Terrace, Kensington, last month, there has passed from English life one whose name will for ever be associated with the literary genius of our country (says the "Daily Telegraph"). "What her influence was, as 'inspirer, consoler, and guide' upon Robert Louis Stevenson was realized to the full by himself, for, ten years after their first meeting in 1873, he wrote to her: 'If I am here and happy, I know to whom I owe it; I know who made my way for me in life, if that were all; and I remain with love, your faithful friend, R.L.S.' She it was who, when Stevenson as a young man was oppressed by doubts of himself, stopped his drifting and directed him upon the course which was to bring him fame; and among her rewards were those letters from the novelist which have taken an abiding place in English literature."

It may now be said that the best sketch of her which can ever be done may be read in an anonymous contribution to the anthology, "Her Infinite Variety," made by E. V. Lucas, closest and kindest of all friends in these later years. It is in the selection of women called "Daughters of Erin," and is entitled "A Thorough-Bred." It is the very word of love and truth. The literary portrait following was written by her husband, and to say that it is worthy of him and her is to say all. For him, the most generous friend of other men in the literature of our time, no expression can tell all the return of feeling and remembrance that goes out to him now, and no praise of him can ever equal her own.

Mr. Birrell much admires the work of Lytton Strachey. Of "Eminent Victorians" he says:—

"This is a delightful book full of the best qualities of authorship, and having the charm and all the authority of youth. It is sure to travel far and make many friends. One of its qualities is the pleasure-giving quality, and in many, though not perhaps in all quarters, "Eminent Victorians" will be read and re-read with pleasure and with profit. . . The Vision of Florence Nightingale is a spirited and even magnificent bit of writing, whilst the story of General Gordon....holds you in its grip from first to last."

"Conrad's mastery of the subtleties of English was surprising—despite his remark to the effect (the exact words escape me) that the only language for maritime occasions is English, because the Sea itself understands none other," says a "Morning Post" writer. "Mr. George Santayana is the nearest parallel case, for who would ever guess, reading his English poems and essays, that he is Spanish to the heart's core."

THE ROMANCE OF SALVAGE

THE WONDERS OF SALVAGE. By David Masters. (Lane. 8s. net.)

It is estimated that in ships and cargoes £5,000,000 is lost annually in British waters. The effort to recover part of this sum has led to the invention of ingenious devices and been the inspiration of most daring feats. The devices and the daring—the human brain and the human spirit—are pitted against Nature in the active and ruthless strength of her great waters; and it is the varied, thrilling, and romantic forms taken by the ensuing struggle that make the subject of Mr. Masters's book.

The aim of the salvor is to raise to the surface something that is under water, and that something may be treasure, documents, a battleship of 24,000 tons, or, most thrilling of all, yet breathing men imprisoned in a sunken submarine. In the limited space of a review the salvor must be presented as the man who dives, but he would be the first to acknowledge his debt to the scientific investigators who have slowly discovered general laws and to the practical thinkers of his own craft who employ that general knowledge in advising him as to the solution of his particular problem.

How does the ordinary man who can swim and take a header conceive the water? Its resistance is inconsiderable—enough to give leverage; if he has tried surf bathing he knows he cannot fight the rollers; but in his experience it is quiet enough under water; if he could breathe he could swim the longest bath, and he might assume that as the diver carries with him an appliance for breathing his task primarily demands patience. These conditions do not apply to the diving of the salvor. At 300 feet—an insignificant depth in comparison with the abysses—water is almost solid; it takes a concentrated effort to lift a hand. And, as likely as not, on the coasts where ships go down this huge weight of water is flung about by violent currents—a ship may be covered in sand or mud in a few hours. In no long time she will have ceased to be a ship. The passenger has to ask his way about a great liner; the diver has to find his own with the risk that doors may slam with the current behind him and upon his air pipe. But she does not remain a liner. Take this from the account of the Laurentic, from which in the end the salvors recovered almost the whole of her five millions of bullion:—

The sheer weight of the water above her was crushing her flat, squeezing her into a shapeless mass just as you might crush a lily in your hand. Moreover, she was full of silt and mud. . . Once more the winter gales played havoc with the wreck, and next spring the divers found that the treasure was lost under a mass of twisted plates and girders. Imagine a street of lofty houses, then imagine that all the buildings were pushed suddenly down into the centre of the road, and you will arrive at some faint idea of what the ship looked like. Great girders were bent into all kinds of strange shapes; iron bars thick as a man's wrist were twisted into fantastic curves.

To be raised to any purpose a sunken ship must be brought to the surface almost as quickly as a drowning man—thence several thrilling stories of salvage in the war, during which a ship was worth more than many men. "After this rather exciting episode," continues the author sedately, after describing how a diver suddenly found himself pulled from his investigations by his life line and dragged along by an irresistible force until at length he broke the surface: the salvage ship had sighted a submarine and run for it. For his own safety the diver should have been raised to the surface slowly—stopping every so many feet to do physical exercises designed to prevent the formation of bubbles of nitrogen in the blood. They put him in the recompression chamber to reproduce the conditions, and we infer that he recovered.

This book is to be recommended for what it tells of the ingenuity of the scientist, of the acumen and enterprise of the expert in charge of the operations, and, above all, of the courage, resource, and pertinacity of the diver. But apart from all that, it contains tales which make Blue-books of sensational magazines.

THE ARCADIAN BUMPKIN

THE SHEPHERD'S WEEK. By Mr. John Gay. (Blackwell. 4s. 6d. net).

This little book, besides giving in pleasant form John Gay's neat and entertaining parodies of pastoral eclogue, embodies in a practical way a sermon on the text: "Put not your trust in editors." The editor, Mr. H. F. B. Brett-Smith, tells in his Introduction of how, trusting to a statement of Mr. John Underhill's in his edition of Gay's poems in "The Muses' Library," he was on the point of accepting the edition with the R. Burleigh imprint as the original one. "And but for an accident," he remarks, "readers of this volume might have gone on trusting Mr. Underhill's very definite pronouncement." The accident referred to caused Mr. Brett-Smith to refer directly to original sources instead of taking his facts on trust, and the fact which emerged from this unusual proceeding was that the R. Burleigh edition was not the original: R. Burleigh had been forestalled in the same year by .Ferd. Burleigh. "The edition here reprinted," writes Mr. Brett-Smith, "is therefore of the first year, but not the first, though it is considerably the rarer of the two. Both the Burleigh editions correspond page for page, as indeed do all the early octavos of "The Shepherd's Week," but Fred. Burleigh's text has a much more liberal and 18th-century allowance of capital letters (he gives them to every noun), and is occasionally superior in printing a title or quotation in distinctive italics."

From this statement it would appear that to reprint the R. Burleigh edition instead of the other was a regrettable error. The earlier edition is much pleasanter to look at with its frequent italics and capitals, so typical of the 17th and 18th centuries, and the only reason why it was not the edition chosen was that Mr. Underhill was inaccurate and Mr. Brett-Smith trustful. But now we reach the climax of our sermon on editors, for, having occasion to consult the original edition, I discovered, on comparing it with the present reprint that (unless the reprint is not a reprint) the two Burleigh editions do not, as Mr. Brett-Smith says they do, correspond page for page, for page nine in the reprint contains eight lines of verse which do not appear in the earlier edition. This fact would have provided an excellent excuse—and the only excuse—for the reprinting of the R. Burleigh edition in place of the earlier one; but, as it is, the most important point that emerges is that Mr. Brett-Smith is no more reliable than Mr. Underhill as an editor, and but for an accident readers of this volume might have gone on trusting Mr. Brett-Smith's "very definite pronouncement."

So much for the editing. The book itself is pleasantly produced, and if the reproductions of the seven little engravings are somewhat blurred and heavy compared with the originals, it would be ungrateful to complain when the price of the book is so low, for they are good enough to make charming illustrations. The poems are delightful examples of light verse. To-day the element of skit has almost faded out of them, but they remain a light, accomplished pastiche, full of quaint and vivid details with a genuinely rural atmosphere breathing through their conscious artificality:—

"Whilom with thee 'twas Marian's dear delight
To moil all day, and merry make at night.
If in the soil you guide the crooked share,
Your early breakfast is my constant care.
And when with even hand you strow the grain,
I fright the theevish rookes from off the plain.
In misling days when I my thresher heard,
With nappy beer I to the barn repair'd;
Lost in the musick of the whirling flail,
To gaze on thee I left the smoaking pail;
In harvest when the sun was mounted high,
My leathern bottle did thy drought supply;
Where'er you mow'd I follow'd with the rake,
And have full oft been sun-burnt for thy sake;
When in the welkin gath'ring show'rs were seen,
I lagg'd the last with Colin on the green;
And when at eve returning with thy carr,
Awaiting heard the gingling bells from far;
Straight on the fire the sooty pot I plac't,
To warm thy broth I burnt my hands for haste.
When hungry thou stood'st staring, like an oaf,
I slic'd the luncheon from the barly loaf,
With crumbled bread I thicken'd well thy mess.
Ah, love me more, or love thy pottage less."

The Proeme, as delightful in its way as the verse, is more obviously comic:—

"That principally, courteous reader, whereof I would have thee be advertised (seeing I depart from the vulgar usage), is touching the language of my shepherds; which is, soothly to say, such as is neither spoken by the country maiden nor the courtly dame; nay, not only such as in the present times is not uttered, but was never uttered in times past; and, if I judge aright, will never be uttered in times future. It having too much of the country to be fit for the court; too much of the court to be fit for the country, too much of the language of old times to be fit for the present, too much of the present to have been fit for the old, and too much of both to be fit for any time to come."

That statement is, of course, conscious buffoonery, but nevertheless Gay would probably have been surprised to know how obviously, for later generations, his verse would date from its period, despite his archaistic pranks.

MARTIN ARMSTRONG.

A LESSON TO MEMOIR WRITERS

SOME EARLY IMPRESSIONS. By Leslie Stephen. (The Hogarth Press. 4s. 6d.)

This wise, tranquil, and beautifully written book is so unassuming as to give rise to the fear lest it may be swamped by contemporary literature of far less value. To give a complete impression of a lifetime in less than 200 pages is something of a tour de force, and one that could have been accomplished only by a man of extended experience in the profession of letters. Mid-Victorian Cambridge needed an apologist of the late Sir Leslie Stephen's calibre, and we have here a most entertaining glimpse of the rationalists who were, if not antagonisic, at least patronizingly amused by the antics of Newman and the Oxford Movement. Religious doubts apparently did not trouble Cambridge round about 1860. "Individuals might belong to what were then called the High, Low, or Broad parties; but their differences did not form the ground for any division in University politics." We may be pardoned for considering their activities slightly trivial when we learn that typical of the date was Bishop Colenso, who proved to his own satisfaction that certain statements made by the authors of the Pentateuch led to the conclusion that priests must eat over 88 pigeons a day! The writer gives an amusing picture of the rise of Evolutionism and Bible criticism round about 1860. The followers of Darwin and of what is known as "modern enlightenment" in general have always found a happier and more congenial home at Cambirdge than at the sister University, and some may consider this a matter for congratulation. Granted that the Oxford Movement as a social activity is out of date, as a contribution to the world's store of quiet romance and spiritual beauty it reaches a height never yet attained at Cambridge, where Science, that hard and bright-eyed lady, goes hand in hand with a cold variety of literary style.

In selecting anecdotes that will best give us the impression of some well-known figure Sir Leslie Stephen was a past master. He makes us know such men as J. S. Mill and Carlyle as though they were memories to us as well as to himself. What would be more revealing than his picture of Mill passionately defending a mediocre disciple whom someone had attacked—or that of Carlyle's Johnsonian annoyance at being introduced to a bore? The number of "eminent Victorians" to whom he presents us in this way is indeed amazing; here are some of the notable characters who race through his pages: Isaac Todhunter, Whewell, Clerk Maxwell, Henry Sidgwick, Sir Walter Besant, Kingsley, "Tom" Hughes, Carlyle, J. S. Mill, Lowell, Abraham Lincoln, Thackeray, Ruskin, and many others.

Most interesting of all, perhaps, is the account of the author's experience of editorship. Having contributed to the "Saturday Review," then in possession of a remarkably brilliant staff, he became for some time editor of the "Dictionary of National Biography," which he eventually left in the hands of Sir Sidney Lee, to take over the "Cornhill Magazine." Experience of this kind leaves little to be discovered in the domain of journalism, and the scraps of information imparted to us on the subject are most entertaining.

But it is the smooth wisdom of the book which is the most astonishing thing about it. Out of the plenitude of his knowledge of and of men the author gives picture of an age such as a you er man could never have done. sobriety of it all! He never pushes his own charming per ality in the reader's face, and th is none of that hectoring, insist tone with which so many mod writers of memoirs bring dividualism into disrepute.

THE WOMAN'S PAGE

THE STOP-GO COMPLEX

"Oh the little Road says "Go;" but the little house says "Stay."

In many ways it is something of a misfortune to have a happy home. You stay in it. Human parents are not as self-sacrificing as the birds who push their children out of the nest when it is time for them to try their wings and explore the world. Of course it would have disadvantages, this having only a bird-like home, not even a "legal residence," a summer cottage, a winter apartment or the like.

Still, the birds migrate with an easy carelessness that seems of all things most desirable to the house-cumbered, association-fettered human. Why must we at the same moment love Piccadilly and Shepherd's Hotel; the Riviera and Alaska? We must protest when we leave that it is not that we love home less but that we have a scientific curiosity to know whether there is any place like it, after all.

Houses have so many possessions to shackle us. Three moves are as bad as a fire the wise old proverb says, but we incline to think that one is nine times worse. The thing to do, of course, is to have a pleasantly large family so that two members may readily absent themselves for travel purposes and hardly be missed the while the others carry on in the homestead. "Keep the home fires burning," was a good song, but some how no one wants to be the family stoker forever. All too frequently that poetic but tiresome task is relegated to the spinster daughter, but of her woes and the injustices done her let us expound on some other occasion.

To resume our diatribe on moving, or rather on packing, is there no way of ridding ourselves of this nuisance? Paper clothes were once prophecied; but would even these be cheap enough to allow us to discard them daily? There is this constant conflict between the desire to be foot-loose, to wander "down the world with Marna," with no possessions save those in your gypsy pack; and on the other hand the craving for things of our truly own, for equipment that shall be valuable and if possible unique.

Dwelling in this day and age when it seems necessary to have something in the way of luggage—for else how may one be permitted even to stop at a hotel?—it will perhaps be permitted us to accumulate some of the conveniences, not to say luxuries of life, provided we keep them in their place, so to speak. "The body is more than raiment," we must affirm as we buy a new gown. "Consider the lilies of the field," we must remind ourselves again, as we race and chase about our household and social cares. If its a choice between leaving our happy homes and all our dear belongings, and a tour of the world, let us go off blithely not fearing the corrupting moth or corroding rust.

MR. AND MRS. R. STANLEY DOLLAR

Mr. and Mrs. R. Stanley Dollar, with their children, Stanley Jr. and Diana, are shown just as they are setting out from San Francisco for Shanghai. A friend with a camera induced them to halt for a moment on the boat deck and this is the result. Mrs. Dollar is well known in California as one of the most gracious and charming hostesses of Piedmont, where the Dollars make their home, and it is plain from a moment's observation of her trim costume that she she represents the latest word in styles as well.

WORD PICTURES

An enthusiastic correspondent, who is herself an artist, writes from the str. Naldera, just entering Marseilles: "Did you ever know artistic indigestion? Were your emotions so played upon that you could not bear another thrill? Then you know my state of mind at the present writing,-so that in place of going on from Damascus to Constantinople as per schedule, I came back to Port Said and am landing at Marseilles to-morrow. The French Consulate is also rather responsible, as they were not over keen on my going further into Syria, owing to disturbances.

"If I had pressed the point—but as I said, I am overwhelmed and I want to get somewhere and absorb it all. This one thing is certain, I shall come back for a spring in Damascus. It drugged me like some heavy Oriental perfume and I revelled in it. I think my impression of the Mosque of Omar by far the best thing I have done on the trip. It was just at sunset, with the gold of the evening light softening it into an exquisite harmony."

AUTUMN'S DEAREST FAD

". . . spinsters and the knitters in the sun
And the free maids that weave their thread with bones."

Never was there such a vogue for knitted garments as this autumn brings with it. The shops are full of bewitching woolies and at every tea patterns for jumpers and dresses are exchanged and discussed. Through the kindness of Messrs. Paton and Baldwin we are privileged to offer our readers every Monday one of the latest designs in knitting and from the widespread interest in this engrossing pastime we feel confident that this will be a popular department.

We advise those already interested in knitting, and those who feel an interest coming on, to preserve these instructions week by week. By pasting them in a book a valuable series will be obtained for later reference. When one is putting time and money into handicraft of this nature one wishes assurance that the result will be satisfactory and throngs of knitters, expert and beginners have found these directions clear and reliable.

RAIN—THE PACIFIER

By Elizabeth Pepys.

The rain held off all summer;
We hadn't one typhoon,
Or even one small cooling shower
From August back to June.

It didn't waste its energy
But waited on the score
That all its pent-up energy
Alone could stop the war.

For oft when arbitration
And argument are vain,
Agreement has come after
A steady, drenching rain.

Let's hope our friend, J. Pluvius
Will set his usual pace
And arbitrate the conflict with no one's loss of face.

BLUE SWAMP LILIES

Lone hermits that the world has seldom seen:
By quiet little shallow pools they grow.
Thousands of lilies, dotted here and there.
Tucked loosely in the grass's glossy hair,
Waiting for some gay little breeze to blow
Their lovely petals open, just to show
The deeper sapphire that lies hidden there.
They will not grow in gardens,
They must be
In marshy places
Whispering of the sea—
In cool hidden places where men seldom tread
These hermit lilies make their marshy bed.
There—in the summer stillness—you will see
Blue lilies nodding to you joyously!

Reheating a Roast.

A good way to reheat a roast is by steaming. This is especially satisfactory if the roast is inclined to be slightly overdone or dry.

To Clean Painted Walls.

It will aid greatly in cleaning the painted walls if they are gone over with thin uncooked starched water.

Painted walls and woodwork can be cleaned easily and well by using equal parts of vinegar and kerosene. Wash with a cloth and dry with a dry cloth.

Molasses Pecan Pie.

Break 4 eggs in a pan and stir slightly. Add 1 cupful of sugar, 2 tablespoonfuls of butter, 1½ cupfuls a little vanilla. Beat together of medium-dark molasses, and a little vanilla. Beat together thoroughly.

Sprinkle the under crust lightly with sugar and flour to keep it from being soggy, then cover it with pecan nuts. Pour the mixture over them cover it with strips of pastry and bake slowly.

This recipe makes two pie fillings.

Swedish Cinnamon Cake.

Five even tablespoonfuls sugar; 6 even tablespoonfuls melted butter; cream together with 2 eggs not beaten. Then add 2 cupfuls sifted flour; 3 teaspoonfuls baking powder; 1 cupful milk; a little flavoring. Beat very well. Pour into a shallow tin, and sprinkle over the top the following mixture: 5 tablespoonfuls sugar; 2 tablespoonfuls bread crumbs and cinnamon to taste. Bake about 20 minutes.

PARTY HRESSES FOR THE YOUNGEST

Serve it as Cake Shells.

Instead of serving cut-up fruits, ice cream and ices, custards and gelatines in sherbet glasses or on plates, with cake passed separately, the newer thing is to serve them in cake shells. Cake is very much improved by the softening and flavoring given it by the absorption of flavored cream and juices, and the fillings achieve more character when combined with a cake of fine texture and harmonious or contrasting flavor. They become less flimsy and frippery, and although méringue, marshmallow caramel, chocolate, nuts and what-not may be added as topping they are not so cloyingly sweet as when served without the cake.

Any recipe can be used for the batter and the cook who understands the great art of combining flavours will find it interesting to determine what cake foundation should be used for the various fillings. An almost inexhaustible number of variations is possible with a few materials. Fruit short cakes are excellent in these forms.

The shells are to be had in two styles, one a single pan which will serve eight people liberally, the other a set of six individual pans. They are made of continuous pieces of aluminum and they bake evenly and impart a uniform colour. Cleansing is easy because there are no seams, crevices solder or rough places where food could stick. With good care, these shell tins are almost indestructible both in real wearing quality and in freshness of appearance.

SURRENDER

They handed me a lump of clay,
a shapeless thing;

"This is your life," they said, "to fashion as you will."

But I was never very good at sculpturing,

I had no teaching, ever, and I have no skill,

And so, I hand the clay to you, who are more fit,

Some day, perhaps, to make a lovely thing of it.

—Helen Choate, in "Varity Fair."

HEAVY ATTACK ON EAST FRONT

Bombardment Between Liuho and Kading: Liuho in Flames: Refugees Pouring into Shanghai from All Round Country

Refugees, panic-stricken by Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang's retirement from Hangchow and anticipating the renewed Kiangsu attack, were pouring into the Settlement yesterday upon all roads from west and north. Special traffic officers, stationed at all approaches, met them and all suspicious-looking baggage was inspected. Yesterday evening at 6 o'clock a special train came in from Kiangwan, in which were placed 250 girls and the smaller boys from the Anti-Kidnapping Society's home. The larger boys, very nearly as many more, remain at the home until danger becomes more imminent. The girls, were marched to temporary quarters in Elgin Road.

For the first time in 10 days the road to Liuho showed signs of activity and yesterday ricshas travelled a greater portion of the distance, some of them coming into Shanghai laden with villagers and baggage, while others, empty, returned for further loads. Streams of peasants on foot, men, women and children from beyond Lotien, lined the paths, though the farmers between Shanghai and Lotien continued picking the cotton and other crops. Motor-trucks filled with the more prosperous, hurried by the others, while another car, bearing the American flag, filled with women and children outdistanced them all in their flight for safety. Others which carried a white cross on a blue field, were engaged in like work.

It was officially stated yesterday by Red Cross officials that the number of wounded in the Shanghai hospitals and those in Nantao, altogether nine, amount now to a total of 1,000 men, while at Woosung in the special military hospital and the extra one in the school near by, nearly 700 men are undergoing treatment. Thirty more arrived yesterday at Shanghai North Station and were taken to Woosung direct, while from the Liuho front occasional wounded men filtered through.

Fighting, as is indicated from all reports that seem authentic, appears to have been resumed on a large scale again by the Nanking men, who are now attacking with renewed confidence by reason of the débâcle at Hangchow, and with all arms are pushing hard. Yesterday morning three aeroplanes flew over the Chêkiang lines as far as Nanziang. They dropped bombs at both this point and the advanced station of Huangtu, but retired in a few minutes, after making military observations. Reports indicate that they flew too high to do much damage though several shells fell in the vicinity of the Nanziang station house.

Shanghai residents, many of whom were awakened during the night by gun fire, believed the reports to be from a much closer point, though this is a matter of dispute, for officials at the railway station at a late hour last evening stated that trains were running as usual, when the military desired, as far as Nanziang and at that station an engine and car went on to Huangtu if the need arose. This would make it unbelievable that the Kiangsu lines had made any material gain, for the main Chêkiang batteries, of the heaviest guns, are entrenched right at the latter point, not more than 100 yds. distant from the further extremity of the railway yards.

There is a scarcity of military information to be had in Shanghai for the military officials have forbidden correspondents to ride on the troop trains to the front, while yesterday afternoon motor-cars on the Liuho road were stopped at Lotien.

The Burning of Liuho

Wounded soldiers who came through with the refugees stated that Liuho was in flames and the better portion of it burned to the ground, and that although the Chapei fire brigade hastened to the village they were unable to do much to stop the flames—there was not enough water. The fire had burned from midnight onward and yesterday afternoon the town was all but in ruins. Two of the motors returned to their station while the third remained at the scene.

The flames are said to have been started by incendiary bombs fired by the naval vessels lying in the Yangtze River, several miles from the city. Eight ships of various sizes compose the fleet and these, manœuvring as they do, approach their objective in pairs, fire their rounds and then veer off, while the next approach. This report conflicts with that of the day previous, when it was thought that but two ships were engaged. Yet another report says that the Kiangsu and the Independent navies have come to terms to do no more firing.

While the flames occupied the attention of the coolies and the few non-combatants yet remaining in Liuho, the army under command of Colonel Chang, who personally directed operations at the immediate front, were busily engaged in repulsing the Kiangsu attack. With the village well ablaze the naval detachment began to fire off their heavier guns and the reports heard in Shanghai led military men to observe that they were either six inch or 4.7, either of which could be heard with favourable weather conditions (as they were) in Shanghai. Infantry and machine-gun attacks continued throughout the night and the night's fighting was probably heavier than any since Colonel Chang's men retook the town from Kiangsu about 10 days ago.

Guns Heard in Settlement.

At intervals all day the big guns could be heard easily in the Settlement. The noise died away about 4 p.m. but was heard again after nightfall.

Later reports from the Huangtu sector indicate that fighting began with renewed vigour on the entire length of the sector, though no news was received from Kading.

A reliable Chinese, who visited Lunghua on Thursday, reported that the safe belonging to Gen. Ho was removed to within the Settlement during the day, this containing valuable personal and some military papers. Still another semi-official report has it that Marshal Lu brought all the rolling stock of the railway from Hangchow to Sungkiang and that no trains are running beyond that point. One thousand soldiers are stated to have left the capital of Chêkiang for Sungkiang to join the garrison at the latter point.

Discipline has in no way been relaxed in Marshal Lu's army. Yesterday evening a deserter passed round Shanghai bound for Lunghua, where he will be shot after a court martial.

Large groups of American sailors from the ships in port, given shore leave at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, were recalled by order within an hour.

The Defence of Shanghai.

Although the situation appears to be getting more serious, people are urged not to lose their composure and to pay no heed to the innumerable rumours circulating.

The closest possible point that any armed defending forces were in actual touch with the enemy at 6 p.m. yesterday was at Huangtu, by air at least 18 miles from the Bund and much further than that by road. Last night the cordon was drawn still tighter round the Settlement, while the British Marines patrolled the roadways entering over the railway in the western district. All points of entry are well barricaded.

Marshal Lu's Men Said to Be Holding Well

1 a.m.

A communiqué issued at Lunghua at 12.30 a.m. by Dr. Loh, Secretary of General Ho Feng-lin, states that Marshal Lu's army is still holding Huangtu, although the Kiangsu troops made a desperate attack on their line. This attack was one of the most serious during the war. The staff at Lunghua communicated with Nanziang by telephone at 12.10 a.m. and were informed that the line was holding satisfactorily. A large number of prisoners from the 3rd Regiment of the Honan Brigade had been captured.

There was heavy firing at Liuho during the day but no change appeared in that situation. The northern part of the town was burned by enemy shell-fire. Everything quieted down by 11 p.m.

No information has been received at Lunghua with regard to the activities of Marshal Chang Tso-lin. No news has been received from Hangchow as to the movements of General Sun Chuan-fang, Tuli of Fukien. Reports that the 4th Division stationed at Changhsing had joined in the treachery are untrue.

 Foreign reports support the above.

A report at 1.30 a.m. stated that the Kiangsu troops had found an unguarded road by which they were coming behind their opponents' defences from Kading to Lotion on the Liuho road.

DUTCH BATTLESHIP TO SHANGHAI

The Hague, Sept. 20.

The Government have sent the battleship De Zeven Provincien to Shanghai to protect Dutch interests in China.—Reuter.

THE native press, commenting upon the final satisfactory nomination of Dr. W. W. Yen to the Premiership, says that the matter probably passed the House of Representatives on account of support being given by members who belong to the province of Kiangsu, as they will feel that the Central Government will be in a stronger position to support General Chi Hsieh-yuan when it has a permanent and not temporary Cabinet.

WU PEI-FU IN PEKING PRESSING CAMPAIGN AGAINST MUDKEN

Fengtien Airmen Said to Have Bombed Shanhaikuan: Command of Chihli Army: Men and Mules Seized for Transport

From Our Own Correspondent.

Peking, Sept. 18.

Reports which are credited in official circles state that Fengtien airmen bombarded Shanhaikuan today. If these reports are true, it marks the opening of the Mukden offensive, which has been foreshadowed for the past two days. If there had been any hopes of a last-minute peace, they were shattered by to-day's Presidential mandates declaring war on Marshal Chang Tso-lin and appointing Commanders of the Chihli armies.

Marshal Wu Pei-fu is given supreme command, with Gen. Wang Cheng-ping second in command, in charge of two wings of the armies in the field. None of the commanders has yet left Peking, but their troops have been moving northwards for several days past.

The Chihli line will extend from a point facing Chaoyang to Hsifengkow and on to Shanhaikuan, and by this time the troops must have come into collision with the Fengtien forces between these points.

Wu Pei-fu's Energy.

The presence of Marshal Wu Pei-fu in the capital has stiffened the attitude of the Chihli Party. The prompt issue of the mandate regarding Chang Tso-lin is the first fruit of his visit and his constant conferences with the Army Commanders are another proof of the influence he exerts. He plunged straight away into a conference with Gen. Feng Yu-hsiang as soon as he arrived in Peking at three o'clock yesterday morning. Among those with whom he has been in close conference is Dr. W. W. Yen, who had never previously met him.

It is not at all certain yet whether Gen. Feng Yu-hsiang will go to the front. In anticipation, however, of persuasion having successful effect, Marshal Wu Pei-fu is stated to be bringing other troops northward to guard the capital.

Rigid Censorship.

The presence of Marshal Wu Pei-fu has had a steadying effect on the capital, although Peking is still deluged with false, wild and tendencious reports. Owing to the censorship, which is more rigorous than ever before, the Chinese papers are very chary about printing war news. An exception is the Japanese-owned "Shuntien Shihpao," the sale of which is now prohibited by the police authorities. Several papers published in foreign languages are under similar restrictions, while some Chinese newspapers and news agencies have been closed down altogether. Incidentally, the "Shuntien Shihpao" was reaping a harvest as the result of its policy of publishing all the news, and the paper was selling for twice its regular price.

The commandeering of men, mules, carts and stores is proceeding in the same fashion as in the Shanghai district.

Sept. 19.

Gen. Wang Huai-ching, Commander of the Second Army, has left for the Chaoyang front.

According to the "Manchuria Daily News" the command of the Fengtien armies now facing the Chihli forces has been vested in Gen. Chu Ching-lan, formerly in command of the Chinese Eastern area. It is reported that Marshal Chang Tso-lin has arrived at Chinchow to take supreme command.

KIANGSU READY FOR THE PUSH

Last Days of Reinforcements and Supplies Poured Down to Quinsan Front

By H. L. Pearce.

General Headquarters,

Quinsan, Sept. 17.

Very probably by the time this report appears the Kiangsu army's "big push" will have been put into operation. For days past it has been obvious that Marshal Chi has decided to concentrate all his force on this front and smash his way through to Shanghai. When I left Quinsan this morning, there were troops everywhere preparing to leave for the front, and every possible means was being brought into use for conveyance of men and munitions to the Liuho sector. One operation of special interest was the despatch of two heavy guns along the canal to Kading. The great iron gates of the yamên were pulled off their hinges and used as a platform whereon the guns were lowered from the canal bank to a junk, and this difficult feat having been accomplished, the gates were promptly restored to their ancient use.

During the day, five special trains fully loaded with troops, field guns and munitions arrived at Quinsan, adding possibly some 2,500 or 3,000 men to the fighting strength.

With no doubt full knowledge of all these preparations, the Chêkiang forces made a determined effort to break through the line on the night of the 16th, and so nearly succeeded that, for the second time, all available trains were detained at Anting in readiness for an emergency exit. You will already have received an account of this engagement, but some further details of the fighting as observed from Anting railway station will be of interest.

The Chêkiang plan consisted of a turning movement by troops on the left of the Liuho line and the Kading right, the two attempting to sweep down in a curving line upon Taitsang.

Precisely at 11.30, artillery opened fire all along the line from Huangtu station to Kading, and, taken by surprise, some 10 minutes elapsed before the Kiangsu gunners returned the fire. A terrific duel ensued, and was maintained while the Chêkiang soldiers went forward from the centre of the Kading-Liuho line. The attack was sustained with great determination, and it was fascinating to watch the crescent line of rifle fire by the advancing troops. At 12.15 when the battle was in full swing, a Chêkiang ammunition dump "went up," lighting the skies for an instant with a great fan-shaped flame. Artillery, machine gun and rifle fire was kept up with great intensity until about 1 a.m., and by that time it was observed that the Chêkiang men actually advanced to within a short distance of Taitsang. They got no nearer, however, and when at dawn Kiangsu reinforcements were rushed into the firing line, the attacking force was compelled to retire upon its original position. Shells continued to burst and showed a paler flash against a wonderful sunrise, and it was not until 6 a.m. that the last shot in this very lively encounter was fired. Even so, the Kiangsu Staff waited for another three hours, for assurance there was to be no renewal of the attack, before they would allow any movement by the waiting trains at Anting.

CHANG TSO-LIN'S ADVANCE

500 Russians Enlisted

Mukden, Sept. 19.

Fengtien troops of the Second and Fourth Armies have occupied Fushin capturing quantities of ammunition. These forces are now advancing on Chuli (?).

In response to an appeal from Marshal Chang Tso-lin for volunteers, 500 Russians enlisted. More are expected to join.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, Sept. 18.

The Presidential Mandate issued yesterday morning ordering the subjugation of Marshal Chang Tso-lin appointed Admiral Tu Hsi-kuei Commander-in-Chief of the Navy and Admiral Wen Shou-teh second-in-command.—Reuter.

HOW CHEKIANG WENT OVER

Province Now Considers Itself Wholly Out of War Which It Never Wanted

The coup d'état in Chêkiang on Wednesday night was the result of negotiations on the Fukien border, according to a statement made by a prominent member of the Chêkiang gentry. The immediate agent in organizing the treachery was a cavalry officer who had been a classmate of General Sun Chuan-fang, the Tuli of Fukien, and who would not fight against him. The Chêkiang troops then accepted a defeat after a sham battle and retired, finally turning altogether and marching toward Hangchow. General Chang, Civil Govenor of Chêkiang, under whose personal supervision were the 1st and 2nd Division was in Hangchow and not at the front. Being responsible for the conduct of his troops, he immediately resigned, although his resignation has not been accepted. It is not proved that he was in any way personally implicated in the treachery.

The report yesterday that Hsia Chao, Chief of the Chêkiang Constabulary, had assumed the position of Acting Civil Governor, is not technically correct. Marshal Lu and Civil Governor Chang having vacated their posts, he took charge of the situation, "opening and closing letters," as the Chinese express it. The question as to who is to assume charge of Chêkiang affairs as by no means settled, many important persons aspiring to both the Tuchunate and the Civil Governorship.

War Over—for Chekiang.

The attitude of the Chêkiang people was clearly stated by this same Chêkiang speaker. The war is over, so far as Chêkiang is concerned. Chêkiang never wanted war and never made war. Kiangsu, Fukien and Anhui, assisted by all the forces of the Peking Government made war on Chêkiang. The object of Peking was to dispossess Lu Yung-hsiang. They have succeeded in their object. The Chêkiang people cannot understand why any further attacks should be made on their province. If Marshal Chi continues his attacks on Chêkiang, it means that he is not quarrelling with Lu Yung-hsiang but with the Chêkiang people, which would be most unjust.

Marshal Lu, our informant pointed out, has taken up his position in Lunghua. That is not Chêkiang territory. That was never claimed by Chêkiang as her territory. When the Defence Commissionership was established at Shanghai, a district was given to the Defence Commissioner, which in time became independent of both Kiangsu and Chêkiang. It so happens that the present Defence Commissioner is the intimate friend and the partner-in-arms of Marshal Lu. That is a personal matter between them. From Sungkiang to Nanziang is not a sufficient territory for Marshal Lu to assume to govern. Marshal Lu must therefore regard himself as the guest of General Ho Feng-lin and the war becomes one between Chi Hsieh-yuan and Ho Feng-lin.

It is not to be presumed that the Chêkiang people are unfriendly to Marshal Lu. They have a high regard for him and would have supported him to the end. But the treachery of the troops on the Fukien border resulted in bringing the invading armies on Chêkiang soil. Marshal Lu had promised that that would not happen and he has eliminated himself to keep his promise.

War against Chihli Goes on.

With regard to the general war situation, this Chêkiang speaker, who is also very closely affiliated with Marshal Tuan and whose name is not mentioned because he is in retirement and desires no publicity, said that Marshals Tuan Chi-jui, Chang Tso-lin and Lu Yung-hsiang would continue their war against the Chihli party and the policy of pacification by force as long as they could. Of course, they might be defeated, just as their political aims were defeated by Marshal Chi's precipitating a war. But eventually, they would be able to destroy the Chihli Party because the Chinese people suffer more than do the military men and the politicians under the heel of the pacification policy.

MONDAY.

COMPLETE LULL ON EASTERN FRONT

After Kiangsu's Attack of Last Friday a Week-end of Tranquillity

The situation along all fronts was very quiet all day on Sunday as it had been for the most part on Saturday. Only rarely did the artillery speak. At Liuho it was rumoured that aeroplanes had flown over the lines, dropping bombs, but Colonel Loo Ching-woo, attached to a brigade there, refuted this, though during Saturday night aeroplanes did drop bombs in the vicinity, but because of their high flying they did no damage. Kading is reported as being in the hands of Chêkiang again and the former report that the line had been broken for a depth of three miles appears to be without foundation, though Chêkiang supporters admit that a flanking movement executed by Kiangsu managed to circumvent the southern lines. On the other hand, the entire body that got through are said to be either dead or prisoners.

It was impossible for correspondents to go beyond Lotien yesterday and a motor-car which passed a barricade in the road was called back by armed guards.

The Lunghua official communiqué on Saturday stated that the situation for a while at Nanziang was quite serious, the Kiangsu troops having made an advance, but the position was won back and 200 prisoners and much ammunition were taken, the Honanese being the victims. Malootsen was also recovered after a stiff battle and it was asserted that Chêkiang aeroplanes did much damage beyond Huangtu. The Liuho situation was reported as quite favourable, though at Kading the conditions were more serious, but here, too, it was stated that all lost ground had been recovered.

Independent Navy Joins Kiangsu

The Independent Navy under the command of Admiral Lin sailed out of the Huangpu os Sunday at daybreak, the destination said to be Liuho.

It was reported in reliable quarters that the Independent Navy had come to an arrangement with the fleet under the command of Admiral Tu Shih-kuei and that the sudden departure from Shanghai means the joining of both fleets. Four out of the five ships of the Independent Fleet are gone.

Dr. Loh, Secretary to General Ho Feng-lin, when questioned with regard to this report, admitted that Lunghua had heard of the defection of the fleet but that it had not been confirmed. He said that Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang was fully confident in Admiral Lin personally and that the Admiral was at present in Shanghai, not having gone with the ships.

The Independent Navy has been affiliated with various factions since it declared itself independent of the Peking Government. It announced at the outset of the present war that it was loyal to Marshal Lu. The inability of the Navy to do much damage resulted from the insistence on the part of the Consular Body that the Huangpu be neutralized from Woosung to Lunghua inclusive. Finally, several days ago, the Independent Navy and the fleet under the command of Admiral Tu Shih-hui agreed not to attack each other.

Kiangsu Attacking Again

Midnight.

A communiqué issued by Dr. Loh, Secretary to General Ho Feng-lin, last night, stated that the front had been quiet during the day and that Marshal Lu's position was safe. At Liuho and Huangtu the position was unchanged.

Firing recommenced late last night, Kiangsu attacking.

MERELY INCIDENTAL

Scenes and Impression Behind the Kiangsu Lines

By H. L. Pearce.

In a moment of exasperation one of my colleagues composed an epigram upon the Chinese. He said they were all face pidgin and filth, and the remark was inspired by a Quinsan street incident of so unpleasant character that the inclusion of "face-pidgin" in this brief descriptive criticism was probably intended only as a complimentary set-off. The observation was a gross libel, of course, but there was a grain of truth in it. Quinsan, like most Chinese cities, is no health resort. It has the usual choice assortment of domesticated poison gases, the usual unhappy display of squalor, dirt, dilapidation, the usual net-work of alleyways disguised as city streets, and seemingly more than its quota of unattached canine residents; but in these matters it is no worse than any other Chinese city, beloved of its citizens. They are content. They will gossip among garbage quite cheerfully so long as gossip is good and is conduced with decorum. One wished, however, that their master of secular wisdom, Confucius, had found time for composing just one small treatise upon the organization of a Public Health and Sanitation Department. Perhaps our missionary friends will supply the deficiency. For the Gospel according to St. Luke they might occasionally substitute the Gospel according to Lever Bros. Quinsan stands in urgent need of a spring cleaning campaign. At a street corner I noticed a placard announcing a grand theatrical performance entitled "The Thirty Heavens." The joke will be upon me if the playwright has described Quinsan as the Seventh.

* * *

It was said that Marshal Chi would be delighted to meet representatives of the Shanghai newspapers, was indeed most anxious to do so, but had not a moment to spare. He remained in the deep seclusion of the magisterial Yamên, a human island surrounded by maps. No one ever saw him. One hardy fellow indeed claimed to have done so—but he was an American. One had therefore to be content with gazing upon the soldiers whom the Marshal was manipulating. They were a mixed lot, representing the seven ages of man and, physically, every stage of development from a T.B. ward to a Sandow Institute. Some looked like real fighting men. Others obviously had been dragged from the peace of their native fields and were still wondering why. There were Northern veterans capable of giving fierce reality to a bayonet charge, and there were youngsters who went into the firing line scarcely knowing why their rifles were fitted with bolts.

One story, well authenticated, explains the presence of these raw, untrained levies or some of them. A certain Defence Commissioner called upon to supply his quota of troops found himself in the not unusual predicament of having more men on the pay roll than on the parade ground. But the full number was quickly gathered. Between two and three hundred men and boys in his employ were enlisted, clothed in the garments of war, and packed off with the rest after "training" which just about amounted to explaining the difference between the nozzle and the butt of a rifle. Not all regiments of course were so unfortunately composed, but there were these weak points, and they may possibly explain why, with numerical odds so greatly in their favour—not less than four to one—the Kiangsu force has not yet pushed its way through to Shanghai. Possibly the Staff would not move without an overwhelming force to make a thorough job of it. We must wait and see.

Discipline one observed, though not of the Aldershot brand, and there was a considerable absence of military "eye wash." Sometimes a guard shuffled out and presented arms when the Chinese equivalent of a Brass Hat descended upon them, and occasionally one saw a salute in the Caterham style, but generally "posh" formalities were not insisted upon. Rice and rank co-mingled with easy affability. One rather typical incident was a joy to behold. There stepped down from a special train at Quinsan station a dapper little fellow of high rank and in the pride of a sleek, fat, exquisite youth. He was a cavalry officer and evidently kept a tailor, a hairdresser and a manicurist in his spare kit. With a smile and a beautifully controlled sense of self-importance he made his way through a mob of coolies and soldiers, brushing one and another aside with a polite touch, and quite indifferent to the vast amount of inattention he was receiving. No one sprang to attention, no one saluted as the little Colonel passed through the crowd with his gold and ivory cigarette holder daintily poised. Out in the station yard his charger awaited him—Rosinante, straight from the shafts of a gipsy wagon, one would have sworn—and so he ambled off, along the cobble stones leading to the yamên, the picture of badly mounted dignity.

MARSHAL LU'S TROOPS IN CHEKIANG

Concentrating at Kashing: Looting in South Chekiang by the Invaders

From Our Own Correspondent.

Hangchow, Sept. 19.

There is no special news beyond rumours that Gen. Pan, the Chêkiang leader, and Gen. Sun, the Fukienese, are looting all the towns they pass through on their way down the Chien Tang River. They are expected here in two days, or so, but meantime are held up for some reason or other. They think probably that Lu has put guns on the hill at Changtow to do for them as they land. This is not the case. No resistance will be offered to their entering the city. All the soldiers have been removed to Kashing.

The wounded are still coming in from Huchow. The troops there have been ordered to Kashing where Lu is expected to make his stand. We hear that the Chêkiang troops in the Huchow region have been surrounded, and General Chen's army has suffered badly, and many of them have refused to obey their officers. We are inclined to believe there is some truth in this because our Red Cross unit has telegraphed that they are in danger, and we are sending a doctor at once by special private motor boat to see what is really the matter.

All Loyal Troops Being Called Back from West to Strengthen the Eastern Sector

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kashing, Chê., Sept. 19.

Since the removal of Marshal Lu to Shanghai, the first flutter of excitement is over.

All available steam launches and boats of every description are being used to transfer troops from the Huchow section towards Shanghai. Tents for about a thousand soldiers are pitched at the East Gate, near railway station. The readjustment of Chêkiang Province, without further bloodshed or looting is hoped for. The passenger trains to-day are crowded with people moving in both directions.

Phases of the situation change daily, almost hourly. Everybody is longing to get back to usual occupations.

WHEN TENTS FAIL THE SOLDIER'S UMBRELLA IS NOT TO BE DESPISED

WHO GETS THE PRIZE OF CHEKIANG?

Lu Yung-hsiang's Advice on Leaving to Keep out Rival Aspirants: Fukienese Invader and North Kiangsu General Racing for Tuchunship

From Rodney Gilbert.

Nanking, Sept. 18.

A general offensive is expected to-morrow along the entire Kiangsu line, from Liuho to Kuangteh. The issue of this attack will, it is thought here, decide the fate of General Lu Yung-hsiang. If he wins there will be sympathetic risings against the Chihli party throughout China. If he loses he will probably take flight and the war will be over.

It is reported here this morning on particularly good authority that Lu Yung-hsiang and Ho Feng-lin yesterday chartered a Japanese steamer for $100,000 and are holding it against a likely defeat as a means of escape. Until this morning there have been no reports here of fighting since the 14th. The only Kiangsu man who seems to have been ploughing ahead in spite of Chi's orders is Bei Bao-shan and he can probably claim the credit of being the first to carry the war from Kiangsu into Chêkiang. Most of his troops, working from his base at Changchu, are now supposed here to be south of the border. He reports this morning heavy fighting at Hsiangwonling where he claims a victory. The Chief of Staff here has reports of Anhui advances from Kuangteh but thinks them unimportant. (Our Huchow correspondent reported a truce here on Saturday.—Ed.)

The local headquarters is most interested in a round-about message from General Sun Chuan-fang to the effect that he has taken the town of Kiangshan in Chêkiang and has advanced beyond it. Such movements are at the moment of little interest to General Lu Yung-hsiang. When he left Hangchow he told the Commanders of native divisions that it was to their interest to defend the province against northern invasions because he did not intend to return to Hangchow and if they could keep Northerners out they could have Chêkiang for their own. He said that if he won he would be in Nanking; if he lost he would be an exile, so Chêkiang was open to the first Commander who could get there and the native troops were responsible for its defence.

On the north Chen T'iao-yuan and Bei Bao-shan are undoubtedly racing for the prize of the Chêkiang tuchunship while Sun Chuan-fang is charging in from the Fukien side on the same errand. Meanwhile, according to local reports the commanders of the two Chêkiang native divisions, General Chai-yang and P'an Kuo-kang, are not wholly idle. The former, who has most of his troops at Shaohsing, is said to have declared his indefendence and to be on the point of assuming the governorship. The 2nd Division Commander, P'an Kuo-kang, is believed to have gone on his own account towards Chüchow to contest Sun Chuan-fang's right to the Tuchunship.

This morning comes a report of a big Chihli offensive at Liuho which must be discounted because it does not fit into the general scheme.

General Chi's lost reinforcements have now passed through here en route to Quinsan. They consist of one mixed brigade from Chingningchow, in Shantung, under General T'an Tze-ho and are here thought to be the best equipped and finest looking troops that have yet gone to the front.

SUN CHUAN-FANG TULI OF CHEKIANG

Peking, Sept. 21.

Mandates were issued last night to abolish the post of Tupan of the frontier defence of the Fukien and Kuangtung border held by General Sun Chuan-fang, also the Tuchunship of Chêkiang, and to appoint General Sun Chuan-fang Tuli of Chêkiang and concurrently Inspector-General of Fukien and Chêkiang.

An order has been given for the trial of General Chen Lo-shan, and the deprivation of his rank and orders. General Chu Sheng-kuang has been given command of the Tenth Division, vice General Lu Yung-hsiang. Admiral Li Ching-yi has been appointed Commander of the naval forces at Woosung and Shanghai, with Vice-Admiral Yang Shu-chuang as second-in-command.

Generals Yuan Tsu-ming, Yang Sen and Tang Hsi-hou have issued a circular telegram denouncing General Lu Yung-hsiang and General Ho Feng-lin and their revolt against the Govêrnment, adding that they will willingly take up arms against these rebels if the Government desires.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

WAR OPENED IN THE NORTH

Shanhaikuan Bombed by Marshal Chang's Aeroplanes: Threat Also to Peking: Fengtien Armies in Touch with Chihli

From Our Own Correspondent.

Mukden, Sept. 19.

Three aeroplanes, under the direction of Gen. Chang Hsueh-liang (Marshal Chang Tso-lin's son) this morning bombed Shanhaikuan Station, without causing any damage. It is reported also that aeroplanes will leave Chinchow to bomb Peking shortly, and that Marshal Chang Tso-lin and his headquarters staff will leave for Chinchow on the 22nd instant.

The probable line of advance will be directly towards Jehol, where there will probably be a big engagement during the next two days or so.

An American agent of the Peking party, aged 28, was captured today.

The Mongolian Prince will assist Marshal Chang with 5,000 men and there are already 300 Russians in the front line.

Gen. Wu Chung-cheng left here on the 17th instant for Hsupingkai.

Marshal Chang has purchased two steamers at Dairen for the transport of munitions along the coast. A hangar is being constructed here by Skidelsky (telegraph interrupted).

Notification to Foreigners.

Mukden, Sept 20.

Marshal Chang Tso-lin called a meeting at mid-day to-day at his residence. The meeting was attended by the British Consul-General; the American Vice-Consul; Mr. Fairley, the Chairman of the British Chamber of Commerce; Mr. Poole, of the American Association; Mr. Pratt, of the Y.M.C.A., and Dr. Young, of the Mukden Hospital. Mr. Pratt and Dr. Young are the two missionaries who helped in the signing of the peace after the last Chihli-Fengtien war, which was done on board a British ship at Shanhaikuan.

Marshal Chang expressed his appreciation of the good treatment accorded to him by the foreign communities of Manchuria in the last few years. He reiterated that his protection would be adequate for all foreign residents and property as long as he held his position in Manchuria.

Seaside Resorts in Danger.

The Marshal stated that the enemy headquarters were now at Chinwangtao station, whence he asked all foreigners to leave as he would bomb the place. He also requested all foreign gunboats at Shanhaikuan and Chinwangtao to stand clear as he intended to bomb the enemy's gunboats at those places.

An American missionary has just been arrested at Tieling for travelling without a passport and carrying literature with Marshal Wu Pei-fu's signature. He has been brought back to Mukden and handed over to the American Consul.

Marshal Chang Tso-lin has warned all foreigners to carry passports to avoid trouble. He says that he is fighting for his life and the security of Manchuria, and will take no half-measures.

Official reports claim that an aeroplane has been bombing the railway station at Shanhaikuan.

An engagement took place between the Fengtien Second Army and the First Chihli Mixed Brigade near Jehol with the result that there were more than 200 Chihli casualties.

The Fengtien Eighth Army has occupied the line Chinchow—Chaoyang, as well as Suichung.

Chaoyang Railway Seized.

The Second Fengtien Army reports that it has besieged enemy forces at Laohukou (?) and Liangshuitzu (?) on the afternoon of September 18. The result was the flight of the whole Jehol First Mixed Brigade and of one battalion of vanguards. Upon pursuit to Peipiao (?) some 200 enemy troops were killed.

The entire line of the Chinchou-Chaoyang Railway has been occupied by Fengtien troops.

One Fengtien regiment captured Sanyichan (?). The Fengtien Sixth Army captured the city of Shuitunghsien.

North Manchurian Forces.

Later.

It is reported that on the night of September 16, 3,000 Heilungkiang cavalry arrived at Taonanfu from Tsitsihar and left immediately for Tungliao. On September 19 three trains containing artillery and cavalry and Harbin Northern troops were reported to have passed south of Chinkiatun en route to Tungliao. Troops from the south of Supingkai are also reported to be in concentration at Tungliao.

A clash is expected near Kailu, where it is said that Marshal Wu Pei-fu has concentrated large forces. That they are large is doubtful owing to the difficult country.

Wealthy Chinese are gathering at Supingkai.

Marshal Chang Tso-lin's troops seem well-behaved and look healthy, but they are rather poorly equipped. The guns seen consisted of twelve 75-mm. field-guns.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Chefoo, Spt. 20.

The cruiser Haichi sailed yesterday at noon for Shanhaikuan under the orders of Admiral Wen Shouteh, second-in-command of the Government Navy.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Removal of Foreigners.

Tientsin, Sept. 20.

Shanhaikuan was shelled by Marshal Chang Tso-lin's artillery yesterday. One Chinese banker was killed. The foreign residents of Shanhaikuan have sent telegrams to their Consuls protesting against the shelling.

Train traffic is seriously dislocated. The Allied commanders have agreed to take steps to keep the line open.

The Kailan Mining Administration has arranged for a steamer to take off foreigners stranded at Peitaiho.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Mukden, Sept. 21.

Interviewed by newspaper correspondents to-day, Marshal Chang Tso-lin announced that he was not going to the front to command his army, and was not considering the time when he should take such a step.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

MARSHAL LU QUITE RESOLUTE

Further Assurance to Mr. Tong Shao-yi That He Can and Will Fight on

Mr. Tong Shao-yi visited Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang at Lunghua on Saturday afternoon. In the course of their conversation, Marshal Lu said:—

"The change of headquarters from Hangchow to Shanghai is at this time advantageous, in that I am able to shorten my front from 1,500 li to a single point. I can concentrate all my efforts on that point. It is not necessary to guard against Kiangsi, Anhui and Fukien. My front is a single point.

"With regard to the International Settlement, the people know me and they know the character of my soldiers. There will be no trouble. As I told the editor of the 'North-China Daily News,' everything would be kept in order. (This statement did not reach us, probably because it slipped the mind of the interpreter in the hurry of translating a great many questions and answers. —Ed.).

Mr. Tong Shao-yi's visit was personal and was not connected with any peace efforts.

The present situation of Marshal Lu is that he is in a better position assist Marshal Chang Tso-lin, who came to his rescue, by sticking it out at one single part of the front holding up the Kiangsu troops, delaying any advantage which Marshal Chi might gain from the coup d'etat in Chêkiang and preventing the troops concentrated against him from being free to move northward.

Chinese Chamber's Meetings.

A meeting of the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce took place on Saturday at 3 p.m. to discuss the situation arising out of the war. A preliminary tiffin was held at noon at which many suggestions were made. During the afternoon session, the Peace Maintenance Society was organized, consisting of 83 organizations, for the object of convincing both sides to stop the fight and to devise ways and means for the care of the refugees.

Mr. Yu Yah-ching, Chairman of the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce, visited Marshal Lu at Lunghua on Saturday, but it is denied that this visit was of official character.

The rumours current on Saturday that the Chamber were definitely going to urge Marshal Lu to make terms with Nanking were in no way realized.

WU PEI-FU DETERMINED TO DRIVE CHANG TSO-LIN FROM MUKDEN

200,000 Men to Invade Manchuria with Plentiful Air Force: Central Government's Authority Must Be Restored: Marshal Chang on other Side of Picture

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Peking, Sept. 21.

In an interview with several newspaper correspondents yesterday, Marshal Wu Pei-fu once again declared that Marshal Chang Tso-lin must be driven out. It would not be enough, he said, if, in view of the Chêkiang collapse Marshal Chang Tso-lin abandoned his antagonistic attitude toward Peking: he must be eliminated this time.

Marshal Wu Pei-fu agreed that Peking would be satisfied if Chang Tso-lin voluntarily resigned his position in Mukden. Otherwise, he reiterated, the campaign would be pushed on till Marshal Chang was driven out of Manchuria.

The Chihli Warlord was quite emphatic in making these declarations and confidently asserted that he expected the war to be over in two months.

Peking, Sept. 20.

In an interview this morning given to British, American, French, Japanese and Chinese foreign correspondents, Marshal Wu Pei-fu lengthily reviewed the circumstances leading to the present situation and justifying the Government's resorting to punitive expeditions against Chêkiang and Manchuria. Asked whether it was intended to follow Marshal Chang Tso-lin if the latter retreated owing to the collapse of Chêkiang, Marshal Wu Pei-fu said that, if Chang Tso-lin would not resign, he must be made to do so. He did not consider it too late this year to send an expedition over the Manchurian railway. The Chihli troops were warmly clad, and he hoped to clean up the situation in Manchuria within two months. He definitely intended to carry on the campaign until Chang once and for all was eliminated as ruler of Manchuria, and the Central Government again constituted as the authority.

No War of Hatred.

The Government's operations against Fengtien, however, the Marshal continued, would not be a war of hatred. It would merely be a matter of removing Chang Tso-lin from office. Chang Tso-lin's son could be sent abroad. The Government intended to do its utmost for the protection of foreign lives and property in the zone of operations.

When Manchuria was restored to the Government, it would maintain the status quo as regards the South Manchuria Railway and other foreign interests. The desire of the Government was to maintain foreign relations as in the fifth and sixth years of the Republic.

As regards Kuangtung and Szechuan some difficulties were occurring owing to the Yunnanese mercenaries in those provinces wanting to return home, but the situation did not give any cause for uneasiness. Hunan wanted autonomy, but in other respects was obeying the Government, and was not giving any trouble.

New Rulers for Canton.

General Chen Chiung-ming was not going to Canton now that Dr. Sun Yat-sen had left, but General Lin Fu, Tuli of Kuangtung, and General Yeh Chu, the Civil Governor of Kuangtung, accompanied by two military commissioners recented by mandate, would take over Canton when the moment was ripe.

Meanwhile, the Merchant Volunteer Corps had appealed to the Government owing to dissatisfaction with Dr. Sun Yat-sen's Communistic ideals and practices. The Government, however, continued the Marshal, did not intend to worry over Canton until a settlement had been reached with Mukden.

Marshal Wu Pei-fu emphasized that the Government did not desire to embark on warfare, but the circumstances demanded military action. As little as possible destruction would be done.

Land, Air and Sea.

The keynote throughout the interview was the determination to remove Marshal Chang Tso-lin, for which purpose an expedition of 200,000 men will be sent against him, with four squadrons of aeroplanes and the combined navies, which will assist the military operations.

As usual Marshal Wu Pei-fu is very confident regarding the outcome of the struggle.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Money Needed.

Peking, Sept. 16.

Marshal Wu Pei-fu has wired to General Hsiao Yao-nan, Tuchun of Hupeh, asking the latter immediately to raise military funds to the amount of $1,000,000, as, Marshal Wu says, some $20,000,000 is required to continue fighting against the Fengtien and Chêkiang troops.—Eastern News Agency.

CHANG TSO-LIN'S IDEA OF A GOVERNMENT

Tuan Chi-jui as Next President: Wu Pei-fu must Disappear

Peking, Sept. 20.

Marshal Chang Tso-lin, in discussing the situation with foreigners in Mukden recently, has shown an engaging frankness. Making no secret of his intention to bring about great changes in China, he asserts that President Tsao is a failure and must be replaced. He has, however, selected one of the ablest men in China as the next President. His choice has fallen on Marshal Tuan Chi-jui, whom he describes as a man equally trusted in the North and the South. The only thing Marshal Chang considers necessary for the fulfilment of his plans is the elimination of Marshal Wu Pei-fu, after which the other Chihli leaders are to fade from the political horizon, while Marshal Chang from Mukden will keep a benevolent eye on the capital to guard against political intrigues which might lead to fresh groupings.

The Fengtien military operations are to be taken with a view to inviting attack by the Chihli forces outside the wall, but if the latter fail to be enticed there the Fengtien army will march to Chengtehfu if necessary and await the enemy, who will be heavily defeated. Meanwhile a holding force is to be strongly entrenched outside the wall near Shanhaikuan.

Marshal Chang does not state whether Marshal Wu Pei-fu is likely to offer any formidable obstacles. Apparently the defeat in the field is to account for Marshal Wu Pei-fu once and for all.

The statements, which have been given to more than one foreign official, lately, fully accord with propaganda being circulated in Peking by Anfuite agents. Chinese militarists, however, are inclined to doubt the accuracy of Marshal Chang's statements regarding his military operations, mainly on the ground that he could not expect the Government forces to risk a general engagement far from their base. There have been several discussions on this point in Peking lately, and General Feng Yu-hsiang's advice to await the enemy near Peking has led to misleading reports as to his loyalty, of which there seems to be no reasonable doubt.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE CHIHLI WAR PROGRAMME

Second Army to Bear Brunt of Mukden Attack: The Needs of the War Chest

(From the Chinese Press)

According to present indications, the Chihli Party will conduct its war against Fengtien with three armies in three directions.

General Peng Shou-hsin, Commander of the 15th Division and Assistant Director of Military Affairs of Chihli, will command the First Army, to be composed of the Reserve Mixed Brigade under Gen. Chen Hsi-shen, the 12th Mixed Brigade under Gen. Ko Shu-ping, and the 23rd Division under Gen. Wang Wei-chen, which will advance and attack Fengtien by way of Shanhaikuan.

General Wang Huai-ching, Inspector-General of Jehol, Chahar and Suiyuan, Commander-in-Chief of the Metropolitan Garrison and Commander of the 13th Division, will command the Second Army, made up by a section of the 9th Division under Gen. Tung Chen-kuo, a section of the 26th Division under Gen. Tsao Yin, the Mixed Brigade under Gen. Tan Ching-lin, the Yi Chun under Gen. Mi Chen-piao and the 13th Division, which will defend the long but direct line from Chaoyang to Kailu. The principal duty of the Second Army will be to prevent the progress of the Fengtien forces.

The Christian General.

General Feng Yu-hsiang, Inspector-General of the National Army, Tupan of the Northwest Defences and Commander of the 11th Division, will assume command of the Third Army, consisting of the 7th Mixed Brigade under Gen. Chang Chi-kang, the 8th Mixed Brigade under Gen. Li Ming-chung, the 13th Mixed Brigade under Gen. Feng Yu-yung, and detachments from the 9th and 26th divisions. This army will take the offensive from Hsifengkou. The 11th Division, composed of the Christian General's own troops will remain in Peking for the time being to protect the government.

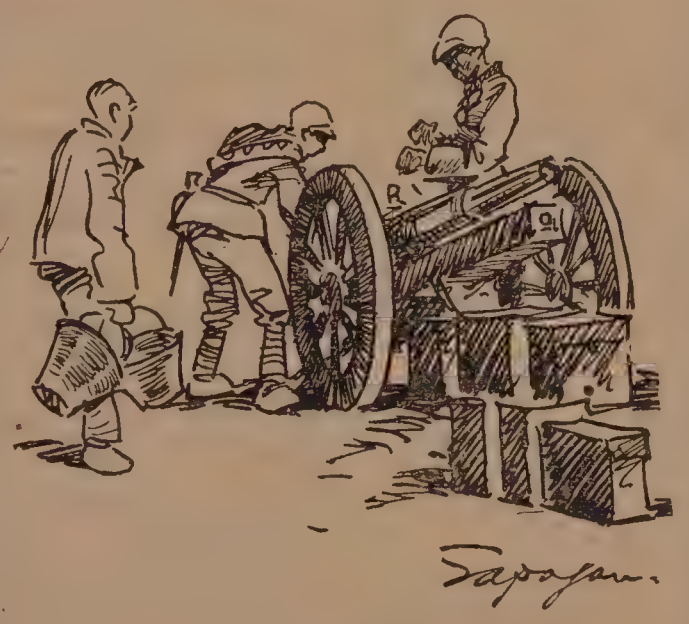
Thus, in the three armies will muster a force of five divisions and six mixed brigades and the whole of Yi Chun, or at least 80,000 strong. Besides, there are also the 4th Brigade under Chang Hsi-yuan, the 14th Brigade under Shi Chuan-shen, the 15th Brigade under Sun Yo, the 24th Division under Yang Ching-chen and other forces in Honan and Shantung, which can be reckoned on to reinforce the armies at the front in time of stress. It will thus be perceived that, except Feng Yu-hsiang's and Wu Pei-fu's own troops, each commanding a full division, all the forces of the Chihli Party have been mobilized for war against Chang Tso-lin.

Besides Tsao Kun, there is no one else in the Chihli Party except Wu Pei-fu to take the supreme command in the present campaign. Wu has therefore come to Peking and established his Headquarters at Szechaotang, a building alongside the Cabinet. The power of the Commander-in-Chief is only inferior to that of the Generalissimo of the Navy and Army which post is usually regarded as the prerogative of the President.

Arms Plenty, Money Uncertain.

As regards the sinews of war, the Chihliities believe that they can be adequately supplied by the three arsenals at Tehchou, Kunghsien and Hangyang, even should the war be prolonged indefinitely. Of course, ample stocks of arms and ammunition have accumulated at the Armoury in Sanchiatien. The war chest, the Chihliites hope, will be filled at least to the amount of $20,000,000 by being able to draw on the capital and interest accrued from the deferred payment of a certain indemnity, upon the settlement of a certain controversy (gold francs). This amount will not last long, and the question of how to raise more funds to meet the future requirements of the war has not yet been broached.

The forces mustered by the rival warlords of Mukden and Loyang seem to be evenly matched; and no one will be bold enough to predict which side will come out the winner.



A CHEKIANG GUN

TUESDAY.

BOTH SIDES STRENGTHENING THEIR POSITION ON EASTERN FRONT

Kiangsu's Costly Attack of Last Friday: Poor Artillery Work v. Deadly Machine-guns: Reserves Arrived for Marshal Lu from Chekiang

BY H. L. PEARCE.

Again on Monday there was very little activity on the eastern front. Behind the lines, preparations for the renewal of fighting are going forward at a great pace, on the Kiangsu side in the completion of arrangements for the prematurely announced "big push," and on this side extra defensive measures, with an eye also to the possibility of Marshal Lu being able to get in a counter-offensive stroke.

The announcement that the Kiangsu advance was to begin on Friday night last was made with a great show of confidence, and left one with the impression that nothing remained to complete the matter but the arrival of Marshal Chi's special train at Shanghai north station. Then came the cancellation order, in view of certain necessary equipment, which had been strangely overlooked, having to be improvised, and this being so, it is possible that Friday night's attack by Honanese troops (reported in the Chêkiang communiqué), was a part of the general attack prematurely launched.

Deadly Machine Gun Fire.

If it was a mistake, it was costly, for although Marshal Lu's troops were compelled to retire for some distance, their retirement was covered by machine-guns well placed in reserve lines, and they did great execution, according to reliable reports.

This method of defence has been employed with success on more than one occasion, and coupled with the hand grenades with which the Marshal Lu's man are well supplied, puts them in a very strong position. Big supplies of ammunition and hand grenades have gone up to Nanziang, and on Sunday night and early yesterday another 1,500 troops were despatched. These would presumably be the northern troops called in from the Taihu front.

Observers report that the Kiangsu heavy gun fire has been very ineffective, the damage done being extremely small in proportion to the volume of fire. Nanziang railway station has been a special target for days past, but most of the shells sailed high above the station and others nearer the mark found inoffensive resting places, so that the station remains practically undamaged.

Marshal Lu's Reserves.

It is reported on good authority that Marshal Lu has fully 10,000 men in reserve along the line between Kashing—where there is any amount of rolling stock for their quick transport—and Sungkiang, and is keeping them in readiness to hold up any advance from Tsingpu, should the expected Kiangsu drive come from that quarter. From all reports it appears that Marshal Lu is as confident of being able to put up a successful defence as his opponent is of getting through to Shanghai.

Marshal Chi has moved his headquarters from Quinsan to near Anting. He went down the line in a special car on Thursday morning last, and somewhat in style, being accompanied by two aeroplanes just arrived from Soochow. Up to the present the Kiangsu aviators have not materially contributed to the progress of events. They have dropped bombs the size of a football intended for Nanziang station, but all of them have fallen in adjacent paddy fields.

Kiangsu's Heavy Guns.

The Kiangsu gunnery has been strengthened by the arrival of two heavy Creusot guns, the biggest on either side, mounted on railway trucks and observed four days ago in the railway siding at Quinsan. These guns, which have very possibly been laboriously hauled over from Kiangyin forts, are too heavy to be moved in the country where the troops are now engaged, and no doubt an attempt will be made to use them from the railway line. If good gun crews can be found they should cause some anxiety on this side.

General Yang Ho-tsao and General Ho Feng-lin have gone to Nanziang to direct preparations now going forward there.

Chinese Passionate Wishes.

To the many rumours recently current as to the possibility of the opposing sides coming to an arrangement may be added a report heard yesterday, probably unfounded, but worth mention as an indication of ideas abroad among the Chinese. It is said that Marshal Lu is open to compromise, and willing to surrender his interests in Shanghai and retain Hangchow. His proclamation reproduced in an adjoining column certainly does not support this idea.

Liuho Line Restored.

The Chinese Red Cross sent some men to Liuho on Sunday, who found that Marshal Lu's line had been restored to what it was a week ago. The house used as a hospital was riddled with bullets and many houses in the town were burnt.

Thirty wounded came in yesterday, one from Liuho, 29 from Huangtu, some cases serious.

Troops at the Railway Station

Troops seen on Monday at the Shanghai Railway Station bound for the Nanziang front,—considerably more than a regiment,—had the appearance of old and seasoned veterans. Their rifles were in good condition and their bandoliers were full of ammunition. There were several dismantled machine-guns in the charge of their crews, several mountain guns, as well as a 75 here and there.

Kading is still being heavily shelled and the Kiangsu forces are apparently closing in on this place.

The Liuho Road is now closed to traffic other than military at a point this side of Lotien, whereas on Sunday motor-cars could drive to several hundred yards beyond the village.

Still Awaiting the Big Action

Midnight.

Dr. Loh, secretary to General Ho Feng-lin on Monday night stated in a communiqué that there had been little fighting during the day on any fronts. Kiangsu had attacked at Huangtu and Kading, but little came of it and the guns were quiet during the evening. No fighting was reported at Liuho.

The great Kiangsu offensive, planned for the 19th, must be regarded as a failure.

General Sun Chuan-fang, who had been appointed Tuli of Chêkiang is now at Chuchow. General P'an, whose divisions declared their independence and thereby forced Marshal Lu out of Chêkiang, is now in Hangchow.

MARSHAL LU'S NORTHERN TROOPS

Now Passing Through Kashing to Join Him in Shanghai: Public Anxiety

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Kashing, Sept. 20.

The northern troops of General Lu from Hangchow, Huchow and elsewhere are passing through Kashing following him towards Shanghai. The entire garrison of Kashing moved out of the reconstructed citadel of the Taipings, near the centre of the city. The civil magistrate is taking a vacation. All authority (if any)) is in the hands of the Police Commissioner. A leader of the gentry has requested missionaries to co-operate in meeting the victors to arrange peaceable possession.

One train each way for passengers came through to-day.

Rumours of strife between Fukien and Kiangsu for control of Hangchow agitate some of our citizens. Early rice shows good yield, late crop not so good. Silver dollars freely offered for bank note currency.

Gen. Pan Near Hangchow

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Hangchow, Sept. 21.

The morning train from Shanghai had not come in to-day at 8 p.m.

Huchow has been looted. Forty boats of Chen Loh-san soldiers from Huchow are being towed to Konzenchiao to be sent by train to Kashing.

The C.M.S. Hospital Red Cross Unit is returning from Changsing.

Dr. Main sent his motor boat in answer to a telegram to help them to get out of the way of the retreating soldiers.

Pan Koh-kan is only a few miles from here and a little palmistry may divert him and his 4,000 soldiers to Shaohsing. It was Chang Kuo-hue one of his chiefs, in charge of the artillery, who gave the show away to Sun Chuan-fang. They were military students together.

When Pan takes his men out of the way, Sun will have a "walk in" to Hangchow and no doubt an understanding with Hsao Chao and Chow Vong-gyi exists. Troops are being hurried in from Shuichien by motor-car and sent on by train to Kashing.

MUKDEN TROOPS CLAIM FIRST SUCCESS

Chaoyang Said to Be Captured with Guns and Rifles by Second Fengtien Army

Mukden, Sept. 21.

General Li Ching-lin, commanding the Second Fengtien Army, to-day captured the important town of Chaoyang, taking 3,000 rifles and six field-guns. Many of the new type of trench mortars were employed by the Fengtien troops with great success.

General Wu, of Heilungkiang, commanding the Fifth Fengtien Army, will attack Kailu to-day, where, it is said, Marshal Wu Pei-fu has concentrated large forces. Chihli troops numbering 3,000 at Kailu are stated to have made overtures for surrender.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, Sept. 22.

According to independent reports from Shanhaikuan the Government troops on September 21 came into contact with the Fengtien advance guards. The latter retreated, while the former following up suffered some casualties from land mines and later came into touch with the main Fengtien advanced force at Wanchiatun, where artillery fire was exchanged until nightfall.

The "Hsing Pao" reports that General Li Ching-lin's Tenth Fengtien Brigade attacked Government forces in the region of Chaoyang on September 20, but were repulsed and driven back several miles.

Government preparations are continuing on a large scale which will require a considerable time to develop.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE FIELD OF ACTION

Marshal Chang Tso-lin's troops are moving in two general directions: one objective is Shanhaikuan, the other Jehol.

The Great Wall meets the sea at Shanhaikuan, through which the Peking-Mukden line passes from North China into Manchuria. At Shanhaikuan then, a principal battle will presumably have to be fought, the Chihli troops using the Great Wall as a defence against the invading army. The bombing of the railway station here from aeroplanes by Marshal Chang's army was perhaps designed to prove that ancient parapets will not withstand modern warfare.

The most serious danger to the Fengtien army in the Shanhaikuan objective is that beyond that city the country is still flooded and that the Manchurian troops may not be ably to fight their way to Peking through inundated territory. The Jehol campaign seeks to offset this difficulty.

The reported capture of Chaoyang yesterday must be taken to mean that the movement toward Johel has commenced seriously.

Jehol is northeast of Peking a central point between Manchuria, Mongolia and Chihli. For military purposes it has been included with Suiyang in the defences against Mongolia, and although geographically within Chihli province, it is outside the Great Wall and is for all practical purposes part of Mongolia.

During the Ching Dynasty, the Manchu Emperors went there during the summer for hunting and a road runs thereto from Peking. This road is now not in a very good condition.

MARSHAL LU'S PUBLIC DECLARATION TO CHEKIANG AND KIANGSU

A Fight to a Finish: Kiangsu to Be Restored to Kiangsu People When He Reaches Nanking

In a circular telegram despatched from Lunghua on September 20, (and here translated from the Chinese Press) Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang makes the following announcement:—

I have declared war upon Tsao Kun in deference to the wishes of the people with the two great objects of eliminating traitors to our nation and consolidating the rights of our people. At the commencement of the war, I repeatedly expressed my desire that the people should join me in bearing the responsibility of reconstructing our nation, and that they should not be over-anxious about preserving the peace and safety of a locality. With these objects in view, I announced in advance that I would return Chêkiang to the Chêkiang people, so that I could with a single mind punish our traitors and solve our national problem at an early date. However, having served in Chêkiang for six years, and in view of the cordial and sympathetic friendship between us as well as of the similarity of our sentiment against our common enemy, I found that for private considerations I could not abandon my old friends in an emergency; and speaking of public duty, I hoped that other people should share in the good work.

Chekiang Divisions' Failure.

Therefore, I despatched the two divisions of Chêkiang troops to defend their respective frontiers against Fukien and Kiangsi, while I personally led my own troops to meet Kiangsu with our whole strength, primarily aiming at crushing Tsao Kun's partisans and also paying due regard both to military exigencies and my civil duties.

Unexpectedly, the said divisions were worsted repeatedly in fighting, with the result that the two important barriers of Kiangshan and Changshan were successively lost. If I stuck obstinately to the principle of keeping my territory at such a moment, I should soon find myself hampered right and left, not only with fatal results to our military strategy, but also adversely affecting the whole national situation. Therefore, I decided to resign the post of Tupan of Military Reorganization Affairs by appointing an officer to act in that capacity pro tem; and at the same time I requested the Legislative Body to select a successor as soon as possible for the sake of the province. I have, in my telegram of September 18, already informed the gentry and people of Chêkiang of all the circumstances leading to my transference to Shanghai to direct my army.

Will Chekiang Still Help?

I understand that the latest attitude of the best element among the people of Chêkiang is that, inasmuch as our national traitors have not yet been extirpated, the Chêkiang people cannot shirk their responsibility; and that, at meetings held Shanghai and Hangchow, they have again unanimously promised their support to the Righteous Army as they did at first. While the sincerity of the Chêkiang people's loyalty has not diminished a whit as a result of my departure from Chêkiang, the determination of my army to kill traitors has, moreover, grown stronger because of the concentration of my forces (on one front). For several consecutive days, the enemy have repeatedly sent reinforcements and made fierce attacks, all of which have been repulsed and during which the enemy lost countless killed and many prisoners.

Traitor Tsao Kun has this time thrown all the troops of several provinces into a stubborn resistance against our advance. Fighting for 20 days has left them where they were. Our troops show a fine esprit de corps, well deserving their good reputation in the southeast. Both Heaven's Will and the people's desire are thus clearly obvious.

A Fight to a Finish.

I, Yung-hsiang, having promised my life to the nation, will not regret to sacrifice it. I swear to use every effort of mine to fight the national traitors to a finish. The sea may dry up and the stone may rot, but my object will be unchangeable. I declared war by the Mandate of the public; I shall certainly act according to popular desires in the settlement of the national situation. Wherever my army may penetrate, the sovereign rights shall be handed over to the people. To-day, I renounced Chientang and returned Chêkiang to the Chêkiang people. Another day when I have occupied Nanking, I shall return Kiangsu to the Kiangsu people. The former action has long been my cherished desire; the latter is of course a consistent sequence of my policy. The glory or degradation of the maniy character of our citizens and the clarification or deterioration of the future course of our government will both depend upon the outcome of this war. Our citizens should clearly realize the seriousness of their responsibility. They must not feel happy or sad on account of a momentary advantage or distress. The achievement of the great merit of punishing our traitors will then be assured.

I speak from my inmost heart and claim public attention.

Signed: LU YUNG-HSIANG.

THE ADVENTURES OF THE HAICHOW

Sailors Who Did Not Like Yangtze Unification Scenery

The Haichow, which sailed from Woosung to Liuho, deserting Marshal Lu to support Marshal Chi, has now returned from Liuho to Woosung, deserting Marshal Chi to support Marshal Lu.

The story goes that when the sailors awoke after the vessel had sailed the Yangtze, they discovered themselves in Liuho instead of in Woosung, where they had been resting during the war. They demanded of their officers an explanation for the change of scenery. When told that they were joining the navy of Admiral Tu Shih-kuei, for the purpose of unifying China and producing a united nation, they replied that since their chief, Admiral Liu, was in Shanghai they preferred to go there. Whereupon, their officers turned the ship about and returned home.

LOOTING BY SOLDIERS AT HUCHOW

Banks of Communications and of China Robbed of Notes: Loss Believed Small

According to a report received yesterday morning it was stated, soldiers, retreating from the Ihsing (west of Taihu Lake) front, had looted in Huchow, as the result of which the branches of the Bank of China and of the Bank of Communications had suffered losses. It was also reported that the greater part of the money taken from the banks was in the form of cancelled bank notes.

In an interview with the respective managers of the head offices of these two banks a representative of the "North-China Daily News" was informed that the reports were quite true though the losses were quite small and could be considered as negligible. In the case of the Bank of China orders had been issued to cancel notes in case of emergency. This branch it was stated was a small one and did very little business besides the redemption of notes.

CHINESE WOUNDED IN SHANGHAI

Some Pitiable Sights: Evidence of Marshal Lu's Hold on Liuho

Chinese wounded continue to enter the settlement. A visit to St. Luke's Hospital assures one of this fact. This hospital is taxed to its utmost and is only able to deal with the more serious cases. A tour of one or two wards is not a pleasant sight to the outsider who is unaccustomed to the sight of human suffering. One poor fellow, who had a bullet through the head, was evidently in a state of deliriousness. He was paralysed on one side and continually called out "Foreigner, am I done for?" "I fear he won't last much more than a week," said the doctor who was showing the visitor round. There were many other pitiable cases. One with the remains of a leg which had barely escaped being blown off. The physician doubted very much the report that "dum dum" bullets had been used. Several he produced had that appearance, but he considered that they had probably split their outer jackets, as it were.

A recent arrival who left the front for hospital early yesterday morning stated that Marshal Lu's troops were still keeping a firm hold on Liuho. One street, he said had been burnt down by the firing from the Chinese naval vessels. Most of the firing takes place at night and according to this same witness the opposing armies are about a mile apart, so that one imagines a lot of the firing must fall rather far from its mark. Some of the men have money in their pockets. From one was taken as much as $112, but whether this was the result of loot it is difficult to say.

MARSHAL LU'S SILVER IN SHANGHAI

Truth of Rumoured Seizure: Alleged Women Spies from Huangtu

Vague rumours filtered into Shanghai during the week end that a motor truck heavily laden with specie had been seized by the French police or marines as it came over the Minghong Road Bridge into Route Ghisi. The contents, supposedly belonging to Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang, were said to have been confiscated by the authorities. Definite information to the contrary has been received in this office, but, in part, the story is true. Silver to the amount of about a lakh and a half, did come into the French Concession bound for a bank in the Settlement and the guard, not being able to open the boxes at the bridge, escorted it to headquarters, where after it had been found to be bonâ fide cargo, it was of course permitted to proceed to its destination.

Two women arrested in the Huangtu sector arrived at Shanghai North on Monday, charged with being spies, and were escorted to Lunghua, where thier case will be investigated.

ANOTHER FALSE LOAN RUMOUR

Story of Attempt by Marshal to Borrow $400,000 from Chinese Chamber Untrue

The Chinese General Chamber of Commerce has issued a denial that Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang last week solicited a loan of $400,000. Mr. K. S. Zee, General Secretary of the Chamber, writes to us as follows:—

Shanghai, Sept. 20.

In its issue of the 20th instant, the "Sinwanpao" in its local news section stated that on the morning of the 19th instant, Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang after his arrival at Shanghai convened an urgent meeting for the purpose of devising measures for the preservation of the peace and good order of the City, and that the gentry, merchants and other representative men were present at the meeting in response to the Marshal's invitation. The statement was also made that the General Chamber of Commerce of Shanghai was requested by the Marshal to furnish a loan of $400,000 to cover military expenses. As the matter was treated as one of grave importance, a special meeting of Board of Directors of the Chamber was called at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, but no result was arrived at though the matter was discussed up to 5 p.m.

The statement that Marshal Lu has solicited a loan of $400,000 from the Chamber of Commerce is entirely unfounded, because he has done nothing of the kind. The meeting at the Chamber yesterday was convened for the one purpose of devising means for calling a halt to the devastation of the war and of affording relief to the war refugees. There was no discussion whatever about a loan for meeting military expenses. This emphatic statement is made by the Chamber to avoid the spread of the inaccurate report.

CHINESE PRESS WAR NEWS

The Price of Peace Not Yet Measurable in Silver

A news agency reports that a number of prominent Kiangsu men held a meeting in the French Concession on Saturday "to discuss the question of maintaining peace and good order in Kiangsu." Unfortunately, they had omitted to obtain police permission to hold the meeting and, the little affair being officially known, they were visited by detectives and the meeting was called off.

S.H.N. RAILWAY BRIDGES BLOWN UP

Work of Kiangsu Agents to Stop Marshal Lu's Chekiang Troops from Joining Him: Kiangsu's Big Guns

The most important piece of news received in Shanghai on Tuesday was that reporting a breach in the Hangchow railway line.

At first it was stated that rails had been taken up west of Kashing, but definite news was afterwards received reporting the destruction of two large bridges, 71 and 78, east of the city, on the Shanghai side. The first, about one mile from the railway station, was blown up at about 10.30 a.m., and the second, about two and a half miles away, towards Shanghai, was demolished shortly after noon. Both bridges are of more than average length and both have been completely destroyed, the stone work being blown up and steel girders, broken and twisted, brought down into the water.

Present information is that this destruction was the work of Kiangsu agents working in the Chêkiang lines, and was not done by advanced troops coming down from Changhsing or Tsingpu. If this blow is followed up immediately with a forward movement of troops southward, the severance of the line would seriously restict the movement of Chêkiang troops and probably necesitate a retirement on the extreme left of the line.

It is known that there has been fighting in the Tsingpu district during the past two or three days, and it is significant that on Tuesday a boat train, bringing troops from that front, came down the Huangpu to the Arsenal, having used the waterway either from Kashing or Tsingpu linking up with the river. There were a number of wounded on the boat train, but the wounded were in the minority.

An officer who had just come down from Naziang on Tuesday reported heavy fighting there on Saturday, Sunday and Monday nights, adding the information that at one time Kiangsu troops actually reached Nanziang station, but were driven back with considerable losses. It is evident that the big attack is developing on the centre and on the western flank, and interesting results may be expected there now that railway communication has been cut.

An ordinary passenger train left Shanghai on Tuesday morning but only got as far as the loop at Songkiang, being then recalled by telegraph. Arrangements are being made to continue the service between Hangchow and Kashing, but the service on this side will probably have to be suspended, further damage to the railway being anticipated.

Kiangsu's New Way of Moving Big Guns.

Reports from Kiangsu indicate that a heavy offensive is under preparation, perhaps the most aggressive during the entire war. According to this report, Kiangsu's difficulty in the past has been an inability to move the heavy artillery which Marshal Chi had hoped would silence Marshal Lu's machine-guns. Shots fired from the Kiangsu large guns have failed, in the past, to accomplish what was expected of them. The reason has been that it was difficult to transport the heavy artillery through the paddy fields and across the many creeks and canals which intersect this country. A plan has now been devised to utilize pontoons for this purpose and one of the explanations for the silence at the fronts is that Kiangsu is using oil drums for the building of these pontoons and that as soon as they are ready, the offensive will begin. Heavy artillery placed on these pontoons will then be moved into position, across canals, creeks and rivers, so that the Kiangsu troops will find themselves able to meet Marshal Lu's troops at closer quarters. It is then expected that this will lead to the final engagement of the war.

A Mixed Bridge from Shantung has already arrived at the front to reinforce Marshal Chi's troops, while a Hupeh Mixed Brigade is now at Nanking, en route to the front. These troops arrived at Nanking on Sunday.

According to these reports a principal action should take place during the present week end.

The Lunghua Communique

Midnight.

A communiqué issued at Lunghua last night stated that there had been no fighting on any fronts, except slight firing at Huangtu.

The report of the death of General Ho Feng-lin's mother is stated to be untrue.

No confirmation of the assassination of General Tang Chi-yao, Tuchun of Yunnan, has been received at Lunghua. His local representatives have had no report.

CHEKIANG'S OWN CIVIL WAR

Opposition to Fukienese Tuchun: Other Claimants for Chief Office: Troops Entering from Several Directions: A Grave Outlook

Civil war has broken out within Chêkiang Province. Chêkiang gentry fear that their province will now become a second Kuangtung, every military faction fighting to get what they can out of the province.

The immediate cause for the trouble is the appointment of Sun Chuan-fang as Tuli of Chêkiang. Those who engineered the dismissal of Marshal Lu planned that his successor should be a Chêkiang man. They did not expect that Peking would appoint Sun Chuan-fang to the position, immediately on Lu Yung-hsiang's departure. Rather, they anticipated, the Peking Government would be sufficiently diplomatic to give Chêkiang a little time to reach a decision as to which man they would prefer. As a matter of fact, at least two of Marshal Chi's generals wanted the job and they would be preferable to Sun Chuan-fang, whose reputation is none too good.

Fighting Reported Already.

It must be borne in mind that General P'an Kuo-kang, whose troops declared their independence of Marshal Lu and thus made possible the easy entrance into Chêkiang of Sun Chuan-fang's troops, is still reported to be loyal to Lu Yung-hsiang and that he is said to have attempted suicide when he learned what his troops had done. It is not believed that he desires the Tuchunate for himself. His programme would rather be to see the former Civil Governor of Chêkiang, his immediate superior, General Chang Tsai-yang in the position.

Meanwhile, General Sun Chuan-fang, now Tuli of Chêkiang and Inspector-General of Chêkiang and Fukien by mandate of President Tsao Kun, has actually entered Chêkiang at Chuchow and is moving his troops toward Hangchow.

It was reported yesterday afternoon that regiments opposed to Sun Chuan-fang were revolting throughout the province and that fighting had actually taken place at Wenchow. It is believed that this is an error and that the place meant is Yenchow, which is midway between Chuchow and Hangchow.

Hsia the Stormy Petrel

It is believed in responsible quarters that the present acting Civil Governor of Chêkiang, Hsia Chao, favours the appointment of General Chen Tiao-yuan, at present Defence Commissioner of Hsuchowfu in northern Kiangsu and one of Marshal Chi's most competent assistants, to the Tuchunate. It is known that General Chen is a candidate for the position and that it has been promised to him, should he reach Hangchow before Sun Chuan-fang arrives. Hsia Chao, who is a Chêkiang man rather favourable to the Peking Government, has played an important part in all the troubles of Chêkiang province for many years. Wherever he dislikes what is going on, he organizes a local autonomy movement. He was responsible for the autonomy movement which resulted in Lu Yung-hsiang resigning his Tuchunship and becoming the Director-General of the Reorganization of Chêkiang. It is only natural that he should prefer to have a Tuchun in the province friendly to himself. Sun Chuan-fang is under no obligation to him; therefore he opposes Sun.

All Sorts of Troops.

Meanwhile troops are entering Chêkiang from all directions. Anhui troops are already in the province. Fukien troops have come in with Sun Chuan-fang. It is admitted by Marshal Lu's friends that Kiangsu will take Changhsing shortly, if they have not already done so. Marshal Lu's troops retired from Huchow there days ago. But his Shantung men are still in the province. Kiangsu troops, Shantung troops, Honan troops, Hupeh troops are about to raid Chêkiang. And added to all these are the provincial divisions, made up of Chêkiang men, but divided among many leaders, each fighting the other for position and preferment. The reports of the looting of Huchowfu and the unconfirmed story of the looting of Kashing can but be the preface to a complete disorganization of the province.

CHEKIANG'S NEW CIVIL GOVERNOR

Peking, Sept. 23.

A mandate issued to-day relieves General Chang Tsai-yang of the post of Civil Governor of Chêkiang, and appoints in his place the Chêkiang Chief of Police, General Hsia Chao.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHINESE PRESS WAR NOTES

Dr. Sun's New Policy

Dr. Sun Yat-sen proposes to nominate Marshal Tuan Chi-jui to be President while he himself will continue to be Generalissimo. He has renamed the Punitive Army as the Chienkuo Chun or the National Consolidation Army. On September 21, he appointed Fang Shen-tao Commander-in-Chief of the Chienkuo Chun in Fukien; all provincial commanders-in-chief will be given the same title, to be distinguished by the name of the province.

Chang Tso-lin's War Plan.

From a foreign source, the Peking Government learns that Marshal Chang Tso-lin's plan is to direct the First Army under Chiang Teng-hsuan to attack Haifengkou, the Second Army under Li Ching-lin to attack Chaoyang and Linyuan, the Third Army under Chang Hseuh-liang to advance upon Shanhaikwan, and the Fourth Army under Chang Tso-hsiang to station itself at Chinchow as a reserve force; the Fifth Army under Wu Chin-shen and the Sixth Army under Hsu Lan-chou are given other works to do, not yet ascertainable.

Chekiang's Doubtful Case

Hsia Chao, Chief of Chêkiang Constabulary and Acting Civil Governor, and General Chou, Acting Military Governor, telegraphed Wu Pei-fu at Peking on September 20, informing him of the departure of Lu Yung-hsiang and Chang Tsai-yang from Hangchow for Shanghai and of their own assumption of duties of the provincial government, reports a Peking telegram. They also said that as they had ordered all their troops to return to their original posts to await further orders, they would beg him to give their province his protection. In reply, Wu asked them to welcome the arrival of Sun Chuan-fang and cooperate in vanquishing Lu, as he relied on their assistance for the restoration of peace and tranquillity in the southeast.

At the Local Headquarters.

Since the removal of the Headquarters of the Commander-in-Chief of the United Army of Chêkiang and Shanghai to the Arsenal, all financial matters have been placed under the control of Mr. Li Shih-hao, ex-Minister of Finance. But all kinds of intercourse with the outside shall continue to be maintained in the name of the Military Commissioner of Sunkiang and Shanghai.

Killed and Wounded.

Since the outbreak of the local war, reports a news agency, over 750 wounded soldiers have been restored to health, 337 have died as a result of their wounds, while over 1,000 have been killed in fighting on the front between Huangtu and Anting alone, according to investigations made. The casualties at Liuho, Kading, Lotien and Ihsing must have been even more appallingly heavy.

PEKING REASSURED BY CONFIDENT ATTITUDE OF WU PEI-FU

Prices Milder but Newspaper Censorship Still Ferocious: Shansi Tuchun Sending Troops: Mukden Army Reported to Have Gained Signal Success at Chaoyang

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Peking, Sept. 22.

Peking continues to take courage from Wu Pei-fu's confidence. The food prices are remarkably stable under the circumstances, rice, for instance, having risen only $1.40 per picul of 155 catties. Flour has risen 25 cents per bag of 40 catties during the past three weeks. The bond market is already recovering and it is said that the upward trend will continue for some time. Bonds to-day show a five percentage appreciation over quotations three weeks ago.

At the same time the censorship does not relax in severity, the latest manifestation being an order by the Metropolitan Police calling upon all newspapers to change their phraseology from Chihli versus Fengtien War to national forces versus rebels. The order states:

"When war reports are printed in newspapers, you should designate the Government troops as 'national forces' and Fengtien troops as 'rebel forces.' Any departures from this order shall be subject to interference from the responsible authorities."

The trains from Peking to Tientsin are being monopolized by the troops. General Wang Chen-ping and his staff are making their headquarters at Tientsin.

Reports of skirmishing on the Chaoyang front are received from time to time but no connected account has yet been received at Peking. To-day's war news, for instance, contains a telegram from a General near Chaoyang that his riflemen have brought down a rebel aeroplane and that they have been suitably rewarded.

Note: Yesterday's telegram to Shanghai reported Chaoyang captured by the Fengtien forces on their way to Jehol.

PEKING IN A STATE OF PANIC

All Able-Bodied Men Commandeered: Flight to Tientsin

A letter sent from Peking last Thursday states:—

"Since writing last, things have taken a more serious turn up here. All men are being forced to take up arms; boys, cooks, coolies, anyone who can be of service to the army in any capacity or imaginary capacity whatsoever. All carts, richas and even motor cars are being commandeered (in a free republic!). There was quite a panic to-day in the city and all those who can do so are moving to Tientsin (so there is a use for a foreign settlement after all!).

"There is the last straw that has broken the camel's back. Schools are closed, with the pupils bolting to places of safety and fearing they cannot reach such in time, even when abandoning all their worldly goods to the champion looters of the Chinese army. All telegrams are strictly censored. Food is at an exorbitant price and coal is unprocurable as there is no one to deliver it. One gets no reliable news and nothing is allowed to get out. No more tickets are being sold for Mukden or Hankow.

SHANSI TUCHUN'S OFFER OF TROOPS FOR CHIHLI

Peking, Sept. 22.

It is officially reported that Gen. Yen Hsi-shan, the Tuchun of Shansi, has offered to maintain two fully-equipped brigades of Shansi troops for service in the field against Fengtien and also 1,000,000 rounds of ammunition.

In accepting the offers, the Government warmly thanked Gen. Yen. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

HANYANG ARSENAL TURNING OUT MUNITIONS

Hankow, Sept. 22.

Since the outbreak of hostilities between Chihli and Fengtien, the Hanyang Arsenal has increased the number of its workmen, who are working day and night to full capacity. It is understood that some 200 rifles and 1,000,000 rounds of cartridges are being manufactured there each day, and that by order of Marshal Wu Pei-fu, the Arsenal is now hurriedly casting 50 field-guns.—Eastern News Agency.

FENGTIEN SUCCESS AT CHAOYANG

Large Captures Claimed of Prisoners and Equipment

Mukden, Sept. 23.

The General Headquarters here announces:—"This morning at 6 o'clock the Fengtien troops virtually captured Chaoyang with the result that they have captured about 600 prisoners of the Chihli troops together with six field-guns, eight machine-guns, 2,000 rifles and large quantities of other military stores. The Chihli troops have been routed in the direction of Lingyuang." — Eastern News Agency.

1,000 WOUNDED IN SOOCHOW ALONE

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Soochow, Sept. 20.

For two days now Soochow has received no wounded, but to date we have cared for about 1,000. During the early part of the week, however, the wounded who were brought in required scores of big operations. One of our Soochow surgeons gained a great deal of experience in this type of surgery in a base hospital in France during the World War. On his rush days during these past weeks he has kept two adjoining operating rooms busy: finishing one operation, and going at once to the other operating room while a third case was being prepared. From what we learn from the front, we may expect another large inrush of wounded at almost any hour.

Looting Firmly Put Down.

As far as we can learn there has been very little looting—far less than might be expected, on all three fronts. Martial law is really working in Soochow to the great relief of everyone. A cook was out for a little all-night gambling, and going home at 3 p.m. a policeman sent a bullet through the calf of his leg. When the cook is able to leave the hospital, he will probably change his gambling hours until conditions are normal. One afternoon last week a number of men went to a Buddhist temple, tied up an old priest, and threatening his life with an axe, robbed him of $160. One of the gang was an ex-servant of the priest. Three of the gang were caught, and though the priest begged for their lives, the three were shot. They were not of the robber class, but were mostly men out of employment—one was a mere boy of 17. This execution has had quite a wholesome effect.

THURSDAY.

MARSHAL LU'S DEFENCES

A Formidable Barrier Againt Kiangsu When at Last the Attack Begins: Navy Supplies Another Comic Interlude

There was on Wednesday almost a complete lack of definite, reliable news of the war. Both sides have undoubtedly been feeling the effects of the severe fighting in the series of engagements during the latter part of last week, and in which the Kiangsu forces were turned back with heavy casualties. For some reason at present unknown, the Kiangsu forward movement which was to have ended the war in a few days has been held up, though it cannot have been entirely abandoned, and the present lull may be regarded as the calm before the final storm. There is no question but that Marshal Chi's last two attempts to break through proved costly in casualties, with consequent effect upon the morale of his troops, and the probability is that he is reorganizing his forces to undertake a new plan of attack. On this side there is talk of an offensive in the next day or two, but the movements which are taking place rather suggest that Marshal Lu is more occupied with his system of defence, which has so far proved extremely sound, and is endeavouring to improve it wherever possible.

Machine-guns and Barbed wire.

Additional machine guns are being placed at certain points, more trenches are being made and barbed wire obstacles set up, and during the past 24 hours 2,000 more troops were sent up to Nanzing. On Wednesday a couple of anti-aircraft guns, with many cases of ammunition, were transferred from Lunghua to Nanziang, but if one may judge from the feeble aviation exploits so far recorded, it does not appear that these guns may be needed for any serious use, unless there has been a late accession of strength to the Kiangsu aviation service. The evening report received from Huangtu on Wednesday state that the line was quite save for an occasional exchange of rifle shots.

Material is being sent forward for repair of the broken bridges at Kashing so that communication possibly may be restored.

There was a story in the Chinese newspapers on Wednesday relating that Chu Hsi, Defence Commissioner of Soochow, had attempted to commit suicide by shooting himself, his life being saved by the intervention of a member of his bodyguard. When at Quinsan a week ago, the writer learned from a well-informed source that the Commissioner, who had command of a Division, suffered severe losses in an engagement at Malutsen, and was not seen afterwards for two or three days. He then appeared at Marshal Chi's headquarters, more or less in disgrace, but was allowed to return to his command. The alleged attempt to commit suicide is attributed to depression because of the heavy losses his Division sustained in killed and wounded.

Kiangsu Still Preparing.

A communiqué issued at Lunghua last night stated that there had been no fighting at the front. Reports from all fronts indicate great preparations on the part of the Kiangsu army including the movement of heavy artillery, which leads to the conclusion that Kiangsu will shortly take the offensive.

Little Picnics for the Navy.

The navy has been in again and out again. It is not quite clear which side the "Independent Navy" is with, but the last report was that the ships after returning to Shanghai sailed again for Liuho. An official at Lunghua said that the captains were seen on Wednesday in the naval headquarters, although another report has it that they had sailed into Liuho at exactly the same time. Apparently, the Independent Navy, which has been inactive since its inception, except in a business way, has suddenly taken to cruising the Huangpu and Yangtze Rivers. It has even been suggested that the sailors desire ringside seats at the Battle of Liuho, long-heralded as the decisive battle of the war. The commanders felt cooped-up at the Arsenal, where there was no more amusing company than a former Tupan, who might not win the war after all.

The Blown-up Bridges.

The report that bridges 71 and 78 on the Shanghai-Hangchow-Ningpo Railway had been blown up by Kiangsu secret agents, although so stated in all authoritative sources, proved to be incorrect. The bridges were blown up by order of the Defence Commissioner of Sungkiang, who was somewhat premature in executing a plan, which had for its object the cutting of the railroad as soon as the last of Marshal Lu's troops had arrived from the western front. A troop train still on the road was unable to proceed and the soldiers came to Shanghai by boat. Bridge 64 was threatened, but all the tracks have been removed and it is believed that the bridge will not now be disturbed.

Kiangsu Feeling Their Way

A communiqué issued by Dr. Loh, Secretary of General Ho Feng-lin, on Wednesday night stated at 7 p.m., the enemy made an attack on Maloo. The attempt was in the nature of a sortie, only one regiment being used, and was repulsed by our regiment which had been stationed at Maloo on Monday.

A similar sortie was made to the rear of Liuho between Lohtan and Lotien. We have a battalion at Lotien, which repulsed the enemy. The Kiangsu army is moving on Lotien from the general direction of Kading with a view to capturing the road to the rear of Liuho.

MUKDEN VICTORY CONFIRMED

Large Captures at Chaoyang: Marshal Chang will Bombard Chinwangtao

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Mukden, Sept. 24.

Chaoyang and Taifu have been captured by the Fengtien troops, together with eight field guns, 16 machine guns, 1,000 rifles and 900 prisoners. The situation at present is that an enveloping movement is in process, which is expected to result in the capture of Chinyuan, between Chaoyang and Jehol.

Marshal Chang Tso-lin again summoned a meeting of the Consular Body and requested them to advise the withdrawal of all men-of-war from Chinwangtao owing to the fact that Marshal Wu Pei-fu has made this port his headquarters and coaling station. Marshal Chang also stated that he intended to bomb the port of Chinwangtao.

In the event of his bombing Peking, which he had threatened to do with three aeroplanes, his objective would be the Presidential palace and he would not touch the Legation Quarters.

I learn on very good authority here that Gen. Feng Yu-hsiang may become antagnistic to Marshal Wu Pei-fu.

A considerable quantity of valuable property from the Chinese City has been stored in the Japanese Concession, including that of Chinese officials. Rents are thus appreciating.

More Mandates Against Chang.

Peking, Sept. 24.

A mandate issued this morning formally cancels Marshal Chang Tso-lin's titles, orders and decorations. The mandate attributes the present disturbance of peace and order solely to Marshal Chang Tso-lin himself, and promises the officers and men serving Marshal Chang enrolment in the Government forces if they report and declare their allegiance to the Government.

The Blue Express between Peking and Tientsin has been temporarily suspended, but is running normally between Pukou and Tientsin.

Later

Representatives requested Dr. W. W. Yen, the Premier, to attend the House this afternoon in order to explain the recent arrest of two members, but the members had since been released, and there was no quorum.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

MARSHAL LU TO PEACEMAKERS

No Peace But by War: President Tsao Must Go: Struggle to the Last Inevitable

Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang's reply to the Peace Maintenance Society (see parallel column) is to the following effect:—

"I appreciate your kind sentiment; but I love peace as before. Since fighting began, peace may still be gained if the other side will show repentance. However, as four provinces are attacking Chêkiang, and as Kiangsu was the first to start the war, Tsao Kun is the chief culprit that has made peace hopeless, to the indignation of the people.

"If you gentlemen really desire a true peace, you must first remove the obstacle to peace. Upon the outbreak of the revolution, our people did not ask Wuchang to stop fighting, they first demanded of the Manchu Court to abdicate. When the title of Emperor Hung Hsien was assumed, our people did not request the Southwest to suspend war; they first asked Yuan Shih-kai to vacate the Presidency. To-day matters stand just the same. If you regard stopping the war as the best plan, it would be as well to advise all our people to surrender to Tsao.

After reiterating his determination to fight on, and the necessity to endure some pain for the time being in order to gain a permanent peace; and after pointing out the ferocious nature of the enemy from whom to obtain peace would be as difficult as to ask the tiger for his skin, Marshal Lu continues:—

"If you do not agree that to stop fighting is tantamount to surrendering to Tsao, then please first disclose your plan of removing Tsao to our people. Our people all hate Tsao, so much so that in none of the newspapers published in Shanghai, has he ever been represented as the President of China. Such a clearly expressed public opinion should be regarded seriously and used as a weapon against the traitor. Your proposal sounds like abandoning your weapon before running the traitor to earth. To surrender to Tsao even for the sake of peace is condemned in principle; not to say that once you place yourselves in the position of a subjugated people, you can enjoy no peace even temporarily."

Marshal Lu then reminds the Peace Society of the tyrannical rule in Chihli, Shantung and Honan, and of the heavy taxation in Szechuan and Hupeh. Do they not tremble upon hearing of that? The difference between a man and a beast lies in that the former has sense to distinguish right from wrong, and the present is not a time to consider the question of profit and loss alone, as they, who are all gentlemen of a high intelligence and good reputation, will readily admit.

Marshal Lu declares that as long as the national traitor is not removed, so long there can be no peace. "The key to peace is not the cessation of fighting, unless you gentlemen can suggest a way to bring the other side to submission without fighting. Kindly carefully consider the situation and you will see that you cannot preserve yourselves merely by stopping the war."

HALF A LOAF'S BETTER THAN NO BREAD

SHANGHAI PEACE OFFENSIVE

Full Organization of Leading Chinese Businessmen to Endeavour to Get Troops Withdrawn

The Peace Maintenance Society, which was organized last Saturday, is rapidly crystalizing public opinion in Shanghai behind a peace offensive. Already messages have been sent to the Peking Government, Marshal Wu Pei-fu and others to influence Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan to cease fighting now that Lu Yung-hsiang has retired from Chêkiang. The Society has also addressed itself to Generals Lu Yung-hsiang and Ho Feng-lin asking them to withdraw their troops since the suffering of the people on account of the war is very great.

The members of the Peace Maintenance Society consists of 84 Shanghai organizations, 43 of which have already sent representatives. The following are the active members: (names translated from Chinese).

Chinse Native Bankers Association, Shanghai Transportation Association, Shanghai Forwarders Guild, Cotton Guild, Nantao Cotton Guild, Foreign Piece Goods Merchants, Chinese Drug Guild, Exporters Association, Grain Merchants Association, Customs Brokers Guild, Silk Merchants Guild, Pawnbrokers Guild, Chêkiang Silk Guild, Cigarette Dealers Association, Paper Merchants Guild, Sugar Merchants Association, Shansi Exchange Brokers Guild, Ningpo Boatman's (?) Association, Shanghai Bankers Association, Dong Zong Benevolent Society, Industrial Home for Orphans (French Concession), Red Cross Society of China, China Benevolent Association, Sun Ki Benevolent Society, Anti-Kidnapping Society of China, Liengi Benevolent Association, Pao Zai Cemetery Society, Kiangsu Educational Association, Shanghai District Assembly, Machine-Made Silk Goods Association, Nantao Chamber of Commerce, Overseas Merchants Guild, Flour Mill-owners Association, San Ching Silk Guild, Chapei Philanthropic Society, Spiritual Society, Shanghai Tobacco Merchants Association, Rice Merchants Guild.

Every Walk of Life.

The list of organization members, as it stands, represents every phase of communal life in Shanghai. Merchants, bankers, educationalists, philanthropists have joined in this movement to save Shangahi from further warfare. Although it is not believed that much will be accomplished at this stage, because of the difficulty of communicating with Kiangsu and for various political reasons, the founders of the organization hope that they may alleviate the sufferings of the refugees and at the same time be prepared to facilitate any peace activities which may develop.

The leaders of the Peace Maintenance Society are members of an Administrative Committee of five members: Messrs. Yu Yah-ching, Shêng Chu-shu, Yao Tse-zah, Wang I-ting and Shen Lien-fang. Mr. Yu Yah-ching is Chairman of the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce and a prominent Ningpo banker and steamship operator in Shanghai; Mr. Sheng is Manager of the Bank of Communications, formerly Chairman of the Shanghai Bankers Association. He is a native of Chêkiang. Mr. Shen Lien-fang is a prominent silk merchant in Shanghai. Mr. Yao Tse-zah is Chairman of the Nantao Chamber of Commerce and one of the local gentry. Mr. Wang I-ting is a local businessman and a member of the Kiangsu gentry.

The Gentry Included.

In addition to this committee, the Peace Maintenance Society has requested the Kiangsu and Chêkiang Peace delegates who drew up the agreement between Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan and Tupan Lu Yung-hsiang last summer to continue to act. These delegates represent the gentry of both provinces. It is such delegates who can now accomplish very much in the interests of peace. Marshal Chi has regarded most of them as Shanghai men rather than representatives of Kiangsu and has felt that their business association with Chêkiang, particularly Ningpo merchants and bankers, has tended to make them partial to a peace-at-any-price programme. For otherwise, they would have included in their agreement last summer clauses with regard to Shanghai.

It is known that peace efforts are being made in altogether another direction and developments have been daily expected which have thus far not materialized. When Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang came to Lunghua it was believed that he was eliminated from the struggle and that there would be a basis for peace. The continued fighting and the difficulty of communicating with the other side has delayed results in this direction.

54 Refugee Shelters.

The important work accomplished by the Peace Maintenance Society at this time is the supporting of 54 refugee shelters conducted by different charitable and benevolent organizations in Shanghai. Refugees have come to the city from the country between the lines and have been cared for by these stations. The Society itself maintains no stations.

CHANG TSO-LIN'S SOLEMN PRAYER

Supplication to the Heavenly Emperor for Victory for the People's Sake

On the 15th day of the 8th moon (September 13), Chang Tso-lin, Commander-in-Chief of the Chen-wei Army, together with Commanders Chiang Teng-hsuan, Li Ching-in, Chang Hseuh-liang, Chang Tso-hsiang, Wu Chin-shen and Hsu Lan-chou, reverently offered incense, joss-paper, wine and fruit on the occasion of delivering a solemn prayer to the Heavenly Emperor, the substance of which is as follows:—

After saying that for two years, he has preserved order and peace within his own territory by virtue of the trust he accepted from the elders, Marshal Chang denounces Tsao Kun for having committed the greatest crimes in expelling the Chief Executive, in bribing the electorate and stealing the highest position. He, Chang, had hesitated to respond at once to the popular clamour to punish the traitor, because he did not wish the people to suffer from the devastation of war, and because he hoped that Tsao would repent in time.

Intoxicated by Conquest.

"But instead," continues Chang, "Tsao, evidently intoxicated by military conquests, has employed his satellites, Wu Pei-fu, Chi Hsieh-yuan and others, to disturb the country and oppress the people. For several years, military operations have been going on incessantly in Szechuan, Hunan, Kuangtung, and Kuangsi, with the appalling result that human skeletons and bones are littered all over that part of the country. In our whole country, the only places that may be comparatively called the happy land are Chêkiang and Kiangsu in the south and Liaotung (Manchuria) in the north. Yet, the ambition of the traitor knows no bounds, as he has been plotting the ruination of Chêkiang and Fengtien day and night as if he were bent upon leaving the whole country without a single place intact and the people without a single haven of shelter. His cruel and atrocious heart must have long been known to Heaven."

On My Head Be Defeat.

After referring to drought and flood afflicting this country, Chihli suffering more severely from flood than other provinces, and exposing the callousness of "the traitor" in neglecting famine relief measures and ordering the four provinces to attack Chêkiang and in mobilizing troops against Fengtien, Chang declares that he has been forced to conclude that he can no longer preserve his territory and protect his people by peaceful measures. Hence, he will do his duty, defend his native province and eliminate the traitor for the whole nation. He mobilizes his army on this day with the sole object of killing the chief offender and absolutely not caring for power and position. "Thou Almighty be my Judge," fervently prays Chang.

If fate should decree that Fengtien must suffer, Chang prays that on him alone shall punishment descend. If Tsao's and Wu's day of retribution has arrived, Chang prays that Heaven will give him a speedy victory, so that the vitality of the nation may not be too much injured and the suffering masses may be restored to peace and safety as soon as possible.

LULL IN MOVEMENTS OF CHIHLI TROOPS

Tientsin's Calm After a Storm

Tientsin, Sept. 24.

A lull has at last been brought to-day to the transportation by rail of the Chihli troops, proceeding to fighting fronts.

Shanhaikuan is the foremost front-line of the Chihli troops, which are commanding the strategic position from the jag of the Great Wall to a point about one mile distant outside Shanhaikuan on the sea-shore. Besides, all the hills and strongholds to the west of Shanhaikuan are being well guarded by detachments of the General Headquarters of the Government troops. General Peng Shoushin, Commander of the 15th Division, a few days ago removed to Chinwangtao, one artillery battalion and one infantry brigade which had been stationed near the foremost line. All the important places along the railway are being guarded by the troops of the 26th Division.—Eastern News Agency.

SHOT FOR FAILURE IN DISCIPLINE

Colonel Sentenced by Marshal Lu: Warning to Troops that Looted Huchow

Colonel Li Ting-mei, Commander of the 38th Infantry Regiment of the 19th Brigade of the 10th Division, was shot at the Execution Ground of the Arsenal at 5 p.m. on Wednesday afternoon by order of Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang, says the Chinese Press.

Colonel Li was found guilty by a court martial conducted by Marshal Lu himself, of having failed to keep his troops under control and having thereby committed a breach of the Army Discipline. This case arose from the looting of Huchow by the troops of the 38th Regiment.

Shortly after 2 p.m. on Wednesday, Marshal Lu had the guilty troops assembled at the drill ground in Lunghua. He addressed them on the importance of enforcing discipline in an army. He offered either to disband and send them back to their homes in Shantung; or to keep them if they would swear to redeem their sins by helping him to fight and defeat his enemy and to be of good conduct in future. A tremendous shout rent the air, the men in one voice choosing to follow their Commander-in-Chief through thick and thin.

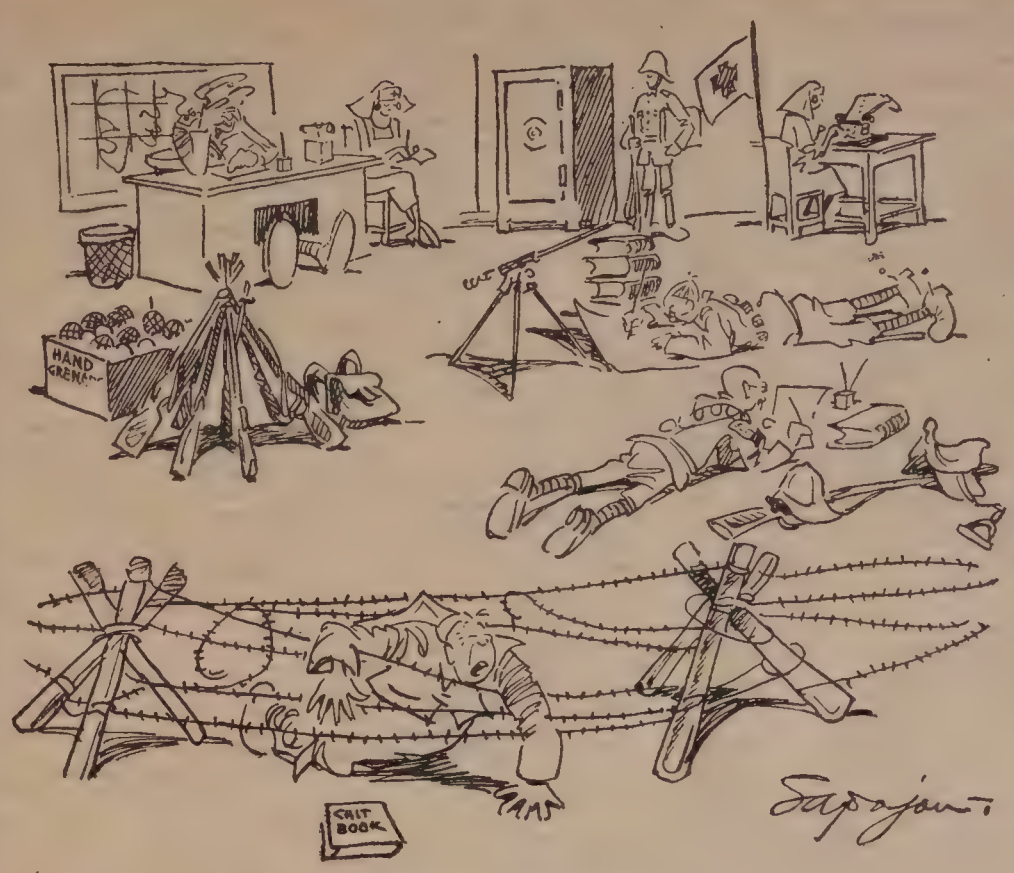
Then followed the tragic end of their Colonel, doubtless to serve as a warning against future misbehaviour.

NEUTRALITY OF SHANGHAI AND WOOSUNG

Mr. Yu Ya-ching has received the following reply from Peking to his telegram of September 10:—

Your telegram of the 10th noted. Referring to your proposal to demarcate Woosung and Shanghai as a neutral area, as Woosung and Shanghai constitute the first commercial port in China at which Chinese and foreign merchants congregate, means should be speedily devised for their preservation. We are just holding consultations as regards the question of demarcating a neutral zone. We still expect your influential assistance.

As a result of information reaching Peking to the effect that Lu Hsiao-chia, son of Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang, was stirring up the bandits along the Tientsin-Pukow Railway, President Tsao and Marshal Wu, have sent instructions to the authorities in Kiangsu, Anhui, Shantung and Honan to offer a reward for his apprehension, says a Peking news agency.



MAHOMET AND HIS MOUNTAIN

If the S.V.C. cannot go to work, why not their work to the S.V.C.?

FRIDAY.

MARSHAL LU'S FRONT FURTHER BARRED

Kiangsu Still Tarries: Possibilities of a Turning Movement: Propaganda Pamphlets by Air

Again on Thursday there was a dearth of war news, and such as was received indicates little if any change in the disposition of the two armies. There was some firing on the right of the line at Huangtu on Wednesday night, kept up spasmodically between 8 and 10 o'clock, but this does not seem to have developed into anything like a big affair, and the rest of the line is reported to have been quiet. On Thursday forenoon, firing was heard from Jessfield, and was evidently one of the big guns which the Kiangsu men have brought down, firing at some considerable distance. Daily for the past three or four days the Chinese newspapers have reported that Marshal Lu has gone to Nanziang to direct an attack, but in fact he has not left Shanghai and his car still awaits him at the railway station.

Every hour's delay has given Marshal Lu more time in which to strengthen his defence, and it now appears certain that he will be able to deal severely with any frontal attack; but the chief danger may lie in a wide flanking movement on the west of his line. He appears to anticipate, however, that Huangtu and Liuho will continue to be the principal points of attack, and on Wednesday night another 1,500 soldiers were despatched from Lunghua to Nanziang, taking with them a big supply of ammunition and some machine-guns, while further supplies went up on Thursday morning.

Propaganda is being briskly carried on among the soldiers on both sides, and instances have occurred in which aeroplanes have been used for the purpose of dropping pamphlets into the enemy lines. It is said that, in inviting deserters to come over to his side, Marshal Chi is offering good treatment, enlistment in his army, and a bonus of $20. At the same time one hears of many desertions from the Kiangsu ranks, followed by the inevitable looting. This was taking place on a small scale some 10 days ago and may have developed to more serious proportions.

CHEKIANG A PREY TO MANY FACTIONS

Province at Mercy of Competitors for Office: Contribution Levied on Kashing: Another Railway Bridge Out of Action

The civil war in Chêkiang is developing into a strife among various military factions for control of the province and already is resulting in a tendency toward cities declaring themselves independent of the provincial capital at Hangchow. General P'an Kuo-kang, commander of the 1st Chêkiang Division which deserted Tupan Lu, has declared himself independent of Hangchow and is establishing his own military dictatorship at Ningpo.

About two years ago, a Volunteer Corps was organized by Shanghai merchants, natives of Ningpo, for the purpose of protecting that city against looters should war break out between Kiangsu and Chêkiang. The volunteers have played very little part in Chêkiang affairs, but they are now emerging as supporters of P'an Kuo-kang. It is reported in Chêkiang circles that a similar movement is being organized in Wenchow and other cities.

Tuli Sun Chuan-fang is due to arrive in Hangchow to-day although Shanghai reports had him in the city yesterday. He will take over the yamên formerly occupied by Tupan Lu and will announce to the Chêkiang people his acceptance of the office.

Meanwhile, General Chen Tiao-yuan, Defence Commissioner of Hsuchowfu and Marshal Chi's candidate for the Tuliship of Chêkiang, is reported have arrived at Kashing and has forced a heavy loan out of the Chamber of Commerce there. Chen Tiao-yuan has not moved his troops from Ihsing to Kashing for the purpose of supporting Sun Chuan-fang in the position which he hoped himself to obtain as a reward for his services in the war.

The blowing up of bridges by the Defence Commissioner of Sungking is designed to check an advance on the part of Chen Tiao-yuan toward Shanghai by way of Sungkiang. On Thursday another bridge, No. 31, on the Shanghai-Hangchow-Ningpo Railway was put out of action by order of the Defence Commissioner, but no serious damage was done.

Should Chen Tiao-yuan capture Shanghai, he will become the Defence Commissioner here, which is less compensation than the Tuliship of Chêkiang, as disordered as that province is bound to be during the next year.

THE FENGTIEN-CHIHLI FRONT

Confirmatory Reports of Fengtien Troops' Success at Kailu

Mukden, Sept. 24.

There is no news to-day of serious fighting. Small skirmishes are reported to have taken place at Kailu, in which the Fengtien troops claim to have been successful. They also claim that the Sixth Fengtien Army is pursuing the enemy.

A bulletin received to-day from the Second Army reports: "Chihli troops consisting of a Liu Brigade, the Thirteenth Jehol Division, the Jehol Mixed Brigade, the Mountain Patrolling Contingent and the Police Vanguards, altogether 8,000 to 9,000 men strong, were badly defeated by the Fengtien troops during the last few days, leaving only a balance of less than 2,000 men, who retreated to Taohuashan, Ehpaihaoshan and Fenghuangshan, where they assumed the defensive on the mountain passes. Finally, after a decisive fight which lasted about seven hourse, the enemy forces fled and our troops pursued them to within ten li west of Chaoyang."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Tientsin, Sept. 25.

Lan Hsien was bombarded yesterday by Marshal Chang Tso-lin. An attempt to blow up the Lan River bridge failed.

Shanhaikuan experienced the usual daily bombing, 50 lb. missiles being used.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHIHLI WAR BOND ISSUE

Tientsin, Sept. 24.

According to information emanating from a reliable Chinese source, as a result of discussions between the Chinese authorities and leading members of the Chinese residents here as regards the question of raising military funds amounting to $10,000,000 as assigned to Chihli Province by the Central Government, it has been decided that bonds to the value of $3,000,000 will be issued and the remainder, $7,000,000, be allotted to all the prefectures in Chihli Province.—Eastern News Agency.

AN EXCHANGE OF SHOTS AT SHANHAIKUAN

Tientsin, Sept. 24.

Heavy firing was exchanged yesterday morning between the Chihli and Fengtien troops at the front of Shanhaikuan as a result of reconnaissance in force by the Fengtien troops. In the afternoon, a number of Fengtien aeroplanes appeared over Luanchow and dropped more than 20 bombs, causing very little damage. Only three or four persons have been killed or wounded.—Eastern News Agency.

MARSHAL WU INTERVIEWED

A Pledge that Kiangnan Arsenal Shall Go When He Has Won the War: Fighting for Constitution and Unity:

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Peking, Sept. 24.

I interviewed Marshal Wu Pei-fu to-day.

The Marshal declared to me that he would take immediate steps, after the cessation of hostilities between Chêkiang and Kiangsu, to remove the Kiangnan Arsenal from Shanghai.

"How do you regard the proposal for the creation of a neutral zone in Shanghai?" I asked.

"The removal of the Arsenal would seem to guarantee neutralization," replied Marshal Wu.

Marshal Wu, who is in excellent spirits, emphasized his position as upholder of the constitution and Parliamentary Government, "but," he said, "I still contend that I am not a politician. My business is that of a soldier, and when I have finished my work, which is the unification of China, politicians will be able to build on that foundation."

"Then you intend to go back to Loyang?" I queried.

"Most probably," was the answer, and he added that he would wait until he saw how the situation developed before formulating any military plans against the South. "Besides, I have got a job on hand already," he went on, almost as an afterthought.

Marshal Wu would not express any definite opinion upon political problems except with regard to the Boxer indemnities and provincial autonomy.

He said he would like to see the Boxer funds returned for the building of railways. "If the Canton-Hankow and the Hankow-Szechuen lines were built," he said, "trade with your country would increase by leaps and bounds."

He argued that the present violations of treaties were only temporary, and that banditry and lawlessness were as much due to the ease with which malcontents were supplied with arms from abroad as anything else. China meant to live up to the obligations of the Washington Conference, when the country was again united, as the agreements then signed marked a new order in China's foreign relations which were full of promise and mutual goodwill.

Such questions as the gold franc dispute were solely for Parliament to deal with and would be decided according to the judgment of Parliament, but he would have nothing to do with provincial autonomy. "That is the enemy of all I am fighting for," he declared, emphatically agreeing that his political faith was in a highly centralized authority.

Marshal Wu again expressed his confidence that unification is in sight. "When the country is unified," he said, "then I will support all efforts in the development of strict adherence to Government mandates."

In conclusion, he said that the status quo in Manchuria in respect of the South Manchuria Railway and the Chinese Eastern Railway would be maintained and all foreign rights and interests protected.

KIANGSU'S HOPES REVIVING

Independent Navy's Desertion of Lu Taken as Sign of Waning Courage in His Ranks: The Battle of Huangtu

BY RODNEY GILBERT.

Nanking, Sept. 24.

Confidence in the speedy victory of the Kiangsu armies and the imminent collapse of the Chêkiang armies revived yesterday after many days of doubt and uncertainty in the minds not only of the people but of the higher officials as well. Opinion was greatly influenced by the news which came in yesterday afternoon that the independent fleet at Shanghai had emerged from the Huangpu and had surrendered to Admiral Tu Hsi-kuei at Kiangyin. It is not assumed that these boats will be of any immediate value in determining the outcome of the war, but it is taken as a sign of panic in the Chêkiang ranks founded upon a certain knowledge of the coming collapse. In addition to the desertion of the Navy and the defection of all the Chêkiang native commanders, it is commonly claimed that a division and two brigades have come over, but as this would have left General Lu with so few men that resistance would be out of the question it cannot be credited.

Bad Artillery v. Machine-guns.

The general lack of faith here in the Kiangsu armies, which has prevailed for some days, was based upon the failure of General Kung's 6th division to capture Huangtu, after the loss of something like 4,000 men and the expenditure of a huge supply of ammunition. Foreign observers explain this failure as due to bad soldiering and ignorance of modern warfare among the officers rather than to any lack of courage on the part of the men, who cheerfully waded the streams and crawled through mud in the face of heavy machine-gun fire. The difficulty has been that the officers did not know how to cover their advancing infantry with artillery and machine-gun fire, so that the Chêkiang machine gunners, entrenched behind formidable barriers, upon which direct fire had no effect, shot down the Kiangsu men in droves with perfect impunity.

A serious attempt was made a few days ago to bridge the Soochow creek and other streams with pontoons which were made here last week as an afterthought and rushed to the front; but when these arrived the senior officers refused to send the men across them, as they said they had already lost too many men and could not cover the Chêkiang line with artillery, since there were no eminences commanding them. Their only idea of using a big gun is to mount it on a tower or a hill and shoot down upon the enemy or to fire point blank when they are exposed.

An Encircling Move.

It was said here yesterday that no more heavy direct assaults would be made upon the Chêkiang positions at Huangtu but that an encirculing movement was under way which would force Chêkiang to withdraw or would have them in a trap in a few days. According to the local authorities the Kiangsu line now runs southwest from Liuho to a point west of Kading, thence southeast to Malu (alias Marro), thence to Nanziang and thence back along the railway to Anting and southwest again towards Tsingpu. The present scheme seems to be to push south from Nanziang and eastwards from the Tsingpu area, so as to encircle Huangtu.

General Ma Yu-jen, commanding the 2nd division at Liuho, yesterday reported through the official bulletin bulletin issued here that on the 19th he had pushed the enemy back at Liuho and had captured 100,000 rounds of ammunition and a large quantity of military stores. Liuho and Kading do not really interest the Kiangsu commanders, however, and it is unlikely that any further determined efforts to break through will be made in the northeast.

Capture of Szean.

In the county south of Ihsing, September 17, the Chêkiang troops attempted a flanking movement but were thrown back beyond their original positions while the Kiangsu forces occupied Shihchuang and Shuik'ouchen and pursued the retreating enemy towards Chingshantsui. The Kiangsu leaders claim that in this fight they inflicted 1,000 casualities upon Chêkiang and captured four field guns and eight machine-guns. While they are advancing upon Changhsing from the north, the Anhui leader, General Wang Pu, has got a wire through that he has taken Szean on the southwest and gone on towards Changhsing. The opinion is now expressed here that General Chen of the 4th Division is making no attempt to advance but is only trying to impede the Kiangsu progress while he withdraws his men through Huchow and Kashing to Shanghai, leaving just enough of a rearguard to making a showing. General Wang Pu in his report of the caputure of Szean claims to have taken two big and two small guns.

Who Gets the Chekiang Plums?

The local authorities were particularly elated to receive a telegram yesterday from General Meng, commanding a division of Sun Ch'uan-fang's invading Fukien army, to say that he had arrived at Huchow on the Chien Tang river and would proceed at once towards Lungyu. These troops are apparently meeting with no resistance on the river since General P'an Kuo-kang of the 2nd Chêkiang Division is co-operating with them; but there is some speculation here as to what will happen when this force reaches Hangchow. The police commissioner of Chêkiang, Hsia Chao, has long been eager for the civil governorship of the province and while he, like all the other native commanders, turned against Lu Yung-hsiang, he may perhaps make a show of resistance to another outsider unless his ambitions are satisfied.

All were so sure of an imminent victory here last night that there was no little speculation upon the ensuing political adjustment. Sun Ch'uan-fang has, of course, already been appointed Tuli of Chêkiang and Inspector General of Chêkiang and Fukien and it is possible that Hsia Chao will get the civil governorship. It is thought that Chu Hsi, garrison commander at Soochow, may be given Ho Feng-lin's post in Shanghai, but he will not be given the same rank as Ho Feng-lin has held for some years. The office of Defence Commissioner will be abolished and whoever holds Shanghai will be simply a garrison commander while the district administration will be merged with that of the province.

FRENCH PAPERS' VIEWS ON CHINA'S WAR

If Foreigners Protected a Wish for a Decisive Result to Restore China

Paris, Sept. 21.

Discussing the events in China, the "Petit Parisien" remarks that the opposing Generals have no tendency to xenophobia and that both Generals are equally concerned in watching over the interests of foreigners. The journal says that so long as her nationals are not injured France, while taking all precautions, will maintain an attitude of impartiality towards the conflict and confine herself to expressing a hope that one or the other of the contestants will carry the day sufficiently decisively to cause restoration of Chinese order and unity, thereby benefiting the commercial interests of France and the other Powers as well as those of China. —Reuter.

Pars, Sept. 22.

The "Echo de Paris" hopes that whatever is the issue of the civil war in China, it will be prompt, so that Japan and America will be confronted with a fait accompli, and all thought of intervention on their part be removed.

"Le Journal" says that in view of Soviet intrigues in China, Japan's attitude, and anxiety in Washington, it will be well to follow events in the Far East closely, as they are pregnant with grave possibilities.—Repter.

THE Hangchow coup d'état has been responsible for a more than usually exuberant flow of platitudes in resolutions by street unions and other organizations against the wicked militarists. The "Association of Various Provincials," a product of the war, has more than held its own in high sounding nothings. Yesterday it dropped this pearl of wisdom: "As a republic the people of China are the masters. They should rise up and protest against the evil-doers."

A terrible price for the treachery of Chinese authorities is being exacted by members of the old Lincheng gang of bandits who are at present terrorizing a large area of Shantung, says the "Peking and Tientsin Times." Their task of robbery, kidnapping and murder is made the easier as the troops who have been stationed in the district have now been withdrawn owing to the Kiangsu-Chêkiang war. The result has been that a reign of terror, worse than before the Lincheng episode occurred, is devastating the countryside. The bandits have no mercy on any troops they happen to capture, and they even work off their injured feelings on their ordinary captives. Many cases have recently been reported where substantial ransoms have been paid, and then only the body of the unfortunate prisoner has been returned.

MARSHAL LU STANDS FIRM

Sept. 22.

SATURDAY was full of rumours of an expected compromise. This was probably due to the fact announced by us that morning that the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce were meeting to consider how they might effectively urge Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang to make peace, and perhaps also the cessation of the Kiangsu bombardment, which had resounded so formidably in Shanghai's ears off and on all Friday. The Chamber of Commerce certainly met and are understood to have discussed all sorts of projects for forming a peace association to stop the war and meanwhile to look after refugees, but nothing definite emerged from much talk. Some of the members went to the Arsenal in the afternoon and called on Marshal Lu. But so far as we have been able to ascertain no suggestion of peace negotiation was mooted. Nor does it look as if it would have had any success if it had been made.

Marshal Lu's position remains the same as he expressed it to this paper's representative on Friday. He tells Mr. Tong Shao-yi that he is quite determined to fight on. He has shortened his front from some thousands of li to a few hundreds and his headquarters at the Arsenal are an excellent place from which to direct operations. His assertion that his troops in this area would remain faithful to him is certainly borne out by Friday's news, when all the officers at least must have known that Chêkiang was out of the war—by the way, from Mr. Rodney Gilbert's letter to-day, one may wonder whether that province will not presently find itself out of the frying-pan into the fire—and Marshal Lu has other loyal troops in Chêkiang, which are now being recalled as quickly as possible to Kashing from west of the Taihu. The explanation of Marshal Lu's resolution is surely to be found in the north. Telegrams from Mukden and Peking leave no doubt that a great trial of strength is impending between Marshal Chang Tso-lin and Marshal Wu Pei-fu. Clearly it is Marshal Lu's duty to his ally to keep up his end and prevent Marshal Chi from sending back his northern troops to reinforce Marshal Wu Pei-fu. If Marshal Chang is defeated, Marshal Lu is no worse off than before; if he wins and gets control of Peking, he will have a useful coadjutor in east China for his schemes of general rebuilding.

Can Marshal Lu's men hold out against the superior numbers massed on the other side? They have certainly fought most bravely so far, but Mr. Rodney Gilbert again insists to-day, as he did in the letter we printed on Friday, that any partial attack must be regarded only as a "side show" and that the big attack when it comes will be all along the front. In opposition to this, a Chinese correspondent at Nanking, usually well informed, writes that Friday's action was to be the beginning of the big attack. If so, and if the Kiangsu troops are so many and formidable, why has that attack eased off? We hazard the opinion—a mere guess—that, as in the Great War, it may be due to the deadly defensive usefulness of machine-guns. Not impossibly the Kiangsu artillery is more formidable in noise than effect and when the infantry advance it is to find Marshal Lu's machine-gun posts as vicious as ever. Also, by the evidence of foreign eye-witnesses, the Kiangsu army is somewhat patchy; some of the troops are very good indeed, some as conspicuously bad. It remains, however, the general opinion of foreign correspondents who have been at Marshal Chi's headquarters that his army can hardly fail to break through if it really tries. The alternative may be weeks of trench warfare.

HYPOCRISY AND OPIUM

Sept 22.

THERE is nothing more highly eulogised in Chinese books than sincerity yet there is nothing in which the Chinese people are more conspicuously lacking than this same quality. The closing chapters of the Chung Yung, the "Doctrine of the Mean," written by Confucius' grandson, Tsze-sze, are a pæan in praise of sincerity. "There are nine principles on which a country may be governed, but there is only one practice by which these may be carried out—sincerity." In the "Great Learning," traditionally ascribed to Confucius, and which, doubtless, bears some traces of his handiwork, "sincerity of purpose and uprightness of heart" is said to be the foundation of government. The teaching of the sages is scoffed at by those Chinese who have studied abroad but these maxims are more than platitudes. Honesty is the best policy in politics as in every other walk of life and the tendency to deliberate misrepresentation that characterizes the utterances of many public men is a boomerang that will ultimately recoil on themselves.

Our issue of September 11 contained a telegram from Geneva in which it was reported that Mr. Chu Chao-hsin, the Chinese representative on the fifth committee of the League of Nations, said, speaking of the suppression of the opium traffic, that "China had good intentions but, unfortunately, she was bound by treaty and could not control the opium supply in her own territory because many foreigners in China still enjoyed extra-territorial rights. China would endeavour to do her best but must look to the foreign Powers to assist her. When the Central Government in China had full power to enforce its laws the opium traffic would be abolished immediately. They wanted to arouse public interest in the question but the Chinese Government and people would never agree to any action or intention which would lead to interference with the sovereign rights of China." This is such an extraordinary statement that we would fain believe that the report has been mutilated in transmission. Unfortunately, this is not the first occasion on which we have had to call attention to the misrepresentations of the Chinese representative in England. Dr. Herbert A. Giles has a book entitled "Strange Tales from a Chinese Studio." It does not belie its name but the fairy stories it relates fade into insignificance before the still more marvellous tales that issue from the Chinese Legation in London. Mr. Chao presumed, and evidently safely presumed, on the ignorance of his audience when he told them that "China's hands were tied by treaty so that she could not control the opium supply in her own territory." There was a time when China was not able to prevent the importation of opium into the country but even in those days she had full power to deal with the "opium supply in her own territory." When one looks back and remembers how ready Great Britain was to help China when she did make an effort to free the country from opium and how the import of opium was first forbidden entry into every province which was declared to be free of the poppy and finally prohibited altogether; and how as soon as the foreign import was stopped China reneged on her professions and immediately began re-planting the drug wholesale; and now to find one of her best educated representatives calmly putting the blame for the present deplorable state of affairs on "extraterritoriality" which has as much to do with it as it has with the recent spell of wet weather, we begin to despair.

Our issue of the 13th instant contained a letter from our Kansu correspondent which explains clearly the reason why China is once more an opium growing country. He says, "The opium this year was more plentifully sown than last year but has not proved so good an investment. Prices are bad and the opium fine, now euphemistically known as the land-tax, presses heavily. In some places those who refuse to grow opium are compelled to pay a lazy-tax." What a thought for the perplexed chancellors of Europe. From this we can see the modus operandi in Kansu. Those who grow opium have to pay the "opium tax" for growing it; those who do not grow opium are fined the "lazy tax" for refusing to plant it. It is a case of "heads, I win; tails you lose." The people are hit either way. The same tale is told by our correspondents in Yunnan, Kueichow and Szechuan. Opium is grown by command of the military authorities who do not hesitate to debauch the people for their own gains. So far has China backslidden from the position she was in when the country was declared free of opium that, according to Sir Frank Swettenham's letter to the "Times," she now produces 15,000 tons per annum or nine tenths of the world's total crop. Had Mr. Chu frankly confessed this and stated the complementary truth that the Central Government was powerless to control the actions of its powerful subordinates who compel the people to plant the poppy he would have had the sympathy of the whole world. China is not the only country with a drug problem. Morphia, cocaine and other narcotic drugs are a growing menace in western lands. But other countries confess their shame and make honest efforts to remove it. When China—official China—does the same her reputation for sincerity will begin to revive.

But we must not forget to call attention to the fact that a National Anti-Opium Association has been formed. It has been created by the co-operation of Chambers of Commerce, Educational Associations and the like. It has already issued a fearsome poster showing a double-headed snake, typifying the foreign-imported narcotics and native-grown opium, being attacked by the Chinese people. More power to their elbows; may the association be a great success.

THE SWORD, PESTILENCE AND FAMINE

Sept. 23.

SLOWLY but surely the League of Nations may yet lead the peoples of the world to settle their differences by peaceful means. Meanwhile, preparations are being made as if at least one more great war was inevitable. The cost has to be counted, and it is very heavy. Of almost first importance amongst the preparations is the suitable and adequate provision for the care of the sick and wounded combatants, and for the prevention of disease among the civilian population. This is a stupendous task which requires for its accomplishment a highly trained and well equipped medical army service and the mobilization of physicians, nurses, Red Cross and other medical organizations, practically all who can render effective medical service. In the United States it is calculated that its next war, should it ever come, will require immediately half a million men for the care of the sick and injured and so urgent are the claims of medicine, surgery and hygiene that the war department has announced that it will give priority to the medical over the combatant service. About 45,000 medical men will be required at once, while 20,000 will be called up later, leaving one doctor to every 1,300 of the population. For in these days the actual and immediate dangers and hardships of war are not confined to the professional soldier, the whole nation is drawn into the struggle including women and children, and a calamity such as famine or disease may compel surrender just as soon and completely as the defeat of armies on the battle-field. It follows that the relief of suffering, patriotism and self-defence alike require that a government, before it declares war, ought to be certain that it will be able to respond to all the demands which may be made upon it, in the interests of public health.

The sword, famine and pestilence have always been closely associated evils. In the past the losses from disease during and after a great war were frightful, particularly from diseases such as typhus fever, typhoid fever, dysentery, smallpox, bubonic plague, scurvy and malaria. During the Thirty Years War, the whole population of Germany, which had been 16,000,000 before the war, owing to the ravages of pestilence, dwindled down to one-half, or as some authorities maintain, a quarter. Armies consumed everything they found wherever they went, spreading typhus fever and bubonic plague in their course. Neighbouring States were almost equally affected: thus Amsterdam lost one-third of her population, and Switzerland became infected even in the most out-of-the-way valleys by the swarm of beggars who were driven by famine and misery out of the desolated parts of southern Germany. In the Napoleonic Wars, the worst scourge was typhus fever which destroyed hundreds of thousands. Probably at least two million soldiers and others must have contracted it. The dissemination of the disease was largely helped, it is said, by the poor inhabitants looting the battlefield and taking home with them the knapsacks and other effects of the dead. In the Franco-German War of 1870 smallpox was the greatest scourge. Coming to the present time, while all branches of medical science have made such great advances that ordinarily the spread of disease can be checked, yet when the circumstances are unfavourable and the medical service inadequate, disease still exacts a very heavy toll. In consequence of the recent great war, tuberculosis, rickets, and malaria are far more common than formerly in various European countries. In Russia, as late as 1921, whole provinces were in the grip of hunger, faced with the prospect of death by starvation and disease. Diseases, especially malaria, took thousands of victims, and there were no medicines to help the sufferers; myriads of orphan children wandered through the country; bands of marauders terrorized the rural districts, and horrible acts were of frequent occurrence which cannot be related here. To quote the common saying, "war is hell."

In the present grave condition of China the purpose of this grim recital is not to arouse harassing fears, but to add force to the plea that the civil war now being fought ought to be the last, for the people are not in a condition to endure constant warfare. Since the Revolution of 1911 the country has been in a state of great disorder; brigandage is common over wide areas; two million men have been withdrawn from peaceful occupations to serve as soldiers, and many of them being poorly paid rob and loot on their own account and are little better than brigands; the generals forcibly collect immense sums of money from the merchants of peaceful cities; owing to the insecurity of life and property trade is partially paralysed; large agricultural districts are desolate or are given over to the ruinous growth of the poppy. Moreover, the medical preparations for a prolonged war are wofully inadequate. Judging by the reports which come in, apart from the good work of the Red Cross in Shanghai, the brunt of caring for the sick and wounded seems to have fallen upon missionary hospitals. In a long war it might easily happen that the very small force of competent medical men in this country would be utterly unable to cope with the demands made upon them to attend the sick and wounded, and to prevent the spread of those diseases which are so apt to break out among the people during and after a war. When the sword, famine and pestilence combined begin to scourge the country, who can tell what the end will be? The Chinese who are truly patriotic will consider these things and wisely endeavour by every means in their power to secure for their country the blessings of permanent peace.

THE POWERS AND CHINA'S TURMOIL

Sept. 24.

IT is clearly most important at a time like this that foreigners should know what some Chinese are saying and thinking. The letter we published yesterday headed "A Chinese View of the Settlement" is easily answered and in many respects unreasonable. Yet it deserves attention, as representing the attitude of many Chinese. It has to be admitted that, from the writer's standpoint, there is something in what he says about foreign concessions in China: they have been used as asylums for the safe engineering of intrigue, in a manner which the Powers should never have permitted and to which they must devote early and earnest attention. To this subject we shall return later. But to suggest, as Y.E.H. does, that the foreign concessions are to blame for all China's misfortunes is sheer nonsense. The recent civil war in Szechuan was planned in no foreign concession. The expulsion of Tang Chi-yao from Yunnan and his subsequent return owed nothing to the fostering of a foreign asylum. In every big city in China chicanery and intrigue are rife, not because there are foreign settlements in some parts but because government is bad and corrupt in nearly all. Let China get good men into office, who will administer public funds honestly and govern faithfully, and though intrigue may not die altogether, it will lose all its power to harm. Y. E. H.'s letter is not, we think, intended as such; but it might stand as a fair example of the old mandarin's trick of trying to deflect against foreigners the wrath excited by his own shortcomings.

This tendency, ever increasing in recent years and attested to by missionaries, travellers, observers generally all over China, illustrates the mischievousness of comment like that of the "Daily Telegraph," which was cabled out yesterday. If the summary received gives the correct meaning, the "Daily Telegraph" thinks that the Legations are in danger; that if so, their situation is of vastly more importance than the possibility of Shanghai being invaded by a mob of leaderless soldiers, with all the incalculable damage which might ensue; and that the position of the Legations ought to rouse Great Britain to drastic measures. Coming from a paper of such standing as the "Telegraph," comment of this kind may do great harm. In the first place, the danger to Legation Quarter is practically nil—unless, perhaps, by an aeroplane dropping a bomb into it accidentally. Nothing is more noticeable in the present conflict than the scrupulous care which the commanders on both sides are taking not to endanger foreign lives and to cause as little inconvenience to foreigners as they can. Incidentally this fact is most significant, suggesting that both sides mean this to be a final fight for the control of all China and that they do not want the new régime to open with complications abroad. In the second place, if there is to be any choice between the potential danger of Legation Quarter and that of Shanghai, there can be little question which has most claim on the British Government's solicitude. Apart from any question of human life (which indeed could hardly arise, guarded as the Diplomatic Body are), the value of Legation Quarter is principally sentimental. But that of Shanghai is colossal. In 1923 Shanghai handled thirty-eight per cent. of the hundred and sixty odd million taels which was the value of British trade, from the Mother Country alone, with China; and ten million tons of British shipping passed in and out of the Huangpu. And the wealth invested in Shanghai buildings and docks and factories, in which to varying degrees thousands of workers in Britain are interested, is incalculable. In the third place, the "Daily Telegraph's" comment is to be deplored, because it may so easily lend a handle to those who would be glad of an excuse to excite mob violence.

Beyond the protection of foreign life and property, to which end measures have already been taken, no serious-minded foreigner desires intervention in the present war or believes that it could avail. The collapse of the Central Government and the substitution of a number of military satrapies, wholly independent of each other even when nominally allied, has left China without any point at which pressure could be applied with hope of success on the whole body. The most probable result of such an attempt would be to unite all parties against the foreigner. At the outset of the war there was a good deal of loose talk in Western papers about intervention. To this in no small measure, we may be sure, were due the violently anti-foreign leaflets which were distributed in Peking and elsewhere. These have apparently subsided, but not the feeling to which they are due and any ill-considered act by the Great Powers, even in the nature of friendly representations, might have evil consequences in regions less well able to protect themselves than Shanghai and Legation Quarter.

Nevertheless it is essential that the Powers should reconsider their whole attitude towards China. Much of the present disorder is due to the Washington Conference, which was based upon two fatal fallacies; first, that China is still one and united; and secondly, that Chinese republicans are willing or even capable of responding to concessions involving some attempt on their own part to put their house in order. They have been encouraged in misdoing by years of timid, invertebrate diplomacy, which has permitted such an unparalleled outrage as the Lincheng affair, not to mention numerous minor murders and kidnappings, to pass utterly unrequited and uncompensated. All sober foreign opinion is agreed that the only course for the Powers to take, to stop the rot, is to exact rigid compliance with Treaty rights, by direct action against the offending province when it can be reached, as most of them can, by sea or river, and to guard the Treaty Ports and Customs and Salt services, on which not only foreign but Chinese loans are secured. Already, by a piece of lamentable diplomatic shortsightedness, provincial officials have been allowed to make serious inroads on the Salt revenues and at any moment they may similarly assail the Customs. Only by the display of force which the Powers for once nerved themselves to make last December was Dr. Sun Yat-sen prevented from seizing the Kuangtung Customs. It should also be made plain that defeated generals and politicians who take refuge in foreign concessions must thenceforward comport themselves as private citizens. If they once leave in order to prosecute a new war, there must be no readmittance for them. This practice of using foreign settlements as an asylum in which to engineer fresh plots is a great grievance of the Chinese people and is totally contrary to the purpose for which the concessions were granted.

The case for firm diplomacy as here suggested is reinforced by the fact that the Chinese are an eminently reasonable people and cannot be roused when they know that the other side's position is a just one. And as distinct from the officials, they are not and have never been anti-foreign. The Tuchuns are also easily misjudged. Very possibly there are vicious examples among them, but there are also many who are genuinely patriotic. In the present struggle there are men on both sides, such as Lu Yung-hsiang and Chi Hsieh-yuan, who have governed their provinces well and have shown real solicitude for public welfare. The curse of China is bureaucracy, politicians, student unions and educational associations. It is among these that anti-foreignism is found and they exercise a secret tyranny to which the Tuchuns themselves are susceptible.

LIKE the Arsenals at Hanyang and at Techow, the Arsenal at Mukden which is the main source of supplies of munitions for the Manchurian forces, has also extended its working hours. About 80,000 rounds of rifle ammunition a day are being put out, it is reported. Besides this output, bombs, shells and hand-grenades are also manufactured. With the installation of a brand new set of machiney for manufacturing field guns, the Mukden Arsenal will be in a position to produce heavy artillery.

COMMERCE AND THE WAR

Sept. 25.

THE letter that we published yesterday signed "Concerned," dealing with the oppressive and in some ways seemingly unnecessary stagnation of trade, expressed the feelings of many business men in these days.

"Is it possible," the writer asked, "that even a war, particularly in a country the size of China, can be allowed to paralyze trade so completely for an indefinite period?

"Are there not ways and means whereby the wheels of commerce can be set going again or must we sit down and be content to wait until China's war lords have ended their campaign to their own satisfaction?"

By the utmost allowance, the area affected by the fighting is not a tenth of that part of China which most concerns Shanghai; and although the railways are monopolized by combatants for the movement of their troops and stores, the main waterways of China are practically unaffected. The European War penetrated far more deeply into the countries and peoples involved than the Chinese civil war has even begun to do; yet, as our correspondent says, under many difficulties trade was kept going. No attempt of the kind has been made in China although, as "Concerned" adds,

> It is inconceivable that both the foreign and Chinese business communities, being at the present thoroughly hard hit by the state of stagnation, are going to neglect any opportunity that holds out prospect of getting back to work again.

So long as coastal and riverine connexions are undisturbed, certainly some business might be done.

Our correspondent finds that the fault lies with Chinese banks who refuse to grant the necessary facilities. We hold no brief for these banks, but we doubt whether this is quite an accurate idea, at least whether it is all the cause of trouble. There is no doubt that the Chinese banks in Shanghai have plenty of money to-day in their treasuries. A few weeks ago they had not much money and they owed a good deal to the foreign banks. But these advances have been largely if not wholly paid off, money having been called in from up country, a process, by the way, which nearly caused a crisis in Hankow. Our correspondent may be trusted to know what he is talking about when he says that "the native banks seem to have declared a sort of moratorium." On the other hand, in respect of imports at least, there must first be some evidence of a desire to buy from up country; and the mere sight of war-like preparations at once chokes off the Chinese appetite for purchase. What money he has he prefers to put into a hole in the ground. Latterly there have been symptoms of a demand from Szechuan, the explanation being that since the triumph of General Yang Sen and the expulsion of Hsiong Keh-wu, the province has been unwontedly peaceful and as the war in east and north China does not come immediately under their eyes the Szechuanese are ready to do business. But further down the Yangtze, in Hupeh, Anhui, Kiangsi, though there is no fighting, there is plenty of evidence of it not far off and nervousness shuts all purses.

This condition of feeling is in marked contrast with the time-honoured axiom that the Chinese will manage to do business under conditions that would elsewhere seem impossible. The case would probably be different if the present war had broken out unexpectedly after years of prosperity. But it is in reality only the climax of a long period of oppression and bad government, which has kept all trading low. The people have been miserably ground down with taxes, fleeced by soldiers, pillaged by bandits. They are poor and are likely to remain so until there is once more some degree of ordered government. Meanwhile we should be sorry to appear to throw cold water on the suggestions made by "Concerned." If the rumour he quotes be correct, that "import, and trade centres, absolutely untouched by the war, are not only ready to do business, but have orders to execute, if only financial facilities were easier to obtain," then certainly no effort should be spared in trying to induce the banks to grant facilities. The first step one might suggest is to ascertain where such a demand exists. If it can be verified, surely it could be met; and as our correspondent says, once trade begins to move, more will follow. There is this fact to be borne in mind. By every appearance, the war is meant to settle the fate of China, and its authors on both sides will therefore be more anxious to start in supreme power (when they win it) with a clean state and popular approval, than is the case in the ordinary interprovincial quarrel. Where the armies are, business must stop. Outside that area, conditions might even prove to be better than they have recently been.

A REACH-ME-DOWN GENERATION

Sept. 25.

ONE of the outstanding features of modern times is the triumph of the herd mind, as psychologists call it. It shows itself in that gospel of standardization which is being preached, in act if not in word, throughout the civilized world. We are beset by a mania for ordering our lives according to set patterns, and anything in the nature of originality is taboo. Take building for instance; individuality in the matter of structure seems to be disappearing and those of us who have travelled in foreign lands are struck by the sameness of modern edifices erected in great cities of both East and West. Whether it be in Shanghai, Sydney or San Francisco, there is a similarity about their streets which robs them of much of the charm a place ought to have for one paying a first visit.

It is the same in the intellectual world. Everybody apparently desires to think like his fellows. Instead of telling our youths to be themselves, we exhort them to be like everybody else. Our educational systems appear expressly designed to promote uniformity. With bureaucratic officials, armies of clerks, cast-iron regulations, red tape and endless examinations, mankind is doing its best to turn out standardized intellects. The last thing that the government education department of any country wants is originality on the part of teachers, and this laudable aim is zealously seconded by politicians. These gentlemen are all in favour of a sort of intellectual goose-step. Their passion for cooperative mass-thinking will never be satisfied until there is mass production of human intellects all manufactured in the same mould.

Civilized people are doing little to prevent this standardization. Every body can read nowadays. But it is no unjust accusation that in most cases they spend too much time in reading and too little in thinking. We have it in us to be original, we are naturally individualistic; but we allow ourselves to be deprived of our birthright. In fact, we have come to regard it as rather bad form to be original. There is infinite danger in this cult of uniformity. A standardized people is an easy prey to the subtle propagandist, a gramaphone press and, what these eventually lead to, a bureaucratic dictatorship. "Once admit the drill-sergeant to the realms of mind and spirit," says a recent writer, "and moral responsibility will totter and the 'new freedom' will stand unmasked as the new and greater tyranny." That is the last stage in the decline of democracy untempered by humanism, delighted in by socialist doctrinaires, but abhorrent to all who have learnt something of the lessons of history and believe that a man is a greater thing than a system.

THE BOY SCOUT AND CHINA

Sept. 26.

IN these days when men of good-will all the world over are anxiously searching for effective ideals and practical methods which will bring about universal brotherhood and make war an anachronism, one of the most encouraging signs of the times is the marvellous success in the British Empire of the Boy Scout Movement. At the Wembley Exhibition recently, 21,000 boys assembled from all parts of the empire. The immense gathering was most interesting and to those who discerned the spirit and aims of the movement it was of great significance and promise. First, as to the various displays. How the hearts of the onlookers must have been stirred by the dancing of a thousand Highland Scouts with their skirling bagpipes and their jolly cheering; by the thousands of little. Wolf Cubs in a well-ordered display using their wits without officers present to guide them; by the handiness of the Sea Scout and bridge builders; by the historical pageants, the choirs and bands, the athletic achievements, the pathetic little display of "Mafuzziwogs" made by Scouts who could not themselves be there because they were cripples, and the inspiring marching of these young citizens of the Empire! All the displays were wonderful in their way.

But as pointed out by Sir Robert Baden-Powell, the Chief Scout, whose article on the subject we quote freely, the spirit of the movement is far more wonderful. To a very great extent the hopes and expectations of its founders are being fulfilled. The boys are appreciating what it all means, the aims of the movement, and the practice of that discipline which comes from within from the sense of "playing the game" under a high ideal. This self-discipline was evident in the camp, behind the scenes, and in the off-duty behaviour of the 21,000 boys. The Scout spirit was very pronounced at their own special Thanksgiving Service at Wembley. Still more was it in evidence on the occasion of the service in Westminster Abbey when the boys realized that there they were from every country and every race in the Empire, privileged to meet in the sacred shrine of the nation because their pursuit of an ideal was taken seriously. And it made them understand better the history of their race to be among the memorials of its great men, from Chaucer down to the Unknown Warrior. This was by far their most impressive experience. "In their camp that night there reigned an unwonted silence. There was none of the usual singing and skylarking. The boys went to bed sobered, awed and inspired. Where there is this reverence and this self-discipline it is certain that Scouters have done their work and done it well; they have instilled and inspired, instead of instructing and commanding."

In surveying the disordered condition of China, the utter loss of lofty public spirit among the elders, and among the children the absence of the old-time willing submission to discipline, what a tremendous gain it would be if all Chinese boys were inspired by the ideals of the Boy Scout movement! It is true small groups of Boy Scouts have been formed here and there, generally in missionary schools, but as an organization it is very small and it has little strength; it has not "gripped" the students or they would have behaved very differently during the past few years. The mistake lies in not linking the new with the old. Whatever is good in the national life and history of China should be combined with the new teaching to form the character of the boys and help them to love and serve their country. The study of their own classics should not be abandoned, nor the public performance and recitation of their wholesome historical dramas. The movement should have a religious basis, as in the British Empire, but here as elsewhere the religion taught the boys should be simple, practical and attractive. Wisely managed the Boy Scout movement should lay hold of the boys in China and lead them also to learn lessons of reverence, self-discipline, and helpfulness. Its teaching and practical training would do more to regenerate the nation than much of the educational work that is now being done.

There is another valuable outcome of the Boy Scout movement which furnishes a strong reason for its development in China—its basis for the formation of a great brotherhood. At Wembley boys from all classes and from all parts of the world met in genial fellowship and learned to know each other: This is a sound beginning of that national good-will and co-operation which is the great remedy for the solution of the social, political, and industrial difficulties of the time. Further, the movement is moulding the youth of the whole of the empire into a great Brotherhood. It has a still greater ideal. To quote Sir Robert Baden-Powell again; "Our slogan in the Scout movement is 'Look Wide.' There is before us a wider brotherhood even than this empire of ours. There are other motherlands besides Great Britain; there is France; there is America and Holland, and Denmark—indeed, every civilized country in the world. All these have their sons. These are sons of the one Father, and therefore the world itself is a Brotherland. It is with this conviction in view that the Boy Scout movement becomes a school of brotherhood on the widest basis." When such a world-wide brotherhood has been formed there will be no more war.

IT is reported that American, British, French and Japanese military officers in Peking will form a party and proceed to the south in the near future with the purpose of investigating the conduct of the Chêkiang-Kiangsu War.

CENTRALIZATION OR FEDERATION?

Sept. 27.

THE path of neutrality mapped out for foreigners in the present crisis in China is at once facilitated and complicated by the fact that both sides promise so well. And in all sincerity we may repeat that it is a matter of unfeigned regret to foreigners that men of so much character and ability as are to be found on both sides cannot settle their differences except by fighting, which, however carefully conducted, must bring misery perhaps to millions of people. There is much in Marshal Wu Pei-fu's remarks to our Peking correspondent, published yesterday, which we must all welcome, the removal of the Kiangnan Arsenal, the pledge that China shall at last live up to the obligations of the Washington Treaty, the respect for foreign rights and interests. Certainly neither Western Powers nor peoples need ask for more than this. And if there was any idea in Marshal Wu's mind of disarming foreign notions of possible interference, we venture to say that anxiety on this score is needless, in his mind or that of anyone else. The bigness of the quarrel, even if there were no other reason, must put out of court all question of outside meddling. The issue is no mere matter of inter-provincial jealousies but of which system of government is to prevail in China. On no very dissimilar issue did the Americans of North and South go to war and their right to settle the dispute in their own way was no more questioned than that of the Chinese people should at present be.

The interview with Marshal Wu, a recent statement by Marshal Chang, have put the matter quite plainly. The ruler of Manchuria is for provincial autonomy, a federation of self-governing states; and his ally Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang, having handed back Chêkiang to the Chêkiangese,—the phrase in all circumstances rather provokes a smile—will do the like by Kiangsu if he wins to Nanking. Marshal Wu Pei-fu will have nothing to do with provincial autonomy; "that is the enemy of all I am fighting for;" his political faith is in a highly centralized authority. It would be entirely improper, from the standpoint of neutrality, for an outsider to express any opinion as to which system is the better for China, besides being rather absurd. But it is, perhaps, permissible to say that Marshal Wu appears to have set himself by far the harder task. If Marshal Chang wins to Peking, he can to some extent make use of such system of government as remains, somewhat as he finds it. But Marshal Wu Pei-fu would have to go back to something that has really not existed since the death of Yuan Shih-kai. He would also, we may suspect, have to overcome precisely the same forces of resistance that proved fatal to Yuan's throne. Tsai Ao, of Yunnan, who raised the flag of revolt against Yuan, was, we have always been told, a patriot and a convinced republican. But his resistance was made easy and Yuan's projected empire fell, because in every province there were men who had found the republican, so-called, form of government so exceedingly lucrative. Those men exist certainly in no smaller force to-day than nine years ago and they are the real enemies of ordered government in China. Whether Marshal Wu wins or Marshal Chang, either will have to conquer these hidden enemies of reform before his system of government can avail, and that battle will be far tougher than any that is now fought with machine-guns and aeroplanes.

To say that we are sorry to hear Marshal Wu say that he is a soldier and that when his business as such is finished he will leave the rest to the politicians, must not be taken to mean that we wish him to win, or do not wish him to win. It is merely a frank expression of well-grounded distrust in politicians generally and Chinese politicians in particular. If Marshal Foch, Marshal Haig and General Pershing had been allowed to fix the terms of peace when they fixed those of the armistice, Europe would certainly have suffered no more than she has done from the subsequent bungling of politicians, and probably she would have suffered far less. In 1922 Marshal Wu Pei-fu left a clean state in Peking for the politicians to write upon, and the result is the war to-day. It is true his remarks are somewhat cryptic: "When I have finished my work," he says, "which is the unification of China, politicians will be able to build on that foundation." The obvious question "How would you define the unification of China?" suggests the further thought that his retirement to Loyang might be much further off than these words at first sight suggest. We recommend no policy, we express no preference for either side. But whichever party wins on the field of battle, we cannot help feeling that the road to solid reconstruction lies through a period of dictatorship. Nothing else, we may be sure, will now restore order in Chêkiang, which is an image in little of all China. And looking back on the history of other republics, we find abundant examples to prove that the will of the people has only prevailed in the end because for a time was enforced the authority of one man.

BRITISH Government officials, who up to now have had to pay for the stamps used on their salary receipts will do so no more. The abolition of stamps on salary receipts was one of the little reliefs given by this year's Budget, but it has not been put in operation in Government offices until now. "By abolishing the stamp, the Government has made a present of £100,000 a year to Civil Servants, and half of this sum will go to Post Office workers," a Government official said. "The principal grievance in the past has been that the weekly wage-earner has had to buy 52 2d. stamps while the higher official, paid monthly, had to buy only 12."

IT is evident that the United States Navy is paying very special attention to the possibilities of submarine warfare, and is sparing no effort to provide itself with the types which future eventualites may demand. The latest indication of this is the approval of the plans of a submarine mine-layer, which is to form part of next year's programme, and which looks like being one of the most remarkable underwater craft in the world. Details are not likely to be announced for some time, but it is known that she is to be fast enough to accompany the fleet and is to have a large radius of action. Her construction and machinery are to cost not more than $5,300,000, with an additional $850,000 for armament and ammunition.

THE Board of Management of the British Empire Exhibition are to have an opportunity of explaining in the Law Courts why they refused to exhibit certain posters, executed for them by Capt. Spencer-Pryse, an artist and lithographer whose work is widely known. Capt. Spencer-Pryse told the "Evening News" that he was taking legal action against the Board on the ground that they had not fulfilled their contract with him. All his posters had been duly delivered, but some of the posters have been suppressed, one objection to them being that they contained nude figures. Among the banned posters were. Women bathing in Malaya. Tea-gathering in Ceylon (women.) Rice-planting in India. Girls dancing on shore (Pacific Islands.) Coaling station at Hongkong. Maori canoe (New Zealand.)

NOTES AND COMMENTS

Sidelights upon Canton

We have received from a correspondent in Canton a very interesting letter dealing with the present situation. "Sun Yat-sen," the writer cheerily begins, "seems to have made an ass of himself in his various proclamations," with an inevitable loss of face. The letter then goes on:—

"Very few believe in his northern expenition if only for the fact that he has not the funds; apart from which it must take a very long time to go overland before he can be considered a factor in the present northern activities. Chinese newspapers have been on strike for the last few days, and consequently even that source of news has been denied me, but I have formed my own conclusion of the present trend of events. Somehow or other it seems to me that the Merchant Volunteers are actually in the ascendency and that in some manner, without any publicity, they have gained their point, and that it is due to them that Sun Yat-sen has left. Also the retirement of Sun Fo (son of Dr. Sun) from the Mayoralty is due to them, and the dismissal of the Police Commissioner, Te Chen-wu, is their work, he having incurred their displeasure by shooting one of their Majors after the settlement had been agreed to. Liao Chen-hoi as well as Li Fuk-min, have refused to take up their new appointments, and so has Hu Han-min, the man Sun appointed as his Deputy Generalissimo. I think this is because they know that their Bolshevik proclivities (except Li Fuk-lum) are distasteful to the populace. Chen Chiung-ming is again on the march and I would not be surprised to see him back here, since the merchants are not averse to him, although he has lost a good deal of their confidence in the past two years by his inactivities and failures. The fact, however, remains that, when he was here, there was some attempt at keeping order and running the place decently. I would not be surprised to see him appointed at the head of affairs here with a more representative Council. Against all this is the fact that there are still large groups of mercenaries in or near Canton, who will not be satisfied to walk away quietly with empty pockets, and may make trouble."

The writer of the above is careful to point out that what he writes is largely conjecture. At a time like the present it is almost impossible to obtain accurate information, he says. With this, we may say that his information is usually pretty good and the above letter certainly fits in with the probabilities of the situation as shown in recent telegrams.

The "Small Money" Bugbear

Of all the petty annoyances to which the weird currency system of China submits one, not the least are the depredations of our friends the money-changers and the uncertainty associated with the exact amount involved in any cash purchase in which a fraction of a dollar is concerned. Quite recently many of the foreign stores' managements held a meeting at which it was decided by the majority that coins subsidiary to the Mexican dollar would be accepted at the market rate for those coins prevailing on the day of tender, but as not all of the foreign firms have adopted the system nothing has really been done to make confusion less confounded. At the present time it is possible to go to one store on the Nanking Road and make a purchase for, say, 50 cents and to be requested to pay the equivalent in "big money," while a purchase involving a like nominal amount can be made almost next door for 50 cents "small money". It is easily to be understood that firms which, in pricing an article at 50 cents, are reckoning in "big money", naturally expect to be paid with half-a-dollar's worth of coins, but it is not so easily understood why some firms which adopt this system give only 50 cents "small money" in change when a silver dollar is tendered. The big Chinese department stores have for years adopted a system of "big money" both in charges and in change; the system has worked well, has been adopted by many foreign firms to the satisfaction of customers and, it is to be supposed, themselves; and it is difficult to understand why all firms of standing, instead of a proportion only, have not adopted a system on similar lines. The public would know where it stood and so would the firms; there would be equity on both sides instead, as at present in many cases, favouring the shopkeeper in some instances and the public in others. Many firms now have their bills stamped "subsidiary coins received at market rate only" and most of them adopt the same principle in giving change—but not all; and it would create a better understanding all round if the intimation were worded "subsidiary coins received at market rates only, and change given on the same basis."

Russian Child Hawkers

As will have been seen in the article published in another column, the school for Russian children in Avenue Foch has been reopened and has enough money promised to keep it going for another three or four months at least. Considering that it only costs $10 a head per month to keep the child in this school, we cannot for a moment doubt that more money will be forthcoming when needed. At the same time, as was pointed out in Saturday's article, some of the money was promised on the clear understanding that all Russian children, who have been selling odds and ends of sweets, etc., in the street, should be rescued and put into the school. Actually there are about 30 boys and girls in the school, but, as anybody who likes to stroll along Nanking Road any day from the Bund to the Szechuen Road can see, there are other Russian children still on their old beats outside the principal stores. Their parents, when remonstrated with, have replied that until they themselves can get work, the children must go on selling in the streets. An answer of this kind is not calculated to elicit much sympathy. It is, to say the least, most unpalatable that children of such tender age should be standing about in the street for hours together and in all weathers, when they might be in school, properly cared for; and if the parents do not consent to send them to school, compulsion must be employed. It cannot, surely, be impossible for the police to bring these children before the Mixed Court as vagrants, when there is no doubt whatever that the Chinese magistrate would agree to order them to be sent to the school that is waiting for them.

Pilgrims of the Night

Some people in Kowloon have been writting to the press about the noise in the streets at night and the consequent loss of sleep and fraying of temper suffered by those staid, steady householders, their children and their grandchildren, their nurses and their amahs, their cooks and their coolies, who seek slumber before the clock has started the cycle of another day. One Kowloon resident, evidently with an ear well attuned by long suffering to differentiate between the many means of making the night hideous, describes the condition prevailing as "rattling, honking buses; chattering prowlers or ricsha coolies parked on the footpaths; promenading couples larking under one's windows; food hawkers yelling; bursts of crackers from restaurants or elsewhere; taxis or other motor vehicles racing through the streets; dog and rooster choruses; mah-cheuk; an occasional all-night funeral ceremony; factory hands in wooden clogs going off duty. . . ." Some of us in Shanghai can sympathize with the residents of Kowloon, for the description, except that it is not sufficiently strong nor comprehensive enough, is an excellent word-picture of some parts of Shanghai when Chêkiang and Kiangsu are not at war. This question of turning the night into a bedlam by those who have not been trained to think of others, is a serious one, and we cannot do better than repeat some excellent comments on the subject by our contemporary the "South China Morning Post":—

What do these noise-makers do in the daytime? In an American factory, among much good advice to employees, appeared a paragraph to this effect: "What you do in your own time is not our business; but if what you do affects your working capacity next day, that is our business". Quite a big proportion of Hongkong's night prowlers must be employed by foreign firms. An inspection of offices any day would probably reveal a number of thin, worn, half-asleep office boys and clerks, who occupy themselves with doubtful amusements every night when they should be fitting themselves for the labour of next day. Taipans can test the matter for themselves. Employees caught napping, others mysteriously ill and absent for a day (at home sleeping) tell the tale. For the better efficiency of offices and a quieter city it would be a good thing if employers would take some interest in their Chinese staffs' night occupations. A few dismissals would have a good moral effect. Further than that residents must look to the police to help them. It cannot too often be laid down that noise, at night particularly, is a a public enemy.

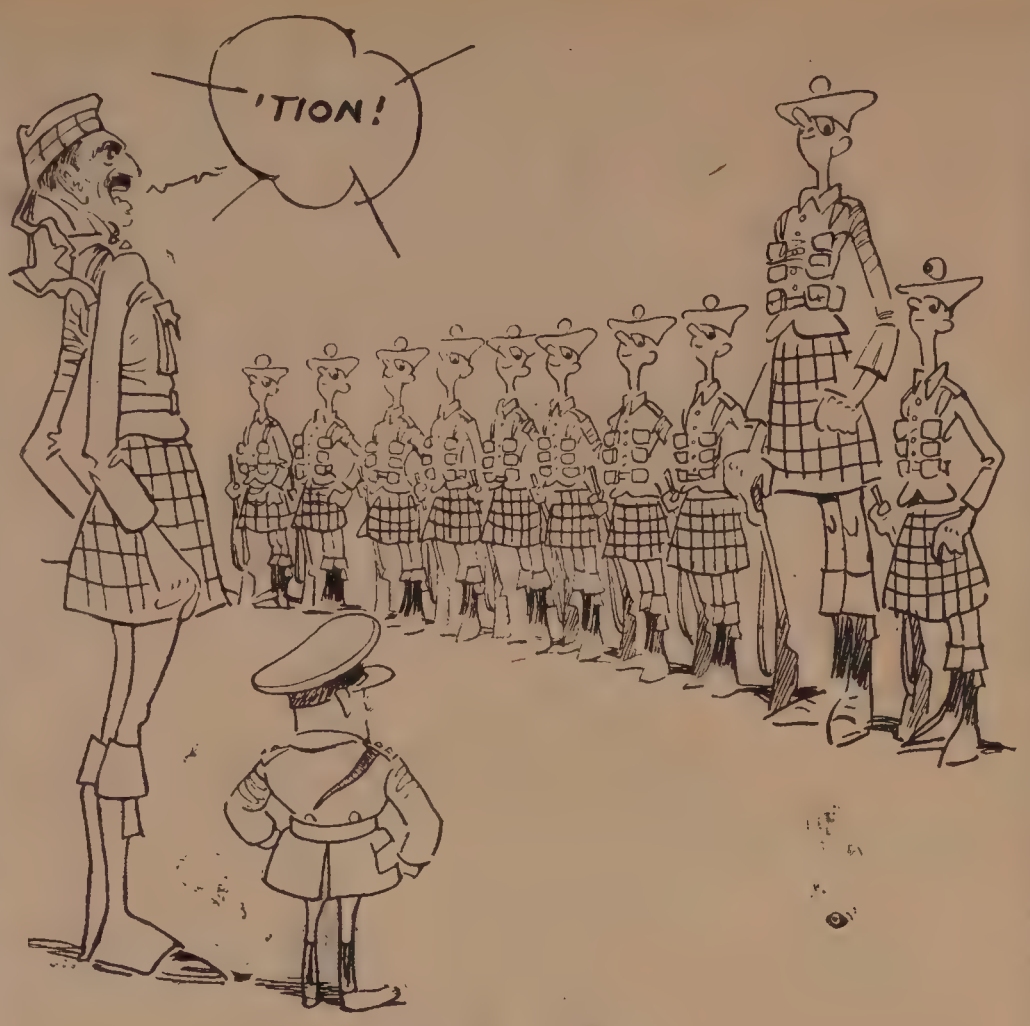
It is not impossible that much of this comment applies with equal strength to Shanghai. Especially, however (while it is no business of ours or of anybody else what other people do at night) it is to be hoped that the police will do something to stop the blatant sounding of motor horns which goes on all night in some districts and streets, and which is as incessant as unnecessary and annoying.

A Word for the S. V. C.

It is in times such as the present that we should feel appreciative of the services rendered by the Shanghai Volunteer Corps, perhaps even more so than if they were engaged in turning back hordes of hopeless refugees or by armed force resisting an invasion of the Settlement. In most of us there yet remains sufficient of the instinct of our primitive ancestors —something quite distinct from "patriotism"—to produce a measure of contentment at the thought of handling a rifle and bayonet, or even lying in a trench sniping an enemy on the verge of invisibility. That, however, is not all the soldier's work. Many who had their first taste of soldiering during the Great War will remember to the end of their days the monotonous hours of barrack-square drill, the fatigues, and the sentry duties—especially the latter, when a man marches back and forth in front of a perfectly valueless piece of property hundreds of miles away from the front and breathes maledictions on the big men who insist on such details. Yet they are a necessity, as any man who has been a soldier, and who has the gift of reasoning, will admit. Then there may be a long and nerve-torturing wait at a concentration camp before going into the line. These are the duties our Volunteers are performing just now, apparently useless but actually necessary, and intensely boring in any circumstances. Think of a young jockey who rode through eight hard races on Saturday and immediatedly after changing into uniform went out to do his trick of sentry-go in front of the Race Club stables. That we have 1,000 young fellows ready and willing to do such work in addition to their ordinary work is something of which the Settlement may be proud. Incidentally it is not only the young men who are doing this work. There may be taipans who forbid their juniors to join up. But there are other taipans and seniors in business houses now in khaki and doing all and even more than most.

Cruelty to Ponies

In England to-day regrets are frequently expressed at the disappearance of the horse from our streets, to give way to the faster but evil-smelling motor-car. On maturer thought, however, one begins to see that the eradication of old Dobbin is perhaps to his own advantage. This was struck keenly home to the mind of the writer the other day in Shanghai, when coming down Nanking Road at about 11 o'clock in the morning, he passed a carriage containing eight people,—three men, three women, and two children—in addition to the mafoo and his assistant, drawn by one miserable specimen of a China pony. The poor animal's bones were sticking out of his body, there were gall sores on his flanks and foam round his jaw. To add to his miseries, the mafoo was dealing him stinging cuts across the back to increase the pace of an already too-fast trot. To bring the matter to the notice of the police was useless, for all the police at this particular point were too busy attending to traffic direction to bother over other things. But there is one thing the Council might be persuaded to do, and that is, to limit the number of people who may be carried in a carriage of this type to a reasonable number, easing the ponies' burdens at least a little. In most of the big towns in Europe this is done in respect of taxi-cabs, and surely what can be done for a car can be done for a horse. Possibly some such order is now in force; if so the police should see that it is strictly applied. The S.S.P.C.A. can do, and are doing, a good deal, but they cannot be everywhere at once, whereas it is literally true to state that the police can, and are.



THE LUCKY PENNY
But What an Unlucky Moment for it to Appear!

Protecting the Birds

Once again there is cause for rejoicing over the fact that Shanghai is so essentially a sporting community that it is difficult to find any gathering, whatever its main purpose, in which sportsmen are not in the majority. The sportsmen on the Municipal Council again have taken a firm stand with regard to the indiscriminate slaughter of pheasants and they deserve all congratulations. Perhaps it may seem strange for a newspaper one day to urge the thinning-out of one species of feathered life and the next be strong in advocacy of the protection of another species. But crows are over-plentiful: pheasants are not. The Chinese Market Stallholders Association, the members of which of course are interested in the pheasant only as a dead and saleable bird, pleaded with the Municipal Council to remove the four-year-old restriction on the sale of hen pheasants, arguing that hens now are numerous but cocks are scarce. That assertion might impress people who would not know the difference between a pheasant and a teal except by the taste, or a pointer and a setter unless they could remember which had a long coat, but there are sportsmen on the Council, hence the very neat and all-sufficient reply:—"If the hen birds are numerous, there can be reasonable expectation that there will soon be a sufficiency of cock birds, bpt if hen birds also become scarce, there will be neither cocks nor hens to come to market." The only thing that remained to be done the Council has done—to publish again the notification prohibiting the sale of hen pheasants or of pheasants denuded of their feathers.

The Brass Band

The Chinese brass band, a product of modern China, has come to play a prominant part in the Flowery Republic of to-day. Its omnipresence in Shanghai, especially during the present autumn sales, is perhaps a little degrading to so high an art, but only goes to show the much lamented trend towards a commercialization of art. The frequent presence of a brass band in the rendering of up-to-date funeral rites, however, strikes the Western observer with a slight sense of inappropriateness, though this is doubtless a lack of appreciation on our part. One cannot help feeling nevertheless that the older Chinese rites with their strange instruments of solemn tone were more truly in keeping with the gravity of such an occasion. The Chinese interpretation of Western music is indeed a strange if not distorted one. Perhaps the foreigner is apt to judge too much by his own standards. What to him is commonplace or even hackneyed comes to the Celestial with all its one-time freshness. The celebrated band of the late President Yuan Shih-kai is reputed to have on one occasion presided at a wedding and to have struck up the then popular air of "Everybody's doing it." On another occasion in Amoy when at a funeral, a Chinese band was heard to play a music hall song of which the words with singular appropriateness were recalled as:—"You won't get them up in the morning." A little discrimination on the part of the Chinese band master would probably be a great advantage, but it is more likely than not that his passive audience would prefer things to remain as they are.

Russians and the S.V.C.

One or two suggestions have been heard recently that some of the Russians in Shanghai might now join up with the S.V.C. and take a share in the defence of the Settlements. Judging from letters which we publish to-day it is not particularly easy for ex-service men of any nationality to join up for the present emergency, whatever their previous war experience may have been. (We hasten to say that we are merely taking the side of the question which these letters present; we have not heard what the other may be.) As regards the Russians, it is only fair to recall that a little more than two years ago the suggestion was made to Colonel Marr Johnson by a leading member of the Russian refugees, that he should take in enough Russian ex-soldiers to form a Russian company in the S.V.C., in which many of the refugees were very keen on serving. For various reasons this idea was not feasible, but Colonel Marr Johnson was, we are told, quite in approval of enrolling qualified Russians in existing units of the Corps. The question went before the Municipal Council, but was rejected by them owing to the possible danger of political complications, as all the Russians who would have joined up were Whites. However, this story shows that if there are no Russians in the S.V.C. to-day, it is not for want of inclination on their part.

New Views for Old

We must make a short reply to the long letter we received to-day from Mr. J. C. E. Rye, if only because he has so strangely misread the leading article of August 12 last, with which he deals in this letter. For example, he says:—

"You point out that in the French Revolution the bourgeois were not molested to the same extent as the bourgeois in Russia have been."

This is exactly the opposite to what we did say. We referred Mr. Rye to the story of Carrier's noyades at Nantes as one illustration that the bourgeois in the French Revolution, just like the bourgeois in the Russian Revolution, suffered really more than the aristocrats. In passing, Mr. Rye's assertion that there was practically no bourgeoisie in the days of the French Revolution is simply inaccurate. Later on he tells us that we recommended him to read a book on "The Persecution of the Russian Church." This is quite wrong. The book we recommended him to read was "A Prisoner of the Reds", which gives an exact account (fully substantiated by other information) of the murder of the Tsar, his wife and children. Mr. Rye's ingenious theory that the murderers of the Imperial Family were not Bolsheviks, but the former ministers of the Tsarist régime, reminds us of the witty comment on books written nowadays to show who was responsible for the Great War in Europe, that they find it necessary to go back to the Hundred Days War, which is historically scientific but practically unconvincing. For less agile minds, the plain fact is that the Bolsheviks murdered the Tsar (with peculiar brutality) because they were afraid that while he lived he might prove a rallying-point of revolution against themselves. In respect of Mr. Rye's informants as to the state of affairs in Russia, we learn now that they are men who "all say, 'Leave the Russian Republic or confederation of Republics alone and the Bolsheviks will play the game to us.'" May we not reasonably say from this that they were men with some prejudice in favour of Bolshevism? If so, we repeat our former question, why should Mr. Rye's information about affairs in Russia be better than ours, neither of us having been there? May we conclude with one brief quotation from our previous article:

"There are, to say the least, very strong reasons for believing that that government (i.e., the Soviet) practises treachery and deceit as the first weapons of statecraft, and that, so far from being impressed by the sincerity and frankness of others who try to deal evenly with it, it merely congratulates itself that the gods of Bolshevism have delivered such transparent fools into its hands. A government which does that sort of thing is morally a bad government, which it behoves others to keep at arm's length."

Mr. Rye has apparently nothing to say to this argument. Possibly he may feel that the facts are too strong for him.

The Phantom Roadmakers

The "Chinese Economic Bulletin" has been giving some more publicity to the notorious National Road Construction Association, which, it is stated "has recently decided to raise a fund of $600,000 for the construction of an office building in Shanghai, which, according to plan, will have an assembly hall, a library, and a museum." It is fairly safe to assume that the association has not succeeded in establishing itself very firmly in the affections of the people, for it must be more than a year ago that we drew attention to a special appeal sent out broadcast and asking for funds wherewith to build comfortable headquarters for the phantom roadmakers, such to include a dining room and all the other appointments of a club. If they still are short of $600,000, with trade thoroughly demoralized, it is most unlikely that they will get even $600. But, assuming even that the fund could be raised, if the association is genuinely interested in the building of necessary roads, why waste $600,000 on a clubhouse? There is not a road running out of Shanghai much longer than about 25 miles and not one of them is in more than moderate condition. If the persistence of the National Road Construction Association, its obvious appreciation of comforts, its liberal ideas of finance, and the energy it displays in writing letters and pamphlets were concentrated on the actual building and repair of roads, it would achieve things of which it might be proud, but it is impossible not to ridicule a "construction" association that never has done a single thing in the way of building and yet in times of war and general trade depression asks for over half a million dollars for a club house.

Our "Specials"

While, at the present time, practically everybody in Shanghai knows that our local Volunteer Corps is being held in a state of mobilization, ready to be used in any emergency that may arise, and an appreciation of what the Volunteers really stand for cannot but have dawned fully on everyone, there is one section of Shanghai's reserve defence forces—albeit a small one—which has come in for little, if any notice. We refer to the Municipal Police Reserves, more commonly known as the "Specials," a body of Shanghai's citizens between 100 and 150 strong who, in these days of war and wild rumours, are being held in readiness to supplement the regular police in any manner in which their services may be called upon. As with the Volunteer Corps, the "Specials" are in a state of mobilization, and the manner in which they have done their work in "peace" time, without kudos and practically without notice, leaves no doubt that they will constitute worthy assistants to the real policemen in any trouble that may come Shanghai's way. It may not generally be known that even in "peace" times, members of the Police Reserve are on duty in some part of the Settlement practically every night; they perform valuable patrol duties in the outlying districts, and even if they do not frequently meet with excitement, they perform duties which have to be done by somebody, and perform them well. The "Specials" have carried out a great deal of search party work and their efforts in this direction especially have been productive of excellent results as regards the seizure of lethal weapons; while as indicative of the danger they occasional run into we need mention only the serious wounding last year of Mr. Rebsamen, who was shot by a robber whose motor car had been stopped for its occupants to be searched. We appreciate what our Volunteers are doing for us at the present time, and what they are prepared to do for us;—let us also realize and appreciate the not unimportant part in the maintenance of law and order in Shanghai which is played by that efficient, unostentatious body, the Municipal Police Reserves.

THE second party of Russian refugees to leave Harbin to settle in Canada consists of 40 families, altogether 168 persons. The third party is now being registered and will leave in about a month's time.

NEWS FROM THE OUTPORTS

WHEN LU YUNG-HSIANG WAS DRIVEN FROM CHEKIANG

The Province a Prey to Leaderless Soldiers and Rivals for the Tuchunship: Press-Gang Seizing Civilians to Help Flight

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Yenchow, Chê., Sept. 20.

Last Wednesday, as the day was declining there swept over this town and district fear and dread. News came to hand that the Fukien troops were already in possession of the town of Kiangshan, on the Fukien border, while the town and county of Changshan had surrendered to the army besieging it from the province of Kiangsi. "The Chêkiang army has been defeated and are fleeing in all directions to Hangchow," were the words on every tongue.

Fearing the "spoiler" would fall upon the town at any moment, hurried preparations were made to flee to the country. The city mandarin, with all his retinue and secretariat, set the pace of the panic. In the space of a few hours all that remained at the official headquarters was a doorkeeper and a few mangy dogs. A proclamation was posted exhorting the people "to be perfectly quiet and on no account to be uneasy." Before daylight most of the women and children had reached some home in the hills for refuge.

Soldiers' Wild Retreat.

By 3 a.m. on Thursday morning, the first boats appeared coming down stream from Lanche. They were crowded with retreating soldiers. Before noon, some 200 large and small river craft had been counted. The military hydroplane was having a busy time flying up and down stream on its scouting activities and largely added to the excitement of the débacle.

The press-gang was busy apprehending civilians who showed the smallest promise of being able to put a little more weight to the oars. If an extra boat was needed, and one was in sight, it was forthwith commandeered. If an extra boatman were needed, a soldier's belt went round his neck and he was pulled off before his weeping wife and children who were left to shift for themselves as best they could. On several occasions blank cartridges were fired to instil fear and submission. During the whole of Thursday and Friday, Yenchow was like the city of the dead and, for the most part, "straitly shut up."

As the fleet of boats passed by, only a few were allowed to tie up to allow the men to make some necessary purchases. At some shops the rush was so great that "mob law" prevailed and the men helped themselves and just paid what they thought fit. Lanche, I understand, suffered much more severely, in this respect, than did the shopkeepers of Yenchow. Where officers were in evidence, there was some semblance of authority. Some men who were making off with a basket of chickens were called back by their superior and made to pay up for the birds.

Ghastly Stories.

No one seemed to know what had actually happened. It was evident something had gone wrong and there was wild talk on all sides. It was said that Gen. Pan was on his way to the fighting line and, on reaching Lanche, was met by the vanguard of his retreating army. The 7th. and 8th. Divisions, it is whispered, surrendered to the enemy and well nigh decimated the 3rd. Division in going over. There is no doubt about the 3rd. Division having suffered heavy losses.

Stragglers are still passing through and in conversation with one and another some gruesome stories are gleaned. A party belonging to this division passed through yesterday afternoon and a weary, travel-stained lot they looked. They had only a part of their accoutrement and some of them had only a vest and a pair of trousers to call their own. It appears that their company had been in action from early morn and late in the afternoon found themselves deserted. Their officers had vanished and the rest of the detachment had long since retired. Being left to themselves they made their way back to the town of Kiangshan. Meeting with a company of Northern soldiers, attached to the Chêkiang Army, a machine gun was turned on them and many were left dead and wounded on the line of retreat.

A General Melee.

From other sources, one hears that there was scarcely three hours fighting altogether, when the general mêlée was evolved. A man in authority told me that when the armies came to close range, the Fukien troops fired blank shot which was the sign to "Talk Peace." In order to give "face" to some show of fighting, the 7th. and 8th. Divisions fired into the 3rd. Division and threw the luckless fellows on their backs. Following this there was some general skirmishing and a running fight with a hasty retreat to the river and the boats.

On Friday evening, the 19th, a wire came from Hangchow saying that Marshal Lu having "left" his post had been cashiered and that a new Governor had been appointed. People were to be comforted with the news and exhorted to carry on business as usual. This morning, however, news comes to hand that Gen. Pan is at Tonglu and a stand is to be made somewhere in the vicinity of Yenchow. We are told also that the Fukien troops may be expected to occupy the town to-morrow, having already left Lanche. We calmly wait for "to-morrow."

A CITY IN THE LINE OF RETREAT

Huchow Threatend with Three Streams of Fleeing Soldiers to Say Nothing of Bandits

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Huchow, Chê., Sept. 19.

Yesterday was a day of astonishment and anxiety. In the morning came the news that at Szean (on the western border facing Anhui) the Chêkiang soldiers were not meeting with success and a retreat was being planned. Foreigners in the city, through a friendly tip were warned and advised to get out of the city as there was a possibility that Huchow might be bombarded. The Chinese who had an inkling of this news were panic-stricken and wanted to flee with the foreigners. Various schemes were suggested including wiring for consular protection when the wires were down, the possibility of escaping in boats when there were no boats, and fleeing to the hills where bandits were reported to be in full control. The "council of war" finally reached the conclusion that as we had to remain, we would do so.

At seven o'clock in the evening 100 wounded soldiers arrived. During the confusion of admitting them to the hospital the word was received that the entire line at Changhsing-Ihsing as well as Szean was going to be given up and the retreating soldiers would reach the city within a few minutes. Steam whistles blowing outside the city warned the people of the approach of the soldiers and dull terror struck many. Word was received that the General of the Changhsing forces was on his way back to the city and that the Chamber of Commerce had appointed a committee to meet with him to pay the soldiers "travel-by" money. This word of the retreating soldiers brought up visions of looting and worse, and it was a great relief this morning to find that the first batch of soldiers had gone on past the city during the night, and the streets as quiet as usual, with the addition of a great number of armed soldiers strolling or parading through them.

The Chamber of Commerce had paid General Chen $100,000 to ensure the safe passage of the Changhsing troops without molesting the city. Large numbers passed during the night and to-day, boats are being packed with rice and baggage outside the south gate, while launches towing houseboats are making their way through the canals of the city.

After Soldiers, Outlaws

Now the people are wondering whether or not the money of the Chamber of Commerce will hold out while the Szean soldiers come through. These soldiers who have been guarding the Anhui border are composed partly of troops recruited from the rabble of Shanghai's streets and the people dread the passage of these gunmen and thugs. When these have gone by, will come the rearguard of the Changhsing outfit and then a period of no soldiers, when the thugs and bums of the city will try their hand at looting, which in turn will be followed by the advent of the Kiangsu troops. We are hoping that this will bring respite from the uncertainties which now confront us.

Work on the aviation field ceased this morning. The coolies went out as usual early, but after half an hour they shouldered their implements and made their way back into the city.

Except for a few people moving out to the country in sedan chairs and a smaller number of people on the streets, with a few more soldiers than usual, everything seems quite ordinary.

Later.

It has been ascertained that the soldiers are going on to Kashing. It is reported that Sungkiang will be the next point to be defended by these Changhsing forces.

PEITAIHO IN A PANIC

Wu Pei-fu's Troops Pouring Past in Thousands to Keep Out Chang Tso-lin

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

Peitaiho, Sept. 15.

There has been a great exodus from this place as a result of war and war rumours. Incidentally it seems to me that many foreigners get the wind up as badly as Chinese and are just as gullible with silly yao yen or "floating words." Surely there is still a pride of race left in us to check such weakness.

There are probably still nearly 100 folk here enjoying the absolute perfection of this climate and surroundings. Unfortunately it will be rather difficult to remain here in comfort much longer for the shops are closing and the railway to the beach will shortly finish for the season.

Vast quantities of troops are being pushed through. It is said authoritatively that 26 troop trains passed through in 24 hours—that is "some doing." 50,000 of Wu Pei-fu's troops are en route for this place and the neighbourhood. They are debouching from the railway at all kinds of intermediate places and disappearing into the mountains to hold all the passes and thus prevent Chang Tso-lin getting through. Chang has stopped all rail traffic through from the Wall northwards by tearing up the line but he has not destroyed any bridges. The repairs can be quickly fixed so that if he is victorious he will have a through run to Peking.

No fighting has yet begun here: it looks as if it will be at least another 10 days or more before the men are in position to get at each other. The common rumour has it that it is to be a fight to a finish this time. Some local Chinese with whom I have talked are very certain that when it is over Chang Tso-lin will be quietly sheltered in his mansion in Port Arthur supported from penury and want by the little nest egg of the few million which again common report has it he has laid in the Japanese banks there.

The Shanghai fighting will be a mere fleabite compared with what will happen up here when it once starts. Probably Szechuan and Hunan will also get moving. The Russians will also have their opportunity with the C.E.R. which in turn may bring in the Japanese. Altogether there are all the ingredients for a very spectacular mix-up.

SOUTHERN CHEKIANG AND THE WAR

Disposition to Meet Fukienese Invader: No Appetite for the Conflict

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wenchow, Chê., Sept. 18.

A strategic point on the Chêkiang border was occupied by the Fukien troops under Gen. Sun Ch'uan-fang to their great advantage. It was hoped that this would be the position to be occupied by the first line of defence of the Chêkiang troops, but Fukien got there first. Three lines of defence have been taken by the troops in this district. The first on the south bank of the river at Pingyanghsien, the second on the Flying Cloud river, on the south bank across from Juian city, and the third about 33 li from Wenchow on the main canal joining Wenchow and Juian. The number of soldiers on the three lines is, however, very few, probably not numbering more than 1,500 altogether and the opposing force is no greater. There has been no battle up to the present.

The main part of the Fukien army has gone northwest to join issue with the Kiangsi troops and they have crossed the border of Chêkiang in three places; at Taishun on the way to Kingning, at Fuling or Pucheng on the way to Lungchuan and from the Kiangsi border towards Chuchowfu (衢州). Whether the object of the Fukien troops, who are on the way to Lungchuan, is to come northeast on the way to Chuchow (處州) and thence to Wenchow or to turn north to join the Kiangsi troops, is not known yet; the former is considered the most likely.

Beyond a small number of gendarmerie, Wenchow city is without defenders. If the Fukien troops break through the three lines of defence the local officials have decided to give a gracious welcome to the new military officials.

War Chest Contributions

Sept. 19.

$15,000 was contributed by Wenchow to the Chêkiang war chest 10 days ago. Yesterday a further request for $30,000 was considered by the city fathers. It was decided to offer $15,000 now and another $15,000 in a month. News is just to hand that Lungchuan has been taken by the Fukien troops. But this must be received with a certain amount of reserve. News is also to hand that the Kiangsi troops are in possession of Chuchowfu (衢州) but this also has not been confirmed; and the Chêkiang troops retiring to Kinhua.

There is a good deal of dissatisfaction felt in the south of Chêkiang in regard to Marshal Lu. He is not a Chêkiang man and is fighting for his own hand and the province is to suffer. The only soldiers in the south here are provincial soldiers, none of the national army has been sent to offer any resistance to Fukien. By joining the Chihli party the officials and people feel that the province may be saved from the horrors of war. It seems not unlikely therefore that the southern part of Chêkiang will throw in its lot with the Chihli party at no distant date.

Lu's Expulsion Well Received.

Sept. 20.

From a state bordering on panic, the people of Wenchow were yesterday lifted to a state of rejoicing. From only thinking of places of refuge for themselves, and places of security for their valuables, the minds of the people are once more turned to buying and selling and the ordinary daily tasks. About 3.30 yesterday afternoon telegraphic news came through of the political change at Hangchow, of a new provincial governor, a new tuchun and the casting forth of Marshal Lu. Chêkiang is to be saved the dire penalties of civil war and whether Marshal Lu is able to join Chang Tso-lin, taking with him the remnant of his army, or join forces with Sun Yat-sen, or retire into obscurity is of profound indifference to the majority of the people of this district.

MUKDEN NOT CONFIDENT OF SUCCESS

Ominous Collapse of Govt. Paper Money: Troops Better Trained but Disheartened

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Fakumen, Man., Sept. 12.

Soldiers have been pouring into Mukden from all quarters, on their way to the neighbourhood of the Great Wall and the Jehol border. An ominous precaution against desertion or treachery is the bringing together of the wives and families of the officers into one of the big Mukden camps. The garrison of Fakumen has gone south.

A few days ago the foreign Consuls were invited to meet Marshal Chang, in order to hear a statement from him on the present situation. That naive way of declaring war was also resorted to in 1922. A war would seem to be a losing game for Manchuria. The most obvious indication of this is the collapse of the paper dollars issued by the Government Bank. Even when Fengtien was defeated two years ago, the local "small coin" paper did not sink so low in comparison with Mexican dollars, as it has done during recent days. The decline continues. No one can safely prophesy when the slump will be arrested. Earlier in the year, speculative brokers in Mukden succeeded by their operations in bringing down the paper dollar to a low value. At that time drastic measures, closing a number of the smaller exchange shops and threatening to decapitate refractory dealers, brought the Manchurian currency back to something like a normal rate.

Why Marshal Chang does not resort to similar procedure just now, we cannot tell. There is still the possibility that when the Marshal has time to turn his attention to this aspect of the crisis, he may succeed as before in stopping the riot. On the other hand, if what is happening is the result of panic, then the patient Chinese people may be beginning to lose faith in the mighty satrap. By a partly instinctive apprehension, the people may have come to realize that their capable ruler cannot win.

Christian General Feared.

That is one shadow of coming events. The other is even more clear. It is the name and fame of Feng Yu-hsiang and his soldiers. The defeat of 1922 was their doing. The men of Manchuria, improved in training though they undoubtedly have been, are no match for General Feng's disciplined cohorts. The latter carry with them the glory of past success, while the former start with the handicap of unredeemed failure.

If Marshal Chang, curbing the ardour of his younger subordinates, would adopt the tactics of Fabius Cunetator, the result might be very different from that of a pitched battle. Along the Jehol border the Chihli army has no railways and only a limited supply of motor-cars. Fengtien has the railway to Tungliaohsien and now the recently built extension westward from the Peking-Mukden line to Hsinlitun, as well as the branch line to the coal mine at Patapao, further south.

Harvests Affected by Floods

Although the harvest generally has been good in these western regions, there have been severe floods specially in Tungliaohsien. That city, near the border of the enemy's country, at the end of the branch railway of the Szupingkai-Taonanfu line, was practically levelled to the ground by the rise of the Liao River.

Apart from sporadic raids by small parties of brigands, the country has been peaceful. As any bad character can buy a military uniform from the tailor, it follows that midnight visitors to a farmhouse, armed and got up like soldiers, can rely on their appearance protecting them to some extent from resistance.

AMERICAN architects paid a tribute to the genius of Sir Christopher Wren when a tablet was unveiled at St. Paul's Cathedral inscribed as follows:—"In recognition of the inspiration and enduring influence upon American architecture of the work of Sir Christopher Wren, this tablet is inscribed by the Architectural League of New York."

PEKING MENACED BY AEROPLANES

Solemn Representations Made by Diplomatic Body to Marshal Chang

Peking, Sept. 25.

After a meeting of the Diplomatic Corps, which did not however include M. Karakhan, the Soviet Plenipotentiary, the following memorandum was sent to the Waichiaopu and Marshal Chang Tso-lin this afternoon by M. Oudendijk, the Netherlands Minister:—"The outbreak of hostilities in China makes it probable that commanders of the various military forces will make extensive use of aircraft in the conduct of their campaigns. The Heads of the Legations in Peking, although resolved not to interfere in any way in this regrettable conflict, nevertheless deem it necessary to point out to your Excellency that they view with the gravest concern the use of this weapon against other objectives than military forces in the field, fortified places or naval units.

"Dropping bombs from aeroplanes on undefended towns is not only an act of wanton destruction, but a crime against the peaceful population. It is a well-known fact that accuracy in dropping bombs is practically unattainable, and that any attempt to hit a given building must inevitably involve the greatest risk for all the buildings and residents in the immediate neighbourhood of the objective.

Historic Buildings.

"In the City of Peking not only are situated the Legations of friendly Powers, but its walls enclose numerous palaces, temples and other historical buildings, which are rightly considered monuments of great value in the history of civilization of mankind. The dropping of bombs from aeroplanes on towns and villages can have no possible military value, but can only cause untold misery and suffering to numbers of inoffensive non-combatants, and cause the destruction of priceless monuments, and, moreover, the lives and properties of foreign nationals, who are taking no part whatsoever in the actual conflict, and intend to maintain an absolutely neutral attitude in this domestic quarrel, will be put to grave and constant danger.

A Solemn Appeal.

"For these reasons the Heads of the Legations feel it their duty to make this appeal to your Excellency, and whilst giving expression to their satisfaction that the intention was made known to afford full protection to the lives and properties of foreigners, they trust that no air attacks will be made endangering the lives of their nationals. Should, however, foreign lives be lost, or property destroyed, as a result of attack by aeroplanes on the Capital or on any Treaty Port, they would feel obliged to hold the authority who ordered the attack strictly responsible therefor."—Reuter.

THE BREAK-UP OF THE TAIHU FRONT

From Our Own Correspondent.

Huchow, Chê., Sept. 18.

Yesterday afternoon your correspondent was taking a stroll along the main waterway which goes to Changhsing. Two launch trains passed, the second was made up of a long string of empties. To-day, four more empty launch trains have left this city headed in the same direction. In my opinion this spells but one message. The Chêkiang soldiers have come to the point where they must retreat. Owing to the fact that little effort has been made to fortify this city it is exceedingly doubtful whether or not a stand will be made at this point. Indications point to a retreat to some point farther east. A rumour heard on the streets states that this has been caused by the sttack of Fokien troops on the south border of the province. The Red Cross Society has just sent word that 100 wounded soldiers have been started to Huchow.

Yesterday at twilight and during the night distant cannon firing could be heard. Inquiry reveals that this was from the West Taihu sector. No wounded have been received in this city from that point in two days. At Szean on the Anhui border there was a small skirmish yesterday and a few casualties resulted on the Chêkiang side, three wounded being sent to Huchow by special launch. A special letter by an observer on the spot states that the little village is absolutely deserted, and the firing line is about five miles from the town. Chêkiang has several cannon in action there.

BOXER INDEMNITY

Hankow Americans' Proposal in Aid of Railway Construction

The American Chamber of Commerce of Hankow has passed a resolution in connexion with the disposition of the remitted Boxer Indemity fund. This resolution has been addressed to Dr. Paul Monroe, who was nominated by the President of the United States to decide as to the use of the fund. The resolution states:—

"We, the American Chamber of Commerce of Hankow, strongly favour the investment of the returned Boxer Indemnity funds in some enterprise which in itself will benefit the Chinese public as a whole, and at the same time serve to create a permanent foundation, the income from which may be devoted to educational and cultural purposes. We do not favour the dissipation of the principal of the funds by direct expenditure in educational work. Since the Szechuan-Hankow Railway is the only Chinese line under construction in which Americans are financially interested, we believe the Boxer funds should be invested in continuing the construction of this railway. Careful provision should be made for American supervision of the original expenditure of the funds and the future operation of this railway to the end that the income from the foundation be assured as a permanent endowment for educational cultural purposes."

It may be pointed out that the suggestion embodied in the above resolution is identical with that put forward by Sir Robert Ho Tung in an interview with a "North-China Daily News" representative prior to his departure for Europe.

LIEUT. DOISY'S NEXT FLIGHT

The impressions of Lieut. Doisy, hero of the great flight from Paris to the Far East, of his trip as gathered from passengers who had been in daily companionship with him on board the Porthos on which he travelled home, were published in the "Soleil de Marseilles." Doisy considers that the most difficult stage in the whole journey was that between Paris and Bucharest owing to the rain, snow, and mist, and the difficulty of picking out landmarks in the flooded areas of Hungary. The Bangkok-Saigon stage was also extremely trying owing to the great heat, heavy storms, and the necessity for flying at a high altitude, while the heat they suffered during the flight from Shanghai to Peking was almost more than they could endure. He has some very ironical comments to make on Chinese officialdom, as he was able to see it when the petty jealousy of the Governor of a province came near to putting an end to his great venture. At all other points the warmth of the reception accorded to him and his mechanic exceeded anything they had imagined. They were loaded with honours and valuable souvenirs. As to the lessons to be learned from his trip, Doisy says that it has conclusively demonstrated that regular non-stop flights can be safely made over at least twice the distance considered possible a year ago, and, further, that France possesses air material which is good enough to permit the establishment of regular communications by air with her most distant colonies. After resting awhile on his return to France, Lieut. Doisy proposes to plan an extensive flight over Africa.

OLDEST BEETLE IN THE WORLD

Chinese Scientist's Amazing Find in Shantung

From Our Own Correspondent.

Peking, Sept. 18.

Amid the hubbub of war's alarums, the Geological Survey has just closed a very interesting exhibit of some its recent finds, which the excitement of the times has not allowed to be sufficiently appreciated.

The outstanding specimen, which will be the cause of keen discussion in scientific circles the world over, was the ancient Scarabæid, the oldest beetle of its kind in the world. It has been named Proteroscarabæus yeni—for two reasons. It is the primogenitor of all the scarabs ever to be found up to this time, hence Proterscarabæus; and is therefore important enough also to mark the Survey's sense of appreciation to the encouragement of its work by Dr. W. W. Yen; hence yeni.

The finding of the oldest scarab in the world is due to Mr. H. C. T'an, one of the geologists attached to the Survey. He is also responsible for the collection of other fossils which were exhibited with the scarab. Their home is the coast of Shantung, in the mapping of the geological formation of which Mr. T'an has given much of his time in recent months. The geologist did not make his discoveries until he had accomplished a good deal of this task. While outlining the geological structure of the region, he had carefully examined the rocks in the hope that he might bring to light some evidence of the ancient life which was as abundant in the river beds millions of years ago as it is to-day. Beyond the recent discoveries of Mr. Roy Chapman Andrews in Mongolia, archaeological exploration of China has contributed nothing to our knowledge of Cretaceous period of the earth's history.

A Beetle 15,000,000 Years Old

15,000,000 Years Old Fish

With the patience of the true scientist, Mr. T'an examined rock after rock with his geological hammer for some sign of a fossil. He knew that remains of millennium old land life and fresh water life are sometimes found embedded in the rocks formed by the hardening through aeons of years of the river sands and muds, and so he kept to his task until fortune rewarded his industry and application by exposing before his view a complete specimen of a fish. According to the authorities of the Geological Survey, this skeleton is perfect, which is amazing when they add the information that it existed some 15,000,000 years ago. It is said to overshadow in importance a similar discovery in China which is now housed in the British Museum and which has been given the name Lycopters sinensis.

This was the first find. Fired with the enthusiasm which the completeness of this discovery aroused in him, Mr. T'an devoted many days to a thorough examination of all the rocks in the vicinity of the first fossil, and finally laid bare a profusion of the fish and plant life of a period millions of years ago. All the fossils were found in an astounding state of completion, and altogether enabled the Survey to determine the age of the formations as Lower Cretaceous, a formation hitherto unknown in China. Mr. T'an in the words of Professor A. W. Grabau, of the Survey, was able to "put the Cretaceous on the geological map of China."

Beetle Once and Always.

Almost Mr. T'an's last discovery was the scarab. Of all the palaeontological treasures unearthed, this is stated to be the prize of the collection. Mr. T'an found it spread on a shale slab, after he had removed a top layer of clay, almost with the perfection of life, but flattened by pressure. About fifteen million years ago it was a beetle, just like the beetles with which we are familiar to-day. There has been little or no change in succeeding beetles, but out of respect for its hoary ago, it has been given a distinctive name. Proteroscarabæus yeni.

JAPANESE ADVISER FOR MARSHAL WU

Appointment has no Connexions with Present Civil War: but its Results

Peking, Sept. 24.

In compliance with Marshal Wu Pei-fu's request, Lieut.-General Banzai, Japanese military adviser to the Presidential Office, is alleged to have agreed to become his adviser in addition to his present post. In this connexion, General Banzai states in part:—

"The fact that I have become an adviser to Marshal Wu Pei-fu may, perhaps, give rise to conjecture that I have something to do with the present Chihli-Fengtien war. but in reality, I have no intention whatever to interfere in the internal disturbances in this country. I have complied with Marshal Wu's request, simply because he is desirous to have my views in order to meet eventualities that may arise in connexion with the Manchurian question at the conclusion of the war. I shall feel quite satisfied, therefore, if my service as an adviser to Marshal Wu should contribute in any way toward the furtherance of the friendly relations of China and Japan. I am not yet in a position to foretell what will be the outcome of the present war between Chihli and Fengtien."—Eastern News Agency.

$1,000 DONATION TO FLOOD RELIEF

Another Handsome Chinese Gift: Soviet Russia About to Raise Funds?

Sept. 26.

To-day Mr. Kuo Chuin-yu, former Minister of State under the Manchus and prominent Chinese resident of Peking is 70 years old. His three sons had planned a fitting birthday celebration with theatricals and the entertaining of many guests, but it will not take place. Instead, Mr. Kuo has given $1,000 for the relief of the flood sufferers.

The Commission has just received a letter from Mr. Li Chia-ao, the Chinese Ambassador in Moscow to the effect that the Russian Government has organized a committee to raise funds for the flood sufferers of China.

The relief committee in Weihaiwei has voted $3,000 for flood relief, telegraphs Mr. W. E. Southcott, acting Vice-Chairman of the China International Famine Relief Commission.—China International Famine Relief Commission.

MISSIONARIES OUTWARD BOUND

London, Sept. 18.

A gathering at Westminster tonight bade farewell to 18 men and women who are leaving to take up missionary work in India, Burma, China and Canada on behalf of the Bible Churchmen's Society, which has existed less than three years. This is the first party of missionaries it is sending abroad.—Reuter.

Peking is also facing a scarcity of foodstuffs. It is said that since the outbreak of the Kiangsu-Chêkiang war no rice has been transported to the Capital from the south, while owing to the currency and bond trouble during the Mid-Autumn Festival most of the local rice shops have been unable to order rice from outports. As the result of the late flood in Honan, a flour-producing province, no flour has been sent to the North.

BLACK PRESS LAW IN PEKING

Unlimited Powers for Police to Suppress all Publication Government Dislikes

When it was proposed in Shanghai that newspapers register with the Shanghai Municipal Council, the Chinese press of the city passed resolutions, published full-page advertisements and in other ways expressed their annoyance. Now comes the Peking Government with a revival of Yuan Shih-kai's press law, one of the darkest documents in the history of journalism. This law was promulgated on April 2, 1914, when Yuan Shih-kai was worried about the popular outcry against his political activities. Its revival now can only be taken as an indication the Government in Peking fears the press and popular opposition and as evidence of weakness.

Art. 10 of the press Law states:

"A newspaper will not be allowed to publish matters of the following nature:

(a) Articles against the present form of government.
(b) Articles tending to cause a breach of the peace and good order.
(c) Articles endangering morals.
(d) Articles containing secrets of diplomatic and military affairs and relating to the administration.

Unlimited Limitations.

In a word, the Chinese press is forbidden to publish the news of the day. Practically all war news during the present conflict could be interdicted under one of these clauses. Practically any editorial opinion except fulsome praise would bring the editor to gaol. The judge of the rightness of a story is the local police, and this does not apply only to newspapers, which can make a correction within 48 hours, but to periodicals, weeklies, papers issued every 10 days, monthlies and annuals, as well.

The Police, under this law, are entitled to know not only the name and address of the paper, the nationality of the proprietor, but also the names, ages, native places, biographies and addresses of the manager, the editor and the printer. In short, if the police decide that all Fengtien or Chêkiang natives are under suspicion, they can haul up an editor before the Procurator, simply because he happened to have been born in Kashing instead of in Sungkiang. To make certain that they get the fines after they have bludgeoned an editor into supporting their cause, newspapers have to deposit from $100 to $350 with the police, 20 days prior to publication. Newspapers published in Peking and the Treaty Ports have to double the deposit.

Police Powers Absolute.

No trial before a court is provided under this law. Police inspectors in charge of districts are authorized to fine editors and stop the publication of newspapers on their own responsibility and according to their lights. The inquisition of the police is far-reaching. The person giving the newspaper objectionable news may be fined and if the news was published for a consideration, the payer of the bribe is liable to a heavy fine, not exceeding $200. The distributors and newsboys may also be fined for selling the paper.

It is difficult to conceive that the modern vernacular press will submit to this outrageous law, revived to suppress the publication of war news. It has been a surprise that they have submitted to the censorship of the press at Shanghai Post Office as well as in other offices within the war zone. Several newspaper issues were suppressed at the local Post Office and it is safe to believe that others were suppressed in other places. One can understand that in a war involving national interests between two nations fighting a life and death struggle for existence, that every care has to be taken to prevent information from reaching the enemy. But that is unnecessary and impossible here. In a private war, between private individuals, in no way involving the whole nation, with the Foreign Powers all acting as China's friends, such suppression of news can only be regarded as tyranny.

In reply to a telegram from Marshal Chang Tso-lin, (says the Chinese press) the French Chargé d'Affairs at Peking telegraphed on September 21, stating that he has not been negotiating on the gold francs question, and that he will gladly appoint a Consul to Mukden.

DR. SUN'S NORTHERN EXPEDITION

Chief of Merchant Volunteers Said to Have Declared His Submission

Canton, Sept. 19.

Dr. Ma Soo, Dr. Sun Yat-sen's former agent in the United States who is now in Canton, issues the following: "Hongkong rumours that Dr. Sun Yat-sen is now at Yingtak and unable to reach Shaokuan and that fire destroyed all the barracks at Shaokuan are both absolutely untrue. I am in constant touch with Dr. Sun in Shaokuan. The Railway Director verifies the statement that Dr. Sun has 10,000 troops in Shaokuan.

Mr. Chan Lim-pak, head of the Merchant Volunteer movement, has issued a circular telegram, in conformity with the arrangement arrived at between the Volunteers and the authorities for the return of the rifles seized by the latter, in which Mr. Chan says in part: "I solemnly declare my allegiance to Dr. Sun Yat-sen. I give him my sincere support, as is the duty of every citizen. I trust that the Generalissimo's magnanimity and leniency will forgive my past errors."

Dr. Sun Yat-sen has ordered the withdrawal of his troops from the East River and the raising of the siege of Waichow, "thus offering General Chen Chiung-ming an opportunity to show his 'repentance' by marching on Fukien."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Trying to Raise Money from Canton Merchants

Canton, Sept. 21.

In order to raise military funds, Dr. Sun has requested the General Chamber of Commerce here to grant him a loan of $1,000,000 in cash, as well as to take up $2,000,000 worth of bonds. The General Chamber of Commerce has agreed to a payment of $500,000.

Simultaneously with his departure for Shaokwan, Dr. Sun earnestly requested General Chen Chiung-ming and his party to attack Chêkiang in order to render assistance to Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang, now driven from Chêkiang, while he also ordered the Constitutionalist troops stationed in the district of the East River to retreat as far as Sheklung.

Some 500 troops of the Workmen's Volunteer Corps and the Farmer's Self-protection Corps, by order of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, went to Shaokwan last night to join the expeditionary ofrces against the North|—Eastern News Agency.

Said to Have Been Recalled to Canton by Threat of Chen Chiung-ming

A Canton report states that General Li Lien-chun has made up his differences with Dr. Sun Yat-sen and has taken his post on the staff. General Li is recognized as the best military man associated with Dr. Sun. It is probable that his active interest in any campaign against Kiangsi Province, of which he was at one time the Military Governor, has something to do with his decision not to come to Shanghai.

Canton, Sept. 23.

The movements of Dr. Sun's expeditionary forces, since their concentration in Shaokuan, have been kept strictly secret, but according to investigations made by a representative of the Eastern News Agency, some 2,000 Kuangsu troops headed by General Li Ming-yang have already advanced as far as the border of Kiangsi Province as the vanguard of the expeditionary forces against the North, while some 4,000 troops commanded by General Chu Pei-teh under the direct control of the Canton Government have been concentrated in the district between Shihshing and Lochang.

About 4,000 Honan troops under the command of General Fan Chung-shiu are stationed in the vicinity of Shaokuan. The temporary General Headquarters at Shaokuan are being guarded by the troops under General Wu Tieh-chêng. It appears, however, that the recent sudden change in the situation between Kiangsu and Chêkiang and the activities on the part of all the troops belonging to General Chen Chiung-ming's faction coupled with the shortage of military funds, have caused the scheme for the despatch of the expeditionary forces against the North to come to grief. Rumour is rife that Dr. Sun will shortly return to Canton, postponing his expedition.

A DECISIVE BATTLE IN THE SOUTH

Both Sides Busy with Preparations: Gen. Chen Concentrating on Canton

Canton, Sept. 18.

That General Chen Chiung-ming is making his way back to the Kuangtung capital has been confirmed by the Kuomintang Government in Canton. The Kuomintang organs, however, deny the success of General Chen's forces.

So far, no extensive military operations along the East River districts in Kuangtung are imminent. It appears that both sides are preparing for a decisive battle. Dr. Sun's mercenaries in these districts are concentrating at Sheklung, withdrawing from Poklo and other places, and reinforcements are being despatched to Sheklung to guard aginst the possible return of General Chen.

The leading Canton merchants' organization have decided to ignore the request of the Kuomintang for $3,000,000 to enable Dr. Sun to carry out his northern expedition. The merchants say that the expedition is not of national interest but of a factional nature, one clique of militarists fighting against another. Moreover, they have submitted to sufficient oppression without subjecting themselves to another forced loan of $3,000,000.

The commandants of the Canton Volunteer Corps having circulated their telegrams supporting Dr. Sun Yat-sen, as required by the terms of settlement for the release of the arms seized by the authorities, Dr. Sun now calls for more from the volunteers before he will order the actual release of the consignment. What the Kuomintang want is the reorganization of the volunteer movement completely, under Dr. Sun's control, which would give the party a regular army without their having to support and finance it.

It is understood that the volunteers, having lost patience, have given notice that they will not submit to the continued holding of their arms any longer and will take action if the consignment is not returned soon.

The press gang in Canton has been revived.

MARSHAL CHANG AND THE SOVIET

Agreement as to the C. E. R.

Harbin, Sept. 22.

An unconfirmed report states that Marshal Chang Tso-lin has signed an agreement in Mukden to recognize the Soviet Government.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, Sept. 23.

According to a foreign report the Mukden Agreement stated to have been concluded between Marshal Chang Tso-lin and the Soviet Government relates to the Chinese Eastern Railway.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Mukden, Sept. 23.

Marshal Chang Tso-lin is quoted by a well-informed source as saying that he did not recognize the Russo-Chinese Agreement signed in Peking but his agreement with the Soviet (which recognizes that article of the Russo-Chinese Agreement relating to the Chinese Eastern Railway) was much more advantageous.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

A Favourable Agreement.

Mukden, Sept. 24.

Chinese circles here confirm the report that an agreement was duly signed on the 22nd instant between Marshal Chang Tso-lin and a Soviet delegate on the Chinese Eastern Railway question. Although the substance of the agreement is being absolutely kept secret, it is reported in well-informed quarters that it is much more favourable to Fengtien than the agreement reached in Peking between the Chinese and Soviet representatives.

MAJOR ZANNI'S NARROW ESCAPE AT HONGKONG

Aviator and Companions Upset in Harbour: Rescued after Being Given up for Lost

Hongkong, Sept. 19.

Major Zanni, the Argentine aviator, is expected to arrive in Hongkong on Saturday or Sunday. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

Hongkong, Sept. 22.

Hongkong, Sept. 24.

Major Zanni, his mechanic, Felipe Beltrame, and Senor Rouillon, the Peruvian Consul, had a narrow escape from drowning this morning in a collision in the harbour between a Government launch and the motor-boat on which the airmen were proceeding to their aeroplane to resume their flight to Foochow. Major Zanni was picked up on the point of exhaustion.

Later.

Major Zanni and his companions left Kowloon at 8.15 this morning on board a motor-boat for their aeroplane for the purpose of resuming their flight to Foochow. When off the Naval Yard, the motor-boat collided with the Government launch Victoria. The motor-boat was struck on the starboard quarter and slightly damaged. The impact caused it to heel over and Major Zanni and Senor Rouillon were thrown into the water. The mechanic jumped on board the launch.

Senor Rouillon swam, but Major Zanni disappeared and being unable to swim, was given up for lost by his companions. Another motor-boat, which was passing by, picked up the airman and also the Peruvian Consul. The launch came round and took the party on board and landed them in Kowloon.

Major Zanni lost his pocket-book containing bank-notes and a letter of credit, but recovered his chart. He retained his composure after the accident and seemed none the worse for the immersion.

The fliers hope to hop off for Foochow to-morrow morning.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE RUSSO-JAPANESE DISCUSSIONS

Some Knotty Questions Still Barring Recognition of the Soviet

Peking, Sept. 23.

As regards the Russo-Japanese negotiations Reuter's representative learns authoritatively that while agreement in principle on many points has been reached, a few subjects still present difficult and knotty problems.

The hope is expressed, however, that mutual efforts will succeed in solving these difficulties in a short space of time. Probably within the next 10 days or a fortnight, it will be seen whether or not a final agreement can be reached on these few questions, which have already been discussed on many occasions. When a conclusion is reached, Japan will accord recognition to the Soviet Government.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

MORE ANTI-FOREIGN RANCOUR

Wuchang Students' Absurd Tirade: A Chinese Philanthropist

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wuchang, Sept. 16.

The new day of National Humiliation, September 7, passed off without much note in this centre. In Hankow and Nanyang, it was practically ignored. But in Wuchang the students made a procession in the streets, and two proclamations were issued and distributed by the Students' Self-Government Associations of the Senior Schools and Junior Schools respectively.

The former proclamation read as follows:

"Beloved fellow-countrymen! You all know what kind of event we remember on the seventh day of the ninth month. In the time of the former Ching Dynasty, there was a kind of clique who called themselves Boxers. They hated the foreigners very much, and their object was to support the Ching Dynasty and to exterminate the "men from over the ocean." They put to death a few foreigners, and the latter in consternation, gathered together the forces of eight great together the forces of eight great Powers. England, America France, Russia, Australia, Italy, Belgium and Japan, all joined in a punitive expedition. They broke into our capital of Peking and the result was a treaty, which was very injurious to our country. By this treaty, the sacred precincts of Peking were garrisoned by foreign troops, and our country was crushed by an indemnity of Tls. 450,000,000, which has not yet been paid in full. What kind of oppression is this! We merely killed a few of them, and we have to suffer all this wrong. What happens when they kill a few of us? It is soon made good! Just a few hundred dollars of blood-money. What benefit is there in that? They not only do not pay an adequate indemnity, but they accuse the Chinese of all kinds of evil, make a big fuss and take stern measures....With one breath they unite to defraud us. We must therefore with one breath unite to resist them. We must certainly unite. The people of our own country, and the people of the weak nations of the earth, must overthrow those who now rob and oppress all our nation. The imperialist nations must be overthrown, and the unjust treaties must all be abrogated."

It is hardly necessry to comment on the above production. Unfortunately, its ignorant misrepresentation of history, and its unrestrained rancour against the foreign nations is only too characteristic of the mentality of the government-school students of today.

Scholar's True Charity

A wealthy Chinese scholar of Hankow, Mr. Chen Hsin-chow, who has spent his life in accumulating a large collection of curios, has been so moved by the reports of flood disasters, that he has decided to put up the whole of his valuable collection to auction for the benefit of the sufferers. His notice of sale, which appears in the local press runs as follows:

As I, although blessed with many of the comforts of life, am unable to forget those of my countrymen who are suffering through the severe calamity of floods in the different provinces, I have decided to offer for sale, so that the proceeds may be devoted to their relief, all the precious Chinese pictures, scrolls, porcelain wares, gold and jewel curios which I have collected during the past many years. For this purpose I have been generously granted by Messrs. Nanyang Bros. Tobacco Company the use of the second floor apartment in their building as a place of exhibition for my collection, and I have decided to commence the sale from the 16th instant. In order to solicit the help of my many charitable foreign and Chinese friends in the Wu-Han cities, I have sent out many invitation tickets to this sale, trusting that their support of the many miserable flood sufferers will be granted by their purchasing of curios. Should I, through oversight, have failed to send such tickets to any would be purchasers, tickets will be sent upon application to Invitations Department, Mr. Chen Hsin-chow's Bazaar, at the above mentioned address."

A Chinese proverb says: "All men of the whole world embrace under the common bond of charity." Ladies and Gentlemen, please come and offer your help to the poor sufferers.

MERCHANT VOLUNTEER ARMS

Dr. Sun Still Holding on to Consignment: Volunteers Refuse to Be Further Duped

FROM A CHINESE CORRESPONDENT.

Hongkong, Sept. 18.

Dr. Sun Yat-sen has again decided to refuse to release the arms and ammunitions for the import of which the Canton Merchants Volunteer Corps have taken out legal permits but which he has unlawfully decided. After some negotiations during the last few weeks, it was preliminarily agreed that Dr. Sun would return the arms on condition that Mr. Chan Lim-pak and Mr. Chan Kung-shau, principal commandants of the Canton Merchants Volunteer Corps, would circulate a telegram in praise of Dr. Sun. Upon the advice of friends, the Messrs. Chan did on September 16 send out telegrams upholding Sun. But soon after they had done so the latter through his deputies, Mr. Hu Han-min, again refused to handover the arms until the Canton Volunteers were so reorganized as to be wholly submissive to Dr. Sun. Reports are to the effect that the Volunteers will refuse to be further duped, paying no more attention to the mediation of Gens. Fan Shek-shang and Liao Heng-chao, of the Yunnanese Army. The Volunteers would have rejected the terms recently entered into for the release of the arms, were it not for the desire of their leaders to respect the signatures of their representatives to the preliminary agreement. Had the Volunteers insisted in getting their arms back unconditionally as at first demanded a fortnight ago the matter could have been settled, some say.

The Canton newspapers, more than 40 in all, resumed publication September 18, after a suspension of 10 days owing to the strike of compositors for higher wages. The strike failed, however, as far as the object of the strike is concerned, as the Canton Press Association, representing the leading dailies in Canton, has refused to grant the demands or any part of it. The compositors returned to work without condition whatever.

Canton, Sept. 20.

Replying to an inquiry, Mr. C. C. Wu states: "The arms will be returned to the Merchant Volunteers when their reorganization under Government regulations is completed. The continued absence of the gunboat Wingfung has no connexion with the above matter. The vessel is on an entirely different mission on the south coast. An explanation has been requested from Belgium regarding the export of the arms on the steamer Hav from Antwerp."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CORRUPTION IN HIGH LIFE AT URGA

Mongol Minister of War Executed: Foreigners Arrested but Released

Peking, Sept. 19.

A letter from Kalgan reports that the recent excitement in Urga was due to the arrest and execution of Danzan, Minister of War and former Minister of Finance, and of one of the Under-Secretaries. Charges of bribery and corruption had been made against them. The report that a number of foreigners had been arrested is not entirely correct, but a Russian chauffeur of Tientsin, named Whiteman, is under arrest there and is awaiting trial. Several other foreigners were placed under open arrest but were afterwards released.

All the Cabinet Ministers attended the regular meeting this morning. The official report says that it was resolved to appoint Mr. En Hua, former Vice-President of the Tibetan and Mongolian Affairs Department, as Vice-Minister of Justice, and Mr. Tang Chung as Vice-Minister of Education.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE FLOODS IN KIANGSI

4,000,000 Mow which Might Be Converted on Reclamation into Valuable Ground

Mr. O. J. Todd, engineering representative of the China International Famine Relief Commission, has just returned to Peking from an investigation of the flooded areas around Nanchang in Kiangsi province. Mr. Todd spent about a week in this region and was accompanied throughout by missionaries thoroughly familiar with the country and representatives of the Provincial Committee of the Commission.

The flooding in Kiangsi Province, Mr. Todd reports, was due to breaks in and overtopping of the dykes. His trip extended along the Kan Kiang 220 li south of Nanchang, as far as the last bad break. As there is no regular unkeep bureau in the province, the dykes had been neglected and in places weakened by villages being built along the tops.

Mr. Todd recommended repairing the main dyke breaks for a distance of 200 li south of Nanchang, at an estimated cost of $40,000. Later the Committee may undertake widening and increasing the height of the dike for several hundred li.—this work to be conducted over a period of two or three years.

Already the water in this region has run off. An amount of rice has been planted and will be harvested in due course.

Damage to Dykes.

The region to the north of Nanchang, in the Kan delta and around P'oyang Lake, was also inspected and found still partly under water. In places an autumn crop of rice is being planted, but generally through this region the yield promises to be small, as it was for the spring crop. A few vegetables will be grown during the winter.

Here there are many breaks in the dykes, and much damage was done by wave-washing. A thorough investigation of the area to the south and east of P'oyang Lake later in the year is recommended in order to estimate the number of people who will then be in need of assistance. A programme of dyke reconstruction will probably be adopted to be carried out under the Kiangsi Committee, half the money to be raised by the landowners benefitted, the rest loaned by the Commission on the usual terms, the loan to be guaranteed by the local magistrates and prominent gentry.

It was proposed that the Nanchang Chamber of Commerce should ask the rice merchants to guarantee a price of four cents per catty for rice for the flood sufferers on reconstruction work, this rice to be distributed by the heads of the working gangs. The proposal met with much favourable comment from Chinese and foreigners alike, and it is thought likely that the rice merchants will agree to cooperate to this extent in aiding their suffering fellow provincials.

A Reclamation Scheme

On the basis of a survey of the P'oyang Lake region, a comprehensive reclamation scheme could be worked out that would do a great deal for the province permanently as well as keep the flood sufferers from starvation now. Mr. Todd estimated that there is an area of approximately 4,000,000 mow which is now cultivated at considerable hazard, which might be brought under permanent cultivation at a reasonable expenditure. It is largely rice land which would have a value of $40 to $80 per mow if reclaimed. Land here brings in an annual income as great as its own value. At an average of $50 per mow, land values in excess of $200,000,000 could be created by an expenditure of a mere fraction of that sum.

At the time of Mr. Todd's visit, the Tuchun of the province was away, but he and the members of the Kiangsi Committee of the Commission were entertained by the latter's secretary, Mr. Li, who has been acting as Civil Governor, who assured them of the Tuchun's approval in principle of any such scheme. The majority of the members of the Committee also approved of undertaking such a project. If preliminary negotiations are satisfactory, Mr. Todd will make another trip later to work out further details of the scheme. It is expected the work, if undertaken, will extend over four or five years.

BANDITS COME IN AS SOLDIERS GO

Misfortunes of Central Kiangsu

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Tsingkiangpu, Ku., Sept. 16.

Recruiting among the bandits of the north country is going along at a merry pace and Sunday 1,000 of them passed through here on their way south. It is reported that they demanded $2,000 from the local Chamber of Commerce for "travelling expenses" and when the local gentry demurred they replied "we are in no hurry to go south, we will just stay here a few days." They got the money. Orders have come to recruit a total of 3,000 troops of this type.

Conditions north of us are growing worse, owing to the lack of soldiers to combat the bandits. The local people could care for the situation but they have practically no equipment while the bandits are well armed. The large market towns are daily in danger. The local city officials have the gates closed at sunset, and both draw bridges on the north side of the city are drawn at night. Those of us on this side, probably 40,000 people in all, do not feel any special alarm as we have a good high outer embankment and the bandits would hardly attack a city of this size until they are better organized than at present. All the foreigners have returned to this station, including women and little children, and we do feel that this has helped restore a certain amount of confidence among the local people. The writer feels that there is no local danger at present. When the local troops, including the many ex-bandits, return from the war our time may come but we are not worrying over the future.

The launches are running again after having been out for two weeks due to the commandeering. They all say they have to stop immediately their services are required again for the transportation of troops. This seems to indicate that the military authorities do not contemplate immediate cessation of hostilities, otherwise the launches would not have been permitted to return to their regular runs.

There are local reports of the marvellous bravery shown personally by our local general in the fighting in the south, and that he has been promoted to the command of two divisions. These reports are most interesting.

SHAOHSING RELIEVED BY LU'S FLIGHT

Demand on Bank of China for Silver Easily Met

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Shaohsing, Chê., Sept. 20.

On Thursday transportation facilities between Hangchow and Shaohsing were taxed to the utmost by the crowds of refugees fleeing from Hangchow. The ordinary launch service was doubled, the last boat train reaching the city at 3 a.m. Friday morning. The fact that Gen. Lu Yung-hsiang was preparing to move his family from Hangchow had got abroad and the people fled in panic from the city.

When news reached here on Friday that Gen. Lu had gone to Shanghai the situation was distinctly easier. The average citizen is greatly puzzled to know what it all means. One man expressed it that if you meet ten different men you get ten different opinions as to what the fighting is about. To-day Shaohsing boats are being requisitioned to transport soldiers from Ling-p'u to Tsaongo; 120 boats have been pressed into service.

For a few days the Bank of China was kept busy redeeming bank notes. The bank was able to meet all demands, however, and is doing business as usual.

The mission and government schools have re-opened but with considerably reduced enrolment.

The fact that Shaohsing has connexions with Shanghai both by way of Hangchow and Ningpo has made communications fairly good during the crisis. Shanghai letters and papers are all late, but coming through regularly.

TSINGTAO STANDING BY

Speedily Prepared for Defence Against Possible Onslaught from Marshal Chang

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Tsingtao, Sept. 18.

Tsingtao has presented a martial appearance ever since Admiral Wen Shou-teh brought his squadron to port. He has landed a contingent of marines and moved them into a building in the centre of the outer bay waterfront, the club and hotel district of the city. The blare of the bugle and rolling drums ever since has heralded the fact that Kiaochou Territory doubtless has been selected as a permanent naval base, where Marshal Wu Pei-fu's main naval strength will be located.

Lately, there has been redoubled activity in the ranks of the marines. Every afternoon witnesses the march of the whole force, probably 500 men, to the open spaces beyond the race course where they are drilled by Marshal Wu's own instructors. This solicitude on the part of the Loyang warlord occasioned some suprise here and also considerable conjecture. In fact, it has been rumoured that the Chihli military leader shortly will despatch two regiments in this direction.

The vessels under the Admiral's command have not been idle, either. They have been cruising between the inner and outer bay and to-day two gunboats took up a new station well out in the outer bay. Tsingtaoites had not seem them there since the spring and they had been rather missed.

Tsingtao's large and well-equipped police force, also, has shown increased activity of late. Many more are on duty at night than formerly and instead of the small details going out each evening one sees a score or more.

All the roads leading to and from the city are strongly guarded each night. Included among the police at these spots are many bicycle patrolmen, a recent innovation here. Apparently the presence of this mobile force indicates a desire to have police on the outskirts who can be rushed to any given spot in a short space of time, in case of emergency.

An Ever-present Menace.

Such precautions on the part of the admirality and the police department can mean only one thing—the possibility of Chang Tso-lin sending an attacking force against Tsingtao to effect a landing here for the purpose of utilizing the tranportation facilities afforded by the Kiao-Tsi Railway for an advance into the heart of north-central China, is not being overlooked here. The authorities mean to be well prepared for all contingencies and the points of access are receiving as close attention as in the stirring days of the German defence of the city against the Japanese and British attack in the early months of the World War.

The presence of police in a far-flung succession of posts along the northeast shore, which extends out toward the tip of the Shantung peninsula, is an obvious precaution against any sudden invasion from that side. Of course it is unlikely that Chang Tso-lin could embark his forces in southern Manchuria and suddenly appear on the horizon without any advance warning, but the civil, military and naval authorities are not going to be lulled by any false sense of security and are taking every precaution.

Tsingtao's Strategic Importance.

No other place in Chihli party territory, unless it be Tientsin, itself, is strategically of greater importance than Tsingtao, as a point of ingress. Rumours of a Fengtien attack here have never ceased being circulated about. The police and admiralty have long been on the lookout for spies in this neighbourhood and have rigidly barred all persons who have no special business there from the piers where the men-of-war are moored.

The attempt to pirate the Hai Chi, flagship of the Po-hai Squadron, was never traced directly to to Chang Tso-lin's door, but there has always been a suspicion that Fengtien had some knowledge of the attempted seizure. The effort was an abortive one and was easily broken up, most of the gang, including the leader, making their escape. It is a curious thing that the leader of the pirate band fled to Manchuria where all efforts to locate him since have failed. A strict watch is being kept over the Hai Chi, at Chefoo, and the other vessels at Chefoo and here.

NO FIGHTING ON ANHUI BORDER

The Opposing Generals Old Friends and Make Truce

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Huchow, Sept. 16.

The situation on the Anhui border at Szean remains quiet. Authentic news has been received that the so-called "fighting" which took place recently was an exchange of about ten rifle shots by each side. This happened on September 14.

It seems that the opposing Generals are named Wang and are old friends and have declared a truce. It is supposed that the rifle shots were made with blank cartridges.

No wounded have been received in Huchow from that area.

FOREIGNERS ANXIOUS IN CHINKIANG

Arrival of H.M.S. Gnat And Enrolment of "Specials:" Red Cross Activities

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

Chinkiang, Sept. 18.

Owing to the prevailing uneasiness among the native residents in and outside the British Concession, due to the war, a meeting of the foreign community was called. Steps were adopted to meet emergencies that might arise owing to the ineffective defence of the Concession. On the request of the acting British Consul, H.M.S. Gnat has arrived in port.

Kiangsu reinforcements are daily being sent viâ Chinkiang to the front. Yesterday morning six train loads of Shantung soldiers, totalling 4,000 men, with four trench mortars, went on by trains to the scene of battle.

Several hundreds of wounded men are arriving daily from the front and are being taken on to Nanking. Up to now about 30 wounded belonging to 19th Division stationed at Chinkiang have been detained here for treatment at the local hospitals. On the invitation of Mr. Hu Kien-chuen, President of the Chinkiang branch of the Red Cross Society of China and Commandant of the local Volunteer Corps, the Chinese doctors were called together last week and organized themselves into a Red Cross Unit to render medical aid to the wounded men arriving from the front. The Presbyterian Mission's hospital now under construction has been placed at the disposal of the Unit. Dr. Newman, the mission doctor and superintendent of the hospital, who has been appointed Chairman of the Medical Unit, has undertaken the professional care of the wounded that may be sent to that hospital. The Chêkiang Guild has also been fitted up as a temporay Red Cross Hospital under superintendence of Dr. Liu Tse-ling, a graduate of the Army Medical College, with the approval of the Municipal Council and the Consul. Dr. S. G. Kirkby-Gomes, Municipal port doctor and medical officer to H.M. Consulate Doctor is acting as Consulting Surgeon to the Hospital.

The Municipal Council has strengthened the police force by enlisting a number of special constables for "special" duty. Mr. U. J. Kelly the energetic superintendent of police has his hands quite full.

WAR'S REACTION IN WUCHANG

Prices Soaring and Dollar Exchange at 2,440: Train Robbery that Failed

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wuchang, Sept. 13.

The war that has broken out in East China is having a very disturbing effect upon the Wu-Han markets. Foodstuffs are rising in price, and the silver exchange is going up steadily. All the up-river boats which come into port are full of passengers from Shanghai who have come to escape from the war-zone. The inns in the native city areas are crowded with these refugees, and the price of rents in the foreign concessions is mounting steadily, owing to the demand for accommodation.

The dollar exchange has reached 2,440, an unprecedented amount. Silver is becoming scarce and a public order has been issued by the Tuchun forbidding the transport of Mexican dollars out of the province. Any one found travelling with a sum of more than $500 in silver will be fined, and the money will be confiscated. Apparently a good many people have been speculating upon the advantageous tael exchange in Shanghai as compared with Hankow.

It is reported that Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan has telegraphed to Tuchun Hsiao asking for gunboats and arms. In answer, two gunboats, the Ts'u T'ai and the Ts'u Lien, have been sent down to Nanking, carrying two cannon and 12 machine-guns.

Mr. Wei Tseng-cho, the Chinese Minister to Berlin, who came back to China this spring in order to get funds from the Waichiaopu, arrived in Hankow on Monday from the Capital. After a stay of a few days in his old home, he will start out upon his return to Germany.

The police are displaying some energy in attempting to suppress the opium dens which riddle Hankow at present. The native press reports four captures made in one day, one of them being in the upper floor over the house of a shoemaker. Altogether 15 people were arrested as a result of these finds.

A failure of an attempt at armed robbery is reported on the Peking-Hankow railway line. A train which was due to go up from Hankow, was known to be carrying a representative of a certain Hankow bank, who had a considerable sum of money in his charge. A band of robbers planned to waylay and rob the train near Loyangfen and Hsinhsiang, where the train was due about 9 p.m. But owing to the recent floods along the line trains have been running irregularly, and this train reached the threatened point before the robbers had collected in force. A few shots were fired upon the train, which caused some panic among the passengers. But the danger-zone was safely passed, and a telegraphic message was sent which brought a guard of soldiers to the spot to protect other trains.

The Hupeh Teachers' Association are not meeting with very great success in their efforts to claim their arrears of educational grant out of the taxes which have been collected by the Ministry of Communications. A few days ago the news came that their second group of delegates had been received at the Ministry and had been offered the sum of $20,000 as an instalment. This offer was indignantly refused by the teachers. The latest news is that six of the delegates have returned to Wuchang with the offer of $40,000 which will probably be accepted. There is no doubt that the matter will now be patched up by a process of mutual bargaining, and very little more will be heard of it.

In spite of the protests of the ricshamen, the new Hankow-Tsaitien Motor Co. are still proceeding with their project. They will have 35 cars on the run, each of which will carry 12 passengers. The fare will be 320 cash per person. The distance from Hankow to Tsaitien by water is 60 li, but by road it is only 30.

WITH the arrival of a further detachment of the Loyal North Lancashire Regiment practically all the battalion is now back again in Tientsin.

WHERE SCHERER AWAITS HIS APPEAL

The First Prison of Fengtien

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Some weeks ago we printed an article describing the prison at Mukden which gave a very unfavourable impression of it. About that time our Mukden correspondent had visited the prison and sent us an article which was unluckily lost in transit. The following is a copy of that article and is not an answer to the adverse description—except that we wish to give both sides. We have also received a letter from the prison authorities protesting against the first article and saying that the prison is at all times open to inspection. Of course its excellence or otherwise does not affect the point on which Mr. Scherer has appealed.

Mukden, Sept. 11.

During the lengthy and considered process of collection of evidence and final preparation for the appeal, Scherer has been passing his days in the First Prison of Fengtien, which sojourn does not seem to have been altogether agreeable.

The prison is quite big when viewed from without, and is surrounded by a high wall dwarfed, however, by the frowning heights of the city wall which skirts its southern and western sides only 50 feet away. The original building dates from 1907, but has been added to since, and reconstruction took place during the second year of the Republic in 1913.

A large number of delinquents are there housed: men guilty of all known crimes from murder to swindle, and there are women prisoners, 110 who have separate blocks to themselves, and there is also a quarter for juvenile offenders, who are mostly boys between the ages of 12 and 18. In all there are 1,920 prisoners under control, out of which 570 cases are still undecided.

Prison Industries.

The problem of utilizing the available labour the prison offered has apparently been dealt with in a most successful and capable manner by the prison authorities, under whose guidance I was permitted to inspect the various factories where the industries of the jail are carried on.

These industries are of a varied and practical nature, and the work turned out by the prison appears fully to demonstrate the good results obtainable from the principles of correction as applied by the staff.

Basket weaving, general smithy work, a printing press for all the prison and court memoranda, shoe and boot making, cotton spinning and weaving for bed covers and towels and similar etceteras, and tailoring, are all managed in a most creditable way and disposed of by the prison sales department. There is also another industry: one perhaps which the ordinary individual would hardly reconcile with the rigour of prison routine, that is, the wholesale and wholesome production of bean sauce, made from a carefully mixed compound of flour and beans, which are then crushed to produce the delicacy in question. Sales for this commodity are made all over Manchuria, and result in the astonishing turnover of 160,000 Mukden notes per annum.

Prisoners are remunerated for work done on a diligence scale, charts showing the amounts earned being hung on the workshop walls.

In summer, prisoners work from 8.30 to 11 and from 2.30 to 5 and during winter from 8.30 to 12 and from 1 to 3.

Heating and Washing.

Two ssytems of confinement here obtain: the Pennsylvanian and the Obern, the former type of cell having stove-heating and use of candles. Scherer's cell is of this type and is situated in one of the new buildings. His bathroom is next his cell. Quarters for prisoners' baths were to be observed in various buildings and all the cells I visited were scrupulously clean.

It is part of the prison policy to treat prisoners, as far as is consistent with prison regulations, according to their standard of living and this is what the authorities have endeavoured to do in the case of Scherer. In fact some resentment has been aroused by partiality thus shown.

At present, there are three foreigners confined here, of whom two are Russians. I had a few words with one of them. He was a tall square-headed Caucasian and looked apparently fit after four years here. He is expecting release shortly under the general amnesty.

Instruction is given daily by teachers to large attendances of men in moral conduct and the illiterate are helped to become acquainted with the written characters. Special classes are devoted to those young prisoners under the legal age in accordance with the classics of the Primary School. Medical attention is available within, and where special attention is necessary, outside assistance is obtainable.

The Want of Money.

In their problem of coping with a big complement of prisoners, the prison authorities appear to be labouring under difficulties. To cover the ordinary maintenance requirements, $52,000 are necessary, while the net profit from the prison works is 48,000 small coin. Out of this sum, so much is appropriated by the provincial treasury, that the small balance which remains is inadequate to give practical expression to those improvements which the authorities consider essential. Major S. C. Wang, the Governor of the Prison, has himself subscribed considerable sums to the work, but he deplores the lack of funds to carry on.

Although, however, we may be gratified to discover that Scherer's lot might be worse, the point remains that his sentence is much too severe although the Procurator's speech, during the appeal last Monday, appeared to be unbiased, and left the impression that Scherer is at once liable to certain punishment.

In conclusion, it may be said that from the point of view of Chinese the prison is a model one, but for a foreigner, no.

SIR ROBERT HO TUNG

Return to Hongkong: Ready to Work for Restoration of Peace in China

London, Sept. 20.

Sir Robert Ho Tung is leaving England. He will return to the Far East in a few days. He will possibly first visit Lisbon with the Governor of Macao, who has been conferring with the Portuguese Ambassador in London, before, embarking on the Genoa for Hongkong on October 7.

Sir Robert, interviewed by a representative of Reuter's Agency, said that the Hongkong Section at Wembley, particularly the silkworm exhibit, had been a pronounced success, and a popular feature of the exhibition. It is understood that Sir Robert has been approached unofficially to continue the Hongkong section.

When he returns Sir Robert hopes, if it should still be necessary, to resume his work of assisting in the restoration of peace and the establishment of unification in China. He said that the present situation in China was really one that might lead to an early and better chance of unification. Sir Robert emphasized that it was not an anti-foreign movement.—Reuter.

Presentation from Hongkong Section of Wembley Exhibition.

London, Sept. 24.

Sir Robert Ho Tung was to-day presented with an address and a massive silver loving cup by the Hongkong section of the Wembley Exhibition in appreciation of his invaluable services to the Chinese exhibitors.

Sir Robert and Lady Ho Tung will leave London on September 25 for China viâ the continent. This is earlier than was originally arranged and is partly owing to the political atmosphere in China due to the civil war. Their son, Mr. Edward Ho Tung, will not accompany his parents, as he is still at Warsaw attending the World's Students Conference.—Reuter.

THE ORIGIN OF THE JAPANESE?

Are They Whites, Siberians, Malays or Ainu-Caucasians?

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Tokyo, Sept. 12.

From time to time the question of "Who Are the Japanese?" has been a favourite subject for theorizing. It has been approached from various angles and various conclusions have been reached. When discussed by Japanese themselves, it is noteworthy that, perhaps unconsciously, the most recent happenings of the political world have managed to creep into the findings as regards whom these people were originally affiliated with, descended from, or indentified with.

I remember that when Japan continued to maintain troops in Siberia after the rest of the Powers had withdrawn their forces upon the evacuation of the Czechs, voluminous articles were written to show that the Japanese originally came from the district around Possiet Bay, in the Maritime Province of Russia. With a curious logic, this was also advanced as adequate and justifiable reasoning for the Japanese to remain in, and colonize, this portion of Siberia.

Then, during the Shantung debates, as plausible were the arguments advanced to the effect that the Japanese were really the better type of former inhabitants of the Celestial Empire. This "solution" as regards the ancestry of the Japanese was again advanced by some, especially by those whose writings were directly or indirectly inspired by the Army General Staff, as an excellent reason for hanging on to Shantung—"simply going back home," was how these writers put it.

Mr. Ku Hung-ming, the well-known writer and sworn monarchist of China, even to-day maintains that the Japanese are the "better" Chinese. The Japanese, generally, do not look on this as much of a compliment.

Were Perhaps Malays.

That they hailed from southern climes rather than from northern ones, in fact, that the Japanese were the more enterprising of the tribes making up the Malay race is also a theory that has often been advanced. There is a great deal in this hypothesis when one considers the facial and somatic characteristics of the Japanese and the Malays, and also when one comes to consider the structure of Japanese homes, their frailty and adaptability for a tropical climate being excellent, while, it is simply impossible to keep a Japanese house warm in winter. A British savant, Dr. Whymant, well versed in the literature of Japan and China, after an exhaustive study, read a paper before the Royal Asiatic Society here, in which he expressed his belief that the Japanese originally hailed from some south sea island of the Malay Archipelago.

Latest Claim: "Whites."

The latest claim regarding the origin of the Japanese is that they are direct descendants of a white tribe, in other words that they are Caucasians, at least in ancestry. This theory has been advanced by Professor Matsumoto, a well-known Japanese anthropologist, and with him, in making the necessary investigations, were associated eight other Japanese scholars. The first inhabitants of Japan, he maintains, were the Ainus—a race that now lives, under very primitive conditions, in the Hokkaido, the northernmost of the larger islands comprising the Japanese archipelago. These Ainus, he declares, were an off-shoot of the white race. "Many European authorities consider," he writes, "that the Ainu, the Caucasian and the Australian must be grouped in one great racial stock. The present Japanese facial characteristics and colour are due to invasions by Mongol hordes which took place thousands of years ago."

Ainu-Caucasians.

These conclusions were reached as the result of the exploration of kitchen middens all over Japan, and the examination of skeletons, buried in shell-heap mounds 20 feet deep. The Japanese, it is stated, are Ainu-Caucasian. Yet, the fact remains that the facial characteristics of the Japanese as well as their physical attributes are very different from the Northern European or the Aryan. This is explained as having been due to various invasions by Mongolians who dominated the existing stocks and assimilated with the varied types. This, then would go to prove that the frequent Mongolian invasions and dominations resulted in squelching out the original "white" strain till it does not any longer exist, if it ever did exist. Japan thus was once some sort of a "melting pot" like Hawaii is these modern times. In the "melting" process the Mongolian's facial and somatic characteristics prevailed over those which originally existed. It is thus a question of whether any great strain of Ainu blood exists in modern Japanese. Dr. Ballou, the well-known world authority on anthropology, is of the opinion that less than three per cent. exists, and that this is erring on the side of generosity.

Government Backing.

The fact is that the Japanese are a race apart. Their insular geographical position has been responsible for this. Although Asiatics, they are not Asiatics in the sense that the Chinese are.

It is significant to note that Professor Matsumoto, in his researches as regards the origin of the Japanese, had the backing of his Government. It is thus quite possible that the Japanese authorities will accept the findings of their experts, that the Japanese are a direct branch of the white race and in this respect, not to mention the country being a world power, are the equals in every way of anyone else. It is also of interest to note that, here again, the speculation as regards the origin of the Japanese is linked with contemporary politics.

Of all the theories put forward, the last seems to an impartial and unscientific observer to be the least plausible. That the Japanese were of Chinese or of Malayan ancestry, with frequent admixtures of Slav-European blood, as a result of intercourse with the Siberians, seems to be perfectly reasonable to accept, and explains many an obstacle one runs up against when considering the origin of the race.

The attempt to find a missing link between the present-day Japanese and the Northern European, through the pre-historic Ainu, seems as impossible for one to take seriously as the attempt some time ago to make out that the Japanese were a lost tribe of Israel.

WUHU RICE EXPORT STOPPED

Military Proclamation that It Only Goes to Feed the Enemy

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

Wuhu, Sept. 17.

On Sunday last a proclamation was issued by Tuli Ma prohibiting all export of rice to Shanghai as "It only went to feed the enemy's Army." Last shipments allowed to leave Wuhu to go on Tuesday 16th.

In spite of this rice-dealers passed several thousand piculs through the Customs on Tuesday for shipment on Wednesday morning.

On Tuesday evening three rice-shops were visited by police officials who requested the owners to call at the police office. One of the owners went, while the other two, evidently smelling a rat, sent an employee. The three men were all arrested and on Wednesday morning all rice passed by the Customs during Tuesday was shut out, by order of the Commissioner of Customs.

During the night between Monday and Tuesday three soldiers, who, it is said, have had no pay for months, made up their minds to help themselves in one of the big shops. A cook who heard them perfecting their plans telephoned to headquarters, with the result that the three men were shot quietly at 3 o'clock in the morning, and the bodies are said to have been disposed of in the river.

Otherwise all is quiet in this district and no trouble is expected here, until the fighting is over and the soldiers come back. It is thought that looting, etc., may then be the order of the day, especially if the Kiangsu troops should be beaten.

AMERICA'S EXCLUSION OF JAPANESE

Sidelights on the Original Controversy are Given

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Tokyo, Sept. 11.

Not Ambassador Hanihara, but Secretary Hughes is responsible for the use of the words "grave consequences" in the Japanese Ambassador's note, according to a statement made by Bishop Reifsnider, in charge of the Tokyo diocese, before members of the Rotary Club this afternoon. "When shown a first and milder copy of the protest," Bishop Reifsnider told his audience, "Secretary Hughes asked Mr. Hanihara to put 'teeth' in the protest. This was accordingly done and afforded Senator Lodge an opportunity for pouncing on the administration, on Japan and on the American constitution. Senator Lodge is not on good terms with President Coolidge and wishes to embarrass him by every possible means!

Bishop Reifsnider went on to declare that 75 per cent. of the Californians and a much larger proportion of Americans in other states would be quite satisfied with placing Japan on the quota basis, "which would practically halt Japanese immigration into the States and, at the same time, preserve the dignity of the Japanese people and remove the sting of the discrimination that now is embodied in the immigration act.

"Consequently," he said, "the only solution to the present question is to make the Japanese eligible to citizenship which would allow them a quota and restore the friendship of the two countries."

Bishop Reifsnider claimed that his information with regard to Secretary Hughes having inspired the use of the phrase "grave consequences" in Mr. Hanihara's communication was gathered while at Washington "from first-hand information." Bishop Reifsnider returned to Japan from America last month.

"Ambassador Hanihara's first note of protest," he declared, "was couched in most carefully selected language. Secretary Hughes returned the note to Ambassador Hanihara suggesting that he put 'teeth' into it, whereupon the now much-talked of phrase 'grave consequences' was inserted. This fact must be mentioned in justice to Ambassador Hanihara."

Up to the very morning of the passing of the Immigration Bill, Bishop Reifsnider said, everyone thought the discriminatory clause would be eliminated. "The American public, in general, is in perfect sympathy with the standpoint of the Japanese against the action of the Senate," he added.

"Even in California," he went on, "I heard that the people would have been entirely satisfied with the quota ruling which would have practically stopped Japanese immigration, and a movement is already on foot to find means whereby Japanese can be made eligible to American citizenship, which, if accomplished, would remove the teeth of the discriminatory clause and, in this manner, also save the "face" of the Senators."

17 DAYS FROM LONDON TO PEKING

Peking, Sept. 18.

Messrs. Mystrom and Wright of Taiyuan University and Mr. A. Ramsay of Peking arrived here on Tuesday, having accomplished the Trans-Siberian trip in 17 travelling days. Apart from difficulties experienced in one or two places in securing tickets and reservations, the journey was made in comparative comfort. Messrs. Mystrom and Wright have completed the double journey in approximately two months.

The possible cause of delaying an early return may be found in obtaining the Soviet transit vise. This difficulty can be overcome by paying for telegraphic communication with Moscow.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

MR. C. E. Seymour, secretary of the American Chamber of Commerce of Tientsin, states that the American Associated Chambers have accepted the invitation of the Tientsin Chamber to hold their annual conference for 1924 in Tientsin. It is expected that this Conference will be held on October 26 and 27.

MISSIONARIES' HOLIDAYS OVER

Exodus from Szechuan Hill Resorts

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tzeliutsing, Sze., Sept. 5.

All the missionaries are back from the Hills. Mrs. Hoffman and family have left for Toronto, as their eldest daughter there is in poor health. Mr. Hoffman is accompanying the family to Chungking.

Dr. Fu has left for a year's post graduate medical study at Tsinan, the Shantung Christian College. He was very fortunate in obtaining a Rockefeller Scholarship which covers travel, tuition, and his keep. Since graduation from the Union University, Chêngtu, three years ago he has been in the General Hospital here and has won a warm place in the hearts of many. Just before leaving a farewell dinner was given at the home of Dr. Allan to him. Dr. Wilford, of Chêngtu, who was stationed here some years ago kindly came from the Hills to enliven the occasion and Dr. Hill of the M. E. M. of Tsechow also was present.

After the dinner the plans and needs of the hospital were discussed. A great deal of interest and sympathy were shown and almost all promised to collect subscriptions. The next day the local military official sent a contribution of $100, and more is expected. The hospital, both men's and women's wards were kept open all the summer by Dr. Fu and the two graduate Chinese nurses, and apparently without great difficulty.

The harvest is about over and the crops are good. The dollar is at 3400 and rice costs 6,000 cash for 30 catties. There has been considerable movement of troops with but few rifles.

Tzeliutsing experienced six days with the thermometer at 93 degrees, just at the proper time for harvesting. Then there was a sudden drop to 70.

PROHIBITION EXTENDED TO PHILIPPINES

British Ships Notified That Eighteenth Amendment Is Applicable

Manila, Sept. 19.

What is believed to be an attempt to extend the American Prohibition Law to the Philippines has been made by the Washington authorities.

The Canadian Pacific Steamship Company have received a cable from the American Consul-General in Hongkong notifying them that the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution has been held applicable here by a ruling of the Attorney-General of the United States. The Empress of Russia arrived this morning without liquor.

It is understood that the Smith, Bell Co.'s London vessels will also be refused health papers by the American Consul if there is liquor on board for the Philippines.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Manila, Sept. 20.

The Philippine Government is expected to lodge a vigorous protest against extension of the Prohibition Law here. Governor-General Wood is querying Washington with regard to the intentions of the Federal authorities. Filipino legislators point out that enforcement would mean loss of Gold $2,000,000 revenue annually and state that there is no liquor problem here among the Filipinos. They also declare that enforcement of the Prohibition Law would mean interference with Filipino autonomy.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Proposed System of Nominal Fines by Local Customs

Manila, Sept. 22.

It is unofficially stated that even if American Consuls continue to refuse bills of health to ships carrying liquor, the Philippine Local Customs will permit their entry with merely a nominal fine.

The present law provides a maximum fine of 2,000 pesos for vessels not provided with a bill of health, but no minimum is stated. It is believed that a nominal fine of ten pesos will be imposed where a ship's failure to show a bill of health is due merely to presence of a liquor cargo.

Later.

Governor-General Wood has cabled to Washington requesting a reversal of the Consular action in regard to liquor imports to the Philippines.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CULTIVATION OF OPIUM IN CHINA

Another Astounding Statement by Chinese Delegate to League of Nations

Geneva, Sept. 21.

In the course of the debate on the report of the Advisory Committee on Opium Traffic, Mr. Chu Chao-hsin, the Chinese delegate, refuted statements that cultivation of poppy was universal in China. He quoted a statement, which he ascribed to Reuter, that a Chinese Governor had enforced the death penalty on all persons found in possession of four ounces of narcotic drugs.

Mr. Chu added that China had laws prohibiting opium traffic in any form and would be able to enforce them to the utmost when the Central Government regained control of all the provinces. Public opinion in China strongly supported the anti-opium movement and China supported honest propaganda. "We promise you goodwill and unreserved support in the movement of combating in the name of humanity this evil of worldwide concern." (Applause.)—Reuter.

Geneva, Sept. 20.

On the adoption of the report on opium traffic, Mr. Chu Chao-hsin (China) assured the Assembly of the League of Nations of China's co-operation against opium and welcomed the suggestion of propaganda in all countries where opium traffic was a serious factor.

A Chinese proposal was submitted to the Assembly recommending the consideration of China's claim to a seat on the Council.—Reuter.

EVENTS IN CHEFOO

Semi-Martial Law Declared: Serious Accident at Recent Races

Chefoo, Sept. 18.

Chefoo is in a semi-state of martial law and the city is closed after 10 at night, Chinese being forbidden to appear on the streets after this hour.

The Autumn Race meetings held on September 5 and 13 aroused much interest but the wet weather did a great deal to spoil the events. The second meeting had been arranged for September 6 but heavy rain on that day and the day following necessitated that the finishing races be postponed until the following Saturday, September 13.

The racing was of a higher standard than Chefoo has been for many years.

The first serious accident at any Chefoo meetings for several years occurred on the first day when Mr. Kay, taking his pony Mik to the start for the second time, got bolted with and came down heavily in the country. A broken collar bone, two fractured ribs and a strained shoulder were the result.

Of the jockeys at the meetings Mr. Villers headed the list with Mrs. Railton second.

The first prize of $999.00 in the Chefoo Champion Sweep Stake was won by an officer on the U.S.S. Black Hawk.

The Champions was won by Christmas Morn (ridden by Mr. Villers). Sandsnipe (Mr. Railton) was second and Survivor (Mr. Swaney) third.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Tuan Chi-jui, who has been promised the Presidency of China if success attends the Anfu arms, is one of the organizers of the modern Chinese army. He was a signatory to the memorial to the Throne urging the Emperor to abdicate. He is a Field Marshal of the Chinese army who has been twice Premier of China and went into retirement at Tientsin in 1922.

ANOTHER UPPER RIVER CASUALTY

Str. Chi Chuan Badly Holed

From Our Own Correspondent.

Ichang, Sept. 17.

The str. Chi Chuan belonging to the Yangtsze Rapid S. N. Co., was badly holed when she ran on the rocks on her last trip up to Chungking. As she filled very rapidly it was fortunate that she was at a place where she could be beached. No cargo lost, but all the cargo must, have been seriously damaged by water. After some days the vessel was brought down to Ichang, and is able to proceed to Shanghai under her own steam for repairs.

The military are using the ships belonging to Marshal Wu Pei-fu which he bought this year from the Japanese company which failed to put them to the Chungking run this season, for bringing large number of troops from Chungking. Many of them are proceeding down river. Marshal Wu must think things are more settled in the West than we are led to believe they are. Rumour still has it that before long trouble may be expected between Yang Sen and some of his Generals.

DISSATISFACTION OF N. Y. K. EMPLOYEES

Reported Resignation of Many Managers and Employees In Branch Offices

Tokyo, Sept. 22.

The long-existing dissatisfaction among the office employees of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha with the management, to whose policy is attributed the present depression in the business of the company, culminated yesterday in the resignations of a large number of the company's office staffs throughout the world, among whom are many prominent persons.

What immediately led to the resignations was that in consequence of a written protest against the management, demanding the resignation of the President, 11 of the prime movers were dismissed.

This morning the employees who resigned, among whom are the managers of the Company's branch offices at Yokohama, Nagoya, Osaka, Kobe, Moji, Nagasaki, Bombay, Calcutta, Seattle, New York, and in London and the submanagers at Hongkong, Singapore, Liverpool, Hamburg and Shanghai, as well as many executives at the head office, issued a manifesto setting forth their grievances, in which they protested against the President, alleging that he attempted to consolidate his own position at the expense of the company's business by creating his own faction among the employees, thereby disturbing the traditional harmony of the administration.

The directors of the Company are holding a conference this afternoon to determine their attitude.

At present the marine staffs and seamen are holding aloof.

Later.

The Nippon Yusen Kaisha directors, after a meeting this afternoon, issued a statement explaining that the employees were dismissed as a disciplinary measure, because they attempted to interfere with the administrative affairs of the Company. The meeting decided to watch developments, and in the meantime attempt to reconcile the rebellious faction.

The President, Mr. Ito, interviewed said that he deplored the trouble, which had been long existent, and declared that the authorities considered that the present was the time effectively to remedy the situation. He announced that he could not decide on his own action until harmony was restored.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Seamen Maintaining Neutrality

Tokyo, Sept. 22.

The troubles of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha have become more extended and all the branch offices, including London office, have sent cables to the headquarters of the group of those who are united to resign, encouraging them to strengthen their union. Those who tendered resignations have reached 673 persons. Mr. Ito, the President of the company, had issued a lengthy statement to all the employees at home and abroad to-day explaining the reasons of the dismissal of a certain portion of the employees of the company and warning the rest not to act imprudently. It is reported that those who have sent in their resignations will also issue a statement soon.—Eastern News Agency.

"Information from the other side in Shanghai is to the effect that these figures are a gross exaggeration, and that the trouble is not so extensive (though still serious) as would appear from the above.—Ed.

Sept. 23.

To-day being a national holiday, there have been no definite developments in the Nippon Yusen Kaisha strike, which in view of possible far-reaching consequences is absorbing public attention to the exclusion of all else.

The publication of the directors' statement yesterday has led to further rejoinders on the part of the strikers, whose attitude, according to this morning's papers, is stiffening by assurances of support from branch officers everywhere.

The seamen, with the exception of one section which is reported to be backing up the President, maintain neutrality. Should they be forced into the dispute, the situation will be greatly complicated. It is understood that the directors are holding another meeting to-morrow for further deliberation of the affair.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Tokyo, Sept. 24.

The meeting of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha directors has been postponed till Friday. Meanwhile the more prominent shareholders are attempting mediation with the dissatisfied faction, who are attending to their duties as usual in spite of the tendered resignation.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Resignation of the Bulk of Shanghai Staff

Shanghai, Sept. 25.

The internal trouble between the directors and employees of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha has come to assume a more serious aspect than ever. While managers and staffs of almost all the N. Y. K. branches throughout the world have defined their attitude, manifesting their dissatisfaction with the administration of the present management and at the same time tendering their resignations, the attitude of the staff of the local N. Y. K. Branch has hitherto remained uncertain. However, as a result of their yesterday's meeting, all the Japanese employees, 52 in all, including two submanagers, with the exception of the manager Mr. M. Ichiki, have definitely decided upon their attitude, issuing a long declaration and tendering resignations en bloc.

The declaration makes a great many allegations against Mr. Ito, the President of the Company, adding that repeated representations have been made to him by the staff which he has ignored. The declaration calls upon him to resign.—Eastern News Agency.

THE CITY OF JEHOL

Chang Tso-lin's Objective on the Way to Peking

The city of Jehol, which Chang Tso-lin's army apparently has as an objective, is one of the ancient summer capitals of the former Emperors of China. Jehol is 144 miles northeast of Peking and is connected by a road. The present name of the city is Chengtefu. The word Jehol, in Chinese Je ho erh, means "hot stream," and refers to the tributary of the Luan Ho on which the city is situated and which is lukewarm. Jehol is in Chihli Province, outside the Great Wall. Its principal exports are wood and fruit.

The environs of the city contain many palaces, temples, monasteries, pagodas, and other beautiful buildings. A spacious hunting ground has been laid out where formerly China's Emperors disported themselves during the Summer. In 1793 Lord Macartney was received there by the Emperor Chien Lung. During the invasion of the north by the Allied Armies, in 1860 the Emperor fled to Jehol where he died a year later. A wall, said to be 15 miles in circumference, surrounds the city and the outlying parks.

ONE OF KUANGTUNG'S MINOR TROUBLES

A Little Gang of 2,000 Ruffians Near Linchow

From Our Own Correspondent.

Pakhoi, Sept. 12.

It is just a year since the last change of government took place in this district, when Gen. Wong Men-tong, a supporter of Sun Yat-sen, was expelled by Gens. Shan Po-fan and Tang Poon-yan. During the year the district has been untroubled by war and trade has improved considerably.

When, in the early summer, Nanning was recaptured by the Sun Yat-sen party, the Governor of Kuangsi, Lam Chan-teng, who was a supporter of Gen. Luk Wing-ting, made a hurried departure and came down here, being welcomed by local officialdom and installed as a kind of District Governor at Limchow, about eight local districts being consolidated into one jurisdiction which, it was suggested should become a separate province. Now by a sudden turn of the kaleidoscope, it is reported that emissaries have been despatched to Canton and have made peace with Sun Yat-sen, who has sent a gunboat here with a large supply of ammunition for the use of the local forces. It is said that Lam Chan-teng and Shan Po-fan have made this arrangement, but that Gen. Tang Poon-yan, who came over from Hainan Island to help the latter into power, has been left out. He is supposed to be at Kochow, but it is not known whether he will now take up arms against his erstwhile friends or retire into his stronghold in Hainan.

The band of robbers, said to be 2,000 strong, which was recently induced to come to Limchow to become soldiers, but took fright at the thought of possible treachery when nearly arrived there and turned back, is still in the neighbourhood. A few weeks ago these ruffians attacked the village of Cheunglok, about 25 miles north of Limchow, looting the place and carrying off a number of persons for ransom. Soldiers have been sent to live in the village and have battled with the robbers, in which a good many were killed and some of the captives rescued, but the danger still remains as long as the band is not broken up.

On Hands. In Tiny Blisters. Cuticura Healed.

"For three years I suffered with eczema on my hands. It seemed like a lot of tiny blisters which when broken discharged a lot of watery fluid and afterwards formed scales. Then my arms got bad and I had to give up work. The itching and burning were unbearable, and my health began to fail.

ALLEGED EMPLOYMENT OF RUSSIAN AVIATORS

Mr. Karakhan's Admission of Lack of Jurisdiction: A Curious Volte Face

Peking, Sept. 17.

The Waichiaopu on September 13 drew the attention of M. Karakhan to reports that Russians were serving as aviators and participating in the warfare with Gen. Lu Yung-hsiang, Gen. Ho Feng-lin and Marshal Chang Tso-lin, and asking M. Karakhan not to permit such action on the part of Russians in future.

Replying on September 16, M. Karakhan pointed out the numerous notes in which he had called the attention of the Chinese Government to the danger of remnants of "White" bands taking refuge in China and being engaged as police or soldiery, but the Chinese Government had taken no action. The aviators in question were these "White" Russians, whom the Soviet did not recognize. Finally, the Soviet had no special administrative rights or privileges in Chinese territory even as regarded its own citizens.

Special interest attaches to the last statement in view of M. Karakhan's recent declaration in connexion with the handing over of the Legation, that the Soviet was still a Protocol Power.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE DISSENSION IN THE KUOMINTANG

Leaders of One Faction Coming to Shanghai: Antagonists to Dr. Sun Yat-sen

In Kuomintang circles in Shanghai last Friday it was reported that Mr. Sun Fo, formerly Mayor of Canton and son of Dr. Sun Yat-sen is coming to Shanghai with General Li Lieh-chun, the leading military man in Canton. Circles friendly to Dr. Sun claim that they are en route to Mukden to arrange with Marshal Chang Tso-lin for financing the northern expedition which Dr. Sun has been attempting for several years. Kuomintang circles opposed to Dr. Sun express the opposite opinion. They hold that the appointment of Mr. Hu Han-ming as acting Generalissimo has brought about a split in the Kuomintang, the younger men declining to associate themselves with Hu Hanming, who is an extremist and who is said to be responsible for some of the worst mistakes made by Dr. Sun, who trusts him implicitly.

The fact that General Li Lieh-chun leaves Canton at this time is taken as an indication of his refusal to assist Dr. Sun in his present venture, and it is believed by many that without the counsel, if not active participation of Li Lieh-chun, the Canton forces can effect very little. It is regarded as significant that General Li, whose ambition is to become the Tuchun and Civil Governor of Kiangsi, is not taking advantage of the present situation to lead a force into his native province.

There can be no question but that Dr. Sun now has the support of General Tang Chi-yao, Tuchun of Yunnan. Tang Chi-yao now controls Yunnan and Kueichow, but is not without ambitions in Szechuan. He has made his peace with Canton after an enmity which arose out of Dr. Sun's support of his treacherous general who effected his elimination from Yunnan for a year. Tang Chi-yao's brother is now in Shanghai in communication with Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang.

PEKING, Sept. 23.—The Panchan Lama has telegraphed to Peking saying that he hopes to reach the Capital before the end of autumn accompanied by the Tukuang Hutukhtu.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE Peking Government has requested the Tutung of Chahar to investigate the reported detention of foreigners in Urga. No new information has come to Peking on this score and while Mr. Roy Chapman Andrews and several other Americans are thought to be there, there is nothing definite on which to believe that they are in danger.

NO INTERVENTION BY POWERS

London, Sept. 19.

Reuter learns that as far as Great Britain is concerned, there is no truth in the report that there has been any communication with other Powers in regard to intervention in China, which is not considered practical at the present time.—Reuter.

Tokyo, Sept. 20.

It is authoritatively stated while Japan regrets the present disturbances in China, she hopes that the warring factions will soon make peace. She is entertaining no ideas of intervention, her policy being one of absolute neutrality, provided that the war continues to be purely domestic.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

ALL EYES ON BRITAIN

Her Chance to Put a Stop to China's War

London, Sept. 21.

The issue in China, declares the "Sunday Times," lies between a fresh stalemate and the establishment of Marshal Chang Tso-lin as virtual dictator of all China, which were the alternatives foreshadowed by Baron Hayashi, the Japanese Ambassador in London, in an interview given recently to a representative of this same paper.

The "Sunday Times" refers to Japan's reluctance and America's hesitancy to mediate, therefore, it seems that Great Britain alone among the Powers might essay a friendly initiative in the interests of China, the British Empire and the trading world at large. Her conduct would be neutral from a political standpoint, says the paper. If Great Britain does not move, none of the other Powers will move. The hope is expressed that the British Government is not merely watching events, but that it intends to seize the first opportunity to terminate the disintegrating and destructive process at the present time working throughout the whole of China.—Reuter.

LEGATIONS IN PEKING

Danger of Scare Being Worked up Causelessly on Their Account

London, Sept. 22.

The "Daily Telegraph," commenting on the events in China, says that if the dispute continues the position of the European Legations in Peking will soon become a matter of daily speculation, which ought not to be tolerated. This question, far more than nice estimates as to the movement of Kiangsu troops towards Shanghai, should decide the action of the British Government at the present moment.—Reuter.

This must strike any competent observer in China as the most extraordinarily mischievous piece of ignorant comment. The Legations in Peking are in no danger whatever unless it be from a bomb accidentally dropped by an aeroplane and it will be disastrous if a scare is worked up quite unworthily on their account.—Ed.

PEKING APPOINTMENTS

Peking, Sept. 17.

The official report of the Cabinet meeting this morning says that the resignation was accepted of Dr. Hawkling Yen, who will be succeeded as Vice-Minister of Agriculture and Commerce by Mr. Wang Sung-yu. It was also resolved to appoint Mr. Hsueh Tu-pi (Vice-Minister of Justice) Vice-Minister of the Interior.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE Waichiaopu has addressed a Note to 16 foreign Ministers, requesting them to order their respective nationals to pay the famine surtax, says the Chinese press. The British, Danish and American Ministers are asked by the Waichiaopu in another despatch to instruct the Eastern Extension Australasia & China, the Great Northern, and the Commercial Pacific Cable companies to collect the famine surtax on telegrams.

The price yesterday was 35d. ready and forward, against 34⅜d. ready and forward last week. The lowest price during the week was 34 1/16d. ready and forward. India and the Continent were buyers, and China is reported to have both bought and sold.

Bars in stock, 2,622, including Silver Yen 10 lakhs. Stocks of sycee and dollars amounted to Tls. 400½ lakhs and $449½ lakhs, against Tls. 394 lakhs and $439 lakhs last week and Tls. 222 lakhs and $333 lakhs on September 24, 1923.

Exchange.

Exchange left off last week with the official quotation for T.T. at 3/4¼d., to which it dropped from T.T. 3/4½d. on opening after the tiffin interval last Friday. The rate remained there until Thursday, when it was raised to 3/4¾d. The market opened quiet, with sellers of T.T. 3/4⅞d. September/November, 3/4 13/16d. December, but on speculative buying the rate dropped to 3/4⅜d. The market closed at the tiffin interval with sellers T.T. 3/13/16d. September/October, 3/4⅜d. November/December; market quiet and steady, with very little doing. Owing to the local hostilities there have been very few bills making.

THE SILVER MARKET

Reporting from London on August 20, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

The market is still affected by the fairly violent fluctuations of the U.S. exchange, not however in a direct degree. That is to say, the price cannot be depended upon to go down necessarily with each movement of sterling depreciation, or vice versa. The position is that the market keeps unsettled, and the movements of the price are determined by the speculative views of operators. For instance, a considerable business has arisen from China, whence, on the same day, buying and selling orders have come to hand. The market really consists mostly of speculative deals, governed by the various views held as to the future of the U.S. exchange. The Continent has again bought considerably, though sales have also come from that quarter. America is not a free seller (doubtless for reasons indicated in the succeeding paragraph) and the tone of the market, apart from the tendency of the price to vacillate, continues sound.

The following extract is from the "New York Commercial":—

"The Webb-Pomerene law prohibits any export association formed under it from 'artificially or intentionally' affecting prices within the United States, or to 'substantially lessen competition' there. But as American producers export 80 per cent. while domestic consumption is only about 20 per cent. of the domestic and foreign silver coming each year on the New York and United States markets, an export pool would necessarily control both the world and domestic prices. This, in the view of the Department of Justice, whose opinion on the question was sought, would make an export pool's operations illegal. To meet this situation in the silver industry, the law would have to be amended, which is regarded as altogether unlikely. Another peculiarity of the silver smelting business works against an export pool. Unlike copper, the silver smelter buys outright and is the titular owner of all silver and gold in ores. It pays the mine on the basis of the full market price and gold in ores. The smelter cannot afford to risk 'carrying' the metal, it must retain liberty of action to sell each day at the market price its intake. An export pool would pro-rate sales and destroy such liberty of action and would compel 'carrying' the metal. This was one cause of the withdrawal of many members of the Copper Export Association. The leading copper and silver interests are identical. It has been proposed to meet this difficulty by having the mines 'carry' their own silver, as the leading mining companies do with their copper, and to sell through the central agency. It was further proposed by a United States Senator to help the mines and agency 'carry' their product, to amend the Federal Reserve Act of 1917 so as to make not only acceptances for warehoused silver rediscountable, but also notes secured by warehouse receipts for stored (unsold) silver."

The silver quotations to-day for cash and two months delivery are 3d. above those fixed a week ago.

THE GOLD MARKET

Reporting from London on August 20, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

The Bank of England gold reserve against its note issue on the 13th instant amounted to £126,488,585, as compared with £126,488,250 on the previous Wednesday. Only a small quantity of gold was available here this week and it was not sufficient to fill all orders for the Far East.

The following figures show the United Kingdom imports and exports of gold during the month of July:—

	Imports £	Exports £
Netherlands	16,038	1,900

The "Times of India," under date of the 26th ultimo, states:—"The Indian Mining Federation, who consider the rise in sterling exchange a distinctly menacing factor to the Indian coal trade, have written to the Government of India that the situation calls for immediate action ....Whilst the general opinion in Bombay is that exchange should be stabilized at 1s. 4d. gold, the Mining Federation goes further and wants it at 1s. 4d. sterling." In connexion with the above, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas, of the Indian Legislative Council, has given notice of two important Bills aiming at the reversion of the exchange ratio to the old standard of Rs. 15 to the sovereign. The grounds for the proposed alteration of the law are set out as follows:—

The Indian Coinage Act (1906) was amended in 1920 in pursuance of the policy recommended by the Currency and Exchange Committee, and it was declared that the sovereign would be legal tender in India at the rate of Rs. 10 to the sovereign instead of Rs. 15 to the sovereign, which had previously been the legal ratio. Experience of the past four years has now proved that the ratio recommended by the Indian Currency and Exchange Committee is unsuited to the conditions of this country, as the exchange has been much more in the proximity of the old legal ratio than the existing legal ratio during all these years, with the sole exception of 1919-20, when world conditions were abnormal everywhere. It is therefore proposed to reverse the legislation of 1920, and to restore the ratio that prevailed up to the date of that legislation.

EGYPTIAN COTTON

Government Plans to Keep up Prices

Cairo, Sept. 19.

It seems that there is some misunderstanding in regard to the exact terms of the reply of the Minister of Agriculture to the deputation urging Government intervention in the cotton market owing to declining values.

While the Government are prepared, if necessary, to buy up to the extent of 2,000,000 kantars, it is hardly likely that this well be found essential. Indeed prices have already stiffened considerably on the mere announcement of the Government's intentions.

While the Minister did not definitely undertake to intervene in the futures market, a small committee has been appointed to examine the best methods of applying Government intervention.—Reuter.

The total output of the Kailan Mining Administration's mines for the week ending September 13 amounted to 76,554 tons and the sales during the same period, to 64,450 tons.

Public Health Report for August.

VITAL STATISTICS.

The Foreign death-rate is below, the Chinese slightly above, the mean average for August.

COMMUNICABLE DISEASES.

SMALLPOX, TYPHUS FEVER.—No cases reported.

RELAPSING FEVER.—One Chinese case was notified.

INFLUENZA.—Three Chinese deaths were attributed to this disease. No Foreign cases were reported.

ENTERIC FEVER.—Information was received of 9 Foreign cases of Typhoid fever and one of Paratyphoid fever within Settlement limits. Five were Japanese, two Indians, one Filipino, and one a non-resident British seaman. Six were fatal, but the apparently high mortality is due to imperfect notification, as the death certificate was the only notice sent to this office in five cases. The case of Paratyphoid fever was an Indian. This patient, and three of the four notified cases of Typhoid fever had never been inoculated. No information on this point was received in the other notified case.

AMOEBIC DYSENTERY. — Three Foreign cases were notified, and, in addition to these, there was one fatal foreign case: a non-resident.

BACILLARY DYSENTERY.—Nine resident Foreign cases, and two non-resident, were notified. Eight were British, two Indian and one Norwegian. There were no deaths. Eight were due to the Shiga strain of the bacillus and three to the Flexner strain. There were other cases of which no notification was sent.

CHOLERA.—27 Chinese cases were reported, but many of these were diagnosed on clinical grounds only. Seven were confirmed by Laboratory examination, of which only two were from within Settlement limits. Of the 27 reported, ten were residents. Two Chinese deaths were attributed to Cholera within the Settlement, but in one of these the Laboratory examination was negative, and of the other none was made. As Cholera was evidently not prevalent, and negative results had been obtained in many cases clinically resembling cholera, these two were returned as deaths from Acute Diarrhoea.

There were no Foreign deaths attributed to Cholera this month, and no Foreign cases were confirmed by Laboratory examination. Two were notified, (one from the French Settlement), but laboratory examination was negative in both cases.

DIPHTHERIA.—One Foreign case was notified within Settlement limits.

SCARLET FEVER.—Two Chinese cases within Settlement limits were notified. There were no Foreign cases.

TUBERCULOSIS. — Three resident and two non-resident cases of Pulmonary Tuberculosis were reported among the Foreign community. There were three Foreign deaths among residents, and four others who had lived outside the Settlement.

PREVENTIVE MEASURES.

September and October are the months in which Amœbic Dysentery is most prevalent. Amœbic Dysentery differs radically from Bacillary Dysentery, (and from almost every other disease), in the mode of infection. Infection cannot be contracted from the patient while he is suffering from the acute attack; for the so-called 'vegetative' form of amœba, which causes the acute symptoms, is very delicate, and cannot pass alive through the stomach. But when the patient begins to recover from the attack the amœbæ assume another form, and produce enormous numbers of 'cysts.' These cysts are very resistant, and when food infected with them is eaten, they develop into the cyst-forming type of amœbæ in their new host.

These new amœbæ in turn produce thousands of cysts, and so the infection is passed on. The great majority of infected persons never suffer from any symptoms, but they continue to spread the infection for years. They become what are known as 'healthy carriers,' and such 'carriers' are the chief source of infection. But under certain climatic conditions the cyst-forming amœbæ may change back into the 'vegetative' forms, penetrate the tissues and give rise to an attack of amœbic dysentery. The conditions favourable to this change are damp heat with a wide daily variation of temperature: the conditions which lead to 'getting a chill.' If this is avoided, the amœba is practically harmless. This fact probably explains the great reputation of the 'cholera belt' in tropical countries.

FOOD, DAIRIES AND MARKETS DIVISION.

SHANGHAI WATERWORKS WATER SUPPLY.—The usual high standard of purification was maintained, and no local contamination was found anywhere during the month.

ICE-CREAMS.—92 samples were examined, of which at least 67 per cent. were up to standard, and over 20 per cent. were of the first class. From foreign shops and hotels the first-class samples were over 30 per cent. of the number examined, although most of the sampling was done in shops which had already produced unsatisfactory samples. The standard of the Chinese shops was not far behind that of the foreign shops. Unfortunately the examination was complicated by a number of indeterminate results. A standardising bacteriological test must itself be constantly checked and re-standardised to make sure that the results are trustworthy. Early in the month it became evident, from the behaviour of the control tests, that further checks had become necessary before a sample could be condemned with certainty on the results of the test alone. Consequently a number of samples which had given apparently poor results were regarded as doubtful, and fresh samples taken, some of which were found satisfactory by the more elaborate examination. It is probable that the actual number of satisfactory samples was nearly 90 per cent. of the whole. In most cases where an undoubtedly bad result was obtained, some grossly insanitary condition was found. There can be no doubt that the quality of the product in all the better-class establishments has been excellent.

MILK.—122 samples were analysed, of which 115 were up to standard. From 3, a large proportion of the cream had been removed: one was watered and three others were of doubtful purity. The licensees of these dairies are habitual offenders, who are not deterred from the practice by the fine imposed. One has been fined $100 thrice in the last three months. The dairy will be closed at the end of the current quarter.

ICE.—Seven specimens were examined, of which one was unsatisfactory. It was found that the filter had never been cleaned since the plant was installed.

AERATED WATERS.—Eleven specimens were examined: one was not satisfactory, but further samples of the same product were found free from any objectionable contamination. The rest were of very good quality.

MARKETS AND FOODSHOPS.—Over 16,000 pounds of bad fruit and vegetables, cut melon, etc., were confiscated and destroyed.

GENERAL.

THE CARRIER PROBLEM.—One of the two Chinese reported as having died of Cholera was employed in a Chinese restaurant. Eleven of the other employees in this restaurant voluntarily submitted to examination and from one of these an organism was isolated which gave the reactions of the 'El Tor' strain of cholera. This, though not the usual type in Shanghai, is generally considered to be a true cholera vibrio. Though the evidence is not complete, as the original patient was not examined, it is possible that this was an example of what is known as a 'contact-carrier.' These occur in most diseases, but in Cholera and Diphtheria they greatly outnumber the actual cases of the disease, and it is by them that infection is commonly conveyed to the food-supply, and especially to milk. The great majority of milk-borne epidemics have been traced to carriers. It is rare to find a man suffering from an acute attack of Cholera at work in a dairy. The infection is introduced by those who, living in close contact with such a patient, become infected and harbour the organism for a few days, without themselves developing the disease. In some cholera epidemics such 'contact-carriers' have been found to out-number the actual cases of cholera by six to one. Unlike the carriers of Amœbic Dysentery, they remain infectious for a few days only; but during that time they are very dangerous.

LAUNDRIES AND TAILORS SHOPS.—A survey of the Tailors' shops in the Western District showed that most of them were in a very unsatisfactory state, in spite of the ministrations of the Guild. The walls & floors were filthy, and in nearly all bugs were found in the crevices of the work-tables. These conditions have already been remedied to a great extent, but much remains to be done. There has been very little opposition.

The 80 shops in the Northern District (wrongly reported last month as 37), are maintaining their standard. Of the licensed laundries cutside the Settlement beyond the Western District, two only are up to the standard required inside the Settlement; the others are taking advantage of their situation to evade their obligations under the license conditions. A number of residents have asked for reports on the condition of the laundries they patronize; and when these are situated outside the Settlement it is certainly advisable to do so.

MOSQUITOES.—2,626 larvae from all parts of the Settlement were examined and no Anopheles were found among them. The 'mosquito fish' introduced in the Spring have multiplied well, and have been very effective in ridding the ponds, where they have been placed, of mosquito larvae.

COFFIN-DUMPING.—At the request of this Department, the Chinese authorities removed over 100 coffins and exposed corpses from the Kiaochow Road area during the month.

COMPANY MEETINGS

SHANGHAI PAHANG RUBBER ESTATE

Annual General Meeting

The eleventh annual meeting of shareholders in the Shanghai Pahang Rubber Estates, Ld., was held on Thursday at the offices of the secretaries and general managers, Messrs. A. R. Burkill & Sons. Mr. M. Speelman presided, supported by Pere Sallou and Mr. A. W. Burkill, directors, and the attendance represented 32,350 shares.

The notice convening the meeting, and the auditor's report, having been read:

The Chairman said: Gentlemen: The planted area of the estate remains at 754 acres, the same as the previous year. During the year 277 acres were brought into the tapping round, but while the whole of the planted area is shown in the report as "Producing" several fields have not yet been opened up for tapping as it was not necessary to tap over the whole area to obtain our allowance. The felling of the new block of 162 acres adjoining Inverawe Division was completed in December last and in order to comply with the conditions of the grant, this area will require to be planted up by March 15, 1925.

The cost of production was slightly higher than the previous year, principally due to the reduced output brought about by restriction measures and to the fact that the weeding of the whole Estate has this year been charged to revenue, whereas last year the weeding of the 1917-1918 plantings was charged to capital.

The report contains very full information regarding the crop statistics and as regards the working of the estate, there is very little for me to comment upon. The estate is in an exceedingly well weeded condition and this augurs well for a reduction in weeding costs which were high owing to the abnormal weather conditions. The position as regards disease is normal and the trees for the most part are healthy and free from disease and bark renewals are ample and healthy. The labour position is easy and the health of the force throughout the year has been particularly good.

Prices throughout the year have had a downward tendency but thanks to a forward sale of 21 tons monthly during the first part of our financial year at a price of 66⅜ cents per pound, the profit for the year compares very favourably with that of the previous year. The profit, after making the usual allowance for depreciation, amounts to Tls. 7,154.45 which, added to the amount of Tls. 8,459.18 brought forward from last year's accounts, leaves us with a total of Tls. 15,613.63 standing at credit of profit and loss account. With regard to the distribution of this amount, the Directors regret that owing to the undertain conditions prevailing, they are unable to recommend a dividend and feel sure that shareholders will agree that the present is no time to make any distribution of cash funds. If the present improvement is maintained, the Directors will give every consideration to the payment of a dividend at the first opportunity.

Forward sales of three tons monthly October/December at a price of 49 cents and two tons monthly January/December 1925 at a price of 50 cents per lb. f. o. b. have been made.

Mr. Birkemose, our manager, is away on a well-earned holiday and the estate is in charge of Mr. Horswill, and I would like to take this opportunity of expressing the Directors' appreciation of the good work done by both these gentlemen as well as that of Major G. Nevil Stevens, our visiting agent.

That is all I have to say, gentlemen, but if any shareholder has any questions to ask, I shall be pleased to answer to the best of my ability.

The following resolutions were formally carried:—

Proposed by Mr. Speelman, seconded by Mr. Burkill: That the report and accounts for the year ended June 30, 1924 as presented be accepted.

Proposed by Mr. Speelman, seconded by Mr. Burkill: That the amount at credit of Profit & Loss Account, viz: Tls. 15,613.63 be appropriated as follows:—

SHANGHAI KELANTAN RUBBER ESTATES, LD.

Liquidator's Report

A general meeting of the Shanghai Kelantan Rubber Estates, Ld. (in liquidation) was held at the offices of Messrs. Seth, Mancel & McLure on Wednesday, when the liquidator's report was presented to shareholders.

Mr. McLure, the liquidator, said: This meeting is called to comply with the provisions of the Companies Ordinances of Hongkong which require that in the event of a winding up continuing for more than one year, the liquidator shall summon a general meeting of the company at the end of the each year from the commencement of the winding-up, and shall lay before the meeting an account of his acts and dealings and of the conduct of the winding-up during the preceding year.

The receiver for the debenture holders has continued carrying on the estate as a going concern, and the liquidators, as such, have no transactions to record.

At the last general meeting accounts up to June 30, 1923, were submitted. The account now before you is for the period July 1, 1923, to June 30, 1924. The balance sheet and profit and loss account as at June 30, 1924, is now on the table for your inspection, and I shall be pleased to answer any questions thereon which you may wish to ask.

Mr. McClure also stated that any shareholder could obtain a copy of the accounts on application to the liquidator.

A small exhibition has been arranged in the King's Library of the British Museum of some of the earliest maps of the British Dominions. Besides the general interest pertaining to the history of discovery and of cartography, certain of the maps have an additional attraction from their delineating the first British settlements and, in some cases, giving the names of the settlers.

THE Dairy Farm, Ice and Cold Storage Co., Ld., in Hongkong has volunteered to come to Shanghai's rescue in the remote possibility of a serious shortage of food supplies. The company, says a Hongkong paper, have more than sufficient frozen meat to meet the requirements of the Colony and have offered to supply Shanghai from their surplus. No definite reply has yet been received and telegraphic correspondence is taking place regarding quotations.

A NEW CHURCH IN SHANGHAI

Seventh Day Adventists: Jubilee of Foreign Missions: What They Have Done

The Seventh-day Adventists of Shanghai have just opened a new church on Range Road. The opening service was held at 10.30 a.m. on September 20. The land and buildings represent an expenditure of nearly Tls. 60,000. The seating capacity of the auditorium is about 500.

The opening of this new church happens to come just at the time when Seventh-day Adventist churches throughout the world are celebrating their jubilee year of foreign missionary endeavour. Fifty years ago, this September, the Seventh-day Adventists in America sent their first representative across the seas. The Rev. J.N. Andrews left at that time for Switzerland. The membership of the denomination in North America was then only 7.000, literature was being printed in English only, and but three small periodicals were being published. One training school was being conducted and the whole denominational investment was but $38,712.53, U.S. Currency, an amount insufficient to erect one such church property as has just been completed here in Shanghai 50 years later.

This denomination has had a remarkable growth. To-day it is carrying on work in 115 countries. The working force has continued to increase until in 1921, when the last complete statistical report was compiled, there were 14,389 evangelistic and institutional workers carrying forward their work in a total of 194 languages.

This church has laid much emphasis upon the importance of the printed page. From a beginning of one small publishing house 50 years ago, with an output of three periodicals and a few small books and pamphlets, this branch of denominational activity has grown to a total of 51 publishing houses and branches, which have a total investment in up-to-date machinery and other equipment of $4,221,575. 72, U. S. Currency. 154 periodicals in 114 different languages are now being printed by these publishing houses. Their publishing house at 25 Ningkuo Road, Shanghai, has the distinction of publishing the most widely circulated religious magazine in all China, sending out more than 40,000 copies of this magazine a month.

A Growing Revenue.

Contributions for the work of the church have increased by leaps and bounds. During the 10 years from 1912 to 1922, the offerings of the church members for foreign missions totalled $17,583,760.91, U. S. Currency, while the contributions for all purposes during that decade amounted of $62,590,778.53, or a per capita of $39.86 each year. During the past three years nearly Tls. 400,000 a year has been appropriated to the work in China.

Sanitariums and hospitals have been established in the United States, England, Canada, South America, Australia, India, China, Japan, Korea, Norway, Sweden, and Africa. Each year more than 200,000 patients are treated. Dr. A. W. Truman, the medical secretary of the denomination, says that only shortage of funds prevents the establishment of many more such institutions in response to the urgent appeals which are coming from all sides.

It was in 1874, the year when the first representative was sent to a foreign country, that Seventh-day Adventists opened their first training school. To-day they are operating five colleges, six junior colleges, three seminaries, 53 academies, and 672 elementary schools, with a total enrolment of 22,600 students. These schools are scattered throughout the United States, in the African wilds, in the jungles of India, in Japan, Manchuria, South America, China, Europe, and Australia. Of these schools, China has one junior college, eight intermediate schools, and 93 primary schools, with an enrolment of 3,721 students. According to Prof. W. E. Howell, secretary of the Educational Department, "the aim of these schools is to develop the spiritual life, train for service to mankind, and equip for the practical duties of every day living."

Though work did not begin in Europe until just 50 years ago, it is now being carried on in every country in that continent. The latest figures indicate a membership of 67,500.

From China to Peru.

Such a remarkable work is being done for the Indians of Peru, Ecuador, and Bolivia that mention of it is constantly being made in the newspapers. A leading newspaper of Guayasuil, Ecuador, says that the efforts of the Adventists "are for the education and redemption of the Indian race, and that their activities include the teaching of the Indians to read and write and giving medical aid to the suffering, all of these services being absolutely gratis."

In speaking of the purpose of this denomination. C. K. Meyers, secretary of the Foreign Mission Board, says: "We are trying to hasten the work of God on earth. Fifty years ago we being in obscurity, poverty, and weakness, by sending out our first representative, and now, under the blessing of God, our missionaries are in nearly every land. Our work is known by the people of every land, and increasing support is yearly given by friends of our cause.

"With convictions born of a study of the sure word of prophecy, we have declared that the plan of God will be quickly consummated even in this generation."

THE WAR AND TRADE

Chinese Newspapers Badly Hit: No Lack of News but No Advertisements!

One effect of the war has been the dwindling size of the Chinese newspapers. While the news columns are of course dominated by war items, reports on other matters, though not lacking, have had to be condensed to save space for tidings of a mortal character. On the whole, "copy" in the news columns does not appear to have diminished much in quantity.

In respect of advertisements, a somewhat dismal tale has to be told. Even from the leading Chinese papers, many of the trade notices and other advertisements, it is noticeable, have suddenly disappeared. Perhaps with the exception of advertisements of patent medicines and cigarettes, and notices of theatrical performances, and various kinds of amusements, one may safely say that from one-fourth to one-third of the bona-fide trade advertisements usually appearing in the Chinese papers has been withdrawn as the result of the war.

Even the "Shunpao" and the "Sinwanpao," two leading Chinese papers, have reduced their daily issue to four sheets. They usually give the public five or six sheets a day and, in addition, the "Shunpao" used now and again to issue a supplement on some special subject as the "Automobile Supplement" or "Sunday Supplement."

Several other papers, including the "Shanghai Journal of Commerce," are now issuing only three sheets a day, when ordinarily they issued four sheets.

It is of course understood that by trade advertisements, we refer chiefly to those inserted by Chinese firms and merchants, mostly local, big foreign firms naturally not yet feeling the effect of the civil war to such an extent as to justify the withdrawal of their advertisements.

Mr. Sheng Ping-chi, Manager of the Bank of Communications, who has been Chairman of the Chinese Banking Association of Shanghai for two years, handed the latter post over to Mr. Nyi Yuan-fu, the newly elected Chairman at noon on Thursday. Mr. Sheng made a felicitous speech, complimenting the Association on obtaining the services of such an able and experienced banker as Mr. Nyi to direct its affairs.

CHILD STREET HAWKERS

Russian School in Avenue Foch: How to Get the Children Off the Street

The little Russian School at 721 Avenue Foch is again on its feet, if not permanently at least for some months to come. This rescue from extinction through penury is the result of good work done and financial aid provided by "Rex" and other friends. That ever-ready benefactor of needy and deserving institutions, the Shanghai Race Club, has also handsomely helped with a subscription of $100, guaranteed monthly for six months.

But most of this money has been given on the understanding that the school shall take in the Russian child hawkers from the streets. And the school is ready to do so, the only difficulty now being how to shift the children out of the street into the school. This task is not so easy as it may seem. The poor mites who offer you chocolate, or whatever it is they carry in their trays, are too small and helpless to have any say in the matter themselves. Members of the School Committee and others have talked with the relatives and tried to persuade these people to take the children to the school; but the answer in every case is, "Find us work so that we need not be dependent on the children's earnings and then we will let them go."

Whilst sympathy may be felt for these adults their misfortune would seem no sound reason why little ones, five, six and seven years of age, should be forced to stand in the streets in all sorts of weather and at all hours of the day and night. At least one of these children is known to be in bad health. She has been already in hospital twice. Housed in the school she would have not only shelter, food and teaching, but also medical attention, for the health of the children is being cared for by Dr. Kazakoff, the school's President.

It is to be hoped that soon the Police will take a paternal hand in the matter, for hawking without licence is contrary to Municipal regulations, and official suggestion would carry far greater weight with the children's guardians than anything anyone else can say—unless it be the magistrate at the Mixed Court.

A visit to the school one evening this week proved well worth while. The children, at present 22 boys and eight girls, were at their evening meal when the visitors arrived, the meal consisting of dry bread and a cup of Horlick's Malted Milk, the latter a gift from Shanghai's local agent for this valuable food. But only a few bottles of "Horlick's" are left. In case anyone should wonder why the children are provided with such meagre diet it should be remembered that the school is being run on an estimated cost of $10 per month per head, this sum paying for rent, light, water, taxes, food, school utensils and exceedingly small stipends granted to one or two of the teachers.

Despite the poorness of their fare the 30 boys and girls looked well and cheerful—especially the latter. And their deportment was excellent, likewise their singing when they sang their grace after food. The director of the school, Mr. Schelkin, a University of Petrograd man, was formerly Chief Inspector of Schools throughout a vast area of Siberia terminating at Vladivostok. Now, perforce, he gives his services to this little Shanghai Russian school free. Mr. Shelkin showed us his small stock of copy books, pencils, etc. With 30 boarders and 12 day scholars to provide for—and later the child hawkers from the street when they come in—these supplies will not last long. A great need is slates and pencils, and if funds permit, a purchase of these will be made some day. But, unaccustomed to its newfound "affluence," the school feels that it must go slow, for the Race Club subscription is only guaranteed for six months—so far, although a few others are promised for a whole year.

On the first floor is the boys' dormitory, which also, when it has been swept and tidied, serves as a class room. The floor above is devoted to the girls and their mistress, who not only teaches them needlework but also mothers them in all other ways.

The outstanding features which strike the visitor are the strict clearliness everywhere and the extraordinary way in which it is found possible to make very little do. There are no mats on the floors, there are insufficient chairs, stools, bed coverings—just to name but a few things that strike the casual roving eye of a mere man. If any lady reader wishes to complete the list of "wants" let her go to look for herself. Visitors are always welcome at 721 Avenue Foch. The school's honorary treasurer is Mr. I. Vouich and his address is 10 Route Voyron; this for the information of kindly readers who may wish to send along contributions to help buy those much-needed slates and pencils and other things.

HOW THE SETTLEMENT IS RINGED ROUND

Every Entrance into Chinese Territory Barricaded with Barbed Wire

One of the most interesting expeditions to take at the present time is to drive round the boundaries of the Settlement. The average citizen is astonished at the thoroughness with which the border between Shanghai and Chapei and Paoshan, and on the French side, between the French Concession and the Chinese City, is barricaded.

Along Boundary Road every little alleyway leading into Chinese territory is blocked with barbed wire, carefully and scientifically threaded on the trestles. Sikh and Chinese police are on duty on this side to prevent anyone from passing in and out, whilst spare barbed wire is laid along the roads ready to put into use at a moment's notice.

The railway station presents an extraordinarily deserted appearance. The approaches are bare of human beings with the exception of one or two Chinese sentries who keep their guard in full marching order. A "North-China Daily News" representative, who happened to be in uniform (though without arms) was turned back, firmly though politely, by the sentry when he attempted to enter the station. It is interesting to note, however, that he was allowed to pass freely in other of the native territory, though both Settlement and Chinese city police were on duty on their respective sides of the barricades. American sailors, also, were to be seen wandering freely round the native quarter.

The French Concession is equally well guarded. Every bridge leading over Siccawei Creek has its guards of armed French marines or police. The smaller bridges have just plain barbed wire and a guard of two, or perhaps three men. The large bridges, however, have not only the barbed wire, but are littered up with stones and lumps of wood in such a way as to make them extremely difficult to negotiate. An armoured car is on duty near St. Catherine's Bridge, so that if soldiers were to attempt to cross the creek by means of sampans the car could be quickly on the scene.

PORTUGESE CRUISER'S ARRIVAL

A Detachment Landed

A detachment from the Portuguese gunboat Patria, which arrived a few days ago, landed last Friday afternoon to participate in the general scheme of defence of the Settlement.

The detachment is at present quartered at the Club Lusitano, where the sailors have received a warm welcome from the Portuguese community.

It is understood that the gunboat's arrival was in response to a wire to the Macao authorities from Mr. Casanova, the Portuguese Consul-General, to send a man-of-war to Shanghai.

A telegram has been received by the Admiral Line Pacific Steamship Co. from its head office, stating that the 160 Chinese students from Tsinghua and other colleges in China, who left Shanghai in the President Jefferson on August 23, have been permitted to land at Seattle. They proceeded to their various universities without encountering any difficulties under the new Immigration Law.

THE S.V.C. AND ITS WORK

How the Volunteers' Defence Duties and Hours on Guard are Arranged

The Shanghai Volunteer Corps still remains on duty, though in skeleton form, to protect the Settlement, and can be mobilized at full strength within the hour at any moment. The different units have been working steadily and hard during the last fortnight, and, as stated in Notes and Comments, the thanks of the community are due to them for all they have done and are doing.

At certain periods during the war the whole Corps has been on duty, almost to a man, standing at its posts and awaiting anxiously, and if the truth be told, for the most part hopefully, for developments. Each unit has been given a definite post on some section of the boundaries of the Settlement, linking up on each side either with another unit of the S. V. C. or with a landing party from one of the men-of-war in harbour. The men on the boundaries have been allotted to convenient billets wherever possible in the vicinity. Generally speaking, two-thirds of the unit has been off duty, but standing by in the billets, while the remainder is actually on patrol work or sentry-go at some salient point, such as the bridges over the Soochow Creek and the main roads leading into the Settlement. Reliefs are arranged in such a way that each man does two hours on and four hours off.

When the situation has not been so serious, and the imminence of danger to the Settlemnt less, 10 men from each unit have been required to stand by in billets during the day, and half the unit by night, thus allowing skeleton guards to be posted where required, and incidentally giving the police some relief from their extra duties.

Of the mounted units, the Light Horse and the American Troop have been used as patrol in the western district, while the Field Artillery Battery and the Machine Gunners have been held in reserve at the Race Course and Headquarters respectively.

On Wednesday a new order was issued requiring units to occupy their billets from 7 p.m. to 7 a.m. only, thus freeing every volunteer during the day.

The expense to which the ratepayers have been put in calling upon the Volunteer Corps for these duties amounts to providing them with food only. A capitation advance of, we believe, $3 per day is allowed for each man who is on duty, who takes all his meals in billets. Each unit at the present time is left to the tender mercies of its Quartermaster as far as arranging for meals is concerned: if that worthy is a good man for the post the men are in luck, if not . . . . . .

POLICE PATROLLING THE RIVER

Gang of Coolies Kidnapped for War Work Turned Back on Soochow Creek

The Shanghai Municipal Police, following the precedent established during the troubles in 1913, now have taken over the duty of patrolling the river in the neighbourhood of the Soochow Creek, using a launch on which there flies the Municipality's flag. Apparently one of the chief purposes is to put a stop to the transportation up the creek of impressed coolies. Very shortly after the patrol had been established a large lighter came along in charge of a Chinese police inspector, with over 50 hapless coolies on board, all pressgang victims. This lighter was stopped by the police launch and turned back, despite all the threats of the Chinese inspector. He then lodged a complaint with another service over which a foreigner presides, but it is understood that he was politely and firmly told that unusual conditions existed and that as a consequence unusual precautions had to be taken and that if he cared to argue with superior force he must assume the responsibility himself.

FIERCE FIRE ON THE EDMORE

Serious Outbreak While Lying at Dollar Wharf: Great Damage Inflicted

Fire was discovered in the No. 4 hold of the Admiral Line str. Edmore, while moored at the Dollar Wharf on Tuesday afternoon, which required the attention of half-a-dozen fire fighting units to extinguish. The flames, first noticed by a member of the crew, were seen at 1.30 o'clock and immediately the call of fire was despatched to the wharf office and the municipal brigades notified. In the meanwhile the crew of the Edmore under the leadership of Captain Johnson turned to with the ship's equipment and streams were directed at the seat of the trouble, which appeared to be between decks. Mr. F. Palmer, superintendent of the Dollar interests at Pootung, got out the dock apparatus, and, handicapped as they were by the absence of the water tower, which it will be remembered fell down several weeks ago, the staff used pumps to get water from the river.

Attracted to the scene by the fire, the American sailors from the U. S. destroyer 345 brought that ship's equipment into action; the crew, under the active command of Cmdr. Kimmel, worked the entire afternoon assisting the work and doing invaluable service.

Owing to the distance from Shanghai it was some time before the fire float Hu Ning, with Captain Longworth, Assistant Harbour Master, commanding, arrived, while the Shanghai Fire Brigade under Chief Officer Pett, suffered a similar handicap.

Danger from Fuel Oil.

The combined forces, however, had no easy matter of the fight and the situation of the flames, tween decks and near the engine room bulkhead, made the battle all the more stern. A further danger existed in the proximity of the fuel oil, no less than 6,000 barrels, and the intense heat bore very hardly on the men who struggled to keep the flames from the tanks below.

Though the firemen poured water from a dozen nozzles into the mass of smoking and burning cargo, little result appeared to come of their efforts and at one time it was thought best to move the Edmore into the stream away from the wharf, but as soon as the firemen slackened at all, preparatory to the move, the flames burst out more strongly, and at last it was thought best to continue where the vessel was tied up, until the greater danger had passed. Though the sides of the ship in many places were red hot, a force of men worked to cut through the steel plates, which operation permitted water to be centred upon the flames directly. This accomplished, the fire was got under control to a greater degree and shortly after 6 p.m. it was felt that the worst was over. At. 7.30 o'clock Chief Officer Pett gave the order for the Shanghai Brigade to return to the Settlement, while the Customs float left about the same hour.

While directing the lines from a point below, Sub-officer J. G. Shaw was struck in the eye by a nozzle that got free and was swinging and he had to be removed to hospital. The wound is a bad one but there is no danger of his losing the sight of the left eye.

The cargo at the seat of the fire appears to have been mainly lumber and other general stuff, while below in the hold were stored 2,400 bags of flour and dunnage, the most of which has been ruined by the water and fire. At a late hour on Tuesday officials of the company could not state the amount of the damage done to the cargo, while marine surveyors could not approach the vessel to ascertain what will be required to repair the ship, which had been towed into the river. It is understood that the refrigeration plant has been entirely wrecked.

One rather fortunate point about the fire may be mentioned. Had the ship got to sea—she was due to leave at 3 p. m., and was waiting for the tide, when the flames were noticed—it is questionable whether the crew could have managed the trouble alone. The Edmore has been unlucky of late. On a recent trip from America, while in a storm in the Japan Sea, she hit a reef, and fears were entertained in Shanghai for several days for the safety of both crew and vessel.

"AND FOR THE LAND'S SAKE, BOYS, DON'T CALL ME 'CAP'"
Captain Olson addresses the American Co., S.V.C., prior to inspection by the Colonel

Splendid Work by St. Sampson and St. Aubin

At the time the Shanghai Tug & Lighter Company received a call for assistance—1.57 p.m.,—the St. Sampson and St. Aubin were at their customary moorings below Pootung Point. The call for help was passed by telephone to the tugs at a fraction before two o'clock, and within three minutes from the time of receipt of the message the tugs had left their moorings and were on their way to the Edmore at the Dollar Wharf. When the tugs arrived at the Edmore at 2.17 p.m. a U.S. destroyer had already gone alongside to tender what help it could. Without any delay, the St. Sampson and St. Aubin brought to bear on the fire powerful jets of water from four 2 in. hoses, and also had available, for immediate use, two portable Drysdale pumps to be used for flooding the vessel if necessary. The fire-float Hu-ning arrived shortly after the St. Sampson and St. Aubin, and the Municipal Fire Brigade under Chief Officer Pett came soon afterwards.

The St. Sampson and St. Aubin continued with the other fire-fighting units in attacking the fire. At 2.55 p.m. the St. Sampson left the Edmore to find a berth for that vessel, as it was considered dangerous that she should stay at the wharf. She returned to the assistance of the St. Aubin and the fire-floats, and work went on without cessation—except for a short period to allow of the American destroyer coming from the side of the Edmore, till 4.30 p.m. when the fire was more or less under control. At 5.5 p.m. the Edmore was towed from the dock and taken by the two tugs to a mooring opposite the Kiangnan Arsenal, where she was tied up, with the fire practically extinguished, by 6.30 p.m.

THE "Blue Lantern," which is approaching its first anniversary, has some attractive features for September. The Ku Klux Klan having figured largely in American politics of late and in a distinctly attenuated though to Shanghai no less interesting local form, the article by L. M. Cramer gives a good idea of the history of Klan. In this issue will be found two translations of Chinese poetry by Moon Kuan, a young Chinese who went to America when he was 15 and apparently has now discarded his Muse for motion-pictures. The specimens published are English versions of two poems of the eighth century A. D. and are admirably paraphrased. There is much other entertaining matter of the light fiction order which will no doubt find a large circle of appreciative Shanghai readers.

ARMED ROBBERS ACTIVE

Three Raids and Two Victims in Hospital—Week-end Toll

Three armed robberies occurred during the week-end. On Saturday morning a couple of thieves visited an exchange shop in Seward Road and got away with $383, of which $120 belonged to an unfortunate customer who unluckily was in the shop at the time.

Two Chinese were seriously wounded in a similar affair which occurred at an exchange shop in Alabaster Road. Here $75 was collected, and when the robbers had departed, an assistant ran along the alleyway blowing a police whistle. He was shot at by one of the robbers who had remained "on guard" while the affair was in progress, and sustained wounds in the jaw and left arm. Police now on the scene gave chase and the robbers made a dash for Chapei. On the way, one of them fired at a police constable, missed him, and hit a Chinese walking along near Thibet Road bridge, the bullet striking the man in the head. The three culprits escaped over the boundary.

The third raid took place in Sinza Road, where four men visited a compradore's house and demanded $5,000. They were told there was no money in the house, but managed to find $268, and with this they walked off. One shot was fired, but no danage was done.

WEDDING

Hutchison—Parker

A very pretty wedding was solemnized at the Church of the Sacred Heart on Saturday afternoon, when Miss Mabel Lilian Parker, daughter of the late Mr. W. L. Parker of the Chinese Maritime Customs and Mrs. Parker, was married to Mr. William Hutchinson, Jr., of Shanghai. The bride, who was given away by Mr. M. Stefanis, looked charming in a buffet Spanish lace dress trimmed with orange blossoms. The bridal bouquet was of white carnations. The bridesmaid, Miss Agnes Anderson, wore a handsome dress of lavendar georgette and white poke bonnet, and carried a bouquet of pink carnations. The two little flower-girls were dressed in frilled yellow georgette. Mr. Hutchinson was supported by Mr. Claude Taylor as best man.

The reception took place at the home of the bridegroom, 35, Tongshan Road, where a large gathering of friends wished Mr. and Mrs. Hutchinson all happiness. Mr. Taylor proposed the toast of the bride, to which the groom suitably responded. The beautiful selection of presents on view testified to the popularity of the happy young couple.

"A" CO., S.V.C. AGAIN OPEN TO ALL

A Reversion to the Old Title of Mih-ho-loong Rifles: Italian Company Re-organized

It will be noted with satisfaction that there are signs in this week's Municipal Gazette of the S.V.C. gaining some much-needed numerical strength. There have been complaints that men of certain nationalities—particularly Scandinavians—were unable to find places in any of the S.V.C. infantry units, but "A" Company once more is to extend hospitable arms to all comers, provided of course that they are men who will worthily uphold the proud traditions of the Mih-ho-loongs. The official notification follows:—

"On the request of members of "A" Company, British, and the recommendation of the Commandant, the Council has sanctioned an application by the Officer Commandnig the Company that the Company should revert to its former designation, viz., "A" Company (the Mih-Ho-Loong Rifles), omitting the word "British," and that the Company be opened to recruitment from suitable persons of non-British nationality."

Another pleasing item of news is the following:—

"Upon the application of N. U. Comm. G. de Rossi, Consul-General for Italy, the Italian Company of the Volunteer Corps, which was recently disbanded, has now been re-organized and its offer of service has been accepted by the Council."

Unofficially we understand that the Italian Company either has, or shortly will have, approximately 40 men, and if that is so no one will be able to say that the Italian community is not doing its bit, for that must be a very big percentage of the eligible men. The Italians have made a speedy and highly creditable recovery from their Volunteer slump and it is to hoped that never again will they find it necessary to embark upon a campaign of intensive recruiting.

Again unofficially, it is known that a determined attempt is being made to find ways and means of bringing together all the Scandinavians, and possibly also the Dutch, to form in combination an additional S.V.C. unit. This would remove one cause of argument of long standing and one can believe that the unit would be very strong and efficient.

MR. C. P. Yin, Managing Director of the Shanghai-Nanking Railway, is reported to have submitted his resignation to the Ministry of Communications.

ECHO OF NEWSPAPER OFFICE SUICIDE

Deceased Girl's Mother's Fresh Appeal for Justice: Dr. Tong on Bail?

Dr. F. C. Tong, formerly connected with the "Shanghai Journal of Commerce" who was arrested and imprisoned in connexion with the suicide of Miss Hsi Shan-chen, a clerk employed in the office of the "Journal", has been released on bail, according to the Chinese press. Tong was also suspected of being involved in Bolshevik propaganda, with the result that shortly after his conviction and incarceration in an ordinary gaol, he was removed to the Defence Commissioner's yamên at Lunghua.

It is reported by the local Chinese newspapers that the mother of the deceased Miss Hsi has again "appealed for justice" to the Tungtingshan Association. She first expressed gratitude for assistance previously received from the Association, which led to the conviction and sentence of defendant to a term of imprisonment. Judgment also went against him in a civil suit, the Court ordering him to return the money fraudulently obtained from her daughter. The petitioner points out that neither the criminal or civil judgments could be executed before Tong was removed to the yamên of the Military Commissioner. Both judgments have remained in abeyance and the injustice she and her daughter suffered has continued unavenged. As she has learnt from the press that Tong has been released on bail, she prays her fellow-townsmen to complete the kind work which they undertook before in compassion of her helpless condtion.

WHY OPERATE FOR PILES?

Pain, Swelling and Inflammation Quickly Banished by Zam-Buk.

Those rescued from the weakening agony of Piles by Zam-Buk are best able to describe the marvellous soothing and healing of this great herbal balm. Besides its instant allaying of the burning, itching irritation, Zam-Buk relieves congestion and checks the bleeding. All swelling, soreness and inflammation vanish and the piles themselves gradually disappear where Zam-Buk is persisted with.

Mr. W. A. Coe, of Ixworth, Suffolk, England, writes:—"During the thirteen years I was in the British Navy I suffered terrible torture through piles. They were, at their worst the three years I was on the China and Indies stations and the surgeon had to operate. The result wasn't a success and, when discharged from the Navy, I was still suffering from the old complaint. Then I heard about the great healing power of Zam-Buk and sent for a box.

"I derived such instant relief from Zam-Buk that I needed no persuasion to continue the treatment. Gradually the inflammation and shooting pains become less troublesome and the burning irritation passed away altogether. Now, thanks to Zam-Buk, the piles have been completely banished."

Zam-Buk is of the highest standard of purity both in a medicinal and religious sense. It is a precious balm prepared from rare herbal extracts of marvellous curative virtue in all such skin diseases as ringworm, eczema, prickly heat, Dhobie's itch, bad legs, ulcers, boils, abscesses and swellings, foot troubles, cuts, bruises, burns, scalds, insect bites, and other injuries.

Medicine dealers and dispensaries everywhere sell Zam-Buk, by post from agents: Messrs. Wakefield & Co. (China), Ltd., Szechuen Road, Shanghai.

"THE UNIQUENESS OF MISSIONARIES"

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I am one of those missionaries who read Mr. Peffer's article in your issue of August 30 on "The Uniqueness of Missionaries" with great "interest and enjoyment" as you expected "both missionaries and their opponents" would do.

It is always interesting and beneficial to try to see ourselves as others see us, and although we missionaries may feel sometimes that our critics do not quite understand all our circumstances, yet many of us learn useful lessons from their criticisms, and are therefore grateful for their help.

Mr. Peffer, it seems to me, has written very kindly on behalf of the missionaries and with great insight, but when he speaks of "Missionaries and business men remaining strangers and mutually hostile," and says that "wherever they are they belong to different worlds," I cannot but feel that his experience (though unfortunately perhaps quite true in some cases) has been limited and rather one-sided. I feel also that he is speaking of a condition that was more prevalent 20 years ago than now, and I would like to say something about the friendliness and goodwill between missionaries and non-missionaries in many parts of China, and of the many kindnesses shown by the latter to the former.

For This Relief.

Even 35 years ago when I first came to China some of the merchants were our best friends, and several of the very same still remain so. They have not only given us financial help, but have gone out of their way to show hospitality—to put their launches at our disposal, to send us newspapers and magazines, to attend our school sports and prize-givings, and to give voluntary help in teaching music and English, or in organizing Boy Scouts in our schools. There are pastimes and amusements in which, because of the late hours at which they are held, if for no other reason, our non-missionary friends would themselves not expect us to take a share, for they know that our work begins at a very early morning hour and that it would suffer if we did not live a somewhat restricted life.

It is not surprising that some of the adverse criticism of missionaries has been made "in the smoking-room and as deck gossip," and this is probably due to two reasons. The first of these Mr. Peffer gives when he says of non-missionaries that "not one in 20 has ever had an unbroken hour's conversation with a missionary, or made the smallest first-hand observation of his work." It does, at least, seem a pity that the Englishman who generally prides himself upon fair play should condemn in so wholesale a manner a class of workers about whom he has so little first-hand knowledge: and would it not be fairer if he made it his business to become personally better acquainted before allowing himself to pronounce judgment? When he has been willing to give time frankly to discuss missions with a missionary his preconceived ideas have often changed, and he has not only altered his opinion, but has put his hand into his pocket and helped the worker whom he once adversely criticized, to carry on his work.

The financial help given by members of the British Chambers of Commerce to many Mission Institutions may not be generally known, nor the fact that, at the annual meeting of the Associated Chambers, when passing the recommendation that the balance of the British share of the Boxer Indemnity should be used for educational work, the feeling of a large majority of the members was that missionaries should be allowed a very considerable say in how the money should be apportioned.

Let Bygones Go.

The second reason for the adverse criticism is that we deserve it. We have often made ourselves objectionable to the merchant, less, however, I hope, now, than in years gone by. I remember, on the steamer which first brought me to China, the constant hymn-singing on the public deck, without any consideration as to whether it was annoying others, and how the non-missionaries were expected to take an interest in, and attend the missionary meetings on board, though it was considered quite wrong for the missionary to attend concerts given by the non-missionary passengers.

Such an atmosphere of lack of sympathy and social intercourse rarely, I believe, exists now. And we would ask the non-missionary to forget the past and to walk over the bridge that now spans the gulf, more frequently.

In the paragraph headed:—"Missionary Religion," Mr. Peffer says, "it is this that has much to do with the wall that separates the missionary and his non-missionary co-national." This partly comes from no attempt being made to try to understand each other's view-point. The missionary, far from appearing very saintly to the non-missionary often appears very irreverent, though he is far from thinking that he does. I remember how irreverent much of the hymn singing, the exclamations of "Hallelujah, Praise the Lord," (in place of a silent thanksgiving) and even the disputes over the reading of the Bible (for it could not be called study) were to me, a missionary, many years ago. But now one believes that it was a great deal due to temperament and habit, and tries to understand the deep sincerity of one's fellow missionaries.

I am glad that Mr. Peffer wrote his feelings so frankly about missionaries' prayers, the "Brother Smith" type is equally trying to many missionaries at first, but is it not possible to learn to appreciate and be able to join in both kinds of prayer, though still perhaps feeling that they are not necessarily equally suitable for all groups of worshippers. Mr. Peffer expresses his dislike of being egotistical, but the offerer of the prayer mentioned deserved no implication of egotism, as he was not praying for his own furlough but for that of the sojourner within his gates.

Live and Let Live.

Temperament, habit, the psychology of our varied minds are responsible for many of the barriers between us, but after all are we not rather foolish to think so much of the method of approach to the King of Kings, so long as we do really see Him? One man may feel more at home catching a sight of King George from a ten-guinea reserved seat, than he would from a lamp post while another would prefer a lamp-post, but I doubt if the heart of the man in the ten-guinea seat would be any more aglow than that of the one who had as near a view from the lamp-post.

If only we would have more of the spirit of "live and let live" and keep our eyes straight on the goal for which all Christians are aiming, namely, our Lord Jesus Christ Himself, how many of the present day controversies would cease, and differences pale in the Light of His Glory.

Episcopalian and non-conformist, modernist and fundamentalist, high church and low would all try to be more sympathetic with one another, and try to find out the numerous points upon which they do agree, rather than constantly dwell upon those about which they differ.

All sides of a truth should be appreciated, but is it not a foretaste of that land" where sects no more abide," and the greatest proof of what we so often sing, "O God, how wonderful Thou are," when any of His children find that they can meet Him in both a Methodist or Baptist Prayer Meeting—in an Anglo-Catholic or Protestant Service, or during the celebration of the Roman Mass.

HAVE WE A BIBLE OF AUTHORITY?

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Mr. Rowland, in his letter which you published on the 15th, holds that "the solution of the controversy between Fundamentalist and Modernist lies in a clear apprehension of the seat of spiritual authority," and further that, although some depend for infallible spiritual authority upon the Pope, others upon the Bible and others again upon their own judgment, nevertheless, the human mind was never made to be sustained by infallibles.

This idea is fundamentally wrong, absolutely and entirely wrong, for in case the human mind was ever meant to be sustained by anything then it must have been by TRUTH, Divine Truth—which is infallible.

As, however, infallible Truth can only be contradicted by error, it follows that (in this instance) the Truth is to be found either in:—

(a) The Pope's definition of the Bible (and Tradition), or in

(b) The definition of the Bible by someone who relies upon his own judgment.

(a) Why this definition must be the prerogative of the Pope was thoroughly explained in your correspondence columns during the controversy about "the primacy of Peter."

(b) As individuals who rely upon their own judgment, for definition of the truths contained in the Bible, arrive at contradictory results, it stands to reason that the Bible was not meant to be defined in that way, for the Divine Inspirer of the Bible cannot have given to mankind the Truth for the purpose of leading them into error.

I am, etc.,
PAUL.

Shanghai, Sept. 18, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Your correspondent Paul shows considerable hardihood when he writes in your columns claiming that the authority of scripture rests on the Pope's definition of its meaning. On page 8, of the same issue of your journal in which Paul's letter appears, this paragraph is found: "One such 'Golden Age' existed in Provence before the bright and happy land, where the poorest peasant had his chicken in the pot and his cup of wine, ('the water blushed to see her Lord'), was ravaged and ruined for centuries by the, so-called, Crusade against the Albigenses." "Kill and let God find out his own," was the slogan of the Papal Legate in that horrible war, which was really the kind of thing we call "big business" in these latter days—for the cash which enabled the brutal warriors of Northern France to undertake the adventure was provided by merchant money-lenders on the understanding that they were to be repaid (with interest) from the looting of the richest countryside in Europe. "Ecrasez l'infame," cried Voltaire in a later age, but there was no appeal against the triple-crowned tyrant in the far off days when a beautiful edific of civilization was thus wantonly destroyed.

The terrible atrocity described in these lines was the result of the Pope's definition of the meaning of scripture. Paul will have to turn back the wheels of time many centuries before men will again permit themselves to be enthralled by a blind ecclesiasticism.

Wherein lay the authority of scripture when it was first delivered by the lips of our Lord to the peasants of Gallilee? It lay in the hearts and consciousnesses of the hearers. It is there that its authority is still. "If any man willeth to do his will," said Jesus, "he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God." He shall know without the intervention of Pope or priest. The Master says so.

I am, etc.,
JOHN.

Shanghai, Sept. 20, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Your correspondent John in to-day's paper on the subject Have we a Bible of Authority says in his last paragraph—If any man willeth to do His will, said Jesus, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God. Will John tell the wayfaring man how he is going to judge or even define?

I will give him a concrete case:—There is within a short distance of where I am penning this a camp of military men (marines, etc.,) of a certain nation and in Shanghai we have a Y. M. Christian Association who pose as and advertise as a kind of organization whose object is to given spiritual help, or need, or advice, to the class of men encamped, and through giving this out publicly naturally they gather in quite a large amount of money from well wishers. Yesterday it was payday for the boys and it was also the Sabbath Day; this fact or both facts (the former no doubt predominating) was no doubt the uppermost thought of those controlling the Association because ere the pay roll had been got through a motor car came along containing several packages under the supervision of a foreign official assisted by some Chinese who were tabulated as of the no-loafer class and they immediately commenced to load up a table and exhibit their various wares for sale. It was the Sabbath, I am forced to reiterate. I did not price the "Excellentes" brand of cigar or the elaborately scented toilet soap, but my mind did wander back to my boyhood days when my mother taught me the The Commandments and endeavoured to show me that there was really something in the future if I did my best to keep them. The Seventh Day is the Sabbath of the Lord Thy God in it thou shalt do no manner of work, etc. That is over 50 years ago but I still remember and I wondered what she would have said had she been able to read her son's thoughts or even heard him speak his mother's tongue when he was in contact with a body of men posing as Christians and by so posing raking in money from charitable posessing Christians blatantly turning the Sabbath into a commercial opportunity. May I ask John—Is the advertised doctrine of the Shanghai Y. M. C. Association as shown above a doctrine of God or a branch of ? (The query is mine. S. D.)

I understand a clergyman came along and preached the doctrine of Christ in the evening. It is a pity Christ could not have been one of the audience. Surely He could have again quoted His former saying re merchandise with justification.

I am, etc.,
SEATON DELAVAL.

Shanghai, Sept. 22, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In answer to Seaton Delaval, the canteen in question was not established on the initiative of the Y.M.C.A., but as the result of a suggestion made by a member of the U.S. Navy. Any charge of commercialism is, therefore, believed to be ill founded.

The enlisted personnel of the U.S. landing force have sincerely appreciated the unfailing service of the Y.M.C.A. day and night—seven days out of the week.

Very sincerely yours,
T. P. RIDDLE.
Chaplain, U.S. Navy.

Shanghai, Sept. 25, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—Mr. Seaton Delaval quotes again, in to-day's paper, the saying of Jesus, "If any man willeth to do his will be shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God" and asks me to "tell the wayfaring man how he is to decide or even to judge." But that is exactly what Jesus was doing when He said the words quoted above. They were a challenge to the people to whom he spoke and are equally a challenge to Mr. Seaton Delaval and to me. The only reply I need to make is to ask Mr. Delaval to try the formula. Note how easy it is. Jesus did not say "if any man doeth his will." That is, perhaps, true too but what is said here is "if any man willeth"—that is, is willing. If he has a sincere desire to do God's will his doubts will vanish and he will have an ever growing and keener perception of what that will is, as be keeps on endeavouring to do it. That surely is plain enough and the saying is not mine but that of the greatest teacher the world ever knew. The proof of the pudding is in the eating of it. Try it. Most of the difficulties men find in the Bible are purely speculative. Were there two writers of the book of Isaiah? Did Moses write the Pentateuch or was it written over by a later editor? Was Jonah an historical person or is the story an allegory?

These may be interesting questions for theologians to argue about, but they do not concern the everyday conduct of "the wayfaring man" one iota. Has Mr. Delaval ever heard the story of the Bishop who met a tipsy collier in a railway carriage? "Ha," said the jovial one, "you are a Bishop: can you tell me the way to heaven?" "Nothing easier," was the reply, "turn to the right and keep straight on."

As for the other part of Mr. Delaval's letter I will leave that to the Y.M.C.A. but would like him to think of a Chinese proverb which says, "Let every man sweep the snow from his own doorstep and he need not worry about the frost on his neighbour's tiles.

I am, etc.,
JOHN.

SHANGHAI SEVENTY YEARS AGO

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Amongst the many very interesting articles in your 60th anniversary issue there is one entitled "Shanghai Seventy Years Ago" which seems to require a supplementary note. Mr. Isaac Mason states that the author of the curious and instructive diary which he has unearthed and reproduced was "a Student Interpreter, James Mongan by name, of whose later career we know nothing."

Mr. Mason is inclined to suspect that he was a Scotchman from one of the entries which noted the payment of a tip of $1 to a Chinese!

James Mongan was one of a batch of three young Irishmen who went out to China in the Consular Service in the year 1854. The other two were Robert Hart (afterwards Sir Robert) and Mr. P. J. Hughes, subsequently Consul-General in Shanghai. Mongan was a native of Cork and had a distinguished career in the Queen's College there before going to China. His last post was Consul in Tientsin which he held for a number of years. He retired about the end of the seventies and died shortly afterwards.

The aspersion, therefore, that he was a Scotchman is quite unfounded and the evidence on which it was based is insufficient to justify the suspicion, for it must be remembered that Mongan was probably receiving some $70 or $80 a month at the time and the parting with one of them may have seemed important enough even to an improvident Irishman to record in his diary.

I am, etc.,
J. N. JORDAN.

Folkstone, Aug. 21, 1924.

P.S. I have written from memory and without personal knowledge as my arrival in China coincided with Mongan's departure. But the Consular Service in China is a long-lived institution and there must be at least half-a-dozen of its former members still living who date back to the sixties and who served for years with Mongan in China.

PORTUGUESE REVOLUTION

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Your correspondent's assertion that the overthrow of the monarchy in Portugal came about largely through the determined efforts of a few leaders is amusing.

Will your correspondent kindly inform me how he would like to be subject to political and religious intolerance such as that which animated the old régime in my land?

The Portuguese Revolution came, not so much on account of leaders, but because of the people. The latter were fed up with kings and queens, tyranny and inquisition, and would have overthrown the monarchy all the same, sooner or later, leaders or no leaders.

The spirit which inspired the revolt that relieved my country of the Spanish yoke nearly three centuries before also inspired the Revolucão de 5 de Outubro de 1910.

That the Republic has not accomplished all it had undertaken to fulfil does not reflect on our people or their ideals. Our leaders are only to blame.

Whatever the malcontents may say, the Republic is to stay, for we are through for ever with the monarchical farce that had been enacted up to 4 de Outubro de 1910. We have had enough mockery and camouflage.

Hoping you will excuse my encroaching on your columns,

I am, etc.,
A PORTUGUESE.

CONVENTIONAL CANT

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—On all sides, hypocrisy assails us in some form or other, in this country, where "there ain't no ten commandments" and recent newspaper references to gambling have prompted me to compile the following animadversion. I do not write as one under the spell of this "vice," which has absolutely no attraction for me, although I have been a race-horse owner. I always ran my horses for the love of the sport, and neither backed them nor took any interest in the ring or the tote. I have never risked one cent on the wheel.

The strongest motive with all mankind, after the more sordid necessities are provided for, is excitement. Man, with his craving for strong emotions, will assuredly find means of gratifying them, and, for this reason, gambling will continue and be always with us, in one form or other. Also, all conditions of life being more or less disquieted, either with the cares of gaining or of keeping money, it is but natural that mankind should be allured by the idea of utilizing the chance of an easy and quick way to riches.

Regulation is, without doubt, the wisest possible course, so that those who indulge in games of chance shall do so under the fairest conditions. Surely wise regulation is far more salutary, alike from a financial and a moral point of view, than the unthinking policy of drastic suppression which, as experience teaches, has ever been powerless to extirpate gambling, for all the efforts made during the last hundred years or more have left speculation and gambling in various forms still flourishing. Mr. Sarjeant Ballantyne, the eminent barrister, in his reminiscences wrote concerning the gambling tables at Homburg, the once prosperous resort:

"A serious lady of my acquaintance called it a feast of Satan; but the attendants upon the banquet were so decently clad, and conducted themselves so quietly, and looked altogether so very respectable, that it was difficult to take them for that gentleman's satellites. Still, the word of the moralist went forth; Homburg was purified, and gambling driven into holes and corners where there is no supervision to prevent the worst frauds, or else it has a decent coat put on, and is called speculation."

Without treating with disrespect the conscientious scruples of any class, it may be observed that there is a great deal of hypocrisy in the attitude adopted towards the race-course and the card-table, by those who regard with the greatest toleration, speculation on the Stock Exchange. In England, lotteries are illegal. Yet, a method has been devised by which all classes of the community may court fortune or ruin in the freest manner, without gambling on card games (which would attract attention and be unsuitable for those who object to notoriety), or entering on turf speculations, (still more unpleasantly conspicuous in their method). It has been declared by those who can speak with authority that, at the worst gambling hells in the bad old times of the Georges, fortunes (and, what is worse, not fortunes alone, but competencies and pittances) could not be more readily squandered than by the various forms of speculation in stocks now made of easy access and convenient procedure for all classes of people —for men, for women, and even for those who are little more than children.

Speculation on the Stock Exchange has, of course, been always a recognized method of gambling. In such speculation as in the system invitingly offered to all classes, there has been often very little money behind compared with the amount actually supposed to have been invested in the various transactions. (The word "supposed" is used in an entirely conventional sense, for in Stock Exchange speculation, nothing is supposed to be actually invested, though such and such amounts of stocks are named as bought and sold.) A speculator need be prepared only to pay the difference between the value of the stock he is suppose to have bought or sold at the beginning of the time-bargain, and its diminished or increased value when the time expires. Thus, a man shall nominally buy ten thousand pounds in certain stocks at say, £9,927 which, at the end of the time for which the shares are supposed to have been bought, shall be worth only £9,811; in that case, apart from brokerage or commission, he loses £116 on the transaction. Or, if he had sold stock at £9,927 nominally (not really possessing any such amount), and its value rose to £10,033 at the time for which the bargain was entered on, then he would lose £106.

It is only (as a rule), some such proportion as this of the large sum bought or sold that he will actually lose if unfortunate, or gain, if he has luck, on a transaction which has such imposing dimensions. The system, however, by which gambling in stocks is now made accessible to all is more inviting than the system of time-bargains. By the time-bargain system, a man could not tell how much he was risking, any more than he could tell how much he might gain.

To quote once more the above-mentioned legal authority.—

"I wonder if Monsieur Blanc in his splendid palaces and his refaits and zeros has broken more hearts and disseminated more ruin than that scrupulously washed and dressed gentleman whom, on Sunday, you may see walking so decorously to church, who occupies two dirty rooms in Throgmorton Street, and is a shareholder in that mighty gambling house, the Stock Exchange. Before bidding adieu to Homburg, it is only right to say that everything was conducted with perfect fairness. No imputation to the contrary has ever been suggested. Everyone knew, or might have known the chances secured to the tables." (Alas! can the same be said of racing or the Stock Exchang?)

He proceeds on the subject of Monaco:—

"Lately, a movement has been got up by certain English sojourners, to procure the expulsion of rouge et noir and roulette. A friend of mine, who possesses a very beautiful villa in the neighbourhood, was solicited the other day, by another resident, to sign a memorial for this purpose, but as he considered that those who did not like it, might keep away, and that it was pure impertinence to interfere with the arrangements of a foreign place, he absolutely declined. His friend exhausted every argument upon the score of morals, without avail, and making a last effort, pointed out how much it would increase the value of their property! I should be very sorry to treat with disrespect the conscientious scruples of any class, and, if pressure comes from the natives of a country, to abolish an institution that ought to be treated with consideration; but really, the opinions of foreigners, who might find plenty of improprieties in their own countries, are, in my humble judgment, worthy not only of no attention, but are generally the outcomings of self-interest, and signal examples of impertinence and conceit."

So spoke this high legal authority.

The modern English view of gambling is a confused one, the card-tables and the race-course being bitterly denounced, whilst speculation in stocks and shares is considered an entirely legitimate method of attempting to make money. As a matter of fact, in a great number of instances, this amounts merely to backing stock to either rise or fall in value. Outside brokers exist who do not always actually buy or sell any shares at all, but simply-as-it-were, allow the clients to bet with them on a selected stock rising or falling in price. These are, to all purpose and effect, mere bookmakers, though, for some unknown reason, their calling is not regarded with the same odium which is readily affixed to members of the Ring. This may account for the well-known fact that a large portion of the clientele of the "bucket-shops" are members of the clergy who, allured by glowing advertisements and specious circulars, are induced to part with their money in the hope of making a fortune. The wildest of wild cat schemes have always attracted this portion of the community, some of whom would not tolerate a sweep or raffle at a bazaar. It is, also, a curious anomaly that journals of such unimpeachable morality as the "Times" are guilty of encouraging betting by the publication of the latest odds. Speculation on the Stock Exchange, gambling generally, and betting on the Turf are exactly similar from the point of view of the moralist; there is no difference among all three. On one occasion, it was stated in the House of Commons that 90 per cent. of the business of the London Stock Exchange was of a gambling description, and represented only purchases made with a view to a rise in prices.

Devotees of the simpler forms of gambling, such as are to be procured at the card-table and on the race-course are often criticized by people who are themselves under the sway of other modes of tempting fortune. But all speculation, whether it be in cotton or rice, stocks and shares, race-horses or cards, not forgetting the elusive exchange, is in essence the same,—its main feature being merely the desire to obtain "something for nothing." All conditions of life being more or less disquieted either with the care of gaining or of keeping money, it is but natural that mankind should be allured by the idea of discovering and utilizing an easy and quick road to riches. In the vast majority of cases, this prospect of speedy wealth is nothing but a delusive mirage, as tempting as the "philosopher's stone." Indeed, the votaries of chance, in a great measure resemble the alchemists of old, who were ever seeking, but never found, a method of producing untold gold. So convinced were these searchers of the possibility of eventually discovering the secret of manufacturing riches, that they laughed even at successful gamblers, deeming them to be mere drudges and sluggards on the golden road.

It has been observed that race-clubs cast a jealous eye on gambling, as those who are sufficiently intelligent to calculate the odds readily see that they have a better chance of winning at the tables than on the turf. At the races, not only is a charge made for admission, and a large percentage deducted from all winnings, "for the upkeep of the Club, etc., but one runs the risk of the vagaries of a "temperamental" jockey and a "temperamental" horse—the owners, of course being above the suspicion of arranging matters to suit their book! Without let or hindrance, women, children and office-boys are tempted to risk their money, or that of others on the totalisator, whereas, in properly conducted gaming clubs, the odds are certain, a limit is put on the play, and young people and those who are known to be undesirable are not permitted to take part.

O tempora! O mores! O hypocrisy! Until the crack of doom, certain "vices" will exist, and the wise legislator admits the impossibility of their total suppression, and so looks for a means of regulation, and if possible, uses them as a means to a good end. In the Straits Settlements and the Federated Malay States and Hongkong, the "Government Monopolies" which control the liquor and opium traffic, produce a revenue which contributes immensely to a reduction of taxes,—a great relief to the people. What are known as Opium and Gambling Farms have been a large source of income to the Government, and only hypocrisy prevents other forms of irrepressible vice from being wisely regulated and controlled.

As before observed, the spirit of gambling is inherent in mankind,—himself the victim of life's chance—and its existence cannot be stifled by those who, to quote old Omar, are "swollen with Hypocrisy's Black Must."

A KENNEL CLUB

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In the columns of your newspaper several weeks ago there was published an article headed "Kennel Club for Shanghai" or something to that effect.

I am a new comer to this part of the world and have only been in this country for about four months but from the short experience in the country and especially within easy reach of Shanghai it has occurred to me that the above suggestion was an excellent one. It was suggested that an experienced veterinary surgeon should be engaged from home to look after the kennels and have a house of his own to live in.

I am living in a fairly healthy part of Zahkow on a hill where we have several dogs, and it would be an easy matter, under ordinary circumstances, to send a dog to Shanghai for treatment supposing one got ill. I am sure that lovers of dogs will agree with me that in circumstances where a dog needs the attention of a vet, no trouble is too great to get that dog well and not see it pining away from want of proper care and treatment for it.

I do not know what has been done in the past as regards the number of diseased dogs one sees in the towns in China. It stands to reason that a great number of deaths are caused through the dogs carrying lice, etc., with them, and if it was allowed, it would be the duty of the vet to have a system whereby these dogs would be collected and disposed of.

The writer has just lost a spaniel puppy and as it had a very good nose for sporting purposes, and he would, if it was possible, like to get another young spaniel in its place. He would prefer a spaniel but would consider any other "sporting dog" such as a pointer, retriever or setter providing the price not too exhorbitant.

If any of the readers of your paper have any "sporting dogs" to dispose of, I would be very glad to correspond with them through the medium of your paper. I hope this letter will find a place in the columns of your paper, it might help to stir up an added interest on the subject with which this letter deals; although the political situation at present might somewhat dampen it.

A STUDY OF THE PUBLIC GARDENS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—The article by "A Gentleman Beachcomber" which appeared yesterday in the correspondence column of your valuable paper is of tragic interest to other unfortunates similarly situated, and who trust that now it has been drawn to their notice their fellow countrymen will do their utmost to find employment for them.

British firms when possible should employ Britishers only. Also give local men a chance before going to the expense of bringing new men out from Home. Again during these hard times, it should be a case of one man one job. There is considerable ill feeling amongst my fellow unfortunates to think that a man who is in receipt of a large salary from one institution should also hold the position of manager of another. This man is said to be in the fortunate position of being in sufficient funds to enable him to retire to his native country at any time.

Live and let live.

I am, etc.,
UNFORUNATE.

God's Clear Sky, Sept. 19, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—On perusal of your paper of the 16th instant, I could not help but admire the open letter by "Unemployed Britisher." Although I am not a resident of Shanghai it has not taken me very long to realize that what he has written is perfectly true. His is a letter that is straight from the shoulder and which should find its mark amongst "Taipans" who are looking for men, that evidently never failed the Old Country when the call came 10 years ago.

Good luck to you, Britisher, and a prosperous future.

Enclosing my card,

I am, etc.,
EX-OFFICER OF "99."

Shanghai, Sept. 21, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—Since the letter of "Unemployed Britisher" appeared in your correspondence columns, I have been waiting for a protest to be raised against its contents by some fair-minded Englishman. But no such response came.

In perusing the first part of the letter, I thought I had to do with a noble valiant knight "sans peur et sans reproche." As such he is expected to stand up for his former comrades, the Russians, but what do I see? He even envies the few of them, who have "crept" into positions!

First of all, I think, the Allies ought never to forget that the Russians have lost millions of their people, that their country is devastated and their families are ruined through the Great War they fought together.

After the breakdown of the Russian armies through the Bolsheviks, there still remained many who fought against the traitors. The Allies supported them, but from reasons unknown to me they were left to their fate in a critical moment. The remainder of the armies fought their way through the country under terrible sufferings. Now, I thought, that Russia's former Allies would do all in their might to help these soldiers, who so faithfully since the beginning of the War had stuck to the common cause. I thought at least, that America, a country, which has suffered no pecuniary loss through the war would open her doors to these heroes and help them to find a living. But no, I was mistaken. Small countries, like Serbia and Czecho-Slovakia, have done all they were able to do. But those soldiers, who have had the bad luck to come to China, have the reward for their loyalty in being looked down upon as pariahs.

That the appearance and the behaviour of some of these refugees in the streets of Shanghai deserve contempt, I won't deny; but who of us knowing their fate has the moral right of condemning them?

But now let us turn to the few of them, who have been impudent enough to "creep" into positions in this "International Settlement." It is no wonder, that even well educated Russians, who had lost all were forced to accept any position for any remuneration offered them. That the salaries were reduced, I believe is not a fault of theirs.

Yes "Unemployed Britisher" the Russians must be turned out, that you may have the opportunity of entering the S.V.C., or still better a Russian Corps ought to be formed in order that your valuable life might be spared for teaching the world unselfishness!

The above is written strictly in answer to the letter of "Unemployed Britisher." It means not that I do not appreciate the assistance given to the refugees by many Shanghai people.

Their kindness will never be forgotten!

Hoping you will find space in your esteemed paper and enclosing my card,

I am, etc.,
A LOVER OF RUSSIA.

THE INVISIBLE MARSHAL

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In reading your paper of Monday, September 22, I came across an article written by H. L. Pearce in which he stated that none of the correspondents at present covering the field on the Kiangsu side of the lines had interviewed Marshal Chi. Quoting from Mr. Pearce's article he says:—

". . . . No one ever saw him. One hardy fellow indeed claimed to have done so—but he was an American."

In view of the fact that he definitely stated that no one had ever seen Marshal Chi insofar as an interview was concerned, his following, remark that "one party indeed claimed to have seen him—but that he was an American" can have but one meaning, and as an American reader of the "North-China Daily News" I think it only fair to ask for a public apology and withdrawal of this insulting, slurring and uncalled-for remark.

As an American I can consider the source and let it go, but knowing that this paper is read by Chinese with whom the American people are doing business, the remark contained in the above article can certainly do no good to the moral standing of the American community in China. Unfortunately there are a few Americans in China whose moral integrity is not beyond reproach, but it is certainly safe to say that the proportion is no larger than for the same class of Britons.

It is more than likely that this article was published before being passed by the Editor and that it does not truly picture the attitude of the N.-C. D. N., re Americans, and consequently I feel certain you will publish the necessary apology in order to put to right any misapprehension which your Chinese readers may have arrived at in regars to the integrity of American merchants in China.

I am, etc.,
R. E. MANDERS.

We will certainly withdraw and apologize if our correspondent wishes, though really we think he takes the matter a little seriously. The whole article was in light vein, and no insult was meant.—Ed.

WOUNDED CHINESE SOLDIERS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—When reading the correspondence in the Municipal Gazette this morning between the Red Cross and the Council, one matter seemed to the writer as not having been given sufficient attention. I refer to what is to become of the many wounded soldiers brought into the Settlements for treatment after they are discharged? I have been told that the policy adopted by the Military is to send the more slightly wounded men, who will probably be of further use in the Army, to Woosung, but the more seriously injured, and therefore of little potential value as soldiers, into the Shanghai hospitals. It has also been stated that the Red Cross or other hospitals are not receiving a cent from the military or other authorities towards the cost of treatment and keep of the patients. Not only so but the soldier's pay ceases when he is wounded. Many of these poor chaps will, we hope, recover. If I understand the Council's decision aright, these men when well can be discharged from hospital only they must not wear uniform. What then are they to do?

We read to-day in your valued paper of the good work of the police, in rounding up a number of bad characters and putting them over the border. What is to become of these northern soldiers, far from home and many with no homes at all, stranded without money or friends in Shanghai? Is there not a great danger that they will drift into bad ways and become perhaps a menace to the Settlements, for here there are many opportunities for such and many worthless people who will be glad of such recruits? May we not look forward to an increase of bandits, robbers, thieves and beggars?

Some who know a little about these matters feel that it was a wrong policy on the part of the Councils to allow even wounded soldiers within the Settlements, and I for one am glad that our senior hospital has decided that it cannot take any in. For these are not local men, both sides largely using Shantung and Chihli men who have been recruited in the districts where flood and famine have made life hard and where men are glad to do anything for a living. It is known that for some months past Gen. Lu has been sending his Chêkiang soldiers to the more distant parts of the province and calling in his northern soldiers to Hangchow, knowing probably that Chêkiang and Kiangsu men would not willingly fight against one another—they are too much akin.

Again I ask what is to become of these men when discharged from our local hospitals? If the war is prolonged, there are likely to be a large number and we have more than enough unemployed and unemployables here already. Of course a wounded soldier is to be pitied and helped anywhere and the Red Cross work is in every way most praiseworthy, but there is abundance of accommodation outside the Settlement limits—hospitals, godowns, etc., owned by Chinese, and any amount of vacant land upon which hospital huts could be quickly erected with funds supplied by those responsible for the war if they would only do so. Why then should the foreign Settlements be burdened with the care of the wounded who in every other civilized country are looked after by the Military Authorities? It may become a very serious problem for Shanghai and I feel that the Councils ought to give the matter their most earnest consideration.

RATEPAYER.

HANGCHOW COUP D'ETAT

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—A friend of mine in a recent letter to me quoted among other things:—"An idle brain is the workshop of the devil." This I suppose was also in the mind of Hsia Chao, the Chief of the Constabulary of Chêkiang, who is reported to have successfully organized the coup d'état at Hangchow immediately after the tempting offer made by Marshal Chi of Nanking of one million dollars for the capture of Hangchow and he acted at once with advantage.

Now the question is:—Who is going to get the "whole cheese?" Hsia Chao alone or are there others with him in the soup?

I am inclined to believe that the cheese will be cut into several parts and the division will be made strictly à la mode Chinoise. As "money talks," may one asume that as an outcome of the share—if there be any—of the spoils, another petty jealousy will be the cause of a fresh fight altogether, taking also into account the important appointment of the Tuchunship of Chêkiang?

In writing this, of course, I assume that Hsia Chao and his confederates will side with Kiangsu. I may be wrong. It is a question of "wait and see."

RECOGNITION VERSUS RESPONSIBILITY

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Ever since his recognition by the World Powers, Tsao Kun, in spite of strong opposition from all parts of the Republic, has after all had an opportunity of sitting in a Presidential chair—a chair for the man of letters but not at all for an ignorant militarist.

Taking advantage of the honourable recognition by the Powers and in co-operation with the President, Wu Pei-fu, the Loyang Dictator, has been busily making arrangements for purchasing large quantities of ammunitions from foreign countries with a view to exercising his despotic attitude as well as expanding his militaristic sphere of influence over the whole country, under cover of carrying out the President's scheme towards the unification of China.

In a word, such a monarchical plan as is being utilized by Tsao Kun and Wu Pei-fu does not in any way represent the will of the people, nor does it win their recognition as a whole; but on the contrary, it helps to add more fuel to the flame, as evidenced by the existing civil war in China.

As it is generally known that Wu Pei-fu is wise enough to incite the Military Governor of one province to attack the other, with the assurance that "decorations of high order," etc., will be awarded for such illegal undertaking.

Under these circumstances, it is in the nick of time that the Powers should announce their cancellation of the recognition of the Tsao Kun Government, and let the sons of Young China fight for a democratic government—a lawful government by the people and for the people.

As stated in a local paper this morning that a certain Power, under the pretext of the decline in trade, is prepared to file claim against the Chinese Government, it is, however, imperative that the Power in question should gloriously hold itself responsible for its undue recognition of the Tsao Kun Government.

A CHINESE VIEW OF THE SETTLEMENT

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Certain foreigners are suggesting in sarcasm that if the Chinese really desire the abolition of the extraterritorial rights of foreigners in China the present time is a fitting moment for such a discussion. To my mind the challenge is not unfair, and that, as a matter of fact, the present situation makes the occasion an auspicious one for the presentation of the Chinese side of the case. I will of course admit that the foreigner also has a side which can be strongly presented at any time.

The flocking of refugees to Shanghai is an argument in favour of abolishing foreign concessions in China, for it calls attention to the chaos in the nation, a chaos at least partly caused by the foreigners' extraterritorial rights. On what arguments do I base this statement?

In the first place the foreign concession is a breeding place for plotting. Civil war in China is not unlikely so long as selfish and unscrupulous malcontents can use a foreign treaty port as their unmolested headquarters. The foreigners' extraterritoriality then is a generating place for trouble, for it gives protection to trouble-makers.

Secondly, the existence of the foreign concession has a demoralizing effect on government in China because it is a continual temptation to Chinese officialdom to be dishonest and unfaithful. A Chinese official can squeeze and steal until he is discovered, and then run in safety with his booty, free to squander it on automobiles and sing-song girls. He finds immunity from prosecution within the foreign settlement. We read that Tsao Kun, for example, has moved some of his wives to his mansion in Tientsin, and that he is himself ready to move down whenever Peking seems safe no longer. In other countries as well, wouldn't the existence of a few cities in which crooks and plotters were exempt from the demands of justice have a demoralizing effect?

Thirdly, the foreign concession is a source of turmoil in China because the wealth of the community makes it a bone of contention among military leaders. Much of this wealth was stolen from the Chinese people. The chief cause of the present war is a desire on the part of different provincial officials to control the rich prize, Shanghai. It is said, and no doubt with truth, there are 25 Chinese in Shanghai each of whom could cash a check for ten million dollars or more. Militarists make war to see who shall supervise a community which has gathered such wealth. And much of this money would be distributed and invested throughout the nation instead of being piled up in Shanghai banks were it not protected by foreign extraterritoriality.

During the present trouble I have moved from Chapei to the International Settlement for safety. I feel justified in doing this, for since the danger to my life and property comes partly as a result of the existence of the foreign settlement, as I have tried to prove, the settlement owes me certain protection. To prove how firmly I believe this I am quite willing and desirous that foreign settlements in China be abolished, and that next time there be no place in which I can benefit from the power of foreign protection. For when the foreign settlements no longer harbour political plotters and war-makers no longer demoralize the government by holding out a place of immunity to dishonest officials, and no longer glitter as a tempting prize in the eyes of military leaders, there will be less occasion for danger to the citizen of China.

GUARDED CHAPEI

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Owing to maintaining peace of the Settlement, foreign mariners are landed to guard at its boundary only, but the Japanese mariners have found their ways to some roads in Chapei where are the Chinese territories. No matter how emergent it may be, we, Chinese, need no foreign protection in our territories. Will Japanese have regards for the treaty? If Japanese people in Chapei think of danger, they can remove to the settlements. Please remember that even Japanese Government could not protect our emigrants during the earthquake.

Thanking for the space,
I am, etc.,
CHENG PING CHEW.

Chapei, Shanghai,
Sept. 21, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Referring to the criticism made in the correspondence columns in to-day's issue of your paper by a Chinese gentleman, Mr. Cheng Ping-chew, of the presence of the Japanese marines outside the boundary of the Settlement to protect not only Japanese but also people of other nationalities, including Chinese, I feel it my duty to inform your correspondent that the allotment of districts which are to be guarded by the Japanese marines has been decided upon by the Consular Body after going through the proper formalities, that is to say, after an official notice has been given to the Chinese Commissioner for Foreign Affairs in Shanghai.

There can be no ground for Mr. Cheng Ping-chew to express this complaint when he knows the fact, and I think he does, that all the people residing in the district guarded by the Japanese marines are quite satisfied with the manner in which the peace-preserving marines are daily performing their duties without getting into any trouble at all with the Chinese citizens or anybody else. On the contrary, all these people are leading a very peaceful life and as a matter of fact, they are expressing their gratitude to the Japanese landing force there, rather than objecting to their presence.

By way of convincing your correspondent, Mr. Cheng, of the entire justification, so far as the existing disquieting situation between Kiangsu and Chêkiang is concerned, of the presence of the Japanese marines in the district in question, it may be appropriate to state here that, the decision arrived at by the Consular Body here is, so far as I am given to understand, that allied landing forces and the Shanghai Volunteer Corps are to guard the Settlements as well as the thickly foreign-populated districts adjacent thereto.

While I have not the least intention to walk on the thin ice by referring to the all-important question of extraterritoriality in this country, it may be, at this juncture, advisable to point out to my Chinese friends that it would be well and good for them to remember that so long as argument, reversing the cause and effect, prevails among the young generation of China, there will be no end to civil-wars in this country, much less the abolition of the extraterritoriality. Please remember, Mr. Cheng, that it is not by turning your cold shoulders on well-wishers and friends of your country but by your acting in co-operation with them and receiving their whole-hearted sympathy that you may, in the long run be enabled to accomplish your cherished objects.

I am, etc.,
IKEYASU.

WAR SECRETS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I have noticed with surprise and regret the constant publication of particulars as to the lines held by the Chêkiang forces, the position and calibre of the artillery and other things that their enemy wants to know. Every one desires the war to come to a conclusion in the quickest possible way, but the foreign press need not hasten it by locating every gun belonging to an army that has its back up against the wall.

Marshal Lu has no authority over "foreign correspondents," but his hints on the danger of letting them go forward seem to be quite lost in his politeness. Surely your readers can subsist without knowing the location of dumps and guns and will not question the enterprise of your correspondents if they show some of the restraint which was so serious a requirement in the Great War.

TRADE AND THE WAR

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—There can be very little doubt that foreigners and Chinese alike are viewing the present stagnation in trade very seriously. Since hostilities broke out about a month ago practically every line of commerce has been at a standstill and offices throughout Shanghai have been able to produce so little for the employees to do that in many cases it has gone as far as "Well, one of us had better be here I suppose," sort of thing.

How long is such a pitiable state of affairs going to last?

Is it possible that even a war, particularly in a country the size of China, can be allowed to paralyze trade so completely for an indefinite period?

Are there not ways and means whereby the wheels of commerce can be set going again or must we sit down and be content to wait until China's war lords have ended their campaigns to their own satisfaction?

At the moment there are many important trade centres absolutely untouched by the war and it is more than rumoured that such centres are not only ready to do business, but have orders to execute, if only financial facilities were easier to obtain. That they are not easier is entirely due to the attitude of the native banks who seem to have declared an indefinite moratorium and to have refused to assist business in any shape or form.

Admittedly, under such conditions as the present, finance becomes a serious problem, but in the European War it was solved to a great extent and trade, though handicapped in every conceivable way, carried on from beginning to end.

In the present crisis there seems so far to have been little, if any, concerted effort made to attempt to get things going again. It cannot be expected at once, or probably at any time while the war lasts, to assume "pre-war" proportions (such as they were), but once started the prospects are more in favour of a gradual increase in volume than otherwise, for a spark of confidence, once alight, would be difficult to extinguish.

From the point of view of commerce a good deal of the blame for the present hopeless state of affairs can, with justice, be laid at the doors of the native banks and it would therefore seem that they must be deal with first—their difficulties being best known by the foreign banks, the assistance of the latter, either in conference alone or in any way which might be considered most advisable, must be obtanied before anything further can be done. Should efforts in this direction be attended by some amount of success, the means whereby the rest of the machinery might be set in motion should not be very difficult to secure as it is inconceivable that both the foreign and Chinese business communities, being at the present thoroughly hard hit by the state of stagnation, are going to neglect any opportunity that holds out prospect of getting back to work again.

It must be recognized, however, that in the event of the forces of commerce being actively mobilized in an attempt to improve matters, too much cannot be expected, because there is a war: but on the other hand stagnation such as the present is surely unwarranted until the whole country is raging with strife and all shipping has thereby become completely paralyzed. As long as connexion between the various ports, coastal and up-river, remains practically uninterfered with, there seems little reason why business, on restricted lines, should not be carried on.

Hoping in the interests of all those employed (or rather—at the present moment unemployed) in making a living out of China, that this letter may not have been written quite in vain.

Sir,—Foreign and Chinese merchants would be most grateful to you if you would take up the matter referred to in the letter signed "Concerned" in your issue of to-day. No other subject more important. Something must be done to save the situation. All your business readers look specially to the trade side of the question. Apathy will end in ruin. Foreign and native banks, the general Chambers of Commerce, foreign and native should be stirred up. Matters could be adjusted.

CHINA AND BOLSHEVISM

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—All this inspiring palaver that the Chinese people is immune from Bolshevism is tommy-rot.

Long before Lenin was a babe in arms, Bolshevism, under one guise or another, was already known in the Flowery Kingdom, for the aftermath of each war brought its crop of "Red" stuff, though modified to suit the patrician taste of the Sons of Han.

I repeat, all this inspiring palaver about Celestial immunity from Soviet contagion is bunk. If in doubt, I beg to refer you to Dr. Sun Yat-sen, the undaunted leader of the mythical crusades against the "North."

NEW VIEWS FOR OLD

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I wish to thank you Mr. Editor for your exceedingly fair "Leader" on my article of August 12 last.

I confess, however, that your arguments have not convinced me, that I was wrong in writing, as I did.

Re the murder of the Russian Imperial Family and the arguments I submitted defending my opinion, that H. M. the King was just as right in shaking hands with the Bolshevik delegates presented at Court, as I would be in shaking hands with a German even if my brother had been killed by Germans during the late War, you maintain, that the two cases are far from similar. In the first instance defenceless people were butchered in cold blood. I give in that they were. But thousands of equally innocent people men, women and children were murdered by Chistian soldiers and sailors in cold blood without trial and with no chances of defending themselves,—i.e., air raids, bombing or shelling of defenceless towns, torpedoing of ships (merchants ships) and wholesale executions without the semblance of a trial by the occupation authorities in Belgium and France.

I will go further and say that the murderers of the Imperial Family were not Bolsheviks. That is rather a bold assertion? Perhaps. The Bolsheviks were the executioners only and compared with the executioners of Louis XVI and his consort this execution was less barbarous. They were unexpectedly shot, whilst the French Royal Family had to stand the insults of a mob for days and weeks and this to be followed by execution in public. Who were the murderers of the Imperial Russian Family then? I will tell you. Some of them are still alive. I mean those soulless, despotic, cruel Ministers, who for years and years right up to the first Russian Revolution fooled the Tsar and prevented him from granting the Russian people their freedom. Read a book by the former French tutor to the Imperial Children, amongst others. The Ministers who for years made the Tsar an unwilling and at times unknowing tool in intrigues and deportations. The late Very Reverend Dean Rasputin is another of the moral murderers. We shake hands with the French and they executed their King and Queen also for the sins of the Royal entourage and for the sins committed by the King's forefathers.

You point out that in the French Revolution the bourgeois were not molested to the same extent as the bourgeois in Russia have been. To this argument I wish to say that in those days the word bourgeois did not mean what it means to-day. There were in France practically only two classes then the Aristocracy and the Proletariat. Between those there were the Priests and the Officers.

Nowadays the bourgeoisie is composed of doctors, teachers, engineers, etc., not forgetting merchants and factory owners, profiteers, etc. I mean there is a whole new class. We may add Government officials too.

Certainly the French Republicans could not prosecute a class which virtually did not exist.

Now for some of your anti-Bolshevistic argument. I shudder to think that you still believe in the nursery tales sent out by various propaganda agencies in the early days of Bolshevism re the cancellation of marriage. That is a most abominable lie. Had that been the case, thousands of unhappy married men would have gone to Russia long ago in order to get rid of their "Maggies."

I am sure Comrade Trotsky is not going to allow me to run away with his wife or vice versâ.

You then touch on the question of religion. Yes the Bolsheviks have to their credit dealt radically with the corrupt, superstitious Russian Orthodox Church. The masses of Russia were for centuries deliberately kept in spiritual and mental darkness by the "Holy" Russian Church. They were driven in herds to some daily ritual, which was meant to consecrate their servitude and drug any uneasy stirring of inquiry, ambition or revolt. Amongst other useful thing they were taught (like Oliver Twist when on reduced rations) to pray for their benefactors (who were their oppressors) and in that dark long night of the Russian Church the rest of the "Christian World" was for years waiting to see a Reformer like Martin Luther arise from within its walls. I happen to know that some did arise, but they were quickly finished off.

The result of the grip of the Russian Church on the Masses of Russia has been that up to the year of Grace 1917 probably only 10 per cent. of the Russian people could claim to be civilized, i.e., read and write. The Holy Orthodox Russian Church had till then accomplished what it set out to do at the bidding of its Masters, to keep the Russian people down.

Is it a wonder that people like Lenin and his confrères being as we all admit geniuses in a way (and in many ways) should say: "If we want to raise the Russian people from their present mental darkness, we must reform the Church in such a way that we make it a 'living one' for those who need superstition, but as far as possible we will try to see that the children are not contaminated with its superstitious teachings?"

I have not, Sir, read the book you recommend me on "The Persecution of the Russian Church." I have read any number of propaganda books though and I shall probably miss nothing if this particular book escapes my weather eye.

Who are the most backward people of Europe? The Catholics, nota bene, in countries only where the Church has its Power. Priest-ridden countries like Russia of Tsaristic days, Portugal, Spain, Italy and Greece, etc., are below the standard of England, Denmark and Germany, etc.

If your children, Sir, do something which is no good for them like chewing-gum, then you cut it out. So did the Bolshevisk with the Russian Orthodox Church. They have stolen Church property you say. Well, Sir, from whom did that property come? The Russian people n'est ce pas? I shod no tears over that. To my mind Trotsky or the late Lenin must have been reading the Bible. Probably they are as disgusted as I am with the present Church of Christ. When Christ left this world He left no will to probate. He left a loin cloth and a crown of thorns, His outer garments the soldiers threw dice for.

Christ and His disciples had no palaces to live in. Christ did not, like the Archbishop of Canterbury, have a seat in the House of Lords and a salary of £10,000 a year. His disciples had no villas on Mount Karmel like Mokanshan or Kuling, nor had they bathing places like Peitaiho or Tsingtao. Christ could personally sit down at the same table as prostitutes and receive them. He did not belong to the "Moral Wellfare League," which demonstrates its hypocrisy by stoning the women out of town instead of helping them by taking them by the hand and looking after them in the homes of its members and procuring domestic situations for them in the old country. But, Sir, times have changed since then.

To continue the post mortem on [illegible] I also wish to say that I seem to be labouring under the impression that whereas I have no friends or even acquaintances amongst the Bolsheviks my information re internal affairs in Russia is not worth a penny, as you are quite sure, that the "Whites" did not give me my information. No, Sir, my information is neither from Red nor White sources. But from our own countrymen, honest men, who can tell the truth and from various members of other non-Russian nationalities. They all say: "Leave the Russian Republic or confederation of Republics alone and the Bolsheviks will play the game to us." They tell me that during the Allied intervention and Allied blockade the only people who suffered were the Russian common people, but not the Commissars. Trotsky, Zinovief, Litvinov and Co. still had their ham and eggs for breakfast and pork and beans for tiffin.

In concluding your article you say, that even if the Bolshies are succeeded by some other Government, it is not certain that said Government will pay their debts. Very likely. Still there is nothing like being an optimist. I wager, that even the Bolsheviks will pay if they are treated "like we would others should treat us." And here again I come to the sole and only reason for writing this and my previous letter. Let us give Russia a chance. Whether we like her present form of Government or not do let us remember, that we have a responsibility to our unemployed, which is greater than our responsibility to the murderers of the Tsar, who are behind all the intrigues against the Russian people. Our unemployed want work. Russia wants goods. You can no more sell goods to a man you are daily abusing than you can to a nation receiving the same treatment. By backing the Russian Imperialist we are backing the wrong horse. During the intervention we found what stuff the Imperiaists were made of. To find that probably cost us: £100 Million. (If not more).

And as this is going to be my final article on "New Views for Old" I wish to repeat what I said in my last article: "Do not extend any further help to the Russian deadbeats at Shanghai; 90 per cent. of them would sooner have one square meal a day without work than three meals and work. They are no danger to the Soviet Republic and the minute Shanghai people stop supporting them, they will go home. Helping the children is quite another thing which I beg to recommend most sincerely.

To ensure a new world order the only remedies I can think of are

1. The abolition by law of all religions containing superstition (this includes the Christian of course).

2. State enforced birth control (which can only be made possible, when religions are abolished).

3. The nationalization of essential industries and the confiscation of the fortunes of the idle rich.

Re birth control; one of the greatest reasons why men fight is, because the world is seemingly not big enough to hold them all. Exactly the same takes place in animal life.

As we are more civilized now than some hundred years ago would it not be better for all concerned to limit the birth of children thus doing away with slum life and wars? You save the mothers too.

I could write a lot on this very humanitarian measure but probably I have already exceeded my privelege.

I assure you this is my last letter. It serves no useful purpose to prolong the discussion. I hope ere long that the politicians at home will drop their hypocrisy and the newspapers as well.

The politicians feed us on lies, because they know we would sooner be told what we like to hear than being told the truth and it is more profitable to the newspaper (I am speaking of home papers now) to dope its readers with their favourite fictions than to give them the cold douche of realities.

CHINA'S ANARCHY AND THE S. V. C.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Your editorial this morning on the opium situation in China has a very interesting bearing on the complaints made by two of your correspondents against an unnamed taipan discouraging his staff from joining the S.V.C.

Without knowing who the taipan particularly referred to is (I dare say he has many confederates in this crime) he has my sympathy, if his protest has been made in the proper quarter I should add, wholeheartedly.

During the Great War, at least one large firm circularized throughout their staff a statement signed by a high government official to the effect that these men could best serve the interest of their country by sticking to their various posts and maintaining the standing of their firm. If in such a war such a statement could pass unchallenged, why all this resentment against a man who has the moral courage to make a common sense protest against the disruption, or even inconvenience, of his business by the squabbles of two organized bandit hordes, which differs in no whit from the thousand other squabbles in the various provinces during the past 10 years except in its proximity to this Settlement.

Ten years ago opium was grown in China only in isolated places far from the highways need by the foreigner and a certain amount of secrecy was employed in its production and use; to-day, in the interior it is grown wherever there is suitable soil. Ten years from now we may see it flourishing on the borders of the Settlement. Ten years ago bandit outrages were restricted to small villages and even the isolated foreigner was not interfered with, to-day we find two organized bands of brigands fighting for the privilege of impoing military taxation on the Chinese merchants on the borders of Shanghai. Ten years from now the looting of Chapei will be as common as the looting of Ichang.

In the early days of the foreign invasion of China a few men of exceptional intelligence equipped with a few gunboats and a remarkable foresight succeeded in forcing upon this country treaties which made it possible for foreigners to reside here and do business with a reasonable sense of security. No country was at that time in a position to give her people out here the support that the least of them could render to-day, but our predecessors had one great advantage, there was no Wellington Koo in London or Washington or Paris and public opinion of Chinese affairs in those countries was largely moulded by by men who were familiar with conditions in this country.

I wonder if your correspondents who were so indignant at having a taipan object to his office staff being depleted, realize that for one-tenth the cost of the mobilization recently held in the U.S.A. 10 trained soldiers could have been supplied to relieve each member of the S.V.C. and that these men could have been allowed to return to their offices where they could best serve the interest of their country, this Settlement and foreign trade in general.

In a few weeks at most, a few more generals with healthy accounts in foreign banks will retire to the security of Japan or some foreign settlement, a few more thousand bandits deprived of their leaders will be sent adrift to pillage the country, starve or join the new order and the S.V.C. will be relieved from duty. But as surely as this war is a financial success for its promoters, their activities will increase as fast as the Race Clubs and we will have more and more wars.

The S.V.C. is and always will be a most essential unit for the emergency protection of this Settlement, but there is no practical reason why it should ever be required to function as anything but an emergency unit. They could easily have been relieved in less than 48 hours.

Last Sunday morning I saw a handful of my fellow countrymen being instructed in the rudiments of warfare. A commendable enterprise no doubt but what is really needed is to instruct a few men to act as missionaries to Europe and America so to educate public opinion in these countries that the paid propagandists of the bandit leaders of China would be unable to deprive us of the real protection to which we are justly entitled.

SHANGHAI SLACKERS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Does it not seem incredible to you the number of young men in Shanghai who appear to be absolutely indifferent to the dangers that threaten the Settlement?

Our Consul-General in peace times has often spoken of the great importance of all Britishers being Volunteers, and one expected that at least they would join up when needed, but nothing of the sort has happened, they are content to let older men do their work.

All last week-end the guns could be heard distinctly day and night, and yet how many young men were at the races last Saturday, I wonder, and are at the "Palais de Dance" and other resorts of that class, every night absolutely indifferent to the fact that as time goes on the danger to the Settlement will increase.

It seems to me it is high time the girls of Shanghai took the matter in their hands and urged their tennis and dancing partners to join up—perhaps a few white feathers distributed among them might be of some use! My husband is a keen Volunteer and is doing his bit with the rest of them in spite of being urgently needed in his office, and he would not be the man he is in my eyes if he was not eager to do his share, but it makes my blood boil to see all these young men about the place doing nothing at such a time as this. They cannot in their wildest moments imagine they are indispensable in their offices, so why do they not join up? Is it "cold feet" or do they think their firms would have to close down without their valuable assistance?

If the worst happened and a defeated Chinese army broke through the defence round the Settlement, would these young men hide their precious skins under their beds? It would be interesting to know.

I am, etc.,
A VOLUNTEER'S WIFE.

Shanghai, Sept. 23, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Apropos "Volunteer's Wife's" letter in your issue of to-day on the subject of Shanghai Slackers.

All right-minded people have, I am sure, every admiration for the S.V.C. and the service they are rendering to the community, but one does not expect wives to write and advertise their husbands as heroes before they have had a chance to be heroic.

Does this Volunteer's wife understand that the S.V.C. are not open to take enlistments for temporary periods during the prospect of trouble and this alone prevents very many ex-Service men from joining. Men who would gladly stand alongside this lady's heroic husband while trouble exists but have no desire to do the Play-Soldier stuff afterwards.

Men who did service without camp beds, mattresses, meals at the Kalee Hotel and the opportunity to run home for a bath and a change frequently.

Men who went through Hall and have earned the right to live.

In this lady's indiscriminate folly she would get togther the women and hand white feathers to such as these. Shame! and if she is British, Greater Shame.

Just a word about the patrons of the Palais De Danse and such resorts. They are not all young, a good many are middle-aged and not a few are married. I know, I have been there.

Finally I would assure the lady that if Ex-Service men are really wanted, history will repeat itself. They will fight.

I am, etc.,
EX-ARTILLERY.

Shanghai, Sept. 25, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—"Volunteer's Wife" is right in that there must be a number of men in town who are making paltry excuses for not joining the S.V.C. In times of danger, some men believe that absence of body is better than presence of mind.

It is known, however, that some 200 ex-Service men, who for reasons good and otherwise will not join the S.V.C., have turned in their names to the Commandant and are ready and eager to do their bit in the defence of the Settlements. It would be wise therefore for "Volunteer's Wife" and her lady friends to be careful in passing out the white feather; they may strike a snag and find they are dealing with an individual who knows little about "cold feet."

There is nothing to tell the public that these men, without uniform, are fighting men of experience and awaiting the word for action. Rather than await the crisis, why not get them together now and form an ex-Services Company, for duration only. A distinguishing band round their arm would suffice or let them wear their old uniforms if they have them, with some mark to distinguish their actual rank in the newly formed company. Some of the men who have sent in their names have received no reply from the Council or intimation of the possibility of their being called on. There are many men keen to assist who at the same time do not wish to play at soldiers all the year round and obey the routine of the S.V.C. with its drills and so on, stuff that is stale to them.

I am, etc.,
WARM TOES.

POULTRY FANCYING IN SHANGHAI

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—May I request the favour of your columns to reproduce a part of a letter just received from the "Feathered World," 9 Arundel Street, London, which reads as follows:

'We are always pleased to hear from Fanciers from far-away and we should be glad to know if there is a poultry Society with you and if so if you can give us the name and address of the Secretary."

As I am not aware of any such Society existing in Shanghai, I would appreciate very much any information that could be given by readers of your esteemed paper who are interesting themselves in poultry.

Thanking you for the space,

I am, etc.,
A FANCIER.

THE "RECORDER" AND FORCE

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In the article "'The Recorder' on War, Force and the Like," in to-day's issue, we rather think Rev. T. B. Grafton takes too much for granted. From the first paragraph it is evident that "The Recorder" is the "pacifist" referred to in the first line. In the fifth paragraph we read, "The 'Recorder' rather reluctantly, it seems, admits that 'as a last resort the policeman would be justified in using force.'" If Mr. Grafton will re-read the editorial he will see that we were quoting from Kirby Page in "The Christian Century," not necessarily identifying ourselves with his position but nothing the remarkable divergence of standpoint among Christian people and the fact that the solution seems far distant.

The "Chinese Recorder" is an organ for the discussion of all questions affecting missionary effort in China, and it endeavours to study the various points of view held by the body it represents. If it misrepresents the point of view of its constituency the correspondence columns are always open to criticism of its articles, or the policy of "The Recorder" as indicated in the editorials. In the next issue (August) A. N. R. discussed the very topic Mr. Grafton now writes about in your columns, showing very emphatically that he was "quite unconvinced by Mr. Kirby Page's argument."

In Mr. Grafton's last paragraph reference is made to extraterritoriality. In the July number which has so upset Mr. Grafton there is an article by G. G. Warren which says that whilst he longs for the abolition of extrality he recognizes there is a right and a wrong way of abolishing it; that the matter cannot be accomplished until there is a just law and a just administration.

Whilst the "Recorder" is out for Peace and considers war un-Christian and a relic of barbarism, it has not formulated any definite policy so far as the use of force is concerned. The editorial referred to arose out of the "Copec" report. This weird word which gathers up "Conference on Christian Politics, Economics and Citizenship," also stands for the application of the laws of Jesus Christ to the whole of human life.

We fail to appreciate the force of Mr. Grafton's remarks in the second last paragraph with regard to uniting "man and brute in a bond of brotherhood." Any policy the "Recorder" has is along the line of the ultimate substitution of moral suasion for brute force. Much progress has been made along this line,—wives are no longer carried off by physcial force; parents have more constraining methods than force in bringing up their children (except as a last resort); in penology considerable advance has been made since Charles Reade wrote "It's Never Too Late to Mend," and surely in the matter of war, we are advancing to a time when there will be bonds of brotherhood that will leave the brute away in the dim past.

I am, etc.,
GILBERT MCINTOSH.
Acting Editor of the "Chinese Recorder."

WHY WILFULLY?

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Recently I purchased a copy of "Miscellanea," by Nigel Van Biene, a collection of verse from local newspapers.

I found pleasure in reading these pleasant little verses and enjoyed them, save one, and to that I took strong exception.

The poem was entitled "The Cenotaph," and ran to four lines which I take the liberty of quoting here:

"The simple pride of your strong graven stone
"Saw the homage a loyal people paid,
"Great monument, we would that you had known
"How your dead were wilfully betrayed."

Britain's Liberty of Action

The message and aim of the poem are justified, but I cannot calmly accept that word "wilfully." It does not seem appropriate—nay, it is untrue.

Our dead were betrayed, I will not deny that, but not wilfully, unless, of course, that author has a different aim in view and a different meaning to the poem, I am somewhat in the dark regarding it.

I should like to hear the opinion of some of your readers and whether they take exception to the word or can attach an unconsidered vista where I have not exactly comprehended.

FAMED FOR 50 YEARS

SOUTHERN RHODESIA

SOUTHERN Rhodesia which was inaugurated as the youngest self governing Colony of the British Empire on October 1, 1923, and which had previously for 33 years been ably administered by the British South Africa Company possesses one of the finest climates in the world with long hours of sunshine, breezy temperate days and cool nights. For those who wish to take up farming or ranching in order to make the most they can of their capital, energy and technical knowledge, or for those who wish to retire from strenuous business or professional life and make a home, Rhodesia offers many advantages unequalled elsewhere. The business, social, sporting, educational and medical facilities bear favourable comparison with those of other countries. Native labour is plentiful and when properly managed is cheap and efficient. Taxation is light. Good land in healthy surroundings and amidst fine scenery is plentiful and not expensive.

Full information is obtainable on application to The Secretary, Southern Rhodesia Settlers' Board (attached to the Government of Southern Rhodesia), P. O. Box 372, Salisbury, S., Rhodesia.

The giving of advice to prospective settlers will be facilitated if applicants will advise the Board in detail of their circumstances and the amount of capital they would be prepared to invest in a suitable venture.

IF there is scratch or surface noise on a record, fine musical detail is lost.

When Columbia "NEW PROCESS" Records were invented, needle scratch was eliminated and previously hidden detail revealed.

In Columbia "NEW PROCESS" Records you hear ALL the original detail just as the artist sang or played into the original master record—and ONLY on Columbia, because there is NO SCRATCH to obscure or mar.

Compare a String Quartet recording on Columbia with any other. Your ear will tell the difference.

LAW REPORTS

ALLEGED DANGEROUS DRIVING

Summons that Failed

C. P. Rakusen was summoned on Monday before Mr. G. W. King for having driven his car dangerously, passed another car in motion proceeding in the same direction, and used an open exhaust, in Nanking Road at 9.30 on the morning of the 13th instant.

The complainant, Mr. F. Schlobohm, was not present when the case was called on and, on the telephone, promised to attend in half an hour, but did not do so.

Defendant said it was probable he would not come at all, and added that there was a certain amount of maliciousness in the prosecution. He asked that the case be dismissed.

In the circumstances Mr. E. T. Maitland, who appeared for the police, offered no evidence, Mr. Schlobohm being prosecutor, and the case was dismissed.

Mr. Rakusen was then fined $2 for having no rear light attached to his car in Nanking Road on the evening of the 10th instant.

A conviction was entered against Mr. R. Gordon, and he was ordered to pay costs, for a similar offence.

THE FLAG INCIDENT

Fresh Charge of Molesting Young Woman against Indian

Feroz Khan, who was before Mr. G. W. King a few days ago for stealing a flag from the British Consulate, appeared in court again on Monday, this time charged with assaulting a young lady in the Public Gardens on Sunday morning.

Complainant told the court that as she was passing the defendant, who was occupying one of the seats, he got up and grabbed her by the arm. A policeman was called and Feroz was arrested.

Defendant was remanded for another examination as to his mental condition.

$1,600,000 CASE DISMISSED

In the case of the former treasurer of the International Finance & Exchange Company, Inc., who brought a suit in the U. S. Court for China for the appointment of a receiver, Mr. H. D. Rodger, on behalf of the defendant, moved to dismiss the plaintiff's petition.

In his argument Mr. Rodger pointed out to the Court that the only relief prayed in the plaintiff's bill that the Court appoint a receiver to take charge of the affairs of the corporation; no specific claim was made by the plaintiff. Mr. Rodger cited a number of authorities for the defendant in support of the motion. Counsel stated that a parallel case had been decided by the 9th Circuit Court of Appeal, which is the Appeal Court in this jurisdiction.

The Judge—

"In the absence of a statute enlarging its powers, a court of equity has no jurisdiction at the suit of a stockholder or other private person to dissolve a corporation, or to appoint a receiver to control the corporation, the effect of which will be to dissolve it."

The case of Pearce v. Sutherland et al. and also the case Brictson Mfg. Co. v. Close, et al. were referred to as being directly in point.

Counsel for plaintiff submitted that the Court must find that the plaintiff did not state sufficient facts in his bill to constitute a cause of action. Further that the bill asked for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the affairs of the corporation as the primary and ultimate relief and as such it was beyond the jurisdiction of the court to grant the same for the reason that this remedy was an ancillary and incidental relief to be granted only for the purpose of preserving the corpus of the corporation pending decision in an original suit. At the conclusion of the argument the Court made the order that the plaintiffs bill for the appointment of a receiver be dismissed without prejudice.

AMERICAN COMPANY'S AFFAIRS

Motion for Appointment of Receiver Fails: Alleged Mismanagement of Funds

At the U. S. Court last Friday, Judge Purdy heard a motion by the International Finance & Exchange Corporation, Inc., that a bill filed by Mr. Louis Martel, a former director, asking for the appointment of a receiver to investigate the present affairs of the company, be dismissed. "Mismanagement" of the company's affair was alleged.

Mr. F. J. Schuhl, in support of the motion, said defendants had no legal right to sue the corporation or to demand the appointment of a receiver, as plaintiff was not at the time of the filing of the bill an officer, director, shareholder or creditor of the Corporation. In the bill it was not alleged that the Corporation had been dissolved or was insolvent or in immediate danger of being so.

The motion also stated that the bill contained insufficient facts to constitute a valid cause for action of equity.

Mr. Fox, opposing the motion, argued that in the circumstances the Court was the only place of appeal and the appointment of a receiver was the only adequate remedy.

Judge Purdy said the only allegations were that certain sums of money had never been accounted for by the Corporation. The Corporation had issued shares in respect of these sums and therefore might be financially injured. It might be more than the affair was worth for the receiver to investigate this matter. On the other hand the receiver might not be able to find out anything at all. The motion of dismissal would be granted.

U. S. COURT NOT A STAR CHAMBER

Judge's Refusal to Suppress Reports of Divorce Cases: The Dolan Suit

In the United States Court for China, on Thursday, before Judge M. H. Purdy, Mrs. Alice Dolan petitioned for a divorce from her husband J. S. Dolan. Major C. P. Holcomb appeared for the plaintiff and Mr. F. J. Schuhl for the defendant.

Plaintiff was married to the defendant in Tientsin on February 19, 1923. Immediately after the marriage, defendant began to behave cruelly towards her and one night, in Peking, he struck her whilst she was in bed, bruising her eye. She went out and slept in the amah's room.

"My husband was cruel at other times, too," stated plaintiff. "Every month of my married life I was unhappy, every day, every week. His language was mostly foul. He called me foul names many times."

In January this year, she continued, they went one day to the Astor House Hotel and she asked defendant to dance with her. He refused and called her a very bad name. Accordingly she left the hotel and went home. A few minutes later the defendant came in, pulled all her clothes off, beat her and pulled her hair. The result was that she had to be medically attended. Since then they had lived in the same house, but entirely separately and she had not seen him to speak to for four months.

Plaintiff's amah corroborated the story of the assault in Peking.

Mr. Schuhl said that he did not intend to call evidence for the defence.

Major Holcomb asked if the court would request the newspapers not to publish details of the case, adding that a similar request to the press was made by the Judge's predecessor. Counsel thought that the publication of such cases was not good for the name of the community.

His Honour refused to take such action, saying that, if people wanted their names kept out of the papers, the best thing for them to do was to keep out of court. He did not want it to appear that anything taking place in his court was a matter of secrecy. He did not want the newspapers or anybody else to consider it a Star Chamber proceeding.

In giving judgment, his Honour said that he considered the evidence unsatisfactory. There was a general denial of the charges made, but the case practically was one of default. Plaintiff undoubtedly suffered a great deal of anguish, pain and trouble, but he was not entirely satisfied with the evidence put forward. He wanted to feel that when he granted a divorce there was on record in the court sufficient to justify his action. From what had been said it was clear that these two people could not get along together and in this instance he would grant a divorce.

$4,700 BANK THEFT

Two Years for P. & O. Bank Shroff: Threatening Letter to Compradore

For removing a cash box containing $4,700 and sending a threatening letter to the compradore of the P. & O. Bank, a shroff employed by the bank was at the Mixed Court last Friday sentenced to two years' imprisonment.

Det.-Sgt. Tinkler stated that accused had admitted taking the cash box from the safe and also having placed the letter in the safe. The letter was similar to a number of others received by the Compradore during the last two years. Mr. Zee, the Compradore of the P. & O. Bank, the officer explained, lived in the French Concession, and in connexion with one threatening letter a number of armed men were placed round his door. Since then his son and he had been permitted by the French and International police to carry arms.

The accused had stated that two other men Wong Tuh-sung and Sung Tsang-foo were also concerned in the affair. The second mentioned had received the money from him and the first had given him the key of the safe. He also stated that Wong wrote the letter. He would not admit, however, that he took the impression of the keys and added that he gave all the money away.

The complainant, Mr. Zee, also gave evidence stating that at 9.30 on the 11th a report was brought to him that $4,700 was missing from his safe. On inspection the letter was found. They could not see any marks to indicate that force had been used. The accused was the only person sleeping on the premises. Witness did not think the accused had anything to do with the case as he had been working in the Bank for two years. The handwriting of the letter did not resemble that of the accused.

In answer to the Court, the accused said that he put the letter in the safe to keep blame away from the chief accountant.

Mr. Preston, defending, asked the Court be as lenient as possible.

The Assessor, after pronouncing the sentence, added that the Magistrate wished him to say that the Bank could take civil proceedings against accused to recover the money.

JUDGMENT for Tls. 280 and $50 costs was given against E.M. Mark in the Supreme Court on Monday, in respect of rent due for a house in Route Mayen. Judgment was also given against H.E. Whiddett for Tls. 88.20, taxes due. Mr. E.T. Maitland, appearing for the Municipal Council, (Mr. G. W. King) ruled that the (Mr. G.W. King) ruled that the Council was only entitled to court costs.

BY the provisions of the China Order-in-Council, 1917, the Registrar of H. M. Supreme Court, in the absence of both Judges, has the powers of an Assistant Judge, with a few exceptions. In this capacity, Mr. G. W. King occupied the Bench last Friday in order to deal with the case of Harbak Singh, a well educated Indian newspaper editor, who, on conviction for the publication of seditious literature, was sentenced to two months' imprisonment and ordered to find two sureties for his good behaviour, with the alternative of deportation. Having failed to find the sureties, he was brought up at the expiration of the sentence and the deportation order was confirmed.

SPORTS AND PASTIMES

LAWN TENNIS

Men's Doubles Championship

The final round of the Men's Doubles Championship was played on the lawn of the Majestic Hotel on Wednesday afternoon between Messrs. W. Mansel-Smith and J. L. Wade and Messrs. F. Hisae and S. Noguchi, and eventually resulted in a victory for Messrs. Mansel-Smith and Wade, just before darkness would have made further play impossible, by three sets to one—6-4, 9-11, 6-3, 6-1. There was a large attendance of spectators, more particularly in the later stages of the match and during the first three sets excitement was intense. The Japanese pair had a good hope of victory until the conclusion of the third set, but in the fourth set they went to pieces and won only the sixth game.

The opening set was well contested throughout. The Japanese were the first to find their form, in spite of the fact that the first game went against them. Several games went to one or more deuces and it was not until the score had been called 5—3 in favour of the Englishmen that Wade won the set on his service. The second set was a battle royal and 20 games had to be played before the issue was decided. Mansel-Smith and Wade won the first two games, but at the end of the eighth the score was four all, there being several excellent rallies after deuce had been called. Noguchi lost the next game on his service, as did Mansel-Smith on his, and then came a footfault by Hisae in one set and a double fault by Mansel-Smith. Six all was called, seven all, eight all and nine all, and then the Japanese took the last two games and won the set 11—9. In the third set play was just as even, in the earlier games, except that Noguchi's service was not so strong, whereas Wade was frequently up at the net and put in some telling smashes and cross-cuts. Games were quickly concluded, without any lengthy rallies, but after reaching 3—4 the Japanese fell away and their opponents took the set by six games to three. By this time the light was failing, and it was found necessary to call for a set of new balls. In this, the final set, the Japanese were plainly tiring and lost five games in succession, Wade, from superior energy commanding the situation. Hisae won the sixth game on his service, but the Englishmen took the seventh and thus won the set (6—1) and the rubber.

The winners were undoubtedly the better pair on the general run of play, but the Japanese put up a stolid defence and were particularly clever in their fore-arm drives and low service. In lobbing also, chiefly from back of the court recoveries, they compared well with their opponents. Noguchi volleyed well and his service in the earlier stages of the game was distinctly good, whilst he made many good drives which, just skimming the top of the net, were difficult to return. Mansel-Smith and Wade had, as usual, a perfect understanding with each other, and when one was not there to take a lob or to volley, the other was. Neither was in his best form in the first set, but both improved as the game progressed. Mansel-Smith was weak at the net throughout and missed several easy smashes, perhaps through over-eagerness; in back play, however, he was always reliable and his height enabled him easily to volley the other side's lobs. It was not until the middle of the match that Wade was seen at his best. Then, following up his service, or returns, he came up to the net with every confidence, and though making some mistakes, generally smashed with confidence and made some pretty placings across the court. These, with Mansel-Smith's drives down the centre of the court were the deciding features of the match.

THE WORLD'S SCULLING CHAMPIONSHIP

Sydney, Sept. 20.

Paddon to-day won the world's sculling championship by 12 lengths.

The championship was decided on the Woodburn Course, on the Richmond river, the distance being 3¼ miles. Paddon was the favourite. The betting was 4 to 1 on Major Goodsell who looked like giving the champion a hard go, but the race became a procession after Major Goodsell, inside of a quarter mile, dug his scull deep into the water. It fell out of the boat and when he recovered it, he lost 10 seconds.

Paddon's time was 17 minutes 7 seconds, which constitutes a record for the course.—Reuter.

TOKYO, Sept. 23.—If sufficient public subscriptions are forthcoming, for which purpose a publicity campaign is being instituted, the Imperial Civilian Aviation Association announces that it will organize a world-flight to London in 1925.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

LEAGUE'S SCHEME OF DISARMAMENT

Imporant Arbitration Treaty Announced Between Italy and Switzerland

Geneva, Sept. 19.

The disarmament sub-committee held a prolonged sitting to-day and is expected to conclude to-morrow The ensemble of the work on penalties and disarmament has been completed, whilst the question of arbitration is still being examined.

The date of the assembling of the disarmament conference has been fixed, though it has not been stated. There is reason to believe that it will not take place before the spring.

It is explained that ratification of the protocol must precede the issue of invitations to the conference, to which all States will be invited. The protocol does not contain any infringement of the Covenant of the League, while members not signing the protocol will still remain members of the League.

Lord Parmoor, interviewed by a representative of Reuter's Agency at the close of the sitting, remarked: "We are now in fair waters. Things are going all right."

Later.

After seven days of committee discussions, chiefly on the subject of disarmament, the plenary sittings of the Assembly of the League of Nations resumed to-day.—Reuter.

Geneva, Sept. 20.

Signor Salandra (Italy) announced in the Assembly of the League of Nations that an Italo-Swiss Treaty of General Arbitration was signed in Rome to-day. He said that it was the most extensive treaty of conciliation and peace yet concluded, providing for the pacific settlement of all conflicts without exception (cheers).

M. Motta, the Swiss Presidents of the Assembly, was visibly moved as he explained that all differences would be submitted to the International Court of Justice after other means of conciliation failed.

China's Desire for a Seat on the Council.

In pursuance of a resolution of the Chinese House of Representatives, the Chinese Government has telegraphed from Peking to the Chinese delegation to the League of Nations instructing it to press the re-election of China to a seat on the Council of the League. The telegram points out that of the six non-permanent seats on the Council four go to Europe, two to South America and none to Asia, and that Parliament has further decided that China should withdraw from the League of Nations if she is not re-elected.—Reuter.

THE SECURITY PACT

Difficulties in Drafting Suitable Agreement: Small Nations Uneasy

London, Sept. 21.

A Geneva telegram dwells upon the difficulties in the drafting of the Security Pact. It says that it is now generally felt that the Pact when it comes to be submitted to the Assembly will be far less sweeping than was hoped after the speeches of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and M. Herriot at Geneva. The small Delegations are uneasy and declare that Britain and France are running the show. They are dissatisfied with the Benes project. The opposition of the British Dominions to it also is causing great anxiety in League circles. It seems impossible that the project can be introduced before the beginning of October.—Reuter.

Dr. Nansen's Sudden Departure.

Geneva, Sept. 21.

There has been much comment on the sudden departure of Dr. Nansen for Germany in the middle of the work of the Assembly. It is not believed that Dr. Nansen has been entrusted with the mission of trying to induce Germany to apply for admission into the League, but that he is acting entirely on his own responsibility. The wisdom of continuing to press Germany to enter the League is questioned here. —Reuter.

Geographical Divisions and Representation

Geneva, Sept. 22.

The Assembly of the League of Nations to-day adopted the proposal of the Chinese delegates that in the selection of the six non-permanent members of the Council the geographical divisions of the world and ethnical groups should be considered.

The Assembly also adopted the report of the Mandates Commission and a report dealing with slavery. —Reuter.

Paris, Sept. 22.

The "Journal des Debats," alluding to Asia's increasing importance, writes that it is essential that China remains in the League of Nations.—Reuter.

Provisional Text of Agreements as to Arbitration and Disarmament

Geneva, Sept. 22.

The provisional text of the arbitration and disarmament protocol, which is subject to modification, has been published.

Article 2 amends Article XII of the Covenant of the League of Nations. It forbids a member of the League to engage in warfare with another member, excepting in the case of resistance to acts of aggression, or when acting with the consent of the League.

Article V defines an aggressor as a country refusing to submit a dispute to pacific settlement, or to conform with a judicial ruling, an arbitral award or the unanimous decision of the Council.

The Hague Court will be the arbitrator when international law is involved, while upon the Council devolves the responsibility of deciding whether an act of war is illegally committed and of applying appropriate sanctions.

Non-Members of League

Another article, which is not numbered, authorises an invitation to be issued to a non-member nation to submit to the provisions of the protocol when engaged in a dispute with a signatory of the protocol.

The question of the economic and financial sanctions to be inflicted on the wrong-doer shall, under Article VII, be decided by the economic and financial organizations of the League.

Article VIII requires signatories to give the Council in advance undertakings regarding the extent of military, naval and air forces that they are able to bring into action immediately, in order to enforce the provisions of the protocol.

While signatories may provide the whole or any part of their military, naval and air forces to assist a victim of aggression, all the costs of the operations shall be imposed on the aggressor.

A Time Limit

Unless the majority of the permament members of the Council and 10 other members ratify the protocol by May 1, 1925, invitations to the disarmament conference shall be cancelled.

The protocol will not take effect until the disarmament scheme is adopted. In the meantime, the Council will draft a programme for disarmament, which shall be communicated to the Powers at least two months before the conference meets. The protocol will also lapse if the conference disarmament scheme is not carried out within a period to be fixed by the conference, while any member of the conference not conforming with the disarmament scheme within the time limit will be excluded from the benefits of the protocol.

The appendix stipulates that differences with regard to the protocol shall be submitted to the International Court of Justice.

Great Britain's Reservation

Geneva, Sept. 23.

The draft arbitration protocol was discussed by the Armaments Committee of the League of Nations yesterday evening, when Mr. Arthur Henderson (Britain) made important reservations as regards the use of the British Fleet, which, he declared, must retain entire liberty of action.

Mr. Henderson said that the British Government were of the opinion that it was inconceivable that the British Empire would make war again the Covenant or against the protocol. Therefore they only envisaged the case in which the Empire would be engaged in warlike operations on behalf of the Covenant with the approval of the League. The Government were sure that in such a case it would be necessary and desirable, in the general interest as well as Britain's particular interest, that the British Fleet should be able to operate with the freedom required to secure the rapid success and termination of the sanctions.

The British Government therefore proposed the reservation that disputes, arising from a warlike operation undertaken by the British Empire to support the League, should not be referred to the Permanent Court for settlement. The reservation did not appear to limit in any way the value of what the League was doing. Nobody desired that the Permanent Court should become a body controlling military operations, and therefore the British Government believed in safeguarding the liberty of action of the British Fleet, which, above all, must be safeguarded. They were not action contrary to the general interests of the nations of the world.

The Destruction of War.

Dr. Benes, reporting on the discussions of the sub-committee, declared that the protocol did not overstep the frame of the Covenant in the matter of sanctions. The signatories of the protocol undertook nothing new in that connexion though their obligations would become more precise and more efficacious.

The agreement reached by the sub-committee had resulted in the elaboration of a system leading to the goal of destruction of war. Their responsibility was grave but in spite of difficulties he hoped that the discussions of the Third Committee and, afterwards, of the Assembly and, finally, the acts of the Governments, when it came to the question of signatures, would not cause disappointment to the millions of human beings who were looking to Geneva with one and only one word—Peace—on their lips.

The discussion was then adjourned.—Reuter.

Geneva, Sept. 23.

The Assembly to-day unanimously adopted the Committee's resolution in favour of basing the proposed Institute of Intellectual Cooperation in Paris, in spite of the opposition of the Australian Labour leader, Mr. Charlton, who contended that Geneva and not Paris should be the seat of the Institute, as, otherwise, the Institute would depend partly on the French Parliament and not on the League.—Reuter.

Japan's Doubtful Attitude: British Forces not to be at Free Disposal of League

Geneva, Sept. 23.

The First Committee discussed the arbitration and disarmament draft protocol to-day.

Mr. Adatchi (Japan) explained that he was obliged to reserve his attitude, owing to the non-receipt of definite instructions from Tokyo.

It is freely stated in League circles that Japan generally does not favour the protocol, especially the clauses dealing with arbitration and sanctions.

Mr. Arthur Henderson's precise statement dispelled the misgivings as regards the use of the British Fleet. A further point of Mr. Henderson's declaration deserves special mention. Referring to the part the Council of the League of Nations may be called upon to play in the matter of sanctions, Mr. Henderson declared that there was no idea and never had been any idea of placing troops or ships at the disposal of the Council to use as it thought fit. There was no intention whatever, he said, of converting the Council of the League into a Council of War and of imposing on it the burden of conducting military campaigns or naval operations.—Reuter.

LONDON, Sept. 20.—A Colonial Office Advisory Committee has been appointed on the matter relating to the recruitment and training of officers for the agricultural departments of self-governing dependencies, of which Viscount Milner is Chairman and Lord Lovat Vice-Chairman.—Reuter.

GERMANY'S STATUS IN THE LEAGUE

A Claim for Admission only as Big Power: Reasons for the Application

Berlin, Sept. 23.

It is officially announced that Germany will shortly endeavour to enter the League of Nations on the footing of a big Power. The announcement was made at the close of the Cabinet meeting, presided over by President Ebert. After stating that the decision to secure entry into the League had been unanimous, it proceeds:—

"The Government's standpoint is prompted by the consideration that questions dealt with by the League of Nations, especially the protection of minorities, the regulation of conditions in the Saar, the question of general disarmament in connexion with the carrying out of military control and the paramount question of safety and peaceful co-operation of nations, can only be solved satisfactorily with Germany's collaboration, which could, of course, only be that of a Great Power on an equal footing with other nations."

Speaking at a reception to representatives of German Chambers of Commerce abroad, President Ebert emphasized that every German abroad was under an obligation to show by his conduct Germany was to-day justified in claiming the confidence which was necessary to alleviate the heavy task involved in the execution of the London Agreement. The fulfilment of her obligations necessitated Germany's re-participation in the world's trade.

Dr. Streseman, the Foreign Minister, said that Germany had accepted the London Agreement in order to provide a sound basis of economic life. The co-operation of Germans abroad was necessary to enable Germany to shoulder her burdens.—Reuter.

France Not Concerned.

Paris, Sept. 23.

Well-informed circles deny the rumour that direct negotiations have been going on between Paris and Berlin concerning Germany's admission into the League of Nations. In that connexion, "Le Matin" says that M. Herriot received yesterday the British Ambassador and then consulted by telephone the French Delegation at Geneva, which conferred on the matter twice under the presidency of the ex-Premier, M. Briand.

A message from Geneva states that the Norwegian delegate, Dr. Nansen, questioned the French delegates as to their attitude in the event of Germany applying for admission into the League of Nations, and that M. Briand replied that the question concerned the Governments alone and an answer should be sought in Paris, London and Berlin. The ex-Premier added that there was no reason whatever to modify the view given to the League September 5 by M. Herriot, that the admission of Germany would have to be subject to the common rule, without any privilege or exception.—Reuter.

Memorandum Being Prepared

Berlin, Sept. 24.

The Foreign Office is drawing up a memorandum in which Germany's wishes and conditions for entry into the League of Nations will be laid down.

The memorandum will ask whether a permanent seat on the Council will be guaranteed and will expressly declare that Germany's entry will in no way denote re-affirmation of war guilt. It will seek information as regards the obligations undertaken by becoming a member, especially with reference to the question of transportation of foreign troops through Germany for the assistance of a neighbouring State attacked by a third nation.

Germany argues that such transportation would involve a breach of neutrality, especially in regard to Russia, which might lead to the latter retaliating against a defenceless Germany.

The memorandum will also deal with the occupation of the Ruhr and the question of colonial mandates.—Reuter.

ANTI-SOVIET REVOLT IN GEORGIA

Tiflis Captured by Reds: Immediate Butchery by Cheka on the Grand Scale

Paris, Sept. 20.

It is reported from Tiflis that the Soviet troops have entered the city after desperate fighting. At least 600 leading inhabitants were immediately executed by the Cheka, and hundreds of officials imprisoned. The revolutionary troops are falling back to the mountains in good order, from where it will be difficult to dislodge them, and a long guerilla warfare is probable.

The Azerbaijan revolt is progressing.

Later.

The Georgian Legation states that the Georgian insurgents are consolidating their positions in the mountains in eastern and western Georgia and the districts of Lechgum and Ratcha.—Reuter.

League of Nations' Lack of Action

Geneva, Sept. 21.

The Agenda Committee yesterday discussed the joint British, French and Belgian resolution inviting the Council of the League to watch attentively events in Georgia and to seize the opportunity to enable the country to return to a state of peace.

All the speakers expressed sympathy with the Georgian struggle for liberty, but General Freire d'Andrade (Portugal) and Mr. Hofmeyr (South Africa) expressed surprise that the resolution submitted was identical to one voted two years ago. They asked what the Council had done in the meantime, and suggested modifications in the text in order to conform with the new circumstances.

Eventually a sub-committee, comprising Professor Gilbert Murray (Britain), M. de Brouckere (Belgium), M. Albert (France), Count Bonin Longare (Italy) and Mr. Macdonald (Canada), was appointed to consider the question.

It is understood that the sub-committee intends to suggest that Russia mediation by States which have recognized both the Soviet and the independence of Georgia.

A Demand for Peace.

Later.

Three thousand citizens participated in a public demonstration yesterday in connexion with the "War against War" movement. A procession, carrying banners declaring that only working would ensure the peace of the world and demanding that the Governments and the League should intervene with regard to Georgia, marched to the Communal Hall. There was a lively scene outside, Communists shouting "Down with Georgia" and clamouring for the removal of a banner relating to Georgia. After the tumult, M. Paul Boncour, Mr. Charlton, M. La Fontaine and Italian and German delegates made speeches urging support of the League's peace efforts. Mr Charlton expressed faith in the League's work and pleaded for the support of the workers of the world.

A resolution was adopted protesting against the piling up of armaments and demanding development of arbitration.—Reuter.

The Sovereignty of the Soviet.

Moscow, Sept. 21.

In an interview with a representative of the Rosta News Agency, M. Chicherin complained that Imperialistic countries were conducting a general offensive against the Soviet and that they were using the League of Nations in that connexion. He declared that the joint resolution of the British, French and Belgian Delegations at Geneva was a flagrant case of interference in the internal affairs of the Soviet, inasmuch as Georgia was a free and voluntary associate of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. M. Chicherin said that the League of Nations had passed over silently the events in India, Syria, the Sudan and China, but was only too ready to pass resolutions hostile to the sovereignty of the Soviet.—Reuter.

Paris, Sept. 21.

A telegram to the Georgian Legation states that in the districts of Zougdidi and Senaki and along the river Kodor thousands of insurgents have held up an advance of the Soviet troops, with which Communist detachments organized outside Georgia are fighting.—Reuter.

SOVIET FRONTIERS IN CENTRAL ASIA

Two Republics to Be Formed According to Distribution of Nationalities

Moscow, Sept. 24.

An official news agency publishes particulars of a scheme for the readjustment of the frontiers of Turkestan, Bokhara and Kharasm to accord with the real distribution of nationalities.

According to the scheme, the territories will be formed into two republics, Turkmenistan and Usbekistan, as members of the Soviet Republics. It is declared that the scheme is very popular with Soviet Central Asian nationalities.

The news agency adds that the Kurultai Congress at Bokhara has decided to become a member of the Soviet and has approved the proposed re-demarcation by which the Usbeks inhabiting the Bokhara will be merged into the newly-constituted Usbekistan and the Turcomans into Turkmenistan.—Reuter.

ANGLO-GERMAN TRADE TREATY

Lancashire Cotton Industry's Demand for Equal Terms with Other Nations

London, Sept. 18.

The British Government recently considered the question of the conclusion of an Anglo-German commercial treaty in view of the forthcoming termination of the arrangement under the Treaty of Versailles whereby the Allies received most favoured nation treatment from Germany.

Certain tentative proposals have been made through the British Embassy in Berlin and Board of Trade experts will shortly proceed to Berlin to hold preliminary conversations with German experts, preparatory to the conclusion of a definite treaty subsequently.—Reuter.

London, Sept. 24.

An influential deputation representative of Lancashire cotton interests waited on the Prime Minister to-day in connexion with the negotiation of an Anglo-German commercial treaty.

The deputation demanded that Britain should obtain equal treatment with other nations on German markets. Several spokesmen singled out the advantages already conferred on France, notably Alsace, exports from which country to Germany were not taxed.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald promised that the industry would be kept informed and consulted in the course of the negotiations.—Reuter.

Negotiations Broken Off.

Berlin, Sept. 24.

Reuter learns that the negotiations which have been proceeding between British and German officials for the past three days with a view to the drafting of a commercial agreement have broken down in consequence of the inability of the negotiators to discover a common basis of agreement.

Strict secrecy has been maintained by both sides, but the reason for the breakdown is stated to be mainly the refusal of the Germans to make concessions respecting the taxation of British goods exported to Germany; which will be subjected to practically prohibitive duties under the new German tariff now in course of preparation.

Mr. Henry Fountain, the Principal Assistant Secretary of the Board of Trade, who was the British negotiator, will return to London to-morrow. Lord d'Abernon, the British Ambassador, will also leave for home to-morrow after seeing Dr. Streseman, the Foreign Minister.—Reuter.

LONDON, Sept. 20.—Squadron-Leader MacLaren arrived here to-day.—Reuter.

PARIS, September 22.—According to a despatch received from Smyrna there are 20 dead, 20 injured and 25 missing as the result of a fire in a cinema.—Reuter.

OPPOSITION TO THE RUSSIAN TREATY

Mr. Asquith's Condemnation: "Crude Experiments in Nursery Diplomacy"

London, Sept. 18.

Viscount Grey, speaking at Edinburgh to-day, voiced the official Liberal attitude towards the Anglo-Russian Treaty. He denounced it as a fake and a great blot, a great mistake of British foreign policy. The House of Commons should accept no responsibility for the Treaty.—Reuter.

London, Sept. 21.

Mr. Asquith has added his voice to the condemnation of the Russian Treaty, in the course of a letter to a correspondent in which he especially condemns the projected loan as unprecedented in British history, while the Treaty generally settles nothing, but leaves the whole future to a chapter of accidents. Mr. Asquith expresses the opinion that the relations between Britain and Russia cannot be put into business-like lines or secured by adequate safeguards by "crude experiments in nursery diplomacy."

Commander Kenworthy, M.P. for Kingston-upon-Hull, in a speech in Hull said that Mr. Wheatley, the Minister of Health, had told him that the Russian loan would be of £30,000,000 spread over a period of five years.—Reuter.

Claims for Compensation.

Moscow, Sept. 21.

The Council of the People's Commissaries has appointed MM. Preobrajensky, Goichbarg and Reingold members of the commissions provided for under the Anglo-Soviet Treaty to examine the claims of British nationals for compensation for loss or injury.—Reuter.

Government Disappointed by Mr. Asquith's Expression of Opinion

London, Sept. 22.

Mr. Asquith's letter to a correspondent in which he condemns the Russian Treaty has dashed the hopes of Government circles that the Liberals would tacitly support the existing text of the Anglo-Russian Treaty while seeking to amend unacceptable provisions; but no representative Liberals interviewed to-day, believed that the situation would result in an immediate general election.

The Liberals hope that the Government will revise their elaborate plan of the Russian settlement before the issue reaches a crucial stage in the House of Commons. It is suggested that the Government resume the Anglo-Soviet negotiations as a solution of the impasse.—Reuter.

The Bolsheviks' Queer Code of Honour: Cancellation of Debts a Basic Principle

Moscow, Sept. 23.

In an article in the "Pravda," the well-known Russian economist, M. Miliutine, dealing with the Anglo-Russian Treaty, says that cancellation of the debts of former Governments is one of the basic principles of the Soviet social system and any demand for a settlement of them represents an attempt to modify that system amounting to interference in the internal affairs of Russia, which the Treaty specifically forbids.

M. Miliutine contends that the British Government, by guaranteeing a loan only in principle, made no economic compensation for the most important concessions by the Soviet. He concludes that the advantages of the Treaty are problematical, and that the time has come to break off completely all negotiations connected with the claims of British financiers.—Reuter.

CASUALTIES AT KOHAT

Simla, Sept. 18.

In the Legislative Assembly to-day Mr. D. de S. Bray, the Foreign secretary, stated that the number of casualties resulting from the disturbances in Kohat on September 9 and 10 totalled 11 Moslems and 20 Hindus killed and 23 Moslems, 86 Hindus and 6 police injured.—Reuter.

FRANCE AND SOVIET

The Reds Want Everything and Give Nothing

Moscow, Sept. 20.

The "Izvestia," in an editorial commenting on the preparations of the French Government to settle Franco-Russian relations, declares that the Soviet Government requires unreserved recognition, and the French Government must not expect any sacrifice whatsoever in exchange for recognition. The Russian Government will not agree to preliminary negotiations for the benefit of private creditors.

In conclusion the newspaper warns France that any attempt to exclude Georgia from recognition will be regarded as a hostile act.—Reuter.

Paris, Sept. 20.

M. Herriot decided to constitute a commission to study modalities for resumption of relations between France and Russia.—Reuter.

BRITAIN AND EGYPT

Zaghlul Pasha's Visit to London to Negotiate with Mr. MacDonald

Paris, Sept. 22.

The Egyptian Premier, Zaghlul Pasha, to-day left for London to negotiate with Mr. MacDonald regarding outstanding Anglo-Egyptian questions.

Interviewed by a representative of Reuter's Agency before departing, Zaghlul Pasha said that he hoped to dissipate the clouds with which the political situation was enshrouded.—Reuter.

Paris, Sept. 23.

Zaghlul Pasha, the Egyptian Premier, who left Paris to-day for London, said that his two months' stay in Paris had been most agreeable and profitable and expressed gratitude for the attentions paid to him by his French friends.—Reuter.

London, Sept. 23.

A picturesque demonstration took place at Victoria Station this afternoon on the occasion of the arrival of Zaghlul Pasha to confer with Mr. Ramsay MacDonald with a view to negotiations for a settlement of the Anglo-Egyptian question. The station approaches were lined with spectators. The platform was crowded with cheering Egyptians and Indians displaying green and white rosettes and flags, which are the new Egyptian colours.—Reuter.

GRAND DUKE'S CLAIM TO RUSSIAN THRONE

Hope of Support by Russian Army: Intent to Help the Peasant Population

Berlin, Sept. 23.

The Grand Duke Cyril, in a manifesto to the Russian people, assumes the vacant throne of Russia with the title of Tsar.

The "Coburger Tageblatt" learns that the Grand Duke does not intend officially to inform the Foreign Powers at present of his assumption of the Russian throne, and that he will continue to reside in Germany.

The manifesto dwells on the sufferings of the people of Russia—formerly the grain-producers of Europe. It declares that hope of foreign help would have been vain owing to the efforts of Communists to bring about a world revolution. He hopes that the Russian Army will speak the decisive word, whereby the people will arise and recall their legitimate ruler. The Grand Duke promises to restore the Church, to pardon those who have gone astray and to give the land to the peasants.—Reuter.

SOVIET'S NAVAL AMBITIONS

Riga, Sept. 23.

A despatch from Moscow states that the Soviet naval programme for the next four years comprises a Baltic Fleet of two light-cruisers, four torpedo-boats, seven submarines and three anti-submarine cutters; a Black Sea Fleet of one cruiser, eight torpedo-boats, 12 armoured cutters and six mine-sweepers; a Pacific Fleet of four gunboats, and an Aretic Fleet of two gunboats.—Reuter.

THE MILITARY RIOT IN HOLLAND

Sensational Reports Without Foundation: Discontent with Camp's Quarters

London, Sept. 24.

In view of the persistence of sensational reports of a mutiny of Dutch troops engaged in autumn exercises in South Holland, Reuter's Amsterdam correspondent states that it does not appear that anything of importance occurred.

There were some cases of drunkenness and also of discontent owing to the indequate camping arrangements. Many men suffered from rain pouring into their tents but, as a result of complaints, the men were quartered in houses. There was no mutiny, but there was some friction at Ede Camp at Gelderland as a reprisal for alleged highhanded action by the military police in arresting men for trifling deficiencies in regard to dress, etc. A number of the men beat a military policeman and smashed up the furniture of a police hutment, but a couple of the ringleaders were arrested and order was restored. The military police were reprimanded.—Reuter.

INDIAN COTTON DUTY ABOLISHED

More Money for Mill-owners and Loss of Income to the Government

Simla, Sept. 24.

The Legislative Assembly to-day, after a long discussion, accepted without a division a resolution in favour of the abolition of the cotton excise duty.

Indian members argued that the duty was vicious and had been imposed by the influence of Lancashire.

Sir Charles Innes, in a powerful speech, gave striking figures proving the prosperity of the cotton industry and maintained that no case had been proved for protection. He held that the abolition of the duty would place one and a half crores of rupees in the pockets of mill-owners and cause a loss to the Government. If the duty was removed he reserved the right to refer to the Tariff Board the question whether, in the interest of the consumer, the import duty on piece-goods should be lowered.—Reuter.

U. S. BUDGET AND NAVAL NECESSITIES

Secretary Wilbur's Interview with the President: Denial of Indiscreet Speeches

New York, Sept. 18.

The "New York World," in an editorial, says that if the recall of Secretary Wilbur was not due to the character of his speeches on the Pacific Coast as affirmed at the White House, it should have been.

The paper adds that only meagre reports of the speeches have reached the Atlantic Coast, but these intimate that Secretary Wilbur has been talking for a big navy in the best style of "jingo," all directed, of course, at Japan, without the slightest provocation.

President Coolidge cannot afford to have his administration identified with truculent bluster of this kind but, the paper accepts, he seems be indifferent.—Reuter's American Service.

Washington, Sept. 20.

Secretary Wilbur to-day visited the white House.

After seeing President Coolidge, Mr. Wilbur announced that the President had suggested the appointment of a special board to investigate the relative importance of air, submarine and surface craft in the Navy with a view to an adjustment of the Budget.

Secretary Wilber denied that his recent speeches on the Pacific coast had been mentioned during the interview with President Coolidge, and declared that his remarks had been misrepresented by the newspapers. He asserted that his remarks were conciliatory towards Japan and that he had not said that they were antagonistic peoples in the Pacific, but only that they were of opposing civilizations.—Reuter's American Service.

LA FOLLETTE'S CAMPAIGN OPINION

Presidential Election Thought to Be Very Open

New York, Sept. 20.

The Progressive candidate for the Presidency, Senator La Follette, was enthusiastically received on the occasion of the opening of his campaign in the East here.

Only half of the 14,000 seats in Madison Square Garden were free; the others were sold at between 55 cents to $2.20. There were only a few empty seats. A crowd of 8,000 outside listened through amplifiers. The speech was also broadcasted.

The result of the presidential election is at present regarded as a very open question.—Reuter's American Service.

THE MOROCCO REVOLT

Spain Resolved to Fight on: Troops Reinforced

Marrid, Sept. 19.

An official communiqué reports that an attempt to relieve a post at Gorgues was fiercely resisted by the enemy. Operations will be continued.

To-day a Spanish aeroplane was shot down and caught fire. Both the occupants, a captain and a sergeant, were killed.—Reuter.

Paris, Sept. 19.

Interviewed by the Madrid correspondent of "Le Journal," a high military authority strongly denied the reports of negotiations between Spain and Abdel Krim on the basis of the terms proposed by the Riffis last year. He declared that the army would not agree to the humiliation of a peace dependent on the evacuation of Tetuan, which would amount to the betrayal of international agreements, and lead to a revolution in Spain.—Reuter.

A Spanish Advance

Madrid, Sept. 24.

Official despatches from Morocco show that the Spanish advance with the object of relieving Sheshuan, where a Spanish garrison of 3,000 is invested, has begun. General Primo de Rivera has reorganized the Expeditionary Force of 40,000 men, which recently reinforced the Army of 80,000 already in Morocco.

Aeroplanes are preceding the troops, distributing manifestoes threatening that rebels will be severely punished and promising that loyal tribes will be rewarded.—Reuter.

TRANSPORT IS TRADE

British Government's Plans to Develop inter-Imperial Communications

London, Sept. 19.

At a luncheon conference at the Transport Institute at Wembley to-day, Mr. H. Gosling, the Minister of Transport, proposing the toast, "Imperial transport," said that the Government had to build up our old Empire often on new methods; and it was important to remember that we could not hope to develop trade unless we first developed transport. The Government were fully alive to the importance of bringing back transport accommodation to the highest point of efficiency. The Government were devoting large sums and were going to devote still larger sums to it. They should provide roads and transport facilities because they were needed, and such schemes would absorb many of the unemployed.—Reuter.

FILENE PEACE PRIZE

Essays on What to Do for Prosperity of Europe

London, Sept. 19.

The names of the winners of the £2,000 in prizes in the British Empire Section of the Filene Peace Award Competition, for the best essays on how to restore peace and prosperity in Europe by international cooperation, are announced.

The first place has been taken by Ireland; while England secures 26 prizes; Scotland, Canada and New Zealand two each and South Africa and Tasmania one each.

Mr. Bolton Waller, of Bray, County Wicklow, who is the winner of the first prize, has been awarded £1,000. Miss Freda White, London, won the second prize of £250; and Mr. Norman Angell the third of £100. The four winners of the £50 awards include Major Gladstone Murray of British Columbia; the ten winners of £25 include Mr. Horace Belshaw, of Timaru, New Zealand, and Professor Condliffe of Christchurch, New Zealand; while the twenty winners of £10 include Mr. William Edgar, of the Labour Department, Ottawa; the Rev. Ramsden, Balmforth, Capetown; and Mr. L. F. Giblin, Hobart, Tasmania.—Reuter.

RUBBER RESTRICTION

A Comparison Between Increase in Price and Cost of Production

London, Sept. 22.

Discussing the rubber restriction, the "Times" contends that the benefit of the higher price following on the improved statistical position, at the present time goes largely to the non-restricting producer. The restricting companies' costs rise as production decreases. The rise in costs in some cases is appreciably greater then the increase in price obtained, while the Dutch Indies and other outside producers have been enabled to sell increasing crops at higher prices at the same time effecting a reduction in costs.

The real issue between the restrictionists and the anti-restrictionists is whether the advantage to the restricting producers will, in the long run, be commensurate with the sacrifices.—Reuter

London, Sept. 22.

Claiming that the rubber export restriction scheme in Malaya and Ceylon has amply justified itself, the "Financial Times" says that the persistent campaign to wreck restriction in the beginning must be regarded with something more than mere suspicion; as certain large American consumers are known to be desirous of acquiring a substantial stake in the rubber production of British Malaya, Ceylon and elsewhere. They are aware that if rubber can be brought well below one shilling large areas will inevitably fall into their hands at practically their own price. This can only be achieved by wrecking restriction, but there is not the ghost of a chance for this childish scheme.—Reuter.

THE MISSING BOOKS OF LIVY

Professor Fusco's Retraction of Previous Statements as to his Discovery

Rome, Sept. 18.

The mystery of the missing books of Livy has finally been cleared up by the report, accompanied by a signed statement of Professor Martino Fusco, presented to the Minister of Education by the Inspector-General of State Archives, who has returned from Naples.

The report says that while examining the State archives at Naples, Professor Martino Fusco found a document dated December 23, 1332, which was already well-known, in which King Robert of Anjou ordered a payment to the scribe Paolino for the transcription of the 10 books of Livy on the Macedonian war. Professor Fusco, not being versed in mediæval documents, thought that the Paolino copy was not restricted to the 10 known books, but referred to a complete text of Livy's works. The Professor continued his researches, in the meantime lightly assuring his friends that he had found all the missing codices and had already begun the transliteration of the second ten.

Professor Fusco's statement admits that he followed a false scent, and formally retracts all his previous statements about the lost books.

The Minister of Education does not doubt the bona fides of the statement, but intends to watch developments with a view, if necessary, to preserving the State rights to the treasure trove.—Reuter.

SATURDAY'S TELEGRAMS

TURKISH INVASION OF IRAQ

British Government's Protest to League of Nations: Flagrant Breach of Faith

London, Sept. 25.

A serious situation has arisen in connexion with the Anglo-Turkish dispute as regards the sovereignty of the Mosul vilayet in Mesopotamia. This is one of the questions on which no amicable settlement had been reached at the time of the signature of the Treaty of Lausanne, and was reserved for a subsequent negotiation with the provision of ultimate reference to the League of Nations if necessary.

The Turkish Government, in spite of the application of this provision, last week presented a note to Britain complaining of alleged movements of British troops on the Turco-Iraq frontier.

A message from Geneva shows that Lord Parmoor created a sensation to-day by reading the British reply, in which a strong protest was registered against the invasion of armed bodies inside the area administered by the British and also within the old administrative boundary of the Mosul vilayet. Bodies left behind showed that the invaders included Turkish regulars and evidence was available of Turkish disregard of the status quo at the time of the signature of the Lausanne Treaty. The police of Iraq and local levies had been forced to retire as recently as September 22 to Amadia.

Lord Parmoor said that the retirement was accompanied by a flight en masse of Assyrian Christians and a large number of Iraq tribesmen.

Lord Parmoor emphasized the Government's solemn protest before the League of Nations at the the Treaty. Meanwhile, he stated, the British authorities at Iraq had been authorized to take all necessary action to prevent an invasion or infiltration of Turkish forces of a nature which would entail serious unrest and bloodshed.

Fethi Bey (Turkey), who followed Lord Parmoor, disputed the British view as regards the frontier, declaring that it assumed that the fate of Mosul was already decided in favour of Britain, which Turkey disputed.

Later.

With reference to the Mosul situation, it is officially learned in London that there have been two Turkish raids, in Iraq, one last week and one on September 22. British aeroplanes took part in repelling the invaders.—Reuter.

THE "TIMES'" VIEW OF DISTRACTED CHINA

Weakness of Having Recognized Peking: Need of Appeal to the New Spirit

London, Sept. 26.

Dealing with the question of intervention in "Distracted China," the "Times" says that it is unfortunate that it seemed necessary to maintain "the diplomatic fiction that the provisional Government in Peking is the Government of China." Inert submission to this conventional view, says the journal, is the weakest form of diplomacy. A fresh initiative is necessary.

Britain's best opportunity at the present moment, according to the paper, lies in a non-political appeal to the new spirit in China which is expanding independently of and despite the cruel party-war. Wise co-operation with the Chinese educational movement, such as the proper use of the Boxer Indemnity Fund, would be the most suitable aim for the best British effort, in the opinion of the journal, which says in conclusion that as long as British lives are not endangered, the welter of the tuchuns is not our concern.—Reuter.

ANGLO-GERMAN TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Breakdown of Conversations not Regarded as Final: Position Unchanged

London, Sept. 25.

Reuter's Agency learns on good authority in London that the breakdown of the conversations in Berlin is not regarded as final. The conversations were of a preliminary character, to enable the respective representatives to prepare a full report on the possibilities of drawing up a final Anglo-German commercial treaty. Neither side had the authority to pledge its Government to any particular course.

Mr. H. Fountain, the Principal Assistant-Secretary of the Board of Trade, went to Berlin last Saturday merely to assist the British Embassy. The conversations began on Monday, and were not expected to last for more than three days at the outside.—Reuter.

Berlin, Sept. 25.

The speaker hoped that Irishmen themselves would reach a settlement long before the Boundary Commission reported. In conclusion, he denounced the Russian Treaty as subsidising tyranny.—Reuter.

DISASTROUS FLOODS IN LENINGRAD

Serious Damage to Buildings But Little Loss of Life: People Warned in Time

Leningrad, Sept. 25.

Up to the present 19 deaths have occurred as a result of floods from the Neva, the most disastrous since the great floods in 1824. Serious damage has been done to factories, the electricity station, the central aqueduct, the telegraph office, the zoological gardens, the university, the customs house and the theatres.

The death roll is comparatively small owing to the people being warned in time to take refuge in the upper storeys of their houses.

Troops and firemen and the students' corps are participating in the salvage work. The electricity, telephone and telegraph services have been restored and a partial tramway service is running. The railway service is normal. Free food kitchens for children have been opened.—Reuter.

Sept. 26.

The first estimates of the damage to industrial premises due to the floods exceed 10,000,000 roubles. The damage to private property has not yet been estimated.

Martial law was proclaimed yesterday, but raised to-day as normal conditions have been restored.

The Soviet have issued a statement thanking the people for their courage and the help given to the authorities.—Reuter.

ANGLO-AMERICAN LIQUOR TREATY

Test Case in Federal District Court as to Preference to British Ships

New York, Sept. 25.

The Neptune Association, consisting of American deck officers, have filed a suit in the Federal District Court which will be heard on September 30 to test the constitutionality of the Anglo-American Liquor Treaty.

The suit requests the Court to compel the seizure of all liquor on board British ships regardless of the Treaty, which is described as a violation of the 18th Amendment and the Prohibition Act.

The complaint alleges that, in consequence of the fact that Cunard liners are allowed to carry liquor, passengers prefer to travel by these vessels between America and Britain instead of American vessels, where prohibition is enforced, and this makes the operation of American vessels unprofitable.—Reuter's American Service.

GERMANY AND LEAGUE OF NATIONS

French Press Comment on Her Demand for Assurances: a Dangerous Experiment

Paris, Sept. 25.

The papers, commenting on the question of Germany's entry into the League of Nations, state that, very far from giving the guarantees as required by the Covenant, Germany asks for them to be given her and will not apply to Geneva until she has received satisfactory assurances in that respect.

To bend the common law concerning admission into the League in favour of Germany, say the papers, would be a dangerous experiment. They add that the Allies should be firm in the matter.—Reuter.

Berlin, Sept. 26.

The Cabinet has approved the memorandum dealing with the admission of Germany into the League of Nations. A Note is being despatched to the Governments concerned through the respective German diplomats immediately.—Reuter.

FROM THE FOUR WINDS

GOVERNORS IN THE COLONIES

The Costs of Vicarious Kingship: Who Will Occupy the Tasmanian Post?

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

London, Aug. 19.

The refusal of Mr. James O' Gardy, M.P., to accept the Governorship of Tasmania on the ground of inadequate means has attracted widespread attention not merely because of the merits or demerits of this particular incident but because it raises a important question of principle. Hitherto a Dominion or Colonel Governship, except in Crown Colonies, has not carried with it a living wage, given of course the hitherto existing expections of hospitality in the Governor's house. So a post of the kind can be taken only by someone who has money of his own to add to the official salary. That is to say, such posts have, in a sense, been bought by their occupants. For a sum approximately ascertainable beforehand, each of these has bought, subject to Government approval or invitation, the satisfaction of being for a few years the keystone of a social arch, the nearest possible approach for a subject to being the constitutional king of some community overseas. At the same time there have been Colonial Governors who have tried to live upon their income just as there have been Lord Mayors of London who have tried to spend their official salary of £10,000 a year and no more. They have, I believe, accomplished the purpose at which they aimed, but the community has never forgotten it and their term of office has been associated with meanness. Other Governors have gone out thinking they could spend only a relatively small sum in addition to their salaries. They have speedily become disillusionied, and in most cases they have resigned. Australia has had two or three of these Governors within the last 20 years.

Should the System Be Changed?

There are plenty of Labour Members who would like to become Governors. I not know any one of them who would have sufficient money. Mr. W. S. Royce, who was recently offered the Governship of Tasmania, but died suddenly before he could take the position up, possessed large private means, but then he made his money as a railway contractor in South Africa and was not really a Labour Member at all. All the papers agree that the present situation is not a satisfactory one, and that the system must be changed. The difficulty is to know how to change it. The "Manchester Guardian" remarks: "The thing can be adjusted in either of two ways—by increasing the pay of Governors, or by making the standard of their official expenditure, especially on entertainment, more modest—or by a combination of these two expedients. What do the Dominions think?" We should very much like to know what the Dominions do think, but we shall be very much surprised if they have any useful contribution to make towards a solution of the problem. They are not likely to increase salaries and they are equally unlikely to expect less from a Governor than now. In fact, they may suggest that the Mother Country ought to put up the balance of the money needed. As the Governships, whoever fills them, are presumably exercised in the interests of the Mother Country as well the Dominions or Colonies.

Labour Candidates' Disabilities.

If we going to have a Governor at all, we had better have somebody who sets a standard of education and culture, and while, doubtless, there are very able men among the Labour Party I cannot imagine it providing any who would such requirements as I have mentioned. There are a few, of course, but they are not really Labour Members—they are such people as the Buxtons; Mr. Gillett, Mr. Mosley and a few others. All these are educated men, possessed of a considerable amount of culture and able to impress others. If the Mother Country ever provides the balance of the money needed, it may be taken as quite certain that she will exercise an increasing voice in the selection of the Governors. Some of the Colonies will then get a cold shock, because it is one thing to be a successful politician here and quite another to be the head of a State and a representative of the King elsewhere. No doubt there would then be a slump in Military and Naval Officers, who seem to be especially popular at the present moment, and preference would be given to Trades Union Secretaries, most of whom, while well-meaning and affable, are not fitted for any positions other than those they have occupied hitherto.

A Business Man.

The Overseas Territories, therefore, had better in their own interest keep in their hands the control of the choice of Governors. If they pay for them, they naturally select whom they want. If they let others pay for them, then I think they will soon find out that they have sold their birthright. On the other hand, some of them might do worse than look for Governors outside the immediate ranks of politicians in this country. There are plenty of first-class men over here, of good position, good education, broad views and ample means, who would not touch politics with a barge-pole, but who would probably be attracted by a Governorship. A very little inquiry would soon discover a very good type of man untouched at the present time. The time has arrived to give politicians and aged Civil Servants a rest.

LACONIA'S NARROW ESCAPE

Two Anchors Lost: Struggle with Raging Mersey

Liverpool, Aug. 18.

The Cunard liner Laconia narrowly escaped going ashore off new Brighton during a strong squall which sprang up last night as she was being anchored in the Mersey.

After losing both her anchors she was able to pull round against the wind and heavy seas and reach the Liverpool landing stage.

The Laconia had disembarked her passengers earlier in the evening, and owing to bad weather conditions found it impossible to reach Huskisson Dock. Orders were consequently given to anchor in the river for the night.

"A 29-feet high tide was running," a member of the crew told me, "and the wind was whistling past at a great speed. We let one anchor go, and found it would not hold. We were carried down towards Seacombe almost broadside on at nearly five knots. Everyone was working desperately to weigh anchor, but the brakes would not act, and the ship was past Seacombe Ferry before we got the anchor in.

"The anchor was dropped again to obtain a fresh grip, but we were still drifting, and narrowly missed one or two boats in the river. Off Egremont Ferry our pin went west, the cable snapping

"The second anchor was dropped immediately, but we had been drifting further down stream all the time, and at 1 o'clock in the morning we were off New Brighton, and too close in to be safe.

"Fortunately the anchor did not break away until we got head-on in the stream, and we made for the Liverpool landing stage right away under our own steam.

"If we had been broadside on when our second anchor went we should have been lying up at New Brighton now, I am afraid."

SIMLA, Sept. 23.—The Legislative Assembly to-day by 71 votes to 40 passed the Bill repealing the Criminal Law Amendment Act enacted in 1908 to suppress anarchical crime in Bengal. Sir Alexander Muddiman, President of the Council of State, opposing, The Bill said that the times were difficult and abnormal. He pointed out that no stage would be left between ordinary law and martial law if the bill was passed.—Reuter.

POISON PERILS

Preventatives That Harm the Body

BY A STUDENT OF MEDICINE.

Millions of pounds are lost every year through the "going bad" of foodstuffs of one sort or another.

This colossal waste adds greatly to the expense of living, since the loss is usually made good from the pockets of the consumer. If we could preserve our food in transport, at the markets, and within our homes, we should benefit to an extent few of us at present realize.

Indeed, it is no exaggeration to say that food preservation is one of the supreme necessities of the present age of great cities and crowded populations.

The real battle is not about food preservation at all, but about the kinds and types of preservatives which may properly be used. The difficulty to be overcome lies in the fact that substances which kill the germs of putrefaction are also to some extent poisonous to the human body.

They are what is called "tissue poisons."

Boric Acid.

Thus the eater of chemically preserved foods is absorbing poisonous chemicals in small quantities. These may, or may not, injure him.

During the last week the use of one of these chemicals was condemned in strong terms by the experts now investigating this subject for the Government. They declared, in a published report, that formaldehyde which is used occasionally to preserve meat, is a body poison having a bad effect on the liver and kidneys, as well as on the stomach.

This preservative is not very frequently used. But other chemicals are employed daily in large quantities—notably boric acid.

There is a great deal of argument about the effects on the human system of this substance. The writer, for example, knows a man who becomes violently sick if he eats any food in which boric acid is present. He suffers also greatly from dyspepsia.

Other people appears to be able to take quite large quantities of the chemical without experiencing ill-effects. It is, however, possible that they also sustain damage, and that this damage gradually "adds up" until serious trouble occurs.

Safe Preservatives.

The truth is that we do not know exactly how much or how little damage boric acid is capable of inflicting.

Chemical preservatives of all kinds—and some half-dozen of them are in frequent use—are open to the same objection. We know they are poisonous, but we do not know how poisonous they are.

In the circumstances there is a clear case for getting rid of them, provided we can do this without at the same time leaving our food to the mercy of the destroying germs. Modern science, happily, is now supplying us with safer means of preservation.

These consist of cold storage in its newer applications, and of sterilization by heat.

The objection to both of these methods is that they are far less easy to apply than the chemical methods.

This fact, of course, accounts for the opposition offered by some shopkeepers to attempts to prohibit the use of chemical preservatives. Yet many of the larger and more enlightened firms are whole-heartedly in favour of such prohibition.

Ice Chests.

The food of the public, they believe, should be placed above all possible suspicion. It should be guarded jealously and saved from every form of adulteration.

Doctors are entirely of this opinion. The new knowledge we are gaining about food shows that it is vastly more important to human health than our fathers supposed. Even the very smallest quantities of chemicals contained in it are apt to have far-reaching and serious effects.

Cold storage plants, once installed, are not costly to maintain. Every market and every shop should possess them. Every household should own a domestic ice-chest.

In America these reforms have been carried out—with a very great saving to the nation and a real benefit to health.—"Sunday Chronicle."

OUR SCOTTISH LETTER

More Fascinating Carlylean Biography: The Real Spirit of Modern Clanship

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Edinburgh, Aug. 13.

In a second instalment of what bids fair to be one of the standard works of Carlylean biography Mr. David Alec Wilson brings his hero from his marriage to Jane Welsh to a great landmark of his career—the publication of "The French Revolution." Whatever may be objected to in some of its details, the book is a monument of tireless industry. Besides being a biographer, Mr. Wilson is also an interpreter, and he has a philosophy and a faith of his own—strongly Red in tint—that it is most doubtful whether he would have got Carlyle to endorse.

Mr. Wilson emphasizes, what is already well known, that Carlyle did not feel at home in Edinburgh society—it is doubtful whether there was any society on earth he would have found wholly congenial; the Scotish capital left on him "a sad impression of hollowness and dullness." Yet during the years in the 'twenties when he was a resident, Walter Scott was alive; and, besides Jeffrey, Carlyle had Wilson, De Quincey, and other bright spirits as intimates. Looking back on the place a few years later he wrote, "I love and shall always love that old stone town. It is hard, but clear and strong, in spirit as in outward form; built on rocks, looking out upon the everlasting sea. May it flourish, and evil never gain dominion over it." Carlyle's adverse opinions are of course often to be set down to "a bad secretion of bile."

Jane Carlyle's "Weak Points."

On the personal side, while, considering their respective temperaments, Carlyle and his wife were—during this period of their history at least—a most loving and devoted pair, it is curious that those who write about them seem to feel constrained to take up a position of partisanship towards the one or the other. Mr. Wilson is certainly not a partisan of Mrs. Carlyle. He is not, as he says her husband was, "blind to her weak points;" she was not easy to live with, was "never in the wrong," and "had a nasty tongue." Many details are given of the life at Craigenputtock, as sample of which this account of Mrs. Carlyle's activities, as seen through the eyes of the wife of her brother-in-law living in the adjoining farmhouse, may be quoted—"She used to do no work at all but read and write for many days. Then she would suddenly wake up to the fact that the household work was in arrears, and have it all done in a spurt in three or four days, half-killing herself with overwork. Then she would spend two or three days writing about it. She seldom did any hard work, and never needed to do any. Anyone who saw her white soft hands would have laughed at the suggestion of her having used them much."

Freemasons from the East.

At the quarterly communication of the Grand Lodge of Scotland, the Earl of Elgin gave a cordial welcome to a number of brethren from overseas. Among the visitors were Harry Parker Gibbs, Grand Master of all Scottish Freemasonry in India, and six colleagues from India; Sir Malcolm Watson, District Grand Master of Middle East; Mr. John Watson, District Senior Grand Warden, and Mr. J. E. Watson, District Grand Secretary, North China.

Clanship in Scotland.

The presence among us to-day of the American representatives of the Scottish Clans is a welcome and affecting proof of the durability of the ties which bind the Scottish American to the land of his remote, or immediate, ancestors. Clanship, as a political institution, however, has passed away. We may safely take it that the downfall of the Lordship of the Isles, towards the end of the fifteenth century, signified the final disruption of the Celtic Clan system.

It is true that the Clan survived in many parts of the Highlands and Isles for some considerable time after the title of "Lord of the Isles" had been annexed to the Scottish Throne. But, even before that event took place, it was manifest that Clanship, as it originally obtained in our country, was doomed.

The elective principle, on which true Clanship ever rested, had in many cases gone by the board long before the Lordship of the Isles was abolished. Feudal forms and formularies were everywhere at work, corrupting and destroying the system of aristocratic democracy on which Celtic rule and governance were built up. The wholesale sequestration of the Clan lands, and the accession to power of Chiefs who owed their appointments, not to elections, but to the fact that they were in possession of extensive landed estates, meant, and brought about, the complete ruin of the Clan system.

There was little true Clanship existing in Scotland by the time the Rising of 1745 was set on foot. Nevertheless the old Clan sentiment survived and Clanship, stripped of political power, developed, or rather degenerated, into a purely social institution, retaining, indeed, many of the externals of the original from which it was derived, but meaningless and not a little absurd and trivial so far as the actualities of modern existence are concerned. But, fortunately, that phase of Clanship is tending to pass away; the true social meaning and purpose of this ancient but by no means essentially Celtic institution are slowly but surely gaining recognition on the part of those who are able to penetrate below the surface of things, and to distinguish between the trivialities and theatricalities of modern Clanship and its potential, if not its positive, uses and virtues. For there can be no doubt whatever that Clanship, rightly understood and properly practised, would be of considerable social service to modern society. It was politically insufficient, but socially it is rich in the social appetite and sense, in love of family and home, in regard for service done in behalf of kith and kin. The survival of Clanship in Scotland and its appearance in so vigorous a form in America, prove that there is something in this venerable institution which is congenial to people of Scottish blood; and that widespread sentiment should be availed of in order to draw Scotland and America yet closer to gether.

"As Ithers See Us."

Mr. Wallace Nesbitt, K.C., who has just returned to the Dominion after a visit to London, has been recording his impressions of our House of Commons. Apparently, he says, they were all Scotsmen when he visited the House, "For all the speakers spoke in quite broad Scotch." It is not quite clear whether he refers to these speakers when he says that the majority of members "would strike one as not having so much education or general knowledge, and are not as good a type of men as the members of the township council in the most outlying parts of Canada."

Vogue of International Sport.

In every sport internationalism would seem to be developing a dominating influence. In golf, cricket, athletics, football, and so on, this is the case; organization has as its motive power the desire for success in the international field. It may appear to be old-fashioned to suggest that this is being overdone. In golf and tennis youth is to have special coaching and facilities for competition in order that we may make a show for the Walker and the Davis Cups. In regard to cricket, every consideration is to be subordinated to the rehabilitation of the Mother Country in opposition to Australia. The Olympic Games of 1928 are to be the goal of all athletic effort during the next four years. It may savour of perversity or iconoclasm to suggest that this concentration may have the effect of reducing the number of active participants. Quality may be encouraged at the expense of quantity, and it is difficult to escape from the feeling that this is an inversion of real requirements. Sport is only a means to an end, and not an end in itself. Its purpose should be the spread of physical fitness and a proper outlook over as wide an area as possible, and it is doubtful if this is attained by specialisation. It may be argued that supreme capacity is a stimulus, but it can also act as a deterrent. Let talent be developed, but let it not be forgotten that international success is after all a secondary affair.

"Perfect Style" In Running.

Style in running is being cracked up by the experts; but surely too much should not be made of this, for our own Olympic Champion, Eric Liddell, seems to defy all the canons, and yet has made history. Possibly his success may upset the theorists and cause them further to examine their position. It may be that abstract raasoning will again be found inadequate, as it was when the late Freddy Tait disproved his father's somewhat abstruse computation as to the length to which a golf ball could be driven by going out next morning and exceeding the Professor's "scientific" distance. Liddell's greatness is unquestionable, and in his case the usual phrase may be reversed—his defects seem to have qualities.

At the moment he is the most popular runner in Great Britain and with admiration is combined a sort of affection, for, as a personality, he appeals to all. If, as is stated, he intends to retire from the track at the end of the season, there will be universal regret, but a general recognition that a man must put first those things which to him are primary. Liddell, unlike many of less repute, sees athletics in their proper perspective to the more serious affairs of life and in this respect his influence has been fine. It is stated with some authority, also, that Liddell will not play Rugby in the ensuing season, and that Edinburgh University and the Scottish Fifteen will lose his services.

ELECTRICITY FROM SEA POWER

Harnessing the Tides on the Essex Coast

The scheme just launched for the continuous generation of cheap electricity for Essex towns by the use of the tidal power in the Mersea waters is the romance of an idea doggedly pursued for 15 years.

The originator, Mr. Leonard Weaver, though not an engineer, was inspired by what he saw of hydro-electric enterprise in America to see the possibilities of the marshlands opposite the northern side of the island of Mersea, where he has lived for the last 20 years.

The Weaver Tidal Power Syndicate, Ld., was formed, and the engineering levels are now being taken for the first portion of the project, which is to generate 4,000,000 units per annum at the low cost of 1½d. per unit. Fingrinhoe and Langenhoe Marshes and Geeton Saltings, near the Byfleet Channel, are the tracts to be exploited for the whole scheme, which it is expected will supply eventually more than 15,000,000 units.

The miles of sea walls protecting these marshes have made the scheme practicable. Sluices let into the walls will at high tide automatically flood one area, and the water will pass through turbines into a dammed creek serving as an empty basin. When the tide is at the ebb the water is to run out of the empty basin through flood-gates so that there will never be less than a 10-foot head of water for the working of the turbines.

The application of this principle to about 5,000 acres of marshland assures a ceaseless supply of electricity at an actual cost to the producers of one-eighth of 1d. per unit. The lowest figure at which a steam plant could generate would be 2d.

The advantage of such cheap power to Colchester and Southend is obvious and should help to develop Mersea.

Once the methods are a working proposition it will doubtless not be long before similar works are in operation on such promising sites as Walton-on-the-Naze, the Medway, Romney Marshes, and other spots round the English coast.

THE British Government has acquired pieces of ground in several parts of Germany in order that the bodies of British soldiers who died and were buried in Germany during the war may be collected into special cemeteries.

PARIS, Sept. 19.—With a view to diminishing the cost of living, the Cabinet has decided to reduce the existing import duties on certain essential foodstuffs, including condensed milk by 66 per cent., butter by 60 per cent., and cheese, barley, rice and preserved vegetables by 50 per cent.—Reuter.

OUR PARIS LETTER

The Emptyness of Paris and Deauville's Hour of Vast Expenditure

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Paris, Aug. 8.

In theory, Paris is empty. Everybody who is anybody is away at the seaside, which of course implies Deauville when one has a social reputation to maintain. Shops that sell articles de luxe have put up their shutters, or rolled them down as the case may be, and patron and employees are off to the seaside or inland watering place in which their branch premises are established; for, in France, the superior retail trade is a matter of seasons, and the shops follows the clientele. Some jewellers and hotel proprietors invariably carry on their business at Nice in the winter and at Vichy in the summer. Paris houses do most of the trade at the Normandy and Picardy resorts in the summer, and so we find an announcement, usually hand-written on a simple half-sheet of note-paper, stuck on the shutters, to the effect that the premises will reopen in September. The law-courts are deserted, except by tourists. The Bourse, in a technical sense, is inactive, though no one would think so who heard the howls of its professionals between noon and 3 p.m. In the aristocratic districts of Passy and the Plaine Monceau, nearly all the windows are shuttered, and the concierges lead lives of dignified ease. On the doctor's door is a card intimating that his practice has been temporarily taken over by a confrere, who is no doubt impatiently awaiting his return to vanish likewise. The dentist also is away, it being an understood thing that people are not entitled to have toothache in August. It is really not done by the best people.

Yet Still Quite a Crowd.

And yet the tide of wheel traffic seems almost as noisy and rampant as usual, and it is quite easy to come to grief if vigilance be relaxed for a few brief moments when crossing the boulevards. Thousands of British and American tourists have taken the places of the absent Parisians, and Montmartre has not been heard to complain. The cafés and restaurants look as full as usual, and the theatres and music-halls remaining open are doing well. While there is plenty of life in places open to the multitude, the clubs and resorts in favour with the inhabitants are distinctly quieter, and it is largely for this reason that a certain number of hardened Parisians—mostly old bachelors, or men whose wives and families are away—deliberately elect to remain in Paris in August. They say that they get better attention at their familiar haunts, escape bores and social obligations, and, in general, find it possible to live their own lives.

Deauville's Brief Hour.

In the meantime, Deauville is enjoying its brief hour of triumph. Its vogue appears to be as great as ever. M. Cornuché, the clever organizer who raised this little seaside town from obscurity and persuaded the smart world that this was the only possible place to be seen at in August, is said to have lost all real interest in it, though his hand is still on the helm. What pleases him most is the successful overcoming of obstacles. When victory is an established fact, he sighs for new worlds to conquer, and perhaps one of these days we shall hear of some new place to which the leaders are transferring their affections, just as Trouville was deserted for the sake of Deauville across the river. For the time being, however, Deauville's supremacy is unchallenged. It continues to have its own standard of money values: about five times higher than anywhere else in France. In Paris a franc is still accepted as a trip for some small service. In Deauville no one has any use for small change except perhaps to buy a newspaper. No self-respecting servitor designs to look at anything less than a five-franc note, and the hotel and restaurant bills are in proportion. The gaming at the Casino is on the usual colossal scale. A minute suffices for Fortune to make a man or a woman richer or poorer by 50,000 francs or so. No one is really interested by coups of less than a million. Dresses are more gorgeous than ever, and the fancies of fashion run riot. The very latest is pink hair, so called. It is a new weapon in the armoury of the blonde woman. It is a miracle of dyeing in a soft pinkish shade which perhaps started as a golden chestnut. This new shade is much admired and sets off to advantage some graceful heads and handsome profiles. By daylight it is equally effective as seen in wisps of curls beneath the attractive small felt hats which are almost the only wear at Deauville.

Law Case Over Bobbed Hair.

Apropos of hair, a curious legal point has been raised by a prominent French member of Parliament. His daughter, a girl of eighteen, wanted to have her hair bobbed, and asked her father's permission, which he emphatically refused. She decided, with truly feminine astuteness, to confront him with a fait accompli, and, while he was engaged on his Parliamentary duties she went to the family hairdresser's and had the operation performed. When her father returned home and discovered what had happened, his wrath knew no bounds, and after exhausting his vocabulary, with very little effect, on his daughter, he marched off, in a state of fury, to the hairdresser and reproached him bitterly, winding up with the intimation that he would be prosecuted. The angry deputy even proceeded to carry out his threat, and lodged a complaint against the hairdresser, arguing that the latter ought not to cut off a girl's hair without the consent of her parents or guardians. This is certainly a new aspect of the paternal right of control. The irate parent will no doubt realise on reflection that even a member of Parliament cannot hope to override the dictates of fashion, and that it is better to be disobeyed than to be ridiculous.

"Every man his own landlord" might be the motto for a private Bill which is backed by numerous members of the Chamber and has been laid on the table of that assembly. The preamble puts forward the startling proposition that it would be quite practicable, by means of a system of loans, to provide every French family with 200 square metres of ground. The idea is to extend the scope of the Ribot Act, which enables responsible persons to obtain money advances at low rates of interest, so as to invest in real estate for purposes of habitation. The authors of the new Bill propose that the State should set aside every year a sum which would begin at Frs. 500,000,000 and would be slightly larger in subsequent years. This, they say, would enable 100,000 families a year to borrow money from the State and become the owners of the houses in which they dwell. It is calculated that in the course of thirty years there would scarcely be a family paying rent. Such a state of affairs would react very strongly against Communism and Bolshevism and other dangerous "isms" and would have consequences of a far-reaching nature. It would certainly tend to make France the most stable and least politically adventurous country in the world; but whether the project is financially sound is another matter.

FACTION fights still continue in France. Last month is was reported that such fights between the youths of Moulins, Lille and Wazemmes, rival quarters of the city of Lille, which were frequent before the war, have been revived. The immediate cause of the latest fight was a young woman of considerable personal charm. To settle the quarrel, battle was joined on the fortifications near the Porte d'Arras. One-hundred and fifty youths were engaged on each side, armed only with nature's weapons. The Moulins Lille party, led by a powerful iron-worker, occupied the summit of the fortifications, from which the youths of Wazemmes, led by a mason, tried to dislodge them. In the course of the battle, 23 pairs of eyes were blackened and as many noses were made copiously to bleed. Before the issue could be decided, however, a party of police cyclists put the belligerents to flight, without giving them the opportunity of recovering their coats and waistcoats, which were lying on the ground.

THE INTRICACIES OF PEACE TREATIES

Summary of Terms of Pact of London: How Germany Is to Make Reparations

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

London, Aug. 19.

Last Saturday night all the parties concerned, including Germany, reached an understanding with regard to working the Dawes Report, which is the approved method of obtaining reparations from Germany. The document signed is called the Pact of London. There are about 8,000 words of it, and hardly anybody understands it, at all events, in minute detail. The broad lines, however, are fairly well understood, and perhaps they are worth restating for the benefit of those who have never, from the cables, got a very clear grasp of what is proposed. They may be accordingly set out as follows:—

The Franco-Belgian Forces are to evacuate all German Territory not held under the Versailles Treaty within a year from Saturday last, viz., on August 15, 1924. As a sign of goodwill certain towns are to be evacuated at once, and this has already been done. Others are not to be occupied any longer than the Ruhr itself. In the Ruhr the French have promised to make the occupation as "invisible" as possible.

On its part, Germany agrees to take the necessary measures to carry out the Dawes plan, especially in relation to the Bank, Railways and Industrial Debentures, and to make special provision for control of revenues which are named as security for the annual payments.

To do this Germay has to meet her obligations by taxes, railways and industrial bonds. The German taxation must not be less than that of the Allied countries. A sum increasing yearly, which in 1928-29 will reach 1,250,000 gold marks, must be set down in the German budget. The German railways are to be handed over to a limited company, which will create and supply for reparations eleven milliards of first-class mortgage bonds bearing an annual interest of 5 per cent. The whole working of the business will be controlled by a railway commissioner, who will, in all probability, be a Frenchman.

Germany is to enjoy a partial moratorium during the first four years of the operation of the Dawes plan, and to be assisted in the initial stage by an international loan of £40,000,000 (this loan is to be negotiated in October).

After the fourth year Germany is to pay a standard annuity of £125,000,000, which may be modified within certain limits by the working of a prosperity index. This annuity is to be covered by:—

(1) The gross receipts from the Germany railways, transformed into an international company;

(2) The issue of German Industrial Debentures; and

(3) The yield of certain taxes and monopolies on drink, tobacco and sugar.

Under this scheme, the British share of the reparation sums from 1924-5 to 1928-9 would be

1924—5	£11,000,000
1925—6	13,000,000
1926—7	13,200,000
1927—8	19,250,000
1928—9	27,500,000

In all, 5 milliards of gold mark bonds are to be found for Reparations. France, on its part, has also made sure of a supply of coal and coke for a number of years.

The German board of directors of the Reichsbank, which is to receive reparations payments on deposit, is to be supervised by a general council, half of whom will be foreigners who have extended powers for safeguarding the interests of the creditor nations.

The loan of £40,000,000 is not to to be guaranteed by any Government, British, American. French, or other. The money is to be raised on the open market, a half, it is suggested, in the United States, a third in this country, and the rest on the Continent. It is believed that the interest will be 7 per cent.

In the case of default by Germany, an American citizen is to sit on the Reparation Commission when the Commission considers anything arising out of the Dawes plan. Sanctions will not be applied unless flagrant default has been established. In case of sanctions the Allies undertake to safeguard specific securities for the service of the loan. The service of the loan is to have absolute priority as regards any German payments affected to it.

Finally, any dispute arising out of the question of sanctions can be submitted to the World Court.

Security is thus guaranteed by the occupation of the left bank of the Rhine only. The Cologne zone can only be evacuated if Germany has satisfied the obligations of the treaty at the beginning of 1925 and particularly the obligation to disarm.

Matters in Abeyance.

These are the main outlines of the Agreement, which will have to be submitted to the different Parliaments, though there is only some doubt as to what the German Parliament may do. It will be accepted both here and in France. It really takes us back to the Treaty of Versailles, with rather a better guarantee for the payment of reparations by Germany. Consequently, the Agreement has had a good press here, although, even assuming this arrangement works well, there still remain unsettled the following subjects which will call for further conferences:—Inter-Allied debts. Disarmament, Security. The establishment of the League of Nations.

The closing scenes of the Conference were quite dramatic, but it was clear that all parties wanted a settlement, and there was no apparent ill will or animosity. Accordingly, everyone is well-pleased and Mr. MacDonald deserves credit for giving effect to the Dawes Report which was initiated by the Conservative Ministry. We now have to see how the whole scheme works, though it ought to work well, if worked honestly. I am not sure, however, that there is any great keenness here on lending money to Germany, who can if she wants, I think, get all that is necessary in the United States.

The Cabinet in Recess.

The Prime Minister has now retired to Lossiemouth, and the rest of the Cabinet are having a holiday. They may not find it so easy to deal with the Irish Boundary Treaty on which both parties seem rather uncompromising, and which will thus necessitate special legislation. Mr. Baldwin has been in Ulster, attempting to make Sir James Craig a little more reasonable, but so far as we can gather, the results have been negative. For the moment, Mr. Cosgrave has pacified the Irish Legislature by promising action in the British Parliament, but De Valera is again very active publicly, and it is idle to disguise the fact that the Republican movement is making headway, mainly, owing to the weakness of the Free State Government. Sooner or later there may be serious developments.

HOUSE OF COMMONS TREASURE QUEST

Historical Statuettes

The House of Commons is engaged in a treasure quest. It is believed that somewhere there are to be found, perhaps on the Continent or in America, if not in this country, three ivory statuettes of the 17th century, which open and display beautifully carved scenes of stirring incidents in our history.

There have already been discovered two of Charles the First and one of Oliver Cromwell, which are now in the possession of the House; but the original set, it is thought, consisted of six. A fourth, in fact, has already been traced. It is a Mary Queen of Scots, the skirt opening back to reveal a carved scene of the death of Rizzio. Though it has been stated that it was bought for £30 in Meran by an American some time ago, there is reason to believe, we are informed, that it is in this country, and that there is a prospect of the House having an opportunity of acquiring it.

Of the subjects of the others of the set there is no very definite information, but so novel is the idea in the carving—the historic scene within the body of the figure—that members of the House who are devoting in their holidays a little time to the quest cannot fail to identify the charming little treasures if by some lucky chance they should come across them.

The first was found some six years ago by Sir Clive Morrison-Bell in a shop at Geneva. It was a Charles the First, standing in full Cavalier costume, with the left hand resting on the belt which holds the sword. The whole of the body of the figure opens in the centre and reveals in three parts what is described on the tablet that rests on the thighs, "Dissolution du Parlament par Oliver Cromwell." The central scene, with its 10 or dozen little figures, depicts the moment when Cromwell is thundering "Take away that Bauble." In the left-hand panel are soldiers entering the House, and in the right hand members being expelled. The head of Charles, like a rock above the climber, overhangs the opened scene.

Another Charles and an Oliver Cromwell with a scene of the battle of Naseby have been presented more recently by Sir William Bull and Mr. W. R. Rea. They have not yet been shown, but will shortly be placed in glass cases with the first Charles in the Library. A curious thing is that the Mary Queen of Scots that is now being traced was actually seen by Sir Clive Morrison-Bell in the same shop at Geneva where he purchased the Charles the First. It did not, however, give him at the time the impression that it was by the same artist; nor did it seem to him then so obviously marked out for the House of Commons as the only possible resting-place as the Charles, "and so," he says to-day, "the opportunity passed and the statuette is apparently now in America"—or, as we have suggested, more probably in this country.—"The Observer."

HOW TO ENJOY AN OYSTER

BY AN OYSTER DEALER.

What annoys an oyster is nothing compared with what annoys an epicure when he pays for first-class oysters and then spoils their flavour in handing.

Although there are upwards of 20 ways of cooking oysters, to the palate of the epicure they are seldom so acceptable as when fresh from their native shell.

To enjoy an oyster, eat it the moment it is opened, with its own liquor in the undershell. Unless actually "alive," its flavour and spirit is lost.

Many people spoil their oysters in opening. This is not very difficult if you hold them with the deep shell downward, and then insert a thin knife at the back and cut through the muscle joining the two shells.

Should you suspect an oyster, open it and remove the fish. In the genuine "native" the interior of the shell will either be a pearly-white or tinged with a bluish or purple colour.

In the foreign-bred oyster, a curious dark crescent-shaped mark —resembling a dark eyebrow—will be seen where the oyster attached itself to the shell.

One may rest assured that a "native" oyster is nearly always to be relied on to be a native. This is because imported oysters relaid on our shores do not cast any "spat," and consequently do not breed here.

To judge the age of an oyster examine the surface lamellæ or growth rings on the shell. Oysters are mostly of a size, but their ages differ widely as do the number of their rings.

Oysters of 18 months or two years possess at least two rings, and as many as five. One of three summers has at least two rings, but may have as many as six. A four-year-old oyster has from three to seven and even eight rings.

To keep oysters lay them, bent shell downwards, in a rough basket or earthenware colander. Then twice a day sprinkle with rain or river water from a watering-can.

Above all, keep your oysters cool and yet out of reach of frost. While most of the water runs off, enough will remain for feeding them. In this way oysters can be kept fresh for eight or ten days.

The method of feeding oysters on salt or oatmeal and water is not recommended. The chief drawback to this is that the oatmeal finds its way inside the shell. The fish then tastes "gritty," and the original flavour is destroyed.

"ENGLISH AS SHE IS SPOKE."

Trade Jargon that Is Mutilating the Language

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

London, Aug. 20.

It is August just now, so we are having an animated discussion on "English 'as she is spoke.'" Needless to say it was Mr. George Bernard Shaw, who first ventilated what, with him, is evidently a grievance, as he considers that no public man is able correctly to speak the English language. He must have been listening to some of the Labour Members of Parliament who, in this respect, are not very particular. He has been followed by the Drapers' Conference at Oxford, which has devoted its attention to the slang phraseology of shop assistants. One of the staff experts, who went down to address this Conference, complained of the jargon employed by female assistants, who are apparently addicted to such phrases as "I can do you in green," or "Can I fix you up in stripes?" or, "this comes cheaper." A lady critic of these things suggested that she could not understand why anyone employed the word "come" in these circumstances, and she contended that to ask a potential customer if she would like to be fitted out as if she were a zebra was not particularly flattering.

Apparently, however, shop assistants have their defenders, and an authority, a director of one of the big drapery establishments stated: that it was not slang, but trade language. The girl who comes into the house as a novice shows a new hat to madam and says "I think it's just right for you." After a year or two she thinks in different terms; she then says, "Madam, it is one of the plums of the whole show." Women who attend sales are as expert in the slang or tribal languages of bargain hunters as the girls themselves, and are guilty or saying "What bits and pieces have you?" "Some hot stuff here," says the girl, and she doesn't realize for a moment that it is a special language, like Esperanto or Russian.

"Odds" is supposed to have something to do with betting, but in the shops "odds" may be any little pieces from curtains to fenders.

"Plums" are not fruit, but the special bargains are put on every counter and on every shelf to entice the sharp-eyed shopper to become a Sherlock. It is true that women assistants and customers have a sort of verbal shorthand, and an assistant on hats will suggest "What your face needs is a mitre," as if the customer were a bishop, whereas what she meant was that the customer would look well in a hat the shape of a bishops. Every department has its slang—including the one that invents the names of fruits like "strawberry crush" and "ground tomato" to describe colours.

That Devastating "the Same."

It is not easy to see how you can avoid the debasement of the English language, which there are schools which exist for no other purpose than to teach trade and commercial phraseology. Everybody knows that the worst English is spoken by commercial men, not because it helps their business, but because, as a rule, they do not know any better. Their one favourite word is "same," and they employ it on every possible occasion. I wonder how many times you read a commercial letter with some sort of phrase like this: "I have to acknowledge receipt of your communication and will pay very careful attention to same." Why they cannot say "it" no one knows, but it is most improper to do so, and no self-respecting business man would lower himself so far as to commit such a trade solecism. Trade loves to omit all small words, which really make a sentence read as if it were in good English. A well-known phrase is, of course, "acknowledge receipt of." It would be perfectly easy to "acknowledge the receipt of;" but I suppose people think that if they put in an extra word or two like that it will take up time and compel them to cut the typist's lunch hour down to a half. Of course, the pace at which people carry on is also responsible for the mutilation of the language.

Everybody tells stories of the phraseology and the accent of public servants of the type of omnibus conductors and railway officials; they are not exaggerated. I have myself frequently heard "Picc. Circ." instead of "Piccadilly Circus," and every self-respecting conductor alludes to "—Obun." The newspapers love to tell these Tams, so lots of people will begin to think it is quite the right thing to copy diction of this nature. In America, as you doubtless know, there are men of supposed culture, who are proposing to re-write the Bible and other books on lines of modern slang. Nobody takes much trouble nowadays to employ very accurate English; few newspapers will shed tears over the use of the split infinitive. We do, though enjoy discussions on topics of this nature, since they show our sense of high education.

The Legacy of Cheap Fiction.

One of the briskest controversies we have had for a long time in the papers has been over the point as to whether in certain circumstances you were not compelled to use the split infinitive. One correspondent maintained that you were, and he brought forward instances in support of his point of view, much to the annoyance of literary purists. The truth of the decay in literary expression is mainly due to the mass of pot-boiling fiction which people read. How can you expect to have a high standard of literature in work of this nature? And unconsciously people model their language on what they read. I know this because I once met a Provincial Mayor who modelled all his sayings on Emerson. He was rather a terror in the process, but on the whole, looking back, I am inclined to think that I would prefer listening to him, rather than reading, shall we say, Ethel M. Dell.

EVE AS ADVOCATE

Why She Has Failed at the Bar

Every Law Term when dining in Hall I become more and more conscious of the increasing numbers of women students, writes a London barrister. They sit together at a central table in the old Hall, and draw about them the black sleeveless gowns of which they are so proud. But they do not look particularly happy, at ease, self confident or at home.

And every Law Term, as "call" night comes round, one or more of these women students changes her student's gown for the full sleeve gown and horse-hair wig of a full blown barrister-at-law and becomes in due course a "practising lawyer."

Then she disappears. What becomes of her? She has brains, a fluent tongue, and self-confidence, yet she seldom appears in Court.

Few solicitors will brief the woman barrister. Perhaps they are prejudiced by her sex. Perhaps they regard the briefing of any untried barrister as a risk. English women barristers contend that when they have broken down the barriers of prejudice they will succeed as well as men. But it so happens that they lack certain qualities necessary for success.

First, perhaps, come physical endurance. The successful barrister works some 15 to 18 hours a day. Next comes a large and deep knowledge of life, of human nature, of the wiles of men and of women. These are things the male barrister picks up in his progress about the world.

I have heard one or two women barristers in court. They all struck me in the same way. First they are immensely conscientious, trust to technical argument and are, perhaps, a little impervious to the "feel" of the court.

They have not a flair—so far as I have been able to judge—for brushing aside unimportant technicalities for broad issues. They are technicians.

Yet women have succeeded in America I am answered. Very true. There are women in large practice in the States, eminent and successful lawyers. But—it practice in the States, emminent as solicitors, and not as advocates.

Notes of a Sermon Preached by the Rev. C. E. Darwent in Union Church, Tientsin, Sunday evening, June 22.

Text; "But sanctify in your heart Christ as Lord; being ready always to give answer to every man that asketh you concerning the hope that is in you, yet with meekness and fear."

The great Henry Ward Beecher liked what he called a "fat text." meant one full of matter for teaching , as his texts always were. And this is surely one that we may well spend a half-hour over this warm evening. It is a great word to come from the ex-fisherman, the impetuous, warm-hearted Peter. He was not at all a scholastic person, as we are often told to-day that every preacher of Christ ought to be. I expect that our Lord would be quite willing to-day to exchange all the scholastic preachers that he has serving him for a dozen men with the living catching faith that was in this erstwhile fisherman. China, as well as our own countries, would be the better of a few.

We will begin with the first paragraph of the text, Peter's definition of the people he is addressing. It is intended to be a description of Christian people. It is also intended to indicate our first business. He says, "Sanctify in your hearts Christ as Lord." Dr. Moffatt's rendering of the whole text is, "But reverence Christ as Lord in your own hearts. Always be ready with a reply for anyone who calls you to account for the hope you cherish, but answer gently and with a sense of reverence." To "sanctify Christ as Lord," Dr. Moffatt explains as reverencing Christ as Lord. That is the meaning of all words ending in fy. It means to make things or persons all that the word implies. It is explained in the Oxford Dictionary as making, producing. To pacify is to take such action as will produce peace; to frenchify is to create a French atmosphere, to introduce French manners, to make French ways of doing things and of thinking predominant; to magnify is to make anything great, to give it the greatest importance, as when Paul says, he "magnifies his office." His apostleship came first. It was a greater thing to be an apostle of Christ than to be Emperor. Any minister who lets men depreciate his office is not fit to hold it. So then to "sanctify Christ in the heart" is to make Him Lord and Master—Him first, the rest nowhere. That is Christianity. You cannot make too much of Jesus Christ. It is sometimes said that Christians talk too much of Christ, and that it would be well to say less about Him. No; even Dr. Glover, of Cambridge, who cannot be accused of Fundamentalism, says "the fault of the modern Church is that it doesn't make enough of Jesus Christ." The very name of our religion implies this. We are Christians. Christ is first in the Church; he is first to every one of us. If we know that anything is against His will and mind, there ought, to be no question as to what we ought to do with it. His authority is supreme, in our social relations, in our private conduct, in our relation to God. Christ is the meridian of Greenwich to every man who sets out to sail the sea of life and hopes to enter the harbour of eternal life. We measure everything by Him—politics, economics, family life, national and personal life—if we can only find what exactly the will of Christ is, which is not always easy. Still, that is the Gospel. He is central. God has summer up all saying, redeeming influences in Him. Whatever influence towards the divine life in the soul you find in anyone else you can find with vaster fulness in Him, in whom is "the fulness of the Godhead bodily." Nothing less than this is Christianity. He is power, ideal, in fact everything we need. And what a blessing and mercy this is to man! There is a book by Professor Perry called "The Conflict of Ideals." Surely that has been and is the misery of man, that his ideals conflict, that one nation has one ideal and another. That led to the late awful war. Hence the one thing mankind has always been in the most pressing need of has been one ideal for the whole race Then peace and happiness will reign, and not till then. Now this is what the text means. Jesus Christ is the one ideal for man. All things are "summed up" in Him. To put Him in that place is to "sanctify Him in the heart," obeying, loving Him. All other lords and masters step down and take a second place. That was the way with Peter. He had confessed, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God." And now that he is old, he sees the wisdom of it more than ever, as wise and faithful people do. If humanity is ever to fulfil the creative ideal of it, it must have one supreme authority, standard, Saviour. And the Christian claim is that Christ is that. He is supreme over all.

The One Ideal for Man.

Now that was one of the greatest objections that the world in Paul's time had to the Gospel. It objected to this sweeping claim. You will find that again and again in the first antagonists of the Gospel. Why this exclusive claim? They would have been quite willing to acknowledge that Jesus deserved a place along with other wise teachers of mankind, such as Plato. But, that a Jewish peasant, who had died a shameful death, should claim to be the Truth itself was past bearing. And I believe that this is the main objection to Christian missions yet. I have heard it repeatedly on this coast: "Why cannot people leave the Chinese alone with their religion.?" Peter saw what a tremendous claim it is and he had found out what a rage it threw men into to be told that "there is no other name under heaven given among men whereby we may be saved." It is called overwhelming pretension, and bigotry. And Peter is telling these people that they will have to meet this difficulty.

Reasons, or Excuses.

And that brings us to the next thing he has to say; they have to "be ready always to give answer to every man that asketh you a reason concerning the hope that is in you." He says: You people going out into the world with such a tremendous claim must be prepared to back it with reasons. You have always to be ready. It will bring ridicule on your Lord, if you cannot say why you look up to Him as your Lord and Master. It will be no use saying that the Christian life is a life of faith. It is, but you must show reasons for your faith. It is very likely that these people urged the same difficulty as is still urged, that Peter asks too much, especially too much of ordinary folk. They say, "we are not all learned professors, up in all the ins and outs of the critics." Peter's readers were very ordinary people indeed, yet he sticks to his point, "Be ready to give answer."

Now to show how fair and reasonable the apostle is, I will show how a philosopher of to-day—Professor Perry of Harvard—backs Peter. Professor Perry says in his "Conflict of Ideals" that we always give reasons for everything we do. He says, "In answering the contention which would relegate all philosophies of life to the shadow world, where they would play no real part in the drama of history, I wish to call attention to the fact that human beings do, apparently, feel the need of offering good reasons for their actions." Yes. We do not, as he says, act for any length of time on passion, prejudice, folly or fear. We always manage to give a reason of some kind. It may not be a very satisfactory one, but we produce one. If we are known to be fond of fish, we say it makes brain; if we smoke or drink, there are a hundred reasons given, one or the other "soothes us or stimulates us;" if we vote for Smith and not for Brown at an election, it is because Smith is the best man; if people go to the pantomime at Christmas, it is because the "children do like it, and cannot go alone." Every election is a conflict of reasons, socialism, individualism and so on. We do nothing without a reason. We choose a suit because we like the pattern, or a lady chooses a dress because it suits her complexion. No one can deny this. Nay, so universally do we give reasons, that if we cannot hit on a good and genuine one, we create a bogus one. That is called an excuse. If reproached for not having written a letter we say, We "had'nt time," which is usually untrue. The late war is a clear proof, that Peter is right in requiring all Christian people to be able to give answer to anyone wanting to know why they put Jesus so high. We can all remember how both sides at once began to give reasons for their fighting one another. We had lots of reasons, the "sacredness of treaties," the "defence of a weaker nation." The war "was to end war," and we wound up with the reason that the war was to "make the world safe for democracy." So the Germans fought because they "were attacked." or "going to be attacked," and to "spread the blessings of German culture over the world." The spirit of all the warring nations had to be kept up, and that could only be by giving sounder reasons; and ministers of propaganda were set apart, and the leaflet fell like snow over Europe from aeroplanes, each one crammed full of "reasons." Peter has us all here. As Professor Perry further says, we give reasons for "personal support" in the first place. We are ashamed to admit to ourselves, if we do anything and cannot give a reason. Further we "need social support." We "lose face" with others if we act without reason. Peter is right, and here is the question for all of us. Can we all give "a reason for the faith that is in us?" Professor Perry says, further, that we not only find reasons for everthing we do, but we always also try to find moral reasons. That is most true. It was the basis of the enormous propaganda of the war. So then, all this must be more abundantly true for Christian people. Peter must be right.

What Is Required.

Now this sounds alarming. It sounds as if every Christian man or woman had to be very learned in all the difficulties raised by unbelievers, as if we had all to be learned theologians. Not at all. That is quite a mistake. Let me try and explain what is required and what not. I do not think I have ever seen it explained, but it is vital to know it. The mistake Christians make is to think Peter means that we have to be able to give such conclusive reasons for our faith as to utterly annihilate the unbeliever, and leave him without a leg to stand on. Oh! No. That is impossible. The thing we have to do is to give our reasons for our faith, modestly and firmly, and leave the inquirer to digest or reject them as he likes. He may not think much of them. Very well. We can do no more. It is said that when Lord Morley and Mr. Gladstone met for almost the last time, Mr. Gladstone asked Lord Morley whether he still remained in his old religious position, that is, of unbelief. Lord Morley said, he did. No more was said. They had had it out countless times, and Mr. Gladstone had done all he could to win Lord Morley to faith. And it is no reproach to Mr. Gladstone's faith that he was unable to win his friend for Christ. Some unbelief is deep set. Mr. Huxley once said to Mr. Gladstone when they were talking of religion, "Perhaps men like me are colour-blind to religion." That was candid. It is often true. There are men who are to spiritual things as couour-blind men are to colour "seeing they see not, till the Holy Spirit opens the eyes of their soul to God and eternal things looked at in this way, we can all" give answer to every man that asketh us. We may have one reason or a hundred. If asked give them. Peter doesn't say, "You must give a reason that knocks your inquirer down." No. Give one that satisfies you yourself. That is all, that is required. It may prove "good seed in good ground" or seed "among thistles" or on "rocky ground." You cannot help that.

Give Your Reason.

There is no time to go into all the possible reasons. If you have found that Christ has savel you, given you a new attitude to God, given you a sense that your sins are forgiven, say so; if you believe because Christ is so tremendous a figure in the world's history, and that He verifies Himself to your conscience as the eternal Truth of God, that somehow, He always approves Himself right, and that you feel that you are nearer God, the nearer you are to Him, explain it as they may, say so; if you are Christian because you want your fathers and mother's God and Saviour to be your's, or that with all its saints your church and its great faith are good enough for you, say so. It is not a bad reason, if you know that your father and mother, and better people than you, have found in Christ eternal life itself.

Give your reasons, but as Peter says, so beautifully, "with meekness and fear" or, as Dr. Moffatt has it, "answer gently with a sense of reverence." That is one of the most beautiful touches in the whole Bible. You are not told to be hard and bitter and dogmatic and overbearing as the huge mistake of some Christians is, but, "with meekness and fear." At the present day, as well as in the past, Christians have thrown their reasons at questioners like throwing half a brick at a man. That does no good. You have to state your case and leave your testimony to God and the inquirer's conscience. The Lord Himself when He was here among men, was quite unable, do what even He might, to convince everybody. We cannot hope to be more successful than He but, whether we are learned or not we can all give the reasons which are satisfactory to our own conscience, and that is all Peter asks us to do.

AMAH TALKS

Scene.—A Peak bedroom brightly lighted with electric light. A gentle breeze is fluttering the white curtains. The little cheerful sounds of a thousand insects in the trees come through the wide open windows mingled with the 'sh-sh-' of water flowing down the nullah among the trees.

An Englishwoman is seated before the mirror and a Chinese amah is brushing her hair. As she brushes she talke. The mistress has just announced that she doesn't understand one quarter of what her new amah has been saying:—

"Missis no savee my talkee? My talkee plentee English words. My come Hongkong side long time! What? (with a sudden lapse into Cantonese) You talk my language? Then I can talk to you and say all I want and you will understand. I've never had a Missis to work for who understood Chinese words before!

Missis, you've got very nice hair, the kind we Chinese like best, soft and fine, all same silk. And you don't mind it being white. My other Missis like to put powder and mix with water and make their hair yellow colour or brown colour. You are like Chinese, you don't mind grey hair!

Yes, the new cook-boy is my cousin. I think he can't have understood what you said to him this evening. He told me you said he was to buy Sunday's food on Saturday and not to go to market on Sunday. I said he hadn't understood what you meant. . . You don't wish him to buy things on Sunday? . . . That is the custom of the Christians. . . That's very strange! I've been in Hongkong 11 years and I never heard that before! Is that the Jesus-way? Yes, I've heard of Him, but I don't know who He is. But if he taught people to do like that and give their cooks a rest on Sunday morning, He must be a very kind Man! . . No, my other Missis didn't go to church on Sunday: she goes to play ball. I don't know what God she worships. Master used to stay in the house and go to sleep. He was a good master. He understands the heart of a Chinese. . . .

There was another thing my cousin told me to ask you about. You see he is rather shy, he has never been Number One Boy before, always Number Two. He is very good boy, very careful, and he says the Little Brother in the kitchen is too lazy. You don't know what the Little Brother is? He's what the Red Hairs call the Makee-Learn. . . . What? You don't like me to call your country people the Red Hairs? Then I wont say it again, Missis: but all the Chinese in Hongkong say it all the time. . . No, I see what you mean. I shouldn't like it if you talked of us Chinese as the Black Hairs. . . Yes, the Makee Learn is too cheeky. He says the cook is stingy and the new Missis is stingy, because the cook won't let him help himself to bananas and persimmons out of the market basket as he is coming back up the Peak Road. And the house coolie says the same. The old cook always made more than was needed in the dining room, so he got plenty of ice cream and cakes when he had finished washing up. . . . Yes, there is no doubt my cousin is an excellent and valuable cook and will save you much money. When you've got a good boy like that, it's all right to "eat yourself" (do your own housekeeping) but otherwise it's cheaper as the foreign men do when they share a house, three or four together, to "eat the cook" (let the cook feed you by contract). Of course (thoughtfully) you don't get such nice food then, for the cook is afraid to buy too many of the things you like best, or you eat too much and there isn't enough profit for him. . Oh (with a start) I am talking to you as if you were a Chinese! It's so strange to be talking to a Red Ha—an English lady in my own language that I quite forgot!

Yes, Missis, Sunday is the day all the amahs go out for a while. The boys laugh at us. They say there is an Amahs Union like the Boys Union. . . Only we haven't got a Club. Haven't you seen us squatting by the road side under the trees, talk talk, talking? What do we talk about? Oh, mostly money, and how we like our work, and what we can make on the soap and starch, er-er-I mean how much soap and starch we need for our washing every week. Some of the amahs are very particular. They say we must protect ourselves. When I worked at King's Place Hotel, I had a young Missis who used to have her breakfast in bed on Sundays and she would ring her bell for me to go up and talk to her, when she felt lonely. And the other amahs were angry with me. They said it wasn't the custom to work on Sunday if you were a wash-amah and I shouldn't go up. . . . Yes, I like talking, so I didn't see why I shouldn't go up when my Missis rang her bell even though it was Sunday! . . . Sometimes when we squat by the roadside talking an amah from Canton comes and talks to us about Shameen and Dr. Sun and tells us all the latest news. All the amahs and boys in Hongkong love Dr. Sun. He always promises to protect our rights and he says he will take care of us. He is the only official who doesn't want any money for himself. He says, "Let my country house fall to ruins. I won't spend a penny on repairing it until the country has peace." He says "Let me be buried in a pauper's coffin when I die. I want nothing for myself." . . . Oh, yes it's quite true. The amah from Canton told us all this the other day. . . But I think Hongkong is the best place to live in. Canton (with a sudden lapse into Pidgin) too bobbery! (Then back into Cantonese.) There are so many things to see in Hongkong. I go to the pictures sometimes, but that is one of the things that puzzles me about the foreigners. Once at the pictures I saw a woman, who had a husband of her own, creep out into the garden to speak to a man, who was not her husband. Then I saw men trying to kill other men, and boys stealing; and once I saw one man push a woman over a precipice—all very bad sins. Missi, why do the foreigners make pictures of their sins for other nations to look at?

There now I've finished at last (lapses again into Pidgin) Ai Ya, plentee talkee! Missis savee my Chinese talkee, my likee talkee too much! B'long velly good Missis. My good amah! All-o missis talkee me-'Amah, you velly good, my likee you'-so fashion. Missis, you wantchee me, makee ring bell two times—I come!"

(She tucks the mosquito net carefully around her mistress and leaves the room closing the door softly behind her. A grateful silence begins, broken only by the chirrup, chirrup of the insects outside in the trees, and the thin sharp note of mosquitoes in the darkened room.)

THE Ministry of Education has announced a new schedule of school holidays. Hereafter the summer vacation will last 40 days, the New Year holidays 15 days and the winter vacation seven days. One day each for the four seasons' holidays, one day for the worshipping of Heaven, the birthday of Confucius and for the National Day, will complete the free days allowed students.

PITY FOR THE POOR CHINESE SOLDIER

Dog Eat Dog, Soldier and Civilian

By T. E. Grafton.

Many expressions of indignation are appearing these days at the conscription of coolies for war service. We read harrowing tales of poor richsa men and even shopkeepers and their clerks being caught and handcuffed or tied together with ropes: being guarded by soldiers with bayonets that are too frequently used as goads for the laggards, and finally, after days of toil being sent back with little or no remuneration. To those who witness these things for the first time they seem to be the essence of barbarism and cruelty but I for one am frankly glad that this sort of thing has been brought right to the gates of Shanghai for exhibition. It will show the foreigner who has rarely left the benign rule of Shanghai, something of what life in the interior always is, for we witness the same thing on a smaller scale a score of times in a single year. Better still it will show the Chinese inhabitants of Shanghai what their own country, which they so soon forget after a stay in Shanghai, is really like.

The soldier has been pretty thoroughly bowled out. But as one whose work for 20 years has brought him into daily contact with, and observation of, both soldier and, coolie, I am glad to present the other side of the picture. It may not be soothing to Chinese, but after long observation of the perpetual struggle between the soldier and every member of the labouring classes of China, fairness compels me to state that it is a case of dog eat dog.

At the outset let it be said that after all cases are taken into account the demands of the Chinese government upon its labouring classes in time of war are really insignificant. By the Chinese Government I mean not only the Central (?) government but provincial or county, or the will of any military official. The army gets a few thousand coolies, who are compelled to push wheelbarrows or carry loads for a few days: a few hundred junks, sampans and houseboats are rounded up and kept to use for a week or two: but the vast body of the population is absolutely untouched and apart from the actual zone of hostilities is not only uninterested in but ignorant of the conflict. Just compare this with our memories of the late war, where every man was subject to the call of the state and for which we are still paying and bid fair to be paying for another generation.

The first need of any war is transportation. In foreign lands we simply take the railroads away from their owners and use them as we please. The army actually stops motorcars on the road and takes possession, giving a receipt which is poor enough comfort. The coolie is China's transport system and it is a wild dreamer who would expect to see him escape.

Let us suppose for a moment that General Ho or Bei Pao-san was in need of immediate transport for 3,000 men. Let us suppose that they called a mass meeting of the citizens of the community and called for volunteers: or let them insert an advertisement in the daily press urging patriots to flock to the aid of their brethren in arms—how many would answer the call? I do not venture to say what would happen in the highly patriotic port of Shanghai, but I know perfectly well that such an appeal would not bring forward a single man of any description in Haichow. Not only would his call be negatived, but every man possessed of a wheelbarrow or boat would scuttle away as fast and as far as he could travel. From a pacifist standpoint the result would be fine, as the army would be left high and dry, but for the generals in charge of a healthy war it would not be so pleasing.

Hated and Detested.

Every Chinese official knows what the port patriot seems not to know—that no Chinese not connected with the army or any civil department for that matter will give any aid whatsoever of his own volition. The people hate the soldiers and the soldiers are forced to prey on the people. Let a company of soldiers approach a village and by the time they appear in sight every stealable (or saleable) article is hidden carefully away. If the soldier offers money for eggs he is told that there is not an egg in the village. Only a short while ago I stopped for a few days in a market town where a company of soldiers was stationed. Not being well supplied with food I sent out my cook to buy some eggs, but he brought back the word that there was not an egg in the whole village. Local friends confirmed the report but I was sceptical, refusing to believe that all the hens in that large district had gone on a strike. I called in one of my acquaintances and assured him that these eggs were for foreign consumption and that if the hens could be persuaded to lay a few for the sake of hospitality I was sure they would be rewarded. He disappeared for a short while but soon smuggled in the desired articles and I was the only man in town that night who had eggs for supper.

Let us consider a hungry soldier: he has had a long tramp all day, and likely as not been in a fight. He has missed one of his precious meals. When he finds a village that he knows to be prosperous, suddenly barren, he naturally make a diligent search and if he finds a handful of eggs after all the members of a shop or household have sworn to their non-existence, will he be expected to thank all the people present with a bow and proffer the full market value of the eggs? Or will he walk off with them and neglect to pay? If in addition he is wet to the skin and no person will lend him a quilt or a mat is he to sit out a wet cold night or take the first shelter he can find? Remember that the soldier is as much an enemy in the ordinary Chinese village as the French soldier in the Ruhr; to be cheated, overcharged, and, if a dark corner makes it feasible, knifed.

The same is true not only for transportation and foodstuffs but for everything that makes up the life of the soldier. Shanghai knows nothing of what the humble coolie can do when he has a chance to wield the whip hand, as competition there is so great and the labour market so inexhaustible. But if one lands at a little station where there are only a half dozen barrowmen, all working in full accord, he is due to learn something right off the bat. No one rushes to receive his baggage but before they move a hand they calmly begin to talk prices and lucky is the traveller who has to pay only double what the job is worth. And after everything is loaded up ways will be found to bedevil the victim and squeeze him for all he is worth. Some days ago a colleague and I were walking through town and met a crowd of disgruntled barrowmen herded along at the point of several very determined bayonets. I confessed to him my great joy at seeing these ruffian coolies getting their merits at the hands of some who were so much rougher, and he likewise rejoiced. We had both suffered much from this same coolie gang and been forced time and again to apply for official protection against their rapacity and actual violence and it was a grim pleasure to see them forced into service. Having been gouged outrageously by them and again I cannot work up a sob at the thought of their getting nothing but their food for a day's work. I repeat that for soldier and coolie it is a case of dog eat dog.

"Student Soldiers."

There is another matter upon which I am glad to give a warm appreciation and testimony. There has been in the last two years a very strong effort made to elevate the tone of the enlisted man. I do not know what is being in other provinces but Marshal Chi and those subordinate to him have made a most commendable effort. Careful examination has been made of all the material in their camps and every man who already has a smattering of education or shows himself intelligent enough or ambitious enough to assimmilate more has been set aside, relieved from most of the onerous camp duties and given a chance to improve himself. They are known as "student soldiers" and from personal association I am glad to say that they are a new species. But how little aid the civilan community gives them! The present-day soldier is a product, a logical product of Chinese life, and I greatly fear that the enlisted man to-day who makes a real effort to be decent and serve his country will receive from that same country only the seven dollars a month that is doled out to him at irregular intervals as a reward for his virtue.

A SAVING GRACE

[The treaty with Russia is the first in the history of this country in which the King is not mentioned.]

There are few decent things
In this treaty we know,
But there's certainly one compensation:
The promoters have been
Very careful to show
Some little respect to the nation.
We most certainly owe them
Our cordial thanks,
For (surely there isn't a doubt of it)
They all saw the wisdom
When playing these pranks
Of leaving his Majesty out of it!

"THE RECORDER" ON WAR, FORCE AND THE POLICEMAN

By the Rev. T. B. Grafton

When a pacifist sets out to decry the use of Force as having no place in a civilized life he is bound sooner or later to make some distinction between military and civil force, between soldier and police. But whatever distinctions he may draw he cannot get rid of the basic idea of Force. Dwellers in the interior of China to-day will have unusual difficulty in appreciating these fine-spun definitions. My friend General Bei Bao-san hears of a band of robbers 500 strong that have crossed over into his territory from Shantung. He meets them in a fight, kills some dozens and loses some of his own men and officers. A week later at the Tuchun's order he marches to the border in another direction and has the same gains and losses. According to the "Recorder" the general was a policeman last week and a soldier to-day. Last week he was exercising his police powers in time of peace. To-day he is a redhanded warrior. Yet he is using the same men, the same weapons and against men of the same stamp. My Chêkiang friends may take offence at classing the heroes of that provincial army with bandits that come across from the north, and if they can assure me that there are no enlisted bandits in the Chêkiang armies I will humbly apologize. And if in the course of the war the Chêkiang soldiers get into Kiangsu territory and fail to carry off everything portable I will make my apology a full-fledged kotow.

Peace and War.

In the July "Recorder's" editorial columns we find the following gem, quoted from another pacifist, making clear the fundamental difference between peace and war:

"Here is child menaced by a brute with a club. Surely as a last resort a policeman would be justified in using force to protect the child. Yes, but that would not be war. To have an illustration that would be parallel to war, it would be necessary to assume something like this: This policeman in seeking to protect the child would not only kill the big brute, but would also kill his wife and children and a dozen of his friends and their children, setting the village on fire and laying waste their fields: and in addition would start a process which would end in the killing of the child's family and a dozen friends and the destruction of their homes. To parallel war it is necessary to assume that in protecting a single child weapons would be used which would destroy a hundred lives, enemies and friends. That is exactly what war does: for every family that it protects it destroys a hundred others."

The "Recorder's" picture might be changed a little if drawn from actual occurrences during the past two weeks in this very province: a score of brutes (instead of the "Recorder's" one) menace a farm village of several tens of families, and a great many children (instead of the "Recorder's" one)—Not getting their demands at once they kill all the adults, loot and burn the village, and divide the plunder among their wives and children. Here is a job for the police but it evidently does not fit in with the "Recorder's" little picture, so we will let it pass and deal with the picture as he himself draws it.

Let us be thankful that the "Recorder" has recognized one cold hard fact—that there are brutes in the world. We are not given a picture of a benevolent old gentleman wearing a false face and armed with a paper club filled with candy that he is going to give the child after a momentary joke, but of a cruel brute bent on braining a helpless child. And the problem before us is how to deal with brutes.

The Policeman.

The "Recorder," rather reluctantly it seems, admits that "as a last resort the policeman would be justified in using force" and we are obliged to ask what the policeman's first resort would be. Would he take the brute over to the Y.M.C.A. and set him up to a cold drink? Or would he advise the brute to have his glands examined in the hope of changing his disposition? Or would we have the policeman duck in and receive the blow himself as so many seem to think is the policeman's duty? The officer of the law might lose some of his teeth or have his skull cracked, but a few weeks in the hospital would bring him round and he would be able to appear in court and see the brute get a five-dollar fine.

For my part, if my child were in danger, I would be glad to have a policeman of good Irish stock, one who would use his last resort first, and if the immediate result were one less brute, so much the better. It is hard to be patient with some very excellent people who select a single passage of Scripture and distort it out of all reason. The same Teacher who said "Love your enemies" said also, "It were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck and he be cast into the midst of the sea." In speaking of those whose sins towards little ones were only sins of omission. He said "Depart ye into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angles." How easily the pacifist forgets that God's justice is no less a thing than His love and in each are men His agents.

Vox Humana.

Another argument the "Recorder" brings forward is the sad detail about the brute's dear wife and little children. We have a picture of a sweet, gentle woman waiting with an anxious heart for the return of her precious brute: several little children in their white nightgowns are praying for dear daddy"s safe return, little dreaming that some cruel policeman may have run him in. We wonder if these pacifist writers have over known of a marriage between a brute and a woman worthy of the gentlest care. Does the dove mate with the vulture or the lamb with the wolf? But grant for the sake of argument that the brute has such a heavenly household: Shall consideration for his child compel me to sit still and let him murder my own? The "Recorder's" logic (or lack of it) makes such incumbent upon me, for he goes to say that we may "start a process" that will result in the killing of all my other children. Hence I must sit still. Perhaps the brute's appetite for murder will be sated after braining one. But is it not a fundamental law of nature that a brute's appetite for blood is forever on the increase?

It is a fundamental fact of civilization and Christian manhood that every effort, even to the risking of our own lives, must be put forward in defence of the helpless and any father who would calmly see his child murdered rather than "start a process" by which he and all the rest of his family might lose their lives would certainly not deserve to be preserved. It nevers works out that way anyhow, for the only way brutes can be restrained is by the courage of men who are willing to risk all for the sake of one of their little ones.

Man and Brute.

As long as the "Recorder" and other pacifists preach the doctrine of love and peace between man and man they will have the support and sympathy of all forward looking men, but when they try to unite man and brute in a bond of brotherhood they are weakening the cause of real peace.

As a parting word the "Recorder" is reminded what an excellent chance it has to-day to preach that grand old doctrine of the abolition of extraterritoriality. Shanghai is said to be full of refugees with nothing very much to do except to listen to war rumours. If these can be persuaded to return to those "sovereign rights" from which they have departed so precipitately, doubtless a few of those foreigners whose motto seems to be "My country always wrong" will be glad to throw in their lot with them. And if these refugees could be persuaded at the same time to withdraw all their funds from the Shanghai banks and deposit the same in the Chinese banks of Nanking and Shanghai the war would be over in a twinkling and we would see Marhsals Chi and Lu vieing with each other to be first to fall on the "Recorder's" bosom and exclaim "My long lost brother!"

Uncouth behaviour and rowdyism in the House of Representatives in Peking is to be stamped out by an organization of M.P.'s known as the Order Maintaining Committee. This group has laid down a set of rules which it is hoped the members can be induced to follow. Hereafter, during formal meetings, the members are to respect the chairman and abide by his decisions.

A link with the reign of George III. was severed last month when the death took place of Mrs. Edward Stopford, of Falconers Hill, Daventry, at the age of 105 years and 11 months. She was Julia Maria, daughter of Capt. William Wilbraham, R.N., and was born on September 2, 1818, more than a year before the death of George III. on January 29, 1820. She married, on August 6, 1840, Capt. Edward Stopford, R.N., who was the sixth son of Canon the Hon. R. B. Stopford, a grandson of the second Earl of Courtown, and the brother of Admiral R. T. Stopford and of Mr. W. B. Stopford Sackville. Captain Stopford died on October 14, 1895. Mrs. Stopford leaves one daughter, Edith Louisa, who is the widow of Admiral Sir W. R. Kennedy, G.C.B. Her elder son, Lieutenant-Colonel H. E. Stopford, late 36th Regiment, died in December, 1895, and her younger son, Commander Grosvenor Stopford, R.N., died in 1875.

THE BOOK PAGE

NOTES BY THE WAY

Col. T. E. Lawrence has written an introduction to a new edition of the late Dr. Richard Garnett's book, "The Twilight of the Gods," which will be issued by John Lane during the autumn. The book will contain numerous illustrations and will be published at one guinea. Col. Lawrence worked under Dr. Garnett at the time when the latter was Chief Librarian at the British Museum.

Few living writers can have enjoyed a series of such varied and exciting experiences as Colonel Lawrence. The story of his Eastern adventures would fill a volume; but that volume, unfortunately, still remains to be written. After leaving Oxford, where he had a brilliant academic career, he travelled all over Arabia in Arab garb—unrecognized and unsuspected. His services to the British Government were invaluable. He succeeded in uniting the nomadic tribes of Arabia into an effective fighting force, and helped to free Palestine from the Turks. In revenge, the Turks set a price upon his head. They offered a reward of £17,000 if dead. During this period Col. Lawrence blew up 17 enemy trains. Two years ago he again enlisted in the Army as a private under another name.

Mr. R. L. Mégroz's biographical and critical study of Walter de la Mare, published in Britain by Hodder and Stoughton, is now being published in America by Doran. Mr. Mégroz is at work on a study of sex psychology in poetry which will appear with A. M. Philpot towards the close of the year. The aim of the author in this book will be to present an exhaustive survey of European love poetry and at the same time to offer some impartial criticism of the new science of psycho-analysis.

Messrs. Duckworth make the interesting announcement that just before his death Mr. Conrad wrote a preface to "The Nature of a Crime," a short novel he wrote in collaboration with Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer, and also a note on the joint composition of "Romance," an earlier work by the two novelists. Both preface and note will appear in "The Nature of a Crime," which will be ready next month. The final correction of the proofs, state Messrs. Duckworth, must have been one of Mr. Conrad's last literary activities.

The sketches of the Rodeo, which were made by Mr. Charles Simpson during the recent Wembley contests and exhibited in London, will be published in book-form by the Bodley Head, the artist supplying letterpress and Mr. R. B. Cunninghame Graham an introductory essay.

Flight now boasts a voluminous history, and for the non-expert the pictorial side of it is far from the least interesting. Its early stages are admirably represented in a collection of "Aeronautical Prints and Drawings" (63s.), published by Messrs. Halton and Truscott Smith, to which the text is contributed by Lieut.-Col. W. Lockwood Marsh, while Sir Frederick Sykes supplies a foreword. The 87 plates show how the chief early ascents, beginning in the last quarter of the 18th century, were treated by contemporary artists. The detail of some of these representations, as Colonel Marsh warns us, is not to be relied upon in a historical sense, but they are often very spirited in their conception, and it is interesting to note that the original balloon-builders themselves were often much alive to æsthetic considerations in their architecture. In some cases the car emulates the form of a ship very much as the early motor-car inclined to the traditional pattern of the horse-carriage. The whole collection is most attractive, and will show how the efforts of men like Montgolfier and Lumardi struck the imagination of their own times.

Mrs. Stella Burke May undertook her twelvemonth tour through Latin America with a definite purpose. She set out to study social life and especially the mentality of the women in the countries south of the United States frontier, and "Men, Maidens, and Mantillas" (John Long, 21s.) has been written primarily by way of helping her own countrywomen to appreciate the life and manners of their Southern sisters. The book is well done. Mrs. May commands an easy, pleasant style, and is a shrewd observer, not very profound, perhaps, but thoroughly wideawake. Latin methods of courtships attracted her, and are elaborately explained. We learn, for instance, that in Mexico a young man and his young lady converse by means of a telephone let down from the balcony. Thus the conversation can be kept private, yet the proper distances are preserved. Mrs. May learnt a good deal while she was travelling, and duly hands on her lessons. No one who has read her book will again believe that Latin Americans do not wash. Moreover, Mrs. May's observations are not merely those of a traveller. At Santiago she and her husband took a house, and the story of her housekeeping and her servant and her servant's husband makes what is perhaps the jolliest chapter in the book.

CHINA'S NATIVE CRAFT

CHINESE JUNKS AND OTHER NATIVE CRAFT. By Ivon A. Donnelly. Kelly & Walsh, Ld. $6 net.

In his Prefatory Note to this delightful book Mr. Donnelly says:

> ". . . . . To the average Westerner the term 'junk' conjures up visions of a strange, unseaworthy vessel with big eyes, totally unfit to carry man and his commerce across the high seas, but I hope that the introduction and the brief descriptions of the various types, together with the illustrations given, will dispel this idea which is entirely erroneous."

The volume not only dispels this idea, but affords us a view and a knowledge of Chinese shipping of enthralling interest. This is a "larger and improved edition" of a "small book of sketches of Chinese Junks published some four years ago." Would it were larger still. That ungrateful remark will probably be the sigh of most readers. For there is such a fascination in these 142 pages that one must long for more. In his "Conclusion" the author says:

> "We have travelled up the far reaches of the Hoang-ho; we have tapped the upper tributaries of the Yangtze, and traversed the entire coast of China, but have only seen a very small fraction of the millions of craft that ply on the coast, rivers and lakes of China. We have, however, seen a variety of vessels that for beauty of line, decoration and general utility, have no counterpart in the world."

There are 25 black and white illustrations and six in colour in which the author has brought out these beauties in charming fashion. The illustrations are excellently reproduced and, in fact, the whole book is so extraordinarily well done and finished that it is a matter of amazement that it can be sold for the modest sum of six dollars.

One thing that immediately strikes the reader is the extraordinary fact that this feature of Chinese life and civilization has received so little attention heretofore. Mr. Donnelly opens his "Introductory" by saying:

> "Although much has been written on China and her people, very little has been said about one of her most important industries—shipping. And this, notwithstanding the fact that China has been from the earliest times one of the foremost among seafaring nations. This omission is surprising when one remembers that there are more vessels in China than in all the rest of the world put together."

"Surprising" seems a mild word to use in the connexion. And it is surprising not only on account of the numbers and variety of her ships but also on account of the designs and inventions which were in use in China long before they were re-discovered (or copied?) by Western navigators. This author points out, among many examples, the system of watertight compartments as being in use in Chinese vessels many centuries before 1687 when it was written of by Father le Comte.

One would like to go on quoting extracts from this "Introductory" and also from the descriptions of the various craft for two or three columns. But enough has probably been said to give an indication of the importance and charm of the work.

COURTS OF LOVE

"A KNIGHT'S LIFE IN THE DAYS OF CHIVALRY." By Walter Clifford Meller, M.A., S.C.L. Illustrated. Werner, Lawrie. 30s. net.

REVIEWED BY E. B. OSBORN

As the future grows more dark and menacing, while the civilized world awaits the final offensive of the barbarians from below, the thoughts of kindly and cultured folk seek a sanctuary in the bygone ages, which were sufficient to themselves—when for certain immortal moments the secret of human life seemed to have been read aright, and society was as strongly established in human eyes as a castle on a hill-top in the Southern sunlight. One such "Golden Age" existed in Provence before the bright and happy land, where the poorest peasant had his chicken in the pot and his cup of wine ("the water blushed to see her Lord"), was ravaged and ruined for centuries by the so-called Crusade against the Albigenses. "Kill and let God find out His own" was the slogan of the Papal Legate in that horrible war, which was really the kind of thing we call "big business" in these latter days—for the cash which enabled the brutal warriors of Northern France to undertake the adventure was provided by merchant moneylenders on the understanding that they were repaid (with interest) from the looting of the richest countryside in Europe. Ecrasez l'Infâme, cried Voltaire in a later age, but there was no appeal against the triple-crowned Tyrant in the far-off days when a beautiful edifice of civilization was thus wantonly destroyed.

New books on this and that aspect of the Middle Ages are now appearing in which the results of recent researches are presented. The other day we reviewed Professor J. Huizinga's "Waning of the Middle Ages," in which the modern view of the interim aetas as a period with its own glorious culmination is enforced, and now comes a sumptuous work, "A Knight's Life in the Days of Chivalry," a long labour of love on the part of its author, in which the social life of the age of "chevalerie," when the feudal fetters were a little loosened, is minutely portrayed. In particular it contains an excellent account of the Courts or Parliaments of Love, of which the pious and pitiful foundress was Eleanor of Guienne, the wife of our Henry II. and a most valiant and beautiful lady—did not Bernard de Ventadour, her favourite troubadour-knight, find the remembrance of her sweeter than sleep after a hard day in the lists, and more thrilling than the song of the nightingale? The Courts set up by this granddaughter of the royal troubadour, William IX., Count of Poitou and Duke of Aquitaine (he loved her so well that he gave her his domains before his death), served a goodly purpose; for the first time, and for the last time, in the history of the Western world they established a system of jurisprudence in affairs of the affections and executed its enactments. While maintaining that ideal of romantic love which is perhaps the one real achievement of mankind since Athens flamed like a meteor and vanished, they sternly put down its excesses. Love has been cynically defined as a mutual illusion, and the chief object of modern writers seems to be the destruction of its immemorial mirage—of that strange and bewildering aura which has inspired all the greatest art in the world. There can be no true art, least of all an art of living, if the pivotal illusion of life ceased to glorify our folly by teaching us how to be two fools together. And why, since we are willing to make laws and obey in order to mitigate the horrors of War, should we not follow the example of the romantic Eleanor and set up tribunals to soften the rigours of Love? To-day it is said, and with a good deal of truth, that Honour and Love are incompatible—at any rate, for the average woman. But the Mediæval Courts of Love insisted that women should be chivalrous even in affairs of the heart, and those who would not deal honourably with their lovers were branded as mere courtesans and ruthlessly cast out of the fellowship of gentle souls. Perhaps the bright, young people who have been annoying Puritanical persons by organizing nocturnal treasure hunts in London will turn their attention to the possibility of instituting modern Courts of Love.

Many of the rulings of the fair jurisconsults of Provence (they were almost all married ladies or widows; Jugonne de Sabrar was the only spinster in the Court of Rohanin) have been preserved, and a large number of the more celebrated trials. Here are some of the rulings from André's "Livre de l'Art d'Aimer":

(1) No one can really love two persons at the same time.
(2) Love never stands still; it always increases—or diminishes.
(3) Love is always an exile where avarice holds his dwelling.
(4) A new love affair banishes the old one completely.
(5) The affection of love invariably increase under the influence of jealousy.
(6) A lover can never be surfeited with the consolations which his beloved may offer him.
(7) Nothing prevents one lady being loved by two knights, or one knight by two ladies.

These will perhaps be classed as platitudes—a name we are in the habit of giving to the truths that are overlooked because of their obviousness. A modern Court, no doubt, would present us with a series of more subtle and detailed rulings—for the aphorism De minimis non curat Lex is never applicable in affairs of the honourable heart. Yet I believe that the cases which came up before, say, a tribunal would often closely resemble some of the causes celébres decided by Queen Eleanor, or Ermengarde of Narbonne, or the lady who rewarded Jaufre Rudel of Blaia for his far-off devotion in the manner described by Swinburne:

Oh, brothers, the gods were good to you,
Sleep, and be glad while the world endures,
Be well content as the years wear through,
Give thanks for life, O brother, and death;
For the last sweet sound of her feet, her breath,
For gifts she gave you gracious and fair,
Tears and kisses—that lady of yours.

Here, in conclusion, are examples of leading decisions. [Queen Eleanor, C.J.] A lover, having vainly entreated a lady for her love and being unable to overcome her reluctance, sent her many presents which were accepted with joy and graciousness. Nevertheless, she still refused him the least sustenance. Judgment was to the effect that a lady determined to be inflexible must not accept gifts, and defendant was ordered to compensate her lover or be classed and cast out as a mere courtesan.

[Before the Court of Ladies of Gascony.] A knight, having been proved guilty of revealing the secrets of his sweet intimacy, was condemned to be disowned in every assemblage of knights and ladies, and it was furthermore decided that any lady who in future accepted his love was to be refused the friendship of all honourable women.

[Before the Countess of Champagne, J.] A lover sued a lady for damages (intellectual, moral, and physical) for pricking him with a pin while she was kissing him. The wound having been proved to exist by a leech called in by the Court, and the defendant's rebutting evidence having been disproved, the sentence was that the lady should kiss the place, when required, until it was well.

Whether or not the modern Court of Love, which will be established as a result of this dissertation, should sit in public, is a matter for careful discussion. If it does not sit in camerâ, I should think the proceedings would be fully reported in the Press and that there would be no standing room left at any of its sessions.

THE WEIGHTED WORD

DON QUIXOTE, AND OTHER SONNETS. By the Hon. Grace Tollemache. J. M. Ouseley and Son. 5s. net.

One fears that Wordsworth's influence has been responsible for the sonorous sonnet which, with its overweight of words, is a little frightening. With him it touched perfection, a melody of thoughtfulness, but with lesser stars how easily it droops and slackens. "Don Quixote," with which this volume opens, is an instance. The writer is moved by delight in Cervantes, but her enthusiasm is hardly conveyed to the reader. The sonnet is an exercise of the mind rather than of the heart. Moreover, it is somewhat halting with the unequal line,

> What boon companious as soon could we spare.

Happier is the thought, contrasted with the creations of Cervantes' genius, > men of flesh and blood

> Are but as shadows and as shadows pass.

The classic example of this type of sonnet, of which Miss Tollemache has many, is the Chapman sonnet. Conceived in the brain of Keats, it yet comes from the heart, full of emotion, musically expressed, something which may be enjoyed apart from any knowledge of Chapman's achievement.

Better are the poems in less difficult forms: "In Kensington Gardens," with its opening verse,

> The sun sets through the old Elm-trees,
> The Round Pound's opal mirror pales,
> And gallantly before the breeze
> The mimmic ships spread out their sails.

or "A Moment," with its philosophic sadness,

> A moment's bliss, and life has little more
> For King or bard or lover!

The sad truth is that a long volume, such as this, reveals how hard a mistress poetry is. Like the moment's bliss, she must be caught in the moment and imprisoned while her loveliness is still fresh. Hard thinking is no substitute for emotion.

Miss Tollemache needs more freedom, more abandon. Her verse lacks the spontaneity that comes with choosing subjects which really mean something to her. It is not sufficient to say, "I will make a poem of this pretty child." There must be some point or aspect which moves the poet to expression, not necessarily irresistible, but with a fire that has a kindling glow.

We may cite "To my God-daughter, aged five months." The poem lacks the concentration derived from a single thought, and does the poet really wish that

> So dark your eyes, your lashes long and sweeping,
> Oh, may they never once have cause for weeping.

ABOUT IT AND ABOUT....

"THE MARRIAGE CRAFT." By D. H. S. Nicholson. (Cobden-Sanderson. 6s.)

It is unfortunate that the publication of Mr. Nicholson's disquisition as fiction should have coincided with the revival of Mr. Bernard Shaw's disquisition as drama on the same subject. For Mr. Nicholson has nothing to add to the wisdom, wit, and folly of Mr. Shaw's "Getting Married," except a few private stupidities of his own which are as unhelpful as Mr. Shaw's, and are, alas! unamusing. His party of strange beings on a barge who agree to devote a week to discussing sex and marriage is a dull party, and the whole argument suffers from the absence of the grocer and the absence of Mrs. George, the two persons in whom Mr. Shaw recognizes the existence and the power of common sense and of ecstasy. Mr. Nicholson, like so many moderns, allows his personages to use the most scientific language, which confuses all issues. For instance, the first day's agenda are as follows:—

> The purpose of sex. Physical reproduction? Mental creation? Spiritual development? Or all three?

The choragus of the party discourages metaphysics, wishing to keep discussion on a practical, scientific, and emotional plane. Yet no one points out to him how large a philosophical question is begged in the first four words. You cannot speak of "purpose" without being metaphysical. Why, in the strict plane of physical science, should sex, or indeed anything else, have any "purpose"?

Mr. Nicholson shows a little skill in his characterisation—Pearce, the commonplace, hearty husband; Ronald, the silly, shocking young modern; Henry, the mystic, celibate priest; and Peter, the buffle-headed sentimentalist, are well drawn in a simple way; but their conversation is too devastatingly like what it actually might be to make an entertaining book.

THE WOMAN'S PAGE

OUTSTANDING FASHIONS IN STATIONERY

If this season the summer vacationist flings away an old resolution to confine her correspondence to the addressing of a few post cards, and finds a new delight in note writing, it won't be a surprise to the stationers.

They have laid a tempting snare for the feet—no, not the feet, but the ink tracks—of the epistolary enthusiast. That purse-wrecking curiosity which makes a woman wonder just how a letter in her handwriting will look on a certain attractive sheet of paper and on its distinctive envelope is a motive power of which stationery designers have availed themselves, and because of their new offerings letter writing is expected to rise to a high crest.

If the postman is burdened with added baggage that lengthens his long summer days, at least one of his former petty worries is eliminated. The tiny note, that was wont continually to slip out of his pack, but had to be, because it was essential to the personality of any truly "dainty woman," is something which he can afford to smile at now as a memory. The three-by-two pink note of yesterday has slipped out of his pack for good and all Instead there is an eight-by-four gray one that refuses to be lost.

"There," said a saleswoman, holding it up, as she stopped at one of the stationery counters of a large department store, before which she moved as respectfully as if treading the paths of her neighbour's flower garden, "is an envelope of character. It's like the woman of to-day. It means something—and people are bound to notice it."

She was exhibiting one of the most popular envelopes of this season. In size it is long enough to encase a wide sheet of deckle edge paper, which folds tablet wise into three sections; in colour it charms with a dove-tone gray; in quality it shows a smooth and peninviting texture, and in price it is moderate enough to interest almost everyone.

To many shoppers, the large-sized stationery for women is not a new thing. It may, nevertheless, be surprising to some how it has become. This year has shown such a decided turn of general taste in this direction that those who sell writing-paper are no longer describing this style as a fad, but as "something that belongs to the modern woman."

"Letterette" Paper

The long gray envelope is conservation compared to some of the papers now being sold for social use. One of the shops includes in its most exclusive stock, an envelope of formidable dimensions almost undreamed of heretofore, except perhaps for valentines. The envelope is equal in size, approximately, to the cover of the average book of modern fiction, measuring in some instances, 5½ inches in width and 7½ inches in length. The corresponding paper fits into the envelope without folding.

This is a style belonging distinctively to the new season. Known in some shops as the "Letterette" paper, it originated as a substitute for the usual note paper which folds once to fit into a small envelope. It is still used in the note size, but the advantage of writing on paper that one does not have to fold is proving so great in appeal that the style, as we have seen, is carried out in the larger sheets for letters as well as in the note size. While this non-folding style is a specialty chiefly of the shops catering to those who buy expensive papers, it is available at one or two of the department stores, where it is democratically priced.

A rather indefinitely-drawn colour line in stationery is perceptible in the various shops. One of the oldest and most luxurious of the Fifth Avenue establishments, designed as a gallery of beauty for the great majority and the shopping place of the few, discerns among its clientele a falling away of late from colour in writing paper and a conspicuous preference for white. A few of the most delicate tints, the lavender-line paper or the gray-line paper, serve to satisfy this season a waning preference for colour. But white paper, especially that with a dull kid finish, is reported to be the season's fad. This comes in three weights, of which the heaviest is the most fashionable. Here there is no one prevailing size. According to the dimensions of your handwriting, so should your letter paper be, says the expert at this bureau, where there are no ready-made assortments of stationery but instead a system is followed of studying and suiting individual tastes.

Novelty Papers

Colours, however, are holding their own in stationery, as in clothes, in some of the more generally-frequented shops. This is true more of the linings than of the paper itself, however. The French importations have envelope linings of brilliant blue tissue paper, deep violet, and combinations in striped or cross-bar effect that certainly do not suggest an uncompromising swing to the conservative. A new Parisian paper, which during its brief experience in New York shops has given promise of winning favour, is delicate blue with the edges "bleeded" in a much darker shade of blue. This is an effective variation of the coloured border idea, sponsored by all dealers now. It is a style of printing that gives the impression of the borders being roughly washed on, by brush and is attracting attention from those who like novelties.

READY FOR THE WORLD OUTSIDE

Blue and gray are the predominating colour-motifs in monograms. Many shades of blue are combined with silver, none of these being more beautiful, perhaps, than the deep blue, bordering on violet, which is used as a background for silver letters. "Cut-out" monograms, in which the spaces within letters are opened, leaving revealed the paper underneath, are popular with many, because of their rather lacy effect. Square and octagonal monogram plates are much in vogue. The less definite outline of the plate providing for long, thread-like letters are seen, too, and are charming to many women, although not the outstanding choice.

The uniformity so conspicuously lacking in women's stationery is readily noticeable in the new boxes of writing paper for men. Heretofore, dealers say, not much attention has been paid to the tastes of men. Now there are available gift boxes, providing for extensive use, containing six packages of envelopes and a drawer of paper, arranged in the most convenient manner possible, in contrast with the more involved system in gift boxes of women's stationery, with their usual variety of letter size, note size and correspondence card, and the packages of graded envelopes, to draw from.

Interest in distinctive writing paper seems to be gaining ground insistently. Not among the selected few alone, but in the case of almost everybody the fashion is in favour of choosing something that is individual. In conformity with this trend, the shops are showing unprecedented varieties and are striving to introduce into even their plainest lines an outstanding note of "character."—"Christian Science modern woman."

Critical Father

"Is not my bathing-dress becoming, Dad?"

"Well, it may be coming, but is not some of it rather late?"

In Reverse

"How well does Miss Nisbett sing?"

"Well, if you've never heard her, you have got something to look backward to."

"Well, then, I'll take half a yard of it."

Thoroughly Chaperoned.

Mr. Spoonabit (apprehensively): "When I am in the library with your sister, Donald, do you peep through the keyhole?"

Donald: "Don't get a chance—you see, mother's generally there."

STOLEN FRUIT

From lack of use, delicate things will get so covered with dust that you can never tell what they really look like. In the same way you can seldom tell what are the innermost desires of a maiden lady of 45. Madeline Maxton lived in a tiny cottage in Surrey, where she kept cats and chickens, and looked under the bed every night for a man. Outwardly she was as austere as a pickled onion; she subscribed for flannel knickers for the heathen, and was a pillar of all the church activities. But inwardly this virago, whose flinty face had been known to make a horse bolt, hated flannel, and actually loved "undies"—those soft, pink, alluring things which have gone a long way towards making England what she is to-day.

She seldom gratified her desires—not because she was poor, for she had half a cubic foot of War Loan stuffed into the teapot on the mantelpiece, but she was so mean that even her favourite cat was afraid to stand in a draught, because it was so thin it might have blown away.

One day there knocked at her door a smartly dressed girl who carried a suitcase. Madeline noted that she herself was about a foot taller and much bonier than the visitor, so she was not afraid of being robbed. The girl explained that she was selling material for lingerie, and could she see Madeline's mother? Madeline smiled at this Machiavellian shaft, and demanded to see the material. It proved to be crêpe de Chine, of the very heaviest quality, but at a price which astounded her. It was half a crown a yard.

"What's the matter with it?" said Madeline suspiciously. "Did you come by it honestly?"

"If you ask no questions," said the girl, " you won't hear anything that will shock you."

By this time Madeline's mouth was watering so much that she mentally determined to go without her afternoon cup of tea. She could imagine what that crêpe de Chine would look like made up. She fingered it lovingly, and at the same time said, "I couldn't dream of it."

"Look here," said the girl. "I'll tell you what I'll do. It's a gift at the money, but I want to get rid of it. If you'll buy the lot, I know a dressmaker in Halbury who owes me a turn. I'll send her out here to you, and she'll make the stuff up into whatever you like, at half the usual prices."

It was too utterly wicked for words. Madeline thrilled like Robin Hood when he picked the steel pocket of his first Norman victim. She hesitated, and was lost. Ten minutes later the smartly dressed girl went away with five one-pound notes and left Madeline in possession of about 15 pounds' worth of sinful frill.

The same night a respectable motherly woman called and said she was the dressmaker in question. Madeline spent a sensual hour debating the designs in the pattern books, and the respectable woman took the stuff away to cut it out and make it up.

Madeline is still waiting for her return. She is going to wait some time. The smartly dressed girl is still hawking that same crêpe de Chine in a different part of England, and her mother, the respectable dressmaker, still goes and retrieves it the same night so that they can sell it to somebody else.

Stolen fruit is the sweetest—if you can hold on to it.—Milton Bures in "Suarks Annual."

A SORRY TALE

He was a knight in armor,
She was a beggar chit;
He loved her to distraction—
She didn't care a bit.

He passed her little hovel,
She didn't raise her head,
Though he shone in shining armor
And she had to beg her bread.

Now maids who live in hovels
Seldom refuse their charms
To glorious knights in armor—
They usually leap to their arms.

Then why was she so distant,
If such maids seldom are?
Well—he was a movie extra,
And she was a movie star.

—B. B. in "Life."

WOMEN OUT-OF-DOORS

Natural Philosophy of Clothes for Feminine Nature Lovers

She stood on the mountain-top, golden curls flying, silk blouse fluttering in the breeze, her sheer stockings scratched by brambles, her tiny slippers cutting sharp heel-prints in the earth." It is true that she wore knicker-bockers, a mannish hat, a gay handkerchief tied about her throat. But, doubtless, a camera clicked steadily from the bushes recording every one of her sportsmanlike gestures.

This, it is to be hoped, is only a screen version. Knickerbockers and a Stetson do not make the outdoor woman. There was a time, not very long ago, when women seemed to think they did—or perhaps, when they thought too little about the whole matter. They wore sports clothes unbecomingly and inappropriately—costumes of a wrong cut, at the wrong time. For, severe coats and knickerbockers, unless well made, can be very trying, and, unless worn with the correct accessories and when the occasion demands them, can be very ludicrous.

"Sports Specialists"

Now, conditions are changing. Manufacturers, patterning their models on the excellent lines of English sports clothes, are making attractive outdoor costumes that are correct for every occasion. And the woman of fashion is learning the true uses of sports wear. She no the golf course or in fancy sweaters on horseback. She is aided in her selection by salespeople in the smart shops who are specialists in this line—who have first-hand knowledge of sports in which women engage and their requirements.

The Englishwoman is a helpful example because, for centuries, she has known how to dress for encounters with field and stream. She enters sports in a workmanlike manner. She considers weather-and-comfort first and appearance afterward. And, in following her lead, it is pleasant to discover that an appropriate costumes—is almost always attractive.

Just as golf clothes would be ridiculous at dinner, so furbelows and pseudo sports costumes are ridiculous in the mountains. There is a time for every costume, and every costume should be worn in its time—and only in its time. Though the moving-picture heroine may totter through craggy valleys on high heels, and the inexperienced sportwoman may appear in knickerbockers when knickerbockers are unnecessary, still the true sportswomen and and the women of fashion have learned what to wear in the outdoor world and when to wear it.—"Vanity Fair."

FIRES

The little fires that Nature lights—
The scilla's lamp, the daffodil—
She quenches, when of stormy nights
Her anger whips the hill.

The fires she lifts against the cloud—
The irised bow, the bearing tree—
She batters down with curses loud,
Nor cares that death should be.

The fires she kindles in the soul—
The poet's mood, the rebel's thought—
She cannot master, for their coal
In other mines is wrought.

—Joseph Campbell in The Nation and the Athenæum.
